

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

IN the preparation of this Commentary on the Catholic Epistles no pains have been spared to make it useful to Anglo-American readers. More than three years of labour have been bestowed upon it; and the translation of several Epistles, originally made from the earlier German editions, has been carefully revised by the latest. The addenda are numerous, and have entailed a vast amount of work. They will speak for themselves. It is hoped that the readings of the Codex Sinaiticus, uniformly embodied in this Commentary, the constant reference to the best English and other divines, ancient and modern, and the extracts from their comments on this section of the New Testament, will place the reader in possession of every element necessary to the understanding of these Epistles.

I have endeavoured faithfully to comply with the general principles regulating the translation; and if the reproduction of the style of four different writers presented peculiar difficulties, it is gratifying to me that none of the Catholic Epistles in Lange's Commentary have ever before been translated into English. The diversity of style, to which I have just referred, will be especially apparent in the Introduction and the Critical and Exegetical portions of the Epistles of St. James, from the pen of Dr. Lange. He has an extraordinary genius for word-coining, and some of his combinations are so graphic, telling and original, that I have deemed it proper to reproduce them in English for the reason that these somewhat grotesque and strange-looking words have often the effect of stimulating the mental activity of the reader. The context is generally their commentary; where this was not the case in the original, due recourse has been had to periphrastic explanations.

On many questions I differ from the authors, and the addenda are mostly made to remove onesidedness of statement. In numerous instances, however, I hesitated to express my dissent, because I did not think it fair to carry on a controversy with them in the pages of their own works. I am only responsible for the matter in brackets, [     ], marked M.

May the Divine blessing rest upon my humble endeavours to aid in the elucidation of this important and interesting section of the Inspired Volume!

To the reader I would say: "Errorēs pauci fuerint si forte libello,—errores paucos tollat amica manus!"

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION OF JAMES.

THIS Commentary on the Epistle of James is the joint work of my respected friend, Dr. van Oosterzee and myself. The Introduction, the translation and the Critical and Exegetical notes, are my work; the Doctrinal and Homiletical sections have been supplied by Dr. van Oosterzee. I heartily thank my friend and collaborator for the cheerful and valuable help he has thus far bestowed upon this Commentary.

With respect to the sections undertaken by me, there were especially two reasons which made the work one of peculiar interest to me. In the first place, I was anxious to improve this opportunity to testify against the old Ebionito-apocryphal fiction of non-apostolic brothers of the Lord, who were, at the same time, held in high Apostolic repute. In the second place I desired to express my conviction that the Epistle of James (like the First Epistle of Peter and the Epistle to the Hebrews) cannot be sufficiently appreciated unless the history of the world, at the time when it was written, be constantly referred to, viz., the beginnings of that great Jewish revolution against the Romans, which, with its national sympathies, was, to the Jews in general, a great temptation to become hardened, and to the Jewish Christians an equal temptation to apostasy. This historical reference, hitherto neglected, in my opinion, can only prove advantageous to the exposition of this Epistle. In this sense I have been working; may the fundamental thought of my work be attested by blessed results.

I only add that I did not expect that my honoured collaborator would forthwith apply in the Doctrinal and Homiletical sections the aforesaid points of view, which have still to fight for recognition among theologians. On the contrary I thought it most desirable that the universal side of the Epistle should be fully developed in the Doctrinal and Homiletical sections without special reference to its historical points; and, indeed, the independence of my friend, led me to expect an execution of his work carried out in this sense. The Commentary, as a whole, has doubtless gained in allsidedness by this recognition of the universal by the side of the historical point of view.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION OF JAMES.

MY respected friend and coöperator, Dr. van Oosterzee, has charged me to represent him also in this Preface to the second edition. The first thing to be said imports the assurance that each has carefully, revised, and here and there rectified or improved his respective part, without subjecting the original shape of the work to unnecessary changes.

Since the publication of the first edition Dr. van Oosterzee has been called and translated to Utrecht in the capacity of Professor ordinarius of Theology; he himself has thus occasioned the first and very gratifying change on the title-page. Another call, namely, the removal of our friend, the Rev. Chantepie de la Saussaye, from Leyden to Rotterdam, had, alas, the consequence that the note on page 5 of the first edition [not inserted in the translation for this very reason—M.] could not be fulfilled, according to which he had undertaken the preparing of the Johannean Epistles, but found himself for an indefinite period prevented to carry his task into effect. But, by the help of God, said section of this Commentary passed from one competent hand to another. Our whole work, moreover, has lately made considerable progress; the publishers, as well as the authors, may look back upon the road already traversed, with cheerful gratitude, and forward to the goal with increasing hope.

With reference to exegesis there have appeared since the publication of the first edition in 1862, four theological novelties in our field of labour, which deserve to be noticed: The second edition of the Commentary on James, from the pen of Dr. Huther, appeared in 1863; last year the third edition of the respective section of de Wette's Handbook, prepared by Dr. Brückner; in the same year also a new commentary, of considerable extent, on this Epistle, from the pen of the lately deceased venerable Professor Bouman of Utrecht, published after his death by his sons under the title of "Hermann Bouman, Theol. Dr. et in Acad. Rhenotraject. Prof. Ord. Commentarius perpetuus in Jacobi Epistolam post. mortem auctoris editus. Trajecti ad Rhenum apud Kemink et Filium, 1865." To these Commentaries must be added the publication of the Codes Sinaiticus.

The second edition of Huther's Commentary on the Epistle of James, having been concluded as early as October, 1862, has not led to reciprocal discussions between it and our exegetical work. Interesting is Huther's discussion with his reviewer, Professor Frank of Erlangen, introduced into the preface owing to the circumstance that his reviewer misconstrued the statement that Paul also teaches a consideration of works in the final judgment. Dr. Brückner has referred to our work both in the Introduction and in his exposition. The circumstance, that we could not move that highly-esteemed theologian to pronounce in favour of the radical modifications of the exegesis of this Epistle, in consequence of the definite historical construction which we have put on it, does not disturb us or fill us with doubt; it must also be borne in mind that he had to deal with the revision of a book which, as the preparation of a mandatory work, imposed upon him the most rigid self-constraint. In opposition to our statement that the author designed to fortify the Jewish Christians against the already roused revolutionary spirit of the Jews, without incautiously drawing the impending revolution in over-distinct colours, Brückner simply contends that then the "political fanaticism" ought at least to have been touched in the Epistle. In reply we have to observe, that it is characteristic of the apostolical wisdom of the author to oppose political fanaticism only in its religious motives and roots. These motives and roots, however, appear plain enough by replies to the following questions: 1. Which was the greatest common cause of all the twelve tribes of the Jews in part believing, in part still receptive of belief, during the sixth decade after the birth of Christ? 2. Which could be the manifold common temptations which through patience and steadfastness they were to change into all joy? Or, to be still briefer, which was at that time the common great trial of faith of the twelve tribes? And wherein had, consequently, the common proof to consist? 3. Why does the Apostle, after the general warning against representing the general temptation as a temptation from God, i. e. as a provocation, pass at once to the condemnation of wrath? 4. And what, in particular, is the import of the warning in chapter iii. 13 sqq., which even progresses to the naming of ἀκαταστασία as the result of ζήλος and ἐριθεία? Similar questions arise from each separate section of our Epistle in opposition to the non-historical construction of our Epistle as being merely a collection of edifying exhortations to good moral conduct, but where it is anything but edifying that the author straightway assumes that the poor were disregarded at worship and otherwise neglected in all the twelve tribes of the dispersion, and that the rich Christians were guilty of conduct that he felt justified or rather constrained to utter a woe on them. We reiterate the expression of our conviction, that the non-appreciation of the historical motives and prophetic-symbolical phraseology of the Epistle leaves its great one fundamental thought well-nigh unopened, and this is proved by the extraordinary misconstructions which have been put upon it.

Bouman, the venerable veteran of Dutch theology, who left his Commentary in manuscript, like a testament, to the care of his sons, has first of all gladdened us by the decisiveness and scientific force with which he represents in the Introduction the view that the author of our Epistle could have been none other than the Apostle Jacobus Alphaei. May this example be a sign that theological science begins to turn away from the all-confounding and self-confused prejudice, that a non-apostolical James had risen to the highest apostolical repute in the apostolical Church, because he was a brother of the Lord according to the flesh, who at a late period became converted to the faith. We discover also a welcome agreement of the author with this Commentary in the assumption that the Epistle, though primarily addressed to Jewish Christians, had also the secondary design of converting the receptive Jews to the faith; and that this circumstance accounts also for the prophetic colouring of the Epistle. His attaching particular importance to the parallelism between the Apostle as the head of the Church at Jerusalem and the High priest with reference to the Jewish dispersion, appears to us as not unfounded; but the hypothesis that the Epistle dates from the earliest time of the propagation of Christianity, does not induce us to change the view expressed by us in this respect in this Commentary, or to fortify it by the production of new arguments. The exposition itself resembles variously the Scholia-form, and moves in the track of the customary general and abstract construction of the Epistle, takes, however, in a learned and independent manner, cognizance of modern exegetes, and manifests also with reference to the Codex Sinaiticus a free critical judgment.

The readings of the Sinaiticus, wherever they appeared to be important, have mostly been added to the critical notes.

May the joint preparation of this Epistle continue to be blessed in promoting the vital appreciation of the glorious totality of the Scripture as the Word of God, which appreciation must be consummated in the belief that all the writings of Paul and of James are in perfect agreement with one another, and with the whole Scripture.

INTRODUCTION.

THE EPISTLE OF JAMES BEING THE FIRST AMONG THE SO-CALLED CATHOLIC EPISTLES, IT IS NECESSARY TO FOUND THE PARTICULAR INTRODUCTION TO THE EPISTLE OF JAMES ON A MORE GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES.

I. THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES IN GENERAL.

1. THE TERM "CATHOLIC EPISTLES" AND THEIR STATUS (GERM. Bestand).

The term "Catholic Epistles" embraces the seven Apostolic Epistles, which, besides the Pauline Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews added to them, are found in the Canon of the New Testament; namely the Epistle of James, the two Epistles of Peter, the three Epistles of John and the Epistle of Jude.

According to the primary and original meaning of ἐπιστολὴ καθολικὴ, it denotes an encyclical writing, which as such was primarily addressed not to individual Churches or persons, but to a larger ecclesiastical sphere, to a number of Churches. In this sense Clement of Alexandria (Stromat. iv.) calls the Epistle of the Apostles and of the Church at Jerusalem addressed to Christian congregations according to Acts xv. 22-29 an ἐπιστολὴ καθολικὴ. So Origen (contra Celsum i. 63) calls the Epistle of Barnabas, the contents of which characterize it an encyclical writing, καθολικὴ. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. v. 18) reports that Apollonius reproached Themison, the Montanist, with having written in imitation of the Apostle (probably John) an ἐπιστολὴ καθολικὴ. This shows that the universal character of the First Epistle of John was designated by the term 'Catholic' as early as the time of Apollonius, that is: in the beginning of the third century. Even Origen applies this designation in this sense to the First Epistle of John (in the Commentary of John), to the First Epistle of Peter (according to Euseb. vi. 25), and to the Epistle of Jude, but in passages which are found only in a Latin translation (Comment. in epist. ad Roman.). In the time of Eusebius, the term 'Catholic' was already applied to the whole group of Epistles, which we call Catholic. "James," he says "is said to have written the first of the Catholic Epistles;" and then adverts to "the seven Epistles called Catholic." (Hist. Eccl. ii. 23). The meaning "Epistles more general as to their contents and object," which Guerike considers to be primary, could only be secondary, because it generally resulted from the nature of the encyclical writing; for the very first Catholic Epistle (Acts xv.) was not general as to its object and contents. There was but one step from changing the originally somewhat general character of these circular letters which assigned to them a more enlarged sphere of the Church, into one altogether general. Thus the Apostolic Epistle (Acts xv.) was already destined to apply to the whole Gentile-Christian Church, while the Epistle of James and probably that to the Hebrews were designed for the whole Jewish-Christian Church. In this sense, Oecumenius (Prolegom. in Epist. Jacob.) declared that they had been called 'Catholic,' inasmuch as they had not been addressed to a particular people or city, like the Epistles of Paul, but to believers in general (as a whole, καθόλου), whether to Jewish Christians of the dispersion or even to all Christians, as members of the same faith.

In the Western Church the term epistolæ canonice instead of catholicæ obtained great currency from the time of Junilius and Cassiodorus (see Credner, Introd. p. 570). That this could not have been the original sense follows decisively from the fact that Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. ii. 23) applies the term 'Catholic' also to the Epistles of Dionysius of Corinth to the Churches at Lacedæmon, Athens, etc. But Eusebius probably combined also here with the idea of the encyclical character the idea of the universal, for he remarked concerning said Dionysius and his Epistle, "that he was most useful to all (ἀπασιν absolutely) in the Catholic Epistles which he addressed to the Churches." Yet Eusebius gave already occasion that the idea of general reception or canonicity was combined with the idea of partial or entire universality by saying of the First Epistle of Peter: "The First Epistle of Peter is universally acknowledged, but the Acts of Peter, the Gospel according to Peter, the Preaching and the Revelation of Peter are not among the Catholic writings." [Hist. Eccl. iii. 3—M.].—It is evident that neither the idea of universality nor that of canonicity could be applied absolutely to the Catholic Epistles as contrasted with those of Paul. If they were called universal, the reference was to their more general tenor, if they were called canonical, the reference was at once to their more general contents and to their direct general authority, without any intention of seeking thereby to weaken the less direct universality and canonicity of the Pauline Epistles.

Besides this definition of the term 'Catholic Epistles,' another has arisen in modern times, Hug in his Introduction to the Writings of the New Testament ii. p. 429 observes as follows: "After the Gospels and the Acts had been referred to one division and the writings of St. Paul to another, there were still remaining the writings of different authors which might again be collected under one head and had to be distinguished by a name of their own. They might most aptly be called καθολικὴν σύνταγμα of the Apostles and the writings contained in it κοινὰ and καθολικαί, these two words being frequently used as synonyms by Greek writers." In proof of this statement, Hug brings forward the declaration of Clement of Alexandria concerning the Apostolical Epistle, Acts xv. 23, namely, the Catholic Epistle in which all the Apostles took part. But τῶν ἀποστόλων πάντων has not the meaning which Hug discovers in it. He then cites the judgment of Eusebius that the "First Epistle of Peter is universally acknowledged, but the Acts of Peter, the Gospel according to Peter, the Preaching and Revelation of Peter are not among the Catholic writings." This, according to Hug, denotes the class to which the Apostolical writings in general were then referred. But the citation from Eusebius established rather the contrast between writings acknowledged and writings not acknowledged. The circumstance, finally, that the Epistle of Barnabas is called Catholic, he tries to account for by the assertion that Barnabas also was sometimes called an Apostle. But the true explanation must be sought in its contents, for in the time of Origen, the Epistle of Barnabas was neither acknowledged as Apostolical nor as Canonical. In the sense of Hug, it has also been attempted to draw a parallel between the origin of the Canon of the Old Testament and that of the Canon of the New. For it is maintained that as in the formation of the Canon of the Old Testament, after the Thorah and the Prophets had been collected under their respective heads, the remaining sacred writings, in general, were collected under the head of Hagio-grapha; so, in the formation of the Canon of the New Testament, after the Gospels and the Pauline Epistles (εὐαγγέλιον and ἀπόστολος) had been collected, the remaining sacred writings of the New Testament were collected under the head "Catholic Epistles," i. e. writings of the New Testament in general (καθόλου).—Apart from possible objections to that view of the Old Testament, it is self-evident that in that case the reference ought to have been to Catholic writings and not to Catholic Epistles, and that then both the Revelation and the Epistle to the Hebrews ought to have been included in the last-named class.

Credner gives the following natural account of the old arrangement of the Canon of the New Testament: "First historical notices of Jesus (the Gospels); then such notices of the Apostles; then general (catholic) Epistles of the Apostles; then Epistles to separate congregations and to individuals (the Epistles of Paul). This primary arrangement originated in a clear perception of what was collected and why it was collected."

But the ideal principle of division has evidently been modified by historical relations. A division purely made with reference to subject-matter, would require the Epistle to the Ephesians and that to the Hebrews to be included among the Catholic Epistles, the second and third Epistles of John to be excluded from them. The latter, however, were considered as supplemental to the first Epistle of John, and the former retained by the great mass of the Pauline Epistles, as it were, by attraction.

2. THE IMPORT OF THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES IN THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The Catholic Epistles, comprehending only a small part of the New Testament Canon, are of the utmost importance on account of the completeness and fulness of that part. As the four Gospels are designed mutually to complement each other, so here the types of the doctrine of James, Peter and John, complement the type of the doctrine of Paul. By this complementing they preserve the Christian consciousness from a one-sided culture of the Pauline expression; by the variety and fulness of their modes of treatment and expression, they guarantee the fulness of Christian cognition and the full vitality and motion of the churchly spirit. Paul has been called the Apostle of faith; John the Apostle of love, Peter the Apostle of hope. This is a very imperfect mode of distinction, because, to name only one reason, it is exclusively Pauline; it denotes, nevertheless, the riches of the Apostolical complements furnished by the Catholic Epistles. These Epistles, moreover, are highly important as mirroring the condition of the Church during the latter period of the Apostolic age. In this respect they constitute an indispensable connecting-link between the Acts and the Pauline Epistles (excepting the Pastoral Epistles to which they are intimately related) on the one hand, and the Apocalypse and the Apostolical Fathers on the other.—While in the Book of Acts and the Pauline Epistles, we have the exhibition of the external diversity of the Churches which were springing up every where, as yet predominating over the certainly existing internal unity, the encyclical character of most of these Epistles (as also of that to the Hebrews) gives already greater prominence to the consciousness of a full, and moreover, of an external unity of the Church. This holds also good of the Epistle of James, for he addresses Christendom of Jewish origin not as an Ebionite Jewish-Christian but as an Apostle. These Epistles moreover acquaint us with the further developments of Church-life in the Apostolic age; with the springing up of the Ebionite and Gnostic weeds among the wheat of pure doctrine, and on the other hand, with the development of the more distinct, the dogmatically more conscious Apostolic and church-testimony. Ebionitism is perfectly drawn in symbolical characters not sufficiently appreciated—in the Epistle of James (ch. ii. 2, etc.), in the first Epistle of John (ch. ii. 22, etc.), and probably also in the third of John (v. 9); Gnostic libertinism, on the other hand, is condemned in the Epistle of Jude, in the second of Peter (ch. ii.), and in 1 Jno. iv. 1, etc. With respect to ecclesiastical constitution, our Epistles confirm the identity of the Presbyterate and the Episcopate; but the dignity of the presbyter-bishop becomes more distinct in the position taken by Jude, James, John (2 Jno. 1) and Peter. That is, we have to deal with Apostolical men who, as leading presbyters, had even then entered upon close relations with specific ecclesiastical circles; this applies at least to James and John. We also obtain hints of the form of worship (Jude 12; 2 Pet. ii. 13), and of a certain method and gradation in the presentation of Christian doctrine (1 Jno. ii. 12, etc.).

With respect to the relation of the different New Testament types of doctrine, so richly represented in the Catholic Epistles, we take for granted that in this field a conflict of doctrine is impossible but that differences of doctrine, various types, i. e. individual views, conceptions and modes of statement are necessary. All the Apostles are agreed in that they see in Christianity the New Testament, that is: 1, the fulfilment and therein the harmonious contrast of the Old Testament, the completed religion of revelation; 2, the fulfilment and contrast of all incomplete religions in general, the perfect religion absolutely; 3, consequently they see in the New Testament the primeval, even the everlasting Testament, the everlasting religion which, while it must branch out into the two æons of struggling development and of glorious consummation, car nevermore be followed by another religion. In these respects James is not by a hair's breadth less evangelical (German: neutestamentlich) than Paul and John.

The New Testament, according to all the New Testament types of doctrine, is the fulfilment, the real form, therefore, of the religion which the Old Testament had traced in the symbolical shadow.

Christianity is the fulfilment of the law of the Old Testament, hence the royal law of love, the law of liberty, of spiritual life, of unity; such is the teaching of James.

Christianity is the fulfilment of the theocracy of the Old Testament, hence the real kingdom of God, the real royal priesthood, which, first a kingdom of suffering, finds its consummation in a kingdom of glory; such is the teaching of Peter.

Christianity is the fulfilment of the old Covenant, of the sacraments of the Old Testament, hence the real circumcision and regeneration, hence the real passover, the real redemption and the real new human life as the principle of a real new world of the resurrection, the New Covenant of faith and the new covenant-jubilee of the communion of faith; such is the teaching of Paul.

Christianity is the fulfilment of the worship of the Old Testament, hence the real eternal Divine worship of the completed word, of the completed Sabbath, of completed sacrifice and of the completed festive-church (Germ: Fest-Gemeinde.); such is—closely following Paul—the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Christianity is the fulfilment of all the symbolism of the Old Testament, and of all the symbolism of primitive monotheism (Germ.-Urmonotheismus) in general, on which the Old Testament is founded, hence the real new world in the development of its glorification (Germ. Verklärung) by the Personal Word in the threefold lustre of real light, real love and real life; such is the teaching of John.

The Epistles of Peter (on the character of Peter see my Apostol. Age, I., p. 354, and the Article "Petrus," in Herzog's Real-Encyclopædia.) are connected with the speeches of Peter in Acts, and the Petrine Gospel of Mark. They form a connecting link between the doctrine of James and that of Paul.

The fundamental idea of the FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER is ch. i. 3, 4, the regeneration of Christians out of suffering unto an incorruptible inheritance (Land of inheritance and kingdom of inheritance). The division is as follows:

Introduction: The new hope of the spiritual Israel flowing from the resurrection of Christ from the dead, ch. i. 1-3. The theme already specified, ch. i. 4.

I. Believers destined for this blessedness of the inheritance, ch. i. 5-9.

II. The Old Testament pointing to this inheritance, v. 10-12.

III. The pilgrimage of the spiritual Israel to this goal. Their sanctification. Their redemption. Their brotherly love on the ground of their common heavenly descent by means of regeneration, ch. i. 13-25.

IV. The New Covenant. The preparation of the New Testament. Christ the living stone, antitype of Sinai. Christians, the new theocracy ch. ii. 1-10.

V. The wilderness-pilgrims (v. 11) and their behaviour towards pagans; a. according to the relations of the pagans, v. 12-17; b. according to the relations of the Christians. The behaviour of enslaved men (males); that of wives, especially in mixed marriages, ch. ii. 18—iii. 2.

VI. The behaviour of Christians among themselves, ch. iii. 3-8.

VII. Their behaviour towards persecutors, ch. iii. 9-22.

VIII. Readiness and blessedness of suffering, ch. iv.

IX. The proper relation of the leaders of the flock of God and those who are led, especially as the proper preparation against the adversary, ch. v. 1-9. Conclusion, Benediction and Salutation, v. 10-15.

But compare the First Epistle of Peter in this commentary. As to its literature, we have still to mention Schott's commentary, which has recently appeared. Erlangen 1861.

With respect to the SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER, we refer to our work, "The Apostolical Age" (Das Apostolische Zeitalter, Vol. I., p. 156). We continue to maintain the hypothesis there advanced, that the Epistle of Jude according to its contents was at a later period inserted in the original Epistle of Peter.<sup>1</sup> The fundamental idea of the Second Epistle of Peter is this: Christians are promised to become partakers of the Divine nature by the knowledge of Christ's glory and virtue; hence they are charged to make their godliness [εὐσέβεια—M.] sure by perseverance, ch. i. 3, 4. Conformably thereto is the Introduction, which serves the purpose of wishing and recommending them to grow in the knowledge of God and in Christ, ch. i. 1-3. Why this is necessary is shown by the argument.—The above mentioned theme, ch. i. 3, 4.

DEVELOPMENT: I. They are to grow therein practically by the development of their Christian life, ch. i. 5-9.

II. Their growth in knowledge is necessary, because otherwise they would fall through stumbling, v. 10-12.

III. Such a stumbling might be occasioned to them by his impending departure (his martyr-death) and lead to their doubting the promise of Christ's advent, v. 13-19. (But prophecy is established as the word of the true prophets of God contrasted with the false prophets who shall arise, ch. i. 20—iii. 2).

IV. The coming of those who deny the advent of Christ, ch. iii. 3, 4.

V. Refutation of their denial, v. 5-13. Conclusion, with a reference to misinterpreted sayings of Paul, concerning the advent of Christ, v. 14-18.

THE EPISTLE OF JUDE (on the character of Jude, see my Life of Jesus, II., 149, 699; Apostolical Age, I., p. 364.—Compare the Epistle of Jude in this work) may be regarded as the forerunner of the apocalyptic descriptions of Gnostic Antinomianism (2 Pet. ii.; Rev. ii. 6; vv. 14 15). The type of its doctrine and the symbolical mode of its expression connect it with the Epistle of James. Its more definite analogies in the Old Testament as revelations of the judgment are the books of Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah. On the Apostolicity of its Author compare our special introduction to James.

The fundamental idea of the Epistle of Jude: contending for the true faith against the false belief or unbelief of the (Gnostic) Anomists, v. 3. The introduction pursuant to this theme: a word addressed to those who continue preserved in Christ vv. 1, 2. The theme, v. 3. Division of the short Epistle.

I. The real character of the Anomists: turning the grace of God into wantonness, v. 4.

II. The ancient types of these Anomists and of their judgment; a, the people of Israel in the wilderness; b, the rebel-angels; c, the Sodomites, vv. 5-7.

III. More definite characteristics. Fanaticism unfolding on the one hand into voluptuousness, on the other, into contempt of authority, vv. 8-10. The development of their ruin, v. 11. Their pseudo-Christian and anti-Christian character, vv. 12, 13.

IV. Their coming foretold as to the fundamental trait of their character, viz., murmuring against revelation; a, by Enoch, the most ancient prophet (according to Jewish tradition, to which the book of Enoch also must be supposed to have been indebted); b, by the Apostles of Christ, v. 14-20.

V. Exhortation to proper behaviour towards them; a, defensive, vv. 20, 21; b, polemical, v. 22, 23. Conclusion. Benediction for the preservation of the readers and doxology, vv. 24, 25.

THE EPISTLES OF JOHN join with the Epistle to the Hebrews, as the last type of the developments of Pauline doctrine. They form in conjunction with his Gospel and Apocalypse the last and most completed type of New Testament doctrine. On the unity of this grand trilogy, compare my History of the Apostolical Age, II., p. 571.

The much misunderstood unity of the three Epistles of John, flows from the relation of the second and third Epistles to the theme and division of the first. For the theme of the first Epistle is not, as is commonly supposed, communion with God through Christ, but the mutual communion of Christians based upon that communion. The true communion of the Church based upon walking in the light, ch. i. 7. The Introduction leads to this. The end of all Apostolical preaching is to bring about Apostolic communion as a medium of communion with the Father and the Son. For historically the communion with God is made to depend on communion with the Apostles; but then the communion of Christians among themselves as a communion of perfect joy (the κοινωνία=ἐκκλησία) is made to depend on communion with the Lord. Hence:

I. The communion of God and Christ on which the communion of Christians is made to depend: a, permanent reconciliation; b, confession of sins; c, faith in the Advocate; d, the keeping of His commandments; e, that is, of His word; f, i. e. of the commandment of brotherly love; g, formation of this behaviour in fathers, young men and children; h, the rooting of this behaviour in the love of God, as contrasted with the love of the world, ch. i. 7—ii. 17.

II. The communion of Christians as contrasted with the Ebionite-Antichristian denial of Christ and hatred of the brethren, evidenced by the abandonment of communion, ch. ii. 18—iii. 24. The Antichristians; a, seceded; b, denial that Jesus is the Christ, the Son; c, exhortation to perseverance in faith; d, the protection of the anointing (with the Holy Ghost); e, the dignity of adoption [Kindschaft=state of being the children of God—M.]; f, the demonstration of adoption: righteousness, brotherly love.

III. Maintenance of purity of communion as contrasted with Gnostic spirits who deny Christ having come in the flesh, ch. iv. 1-6.

IV. The vitalizing of the communion of Christians among each other, ch. iv. 7—v. 12; a. The source of brotherly love: God is Love; b, Maintenance of this love by brotherly love, by the Holy Ghost, by the confession of Christ; c, the perfecting of this love in joyfulness before God; in rejoicing in the brethren as God-born; d, Test of true brotherly love by the love of God as evidenced by faith in the Son of God. Conclusion. Exhortation to faith; to prayer; to intercession for erring brethren; to confidence; to watchfulness against deifying the world, ch. v. 12-21.

Now since the FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN manifestly sets forth the law of the life of Christian communion, his two lesser Epistles are clearly corollaries of the first, the second (to the κρυπτα) warning against a lax loosing of the limits of communion, and the third (to Gaius) contending on the other hand against a fanatical narrowing of its large-hearted and wide-reaching sphere.

THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS, being so variously connected with the Catholic Epistles and more particularly with the Epistle of James, we also add a brief notice on its construction. Its fundamental idea is: Christ, the fulfiller of the revelation of the Old Testament as the Son of God, is as such the eternal Mediator of the real atonement-religion [Germ. Versöhnungskultus, the real worship of the religion of atonement—M.], and therefore the eternal and heavenly Centre thereof, ch. i. 2, 3.

I. As such He is superior to the mediators of the Old Testament economy; a, to angels, even as God-Man, ch. i. 4—ii. 18; b, to Moses, the servant of the house, as the Son preparing the house, ch. iii. 1-19; c, to Joshua, the mediator of Sabbath-rest in Canaan, ch. iv. 1-13; d, to Aaron, the Highpriest, as a Priest forever, who has offered obedience, ch. iv. 14—v. 14; e, to Mosaism in its entirety, to which the readers of the Epistle cannot return without falling away, ch. vi.; f, to Abraham even, as the real Priest of God, typified by Melchizedek, ch. vii. 1-11.

II. As the priesthood of Christ is superior to the status of the Old Covenant, so is also the New Covenant with its services superior to the Old Covenant. a, The superiority of the new law and covenant, ch. vii. 12-22; b, the superiority of the new priesthood, vv. 23-28; c, the superiority of the new sanctuary and its services, ch. viii. 1—x. 39. (1, The new tabernacle, 2, the New Testament, 3, the new entrance of the new High-priest into the holiest of holies. The new covenant-blood and sacrifice. 4. Warning against the new or the New Testament apostasy).

III. Hence the New Testament faith is also the sublime completion and fulfilment of the old faith, ch. xi. 1-40. Warning against apostasy from this faith, ch. xii. 1-17.

IV. Hence also the new congregation on the spiritual Mount Zion, is superior to the old congregation at Mount Sinai, ch. xii. 18-24. Warning against disobedience. Exhortation to thank-offering; to the manifestation of this living service in brotherly love, ch. xii. 25—xiii. 7. Conclusion. The application, ch. xiii. 9. Caution against false teachers. Exhortation to bearing the reproach of Christ, to the life of prayer, to churchly disposition [i. e. with reference to ch. xiii. 17—M.]. Appropriate benediction and salutation, ch. xiii. 10-24.

II. THE EPISTLE OF JAMES.

1. THE AUTHOR.

James, who describes himself as Author of this Epistle, must be either the Apostle James the Less (Mark xv. 40), or the son of Alphæus, Jacobus Alphæi (Matth. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13), or also "the Lord's brother" (Gal. i. 19; ch. ii. 9), who is altogether identical with Jacobus Alphæi (Acts i. 13; xii. 17; xv. 13; xxi. 18).

This definite hypothesis does not follow solely from the Introduction of this Epistle, in which he calls himself "a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." But it does follow from it, that James claimed to possess a prominent position in the Church, and felt conscious of being known to the whole Jewish-Christian Church as James, the servant of God and of Jesus Christ in an exclusive sense, which rendered it impossible to confound him with any other James.

But that the tradition of the Church ascribed to him (with a preponderance of testimony) Apostolical authority follows from the reception of his Epistle into the Canon, although it was enumerated among the Antilegomena; indeed it is matter of inquiry, whether during the third century it was not by confounding data and opinions first included for awhile among the Antilegomena.

It is settled, however, that James the Elder, the son of Zebedee, cannot have been the author of this Epistle, because he suffered martyrdom as early as A. D. 44 (Acts xii. 1, 2), while the internal allusions and statements of this Epistle belong to a much later period. The subscription in the Peschito and that in an old Latin translation ascribe without any reason the authorship to him, and Luther took him for the pretended author.

The question of the authorship of our Epistle would thus be settled, had not an old error diffused the opinion current in ancient tradition and modern theology, that it is necessary to distinguish the Apostle Jacobus Alphæi from the Lord's brothers. It is the old Ebionite apocryphal legend of the Lord's brothers.

Adhering to the simple statements of the New Testament all doubt concerning the identity of James with "the Lord's brother" must vanish; although we do not at once see why James the son of Alphæus should be called the Lord's brother.

For James, the son of Alphæus, passes at once from the lists of the Apostles, given in the Gospels (Matth. x. 2; Mark iii. 16; Luke vi. 14), into the list of the Apostles given in Acts (ch. i. 13). Here he appears as yet as James the son of Alphæus, by the side of his prominent name-sake, the son of Zebedee, who is therefore called simply James. But immediately after the death of this prominent James (Acts xii. 2) there is mentioned another James, who bears that name without all further qualification (Acts xii. 47); and the assumption is highly improbable that James, the son of Alphæus, should in so short a time, have vanished from the stage past all tracing, without being thought worthy of having even his death noticed by Luke, the historian, and that there should suddenly have sprung up some non-apostolical James, who actually occupied a prominent position among the Apostles. We are thus forced to maintain that if after the death of James the son of Zebedee, who was simply called James, there arose forth with another James who went simply by that name, that James must have been the son of Alphæus. And thus he is mentioned all through Acts, ever the same and ever in the same position of a mediator of the new Christian faith and the historical national consciousness of his people (ch. xv. 13; xxi. 18). But while the last meeting of Paul the Apostle, and this James of the Acts, who is called James without any further addition to his name, occurred about 59-60, A. D., it is to be noticed, that Paul made mention of James, as the Lord's brother (Gal. i. 19; ii. 9) several years before that time (about A. D. 56-57); so also the appellation "the Lord's brother," simply, or "James" simply (1 Cor. ix. 5; ch. xv. 7 about A. D. 58). Here, again we have to call attention to the circumstance that Paul, in the first chapter of Galatians, conjoins the same James, whom in the second chapter he describes as one of the pillars among the Apostles, with the rest of the Apostles, as the Lord's brother.

In the first place, then, we must hold fast the hypothesis that James the son of Alphæus, and the Lord's brother, are identical. The question now comes up, what is the relation of this supposition to the most ancient tradition of the Church? The oldest tradition is represented by Hegesippus and Clement of Alexandria. Hegesippus, according to Eusebius, iv. 23, reports as follows: "James, the brother of the Lord received the government of the Church conjointly with the Apostles, who from the time of the Lord until our own was surnamed the Just by all; for many were called James, but this one was consecrated from his mother's womb." Then follows an account of his holiness, the character of a pious Nazarite and a faithful Christian martyr. He undertook the government of the Church with the Apostles, that is, he was not the exclusive bishop, but the coöperation (in the office) was reserved to the Apostles as such. As bishop in the Apostolical sense, according to which every overseer of the Church was subject to the joint Apostolate of the Church, he was distinguished from the Apostles although he was at the same time an Apostle,<sup>1</sup> just as Peter was distinguished as spokesman from the other Apostles, although he belonged to their number, Acts v. 29 (ὁ Πέτρος καὶ οἱ ἀπόστολοι). If we here press the letter in the sense of a distinction of the son of Alphæus from the brother of the Lord, Hegesippus in another passage (Euseb. III., 22) on the descent of James declares himself in favour of the identity. He says that Simeon the son of Cleophas succeeded James the Just as bishop, this one again being a descendant of the same uncle of the Lord (θεῖον αὐτοῦ referred to the next following ὁ κύριος), and that all gave him this preference, as being the second relative of the Lord (ἀνεψιός).<sup>1</sup> Cleophas, or what amounts to the same thing, Alphæus (cf. Bretschneider's Lexicon) was consequently our Lord's uncle, James and Simeon (the same as Simon) his sons, James and Simon brothers, both the sons of Alphæus, both cousins of the Lord, but the former, as appears from what has gone before, revered by the surname "the brother of the Lord." Still more important is the testimony of Clement of Alexandria (Euseb. II., 1): "The Lord imparted the gift of knowledge (the gnosis) to James the Just, to John and Peter after His resurrection. These delivered it to the rest of the Apostles." He then adds expressly, "there were, however, two Jameses; one called the Just, who was thrown from a battlement of the temple and beaten to death with a fuller's club, and another, who was beheaded." To this must be added the testimony of Origen in his Commentary on Matthew, ch. xvii. But the testimony of the Gospel according to the Hebrews that Christ, after His resurrection, had appeared to James the Just, the brother of the Lord must be taken in conjunction with the testimony of Paul (1 Cor. xv. 7), that "Christ was seen of James, then of all the Apostles." The same appearing therefore is called once an appearing to James the Apostle, and again an appearing to the brother of the Lord.

The list of the brothers of Jesus, given in the Gospels, specifies James, Simon and Judas (Matth. xiii. 55). The list in Acts also specifies James, Simon and Judas, but it distinguishes the James there introduced as the son of Alphæus, from James the son of Zebedee, the Peter there introduced, as Zelotes or the Canaanite from Simon Peter, and the Jude there introduced, as Lebbeus or Thaddæus from Judas Iscariot.<sup>2</sup> In the Apostolical Epistles we find after the death of the elder James, the name of a James who is an Apostle and also a brother of the Lord (Gal. ii.; Gal. 1)<sup>3</sup>, who is also a brother of Jude, and to whom we are indebted for an Apostolical Epistle.

The most ancient tradition (that of Hegesippus) informs us therefore that James the brother of the Lord, was the brother of Simon, and that both were the sons of Cleophas=Alphæus. But from Clement we actually learn that there existed no other James of any importance than James the Elder and James the Just, who was one of the most distinguished Apostles (so distinguished that Clement, indeed, erroneously confounds him with James the Elder). Lastly concerning Jude, Hegesippus reports likewise a Jude who was called the brother of our Lord, according to the flesh (Euseb. III., 19, 20). Eusebius after his uncritical manner, or as an erring exegete, turns the phrase "he was called a brother of the Lord" into, "he was a brother of the Lord." For in like manner he makes Simeon the son of Cleophas, whose death is reported by Hegesippus (Euseb. III., 32), the grandson of Cleophas, because he understood the phrase "Maria Cleophas" to denote "Mary the daughter of Cleophas."

This identity, which is everywhere transparent, follows also from the most striking particular evidences. Mary, the mother of James the Less or of James the son of Alphæus, is also the mother of Joses (Matth. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40; v. 47, ch. xvi. 1). This proves that four brothers of the Lord bore the same names as the four sons of Alphæus, viz.: James, Simon, Jude Apostleship "which pointed rather to missionary activity than to the episcopal government of a congregation." But where was the Apostle of the Jews to reside, if not at Jerusalem? If Christ did charge the Apostles "Go ye into all the world," He surely did not mean to exclude the centre of Judaism.

<sup>1</sup> On the view of Neander, who makes Ἰάκωβον the subject of αὐτοῦ, cf. my article "Jacobus" in Herzog's R. E. p. 407, and my Apostolical Age, I. p. 194. Nor does the note of Huther (p. 5) affect our explanation, especially as it proposes to leave unaltered the account of Hegesippus, that Simeon the son of Cleophas was ἀνεψιός of the Lord.

<sup>2</sup> Huther will not admit that this Jude is a son of Alphæus, but the son of a James, because he is called Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου in Luke vi. 16 and Acts i. 13. But Jude 1 proves that a Jude might be thus designated with reference to his honoured and universally known brother. Lebbeus also is placed in juxtaposition with James in Matth. x. 3 and we must not press the circumstance that he is not expressly called his brother. In the case of this Jude it was contemplated to distinguish him as much as possible from Judas Iscariot (see Jno. xiv. 22), and this was accomplished by designating him as the brother of the well-known James.

and Joses. On the numerous complications of both lines, see this commentary on Matth. xiii. 53-58.<sup>1</sup>

The opposite view, that the brothers of the Lord constitute a line of the same name to be distinguished from said Apostles is a development which through different stages must be traced back to the Jewish-Christian consciousness; treated with respect to the real point of observation, we may designate it as a view of Ebionite-apocryphal origin. Its first stage is the New Testament emphasis on the sons of Alphæus as being the brothers of the Lord. The Jewish-Christians gave peculiar prominence to the respective Apostles of the Jews, especially to James, particularly as contrasted with the authority of Paul. Paul admits this emphasis as to its historic value and recognizes as a climax of authority in which we have first the Apostles in general, then the Apostolical brothers of the Lord and then Peter, the Apostle (1 Cor. ix. 5). But his language in Gal. 2 shows how far he is from according to this historical authority anything like Apostolical priority. The continuance and growth of this Jewish-Christian emphasizing follows especially from the report of Hegesippus. But he still insists upon the identity of the brothers of the Lord with the sons of Alphæus, he still designates their brotherhood as an original cousinship, he still holds fast to the coördination of the Apostles.—All this was changed with the full development of Ebionitism. The first Ebionite fanatics, who brought about a decided schism, denounced the aged bishop Symon, doubtless because he opposed their heresy, as a descendant of David, consequently as a relative of Jesus, doubtless after immoderate veneration had changed into immoderate hatred (Euseb. III. 32). But the later Ebionites (according to the Clementines) highly exalted James as the Lord's brother even above Peter. Now since Peter was unmistakably the most distinguished member of the whole Apostolical College, the distinction of the brothers of the Lord from the like-named Apostles became inevitable. In the case of the common Ebionites was superadded the natural interest that this facilitated the view which made Jesus the actual son of Joseph, and Mary the mother of a number of children.—This spurious, apocryphal tradition imposed upon and misled the uncritical Eusebius, who was wont to huddle every thing together, who was consequently either greatly at variance with himself or uncertain in himself. As by misunderstanding Papias, in the interest of Theology against the Apocalypse (see Apostol. Age I., p. 215) he conjured up the phantom of a presbyter John, and made Judas Lebbæus Thadæus one of the seventy disciples (i. 12, 13), so he made also James, the brother of the Lord one of the seventy, that is: distinguished from James the Apostle (i. 12), although in every instance he takes refuge behind tradition.

This laid the foundation of the vacillations of the later fathers concerning the brother of the Lord, among whom Gregory of Nyssa and Chrysostom favoured the distinction, Epiphanius and Augustine the identity, while Jerome is undecided (see Article Jacobus in Herzog, p. 408). Since all these fathers depend on Eusebius, their opinion, as opposed to the original tradition in this matter, is devoid of all independent weight. In modern and most modern times the majority of theologians beginning with Luther (that the author of the Epistle "was some good, pious man") have decided for the distinction; but they are opposed by a great number of eminent theologians (see Winer, Art. Jacobus; Wiesinger, The Epistle of James, Introd. p. 4 and others).

The only question, however, relates to the merit of the arguments advanced in support of the two opposing views. But first of all must be settled the question how it was possible that the sons of Alphæus and of a Mary different from the mother of Jesus, could be or become the brothers of the Lord. According to Hegesippus (Euseb. III., 11) Alphæus or Clopas the father of Symeon the second bishop of Jerusalem, was the brother of Joseph and consequently Symeon the cousin of Jesus, by origin. But Mary the wife of this Alphæus is commonly and erroneously considered to have been the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus. For Wieseler (in Studien und Kritiken 1840, Vol. III., p. 648) has shown that Jno. xix. 25 ought to be rendered: "But there stood by the cross of Jesus His mother, and the sister of His mother (Salome; after the manner of John only to indicate personal relations without specifying names), Mary the wife of Clopas and Mary Magdalene." Hence the sons of Alphæus were at the most cousins of the Lord in the legal sense through their father Alphæus and Joseph the foster-father of Jesus, while the sons of Zebedee were at all events His cousins in a stricter sense, as the sons of Salome, the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus. Hence the reference to a wider sense of the term brother as denoting a relative or cousin (ἀδελφός) is altogether insufficient to account for the constant appellation of James as the brother of the Lord. "But in this place arises the most simple hypothesis, supported by the custom of the Jews everywhere (see John xix. 26, 27). Cleophas was dead, Joseph the foster-father of Jesus was his brother, (Hegesippus in Euseb. xi. 3); he now became also the foster-father of the sons of his brother Cleophas and thenceforth the family of Joseph and the family of Alphæus-Cleophas, the other Mary, therefore, and her sons James and Joses, Simon and Jude, with several daughters formed one household (Matth. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3). Now after the decease of Joseph also, the oldest brothers of Jesus, who most probably were older than Jesus, especially James, gradually became the heads of this household and this circumstance would account for the disposition of these brothers even at a later period, to assume some kind of guardianship over Jesus (Mark iii. 31; Jno. vii. 3.—See my article Jacobus in Herzog's Lexicon)."—The sons of Alphæus were then according to Jewish law the brothers of Jesus.<sup>1</sup> Schneckenburger on the false hypothesis of Mary Cleophas having been the sister of the mother of Jesus conceived that upon the early decease of Joseph, Mary the mother of Jesus went to live with her sister the wife of Alphæus.—

We now purpose giving (with reference to the Article Jacobus in Herzog's Real-Encyclopædia already quoted repeatedly) a brief account of the reasons and counter-reasons of the distinction between James the son of Alphæus and James the brother of the Lord.

Reasons: 1. James the son of Alphæus, being only the cousin of Jesus, could not be called the brother of the Lord. This difficulty is set aside by the above discussion of the subject.

2. The most ancient tradition of the Church does not make mention of James, the brother of the Lord, as of an Apostle. We have seen that the most ancient tradition affirms the opposite.

3. In the title of the Epistle of James the author simply calls himself the servant of Christ. But Paul also describes himself by the same title in the Epistle to the Philippians, John in the two lesser Epistles calls himself presbyter, and James had reasons of humility, wisdom and faith for calling himself the servant of Christ especially as he might well notice the abuse to which the appellation "brother of the Lord" had given rise.

4. Jno. vii. 5, we read that "the brethren of Jesus did not believe in Him," at a time when James the son of Alphæus had been received already among the Apostles. But John doubtless refers to the same unbelief or want of resigned obedience of faith<sup>2</sup> according to which his mother also did not believe in him, Mark iii. 31, or Peter, Matth. xvi. 23 and Thomas, Jno. xx. 25.

5. The passage Acts i. 13, 14, besides enumerating the Apostles, mentions the brothers of Jesus. The primary reference may be to Joses and his sisters; but just as Mary, who certainly belonged to the women, is introduced besides the women by the special designation of Mary the mother of Jesus, so also the Apostolical brothers of Jesus, besides having been included in the list of the Apostles, may be introduced by the special designation of the brothers of Jesus.

6. 1 Cor. ix. 5, introduces the brothers of the Lord alongside of the Apostles. To be sure; but Peter also is mentioned in particular according to the climax: a, Apostles in general, b, the brothers of the Lord as distinguished Apostles in the estimate of the Jewish-Christian opponents of Paul, c, Peter as the most distinguished Apostle.

<sup>1</sup> Huther says p. 7 that this hypothesis is devoid of all solid reason but he substantiates his assertion only by the statement that tradition is ignorant of the early death of Clopas and the adoption of his children by Joseph. History knows that the sons of Alphæus and Mary the mother of Jesus formed one household in which the former wielded some authority. Huther (p. 8) thinks it more probable that Mary and the brothers of Jesus believed (according to Mark iii. 21, 31), Jesus to be beside Himself, than to have had recourse to a pretext in order to extricate Him from supposed imminent danger. Mary is to have believed the report that Jesus was out of His mind!! We use here for once two marks of attention against the one of Huther, who, after the manner of Meyer expects it to produce a sensation and for the rest remind our readers of Luther's well-known flight to the Wartburg.

Counter-reasons. 1. It is hardly conceivable that Luke (Acts xii. 2) should suffer James the son of Alphæus to vanish from the stage without all further mention and to let some other James, until then not an Apostle, forthwith (Acts xii. 17) enter the circle of the Apostles and enjoy peculiar distinction, without offering any explanation of the fact.

2. It is purely inconceivable, considering the importance attached by the Apostles to a duly authenticated call to the Apostleship (Acts i. 21, etc.), that they should have agreed to acknowledge as a man of Apostolical vocation, James a recently converted non-apostle, although he was a brother of the Lord; and especially that Paul, who was obliged so emphatically to defend his apostolicity against Judaizing Christians, should have accorded so prominent a position among the Apostles (Gal. ii.) to a non-apostle.

3. If any thing, it is still more inconceivable that the names of three real Apostles should have been extinguished without all trace by the names of three non-apostles who had acquired Apostolical authority, viz.: James, Simon, Jude.

4. Equally inconceivable is this threefold dualism of three names of equal dignity, equal descent and relationship, and of equal fraternity, that is, a. James, Simon and Jude were Apostles. Another James, another Simon and another Jude acquired Apostolical distinction in their stead.

b. James the Apostle was the son of an Alphæus, the non-apostle James and his brothers were also the sons of an Alphæus.

c. In like manner James the Apostle and Joses were brothers, being the sons of Maria Alphæi. The non-apostles James, Simon, Jude and Joses being the sons of Alphæus probably would be also the sons of the same Mary.

5. In the passage 1 Cor. xv. 7, a distinction is drawn between the appearing of Christ to James and His appearing to all the apostles indicating that he had been mentioned before as a single Apostle.

6. The passage Gal. i. 19: "But another of the Apostles saw I not save James the Lord's brother," can only by finesse be construed to mean that James was not counted among the Apostles, as has been done by Hess and Neander, but each in a way of his own. To this must be added:

7. Moreover the coördinate authority of the same James with Peter and John Gal. ii. to which Paul offers not the least objection although he had taken the watchword "to know nobody after the flesh." We have still to superadd:

8. The above-mentioned most ancient church-tradition with its decisive testimony.

9. The demonstrability of the obscure Ebionite-apocryphal origin of the legend of the Lord's brothers taken in conjunction with the insecurity of Eusebius and the false security of the fathers who sustain their opinion by his.

10. The agreement of the characteristic traits of the brothers of the Lord according to the Gospels with the characteristic traits of the like-named Apostles with reference to the caution of James (Mark iii; Acts xv. xxi. 18; the Epistle of James), to the fiery vivacity of Judas Lebbæus Thaddæus (Jno. vii. 3; Jno. xiv. 22; the Epistle of Jude), which may also have been the characteristic trait of Simon Zelotes at an earlier period of his life; cf my Life of Jesus, p. 148; Apost. Age 1, p. 364. We have elsewhere repeatedly affirmed the identity of James and the brothers of the Lord with great decisiveness (Life of Jesus; Apost. Age, Article Jacobus in Herzog's Encyclopædia, in this Commentary on Matthew); but here it was impossible to avoid repeating a short resumé of the process and it is necessary to use every effort towards the removal of the groundless and unreasonable Apocryphon of false learning from the field of theology.

After what has been said we may briefly sketch the life-portrait of James. It follows from the foregoing statement that James also must have been among the brothers of Jesus, who after His first appearance at Cana in Galilee accompanied Him to Capernaum. The Evangelist designates these companions of Jesus to have consisted of His mother, His brothers and His disciples. We have seen that there was good reason for the continuance of the two categories, His brothers and His disciples, at a later period, because the two lines did not fully cover each other, that is, because Joses and the sisters never belonged to the circle of the Apostles. But while we assume that the sons of Alphæus at that time were not yet disciples, their inclination to believe seems to follow from their having joined the company of Jesus.<sup>1</sup> Soon after, after the first festive journey, Jesus appeared at Nazareth (Luke iv. 22; Matth. xiii. 55), and on that occasion His brothers are mentioned as follows, James, Josès, Simon, Judas. Matthew according to his arrangement has assigned the respective event to a later period, probably because he connects it with a subsequent appearance of Jesus at Nazareth. Even then only the sisters, probably married, appear to reside at Nazareth (Math. xiii. 56; Mark vi. 3). Again at a somewhat later period took place the first sending of the twelve disciple-Apostles and among them we find the name of James the son of Alphæus and the names of his brothers Lebbaeus Thaddæus or Judas and Simon Zelotes or the Cananite. But the surname the son of Alphæus distinguishes our James from James the son of Zebedee. The separation of the Apostles had occurred some time before the visit of Jesus to the feast of Purim in the second year of His official life. At that feast Jesus had incurred the hatred and persecution of the Jewish hierarchy by the performance of a cure on the Sabbath day; hence He soon after was put to great straits in Galilee and His mother and brothers (Mark iii. 21-35), conceived it their duty to restrain Him from His bold attitude towards His enemies and to save Him from their hand by stratagem. There is as little difficulty in supposing James the son of Alphæus to have participated in this rashness as there is difficulty in admitting the rashness of the sons of Zebedee (Luke ix. 54), of Peter (Matth. xvi. 22), and in the unbelief of Thomas. Indeed we may go even so far as to suppose that James was the chief prompter in this matter, which exhibits a sinful caution, whose purified and spiritualized counterpart we meet again in his later conduct (cf. Acts 15, and ch. xxi.). For the same reason we may suppose that in the second exhibition of rashness in the opposite direction, on the part of the brothers of Jesus, which took place in the autumn of the same year before the feast of Tabernacles (Jno. vii. 3, 4), it was not James who was prominent but his brothers, especially Judas, who although silenced did at a later period revert once more to the idea of inciting Jesus to manifest Himself to the world (ch. xiv. 22), although it is to be noticed that Jesus had again greatly raised the courage of the disciples on the mountain of transfiguration and at the foot of the same. The degree to which the family of Alphæus emulated the sons of Zebedee (Matth. xx. 20), in their sympathy with our Lord in His end at Jerusalem, is apparent from the fact that Mary the mother of James the Less and Josès was among the women that were spectators of the crucifixion. Yes, it was she only, who on the evening of the burial of Jesus in company with Mary Magdalene, sat over against His tomb (Matth. xxvii. 61); in the same manner, she and Mary Magdalene were among the first of those women who on Easter-morning hastened forth to the tomb of Jesus (Matth. xxviii. 1). Meanwhile James quietly matured into one of the much distinguished Apostles. After the martyrdom of the elder James, who seems already to have stood in a nearer relation to the government of the Church at Jerusalem, because Herod Agrippa laid hands on him first, James the Less, according to a tacit presupposition, seems to step into his place; for Peter charges those, to whom he showed himself after his deliverance from prison, to tell James and the brethren. At the Apostolic Convention at Jerusalem (Acts xv.) James is one of the most distinguished speakers; and here we perceive clearly that he deemed it his task to be the mediator of the religious liberty of the Gentile Christians and the national customs of the Jewish Christians. He stands on precisely the same platform of faith as that of Peter and Paul; what he proposes in order to pacify the Jewish Christians is not a religious but an ethical dogma; a measure of missionary wisdom, which accordingly meets the approbation of all the Apostles. That he did not Judaize, and indeed as an Apostle he could not Judaize, is evident from the decided ground he took against Judaizing demands, which was also fully accorded to him by Paul (Gal. ii.). On the other hand, in his cautious consideration for the Jews, whom in their national totality he would gladly have saved for the Christian faith, he went to the utmost limit, as is evident from the counsel which he and his immediate associates gave to Paul on his last visit to Jerusalem (Acts xxi.). Paul was to give proof to the Jews that he did not despise the customs of the fathers by accomplishing the vow of a Nazarite in the temple at Jerusalem. We cannot consider this counsel in the light of an inspiration; it miscarried and actually produced the very opposite effect that had been contemplated. But Paul, who also before this entertained a high esteem for James (Gal. i. ii.), saw nothing to object to it, although he could offer the most decided resistance to every judaizing tendency, even when Peter was guilty of it. But this cautious position of James, this keeping sacred the national custom of his people enables us to understand how the judaizers might make such manifold abuse of his name (as is apparent from Gal. ii. 4, 12, and similar indications). James, then, is above all things an Apostle, a witness of Christ, everyways the equal of the other Apostles; Christianity is to him the fulfilment of the Old Testament, a new, absolute, eternal principle of religion and in this respect he, Paul and John occupy the same platform. But, in the next place, he is also the Apostle of the Jews 'par excellence,' that is, he conceives of Christianity in its close connection with the Old Testament, as the new perfect law of spiritual life and of liberty, because on the other hand he apprehends Judaism as passing into Christianity [Germ. werdendes Christenthum] and feels conscious of a special call for his people. As to the form of James's ideas, it is to be noticed that he addresses Jewish Christians (for it is settled already that our Epistle can belong to only one James) to whom the mediating dialectical form would be a heterogeneous element. The purity of his Greek style indeed has been to some an enigmatical phenomenon. But it characterizes also the Apostle of holy carefulness.

Baumgarten (Acts iv. 127) has treated at large of the grandness of the ecclesiastical position of James. The following sentence however requires to be examined. "James refuses to acknowledge any other liberty than that formed within the measure of the law and in this sense he calls the law, the law of liberty."—In that sense the law has always been a law of liberty; but here the reference is rather to a liberty, developing and manifesting itself as a new law of life, and which preserves holy Jewish custom in Jewish-Christianity but patriarchal custom with (along-side of) Jewish-Christianity. "James represents the Christian dogma in the form of the Jewish Ethos [θῶς=custom—M.]. He has removed the Old Testament law, as such, from the sphere of religion into the sphere of national custom. And this was the very task assigned to him, because he had to put forth the best effort of love with a view to gain the Jewish nation to Christianity. This effort is recorded by historical tradition." (See Herzog's Real-Lexicon, Art. Jacobus). Three reports are in perfect agreement on the characteristics of James and also with the sketch of his character found in Holy Writ. The Gospel according to the Hebrews narrates of him, that James after the death of Jesus took the vow, that from the time he had shared the last meal with Jesus he would not eat any thing until he saw Him risen from the dead; that the risen Saviour soon afterwards appeared to him and told him, "Go eat thy bread, for the Son of Man is risen from the dead." This report sounds rather apocryphal; but its subject-matter, although not its very words, are confirmed by the statements of Hegesippus, that James was a Nazarite, and by the fact that he also recommended Paul to fulfil the vow of a Nazarite (Acts xxi). This Nazarite vow on the part of James surely does not denote a wavering faith, as Neander thinks, but rather an over-bold form of his assurance of faith. In a general way, however, the account in the Gospel of the Hebrews concerning a special appearing of Christ to James agrees with the statement of Paul I Cor. xv. 7. The second particular, for which we are indebted to Josephus (Antiq. XX. 9, 1) consists of a general notice of the martyrdom of James. He reports "that the high-priest Ananus, a Sadducee, in the interval between the departure of Festus from Palestine, A. D. 62 [Josephus speaks of his death—M.], and the arrival of Albinus, the new Procurator, caused the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, whose name was James and some others,<sup>1</sup> whom he had accused as breakers of the law, to be stoned to the great dislike of the more moderate citizens, who therefore informed against him before Albinus." Eusebius (II. 23), super-adds the words of Josephus that all the calamities of the destruction of Jerusalem did happen to the Jews to avenge James the Just who was brother of Him that is called Christ and whom the Jews had slain, notwithstanding his preëminent justice. To this we must add in the third place the detailed account of Hegesippus in Eusebius (II. 23). "With the Apostles James, the brother of the Lord, succeeds to the charge of the Church—that James who has been called the Just and from the time of our Lord to our own day, for there were many of the name of James. He was holy from his mother's womb (a Nazarite, one consecrated), he drank not wine or strong drink, nor did he eat animal food; a razor came not upon his head; he did not anoint himself with oil; he did not use the bath. He alone might go into the holy place (εἰς τὸ ἅγιον).—This expression is falsely interpreted as designating the holiest of holies. The expression may admit of such an interpretation, but the Jewish law forbids it. The acknowledged Nazarite might probably go with the priests into the temple proper (Acts xxi. 26).—"For he wore no woollen clothes but linen. And alone he used to go into the temple and there he was commonly found upon his knees, praying for forgiveness for the people, so that his knees grew hard-skinned like a camel's, from his constantly bending them in prayer and entreating forgiveness for the people." On account therefore of his exceeding righteousness he was called "Just" and "Oblias" (according to Stroth עֲבִילָם), which means in Greek "the bulwark (pillar) of the people" and "righteousness," as the prophets declare of him (in the opinion of the Jewish people). Some of the seven sects of the Hebrews inquired of him, "What is the door (doctrine) of Jesus?" And he said that this man was the Saviour, wherefore some believed that Jesus is the Christ. Now the forementioned sects did not believe in the Resurrection, nor in the coming of one (Christ, Messiah) who shall recompense every man according to his works; but all who became believers believed through James. When many therefore of the rulers believed etc. At last, reports Hegesippus, there arose a general conflict of opinions among the people and at the Passover they placed him on the gable of the Temple and bade him solemnly declare in the audience of all the people what he believed concerning Jesus, because he was the Just and would speak in conformity with his convictions. From that lofty place he then cried with a loud voice: "Why ask ye me about Jesus, the Son of Man? He sits in heaven on the right hand of great power and will come in the clouds of heaven." And many were convinced and gave glory on the testimony of James, crying, Hosannah to the Son of David. But the Scribes and Pharisees cried "Oh! oh! even the Just is gone astray," rushed up and threw him down. Below they then stoned him (symbolically, therefore, the whole act was of course a zealotical stoning and so Josephus, from his centre of observation, correctly reports the event) and slew him with a fuller's club."—This narrative affords also a full illustration of the forementioned statement of Josephus superadded by Eusebius that the wisest among the Jews agree with him in regarding the destruction of Jerusalem as the punishment of this crime. Josephus and the Jews who were of his mind seem to have had an obscure foreboding that James was the last preacher of repentance sent to the Jewish people as a nation, and that the murder of this witness of the truth was the decisive stubbornness of the people as a people, upon which the judgment had inevitably to follow. Neander and Schaff have discovered without reason much legendary matter and an Ebionite mode of thinking in the report of Hegesippus. Hegesippus was certainly a Jewish Christian but not an Ebionite. It must not be overlooked that his opinion of James momentarily commingles in his report with his opinion of the Jewish people. But this narrative is strongly authenticated in all its main features. That James was a Nazarite is supported by Acts xxi. 23 etc., and by the citation from the Gospel according to the Hebrews. The zeal of James in interceding for the Jewish people is reflected in every thing we know of him. Josephus also testifies to the veneration James enjoyed among the Jewish people. But most important, in the last place, is the account of that public crisis which was to determine the decision of the Jewish nation for or against faith in Christ; and the antecedents of similar analogous crises, particularly in Acts v. 13; vi. 7; xxii. 22, as well as its internal truthfulness, give decided support to this the main feature of the account of Hegesippus. The Nazarite character of James would also explain the reason why, to judge from later indications, the Essenes in particular became converts to Christianity and were more especially attached to the person of James not only as Jewish Christians but also in the direction of the Gnostic Ebionitism. The veneration with which Jewish Christians were wont to regard "the brother of the Lord," which had already before that period become extremely one-sided, would be heightened in their case and the Clementines in particular supply evidence that this veneration had actually been thus heightened, for they exalt James above Peter and all the Apostles and make him the supreme Bishop of all Christendom. James has here been made the symbol of judaistico-chilastic claims to the government of Church and the world. According to Epiphanius Hæres. XXX. § 16 there were among the glorifications of James actually ὑπερβασιλεῖς Ἰακώβου, descriptions of his pretended ascension. Epiphanius also notwithstanding his antagonism to the Ebionites, holds similar exaggerations (Hæres. XXIX. 4 and LXXVIII. 13). Probably it is only owing to Epiphanius misunderstanding Hegesippus that he states, "that James was like the highpriest permitted to enter once a year the holiest of holies because he was a Nazarite and wore the highpriest's mitre (τὸ πέταλον). This myth is not on a level with the account of Polycrates respecting John (Euseb. V. 24). Polycrates doubtless accorded the highpriest's mitre to John in a symbolico-ideal sense; which is hardly so in the case of Epiphanius. (See Herzog, Art. Jacobus). An ambiguous notice in Eusebius (VII. 19) states that the Church at Jerusalem in token of their veneration of James had preserved as a holy relic, his official seat.

Owing to the mythical difference between James the Just and James the Apostle the myth took further occasion to decorate particularly the end of the latter, considered separately. Nicephorus, II. 40, reports him to have first appeared as a messenger of faith in South-Western Palestine, then in Egypt; and that he was crucified at Ostracina in Lower Egypt. (For particulars see Natalis Alex. Sæc. I. p. 59.) On the Church legends of the supposed two Jameses cf. Stichtart, Ecclesiastical legend of the holy Apostles, Leipzig, 1861, p. 79 etc. The chronology of Eusebius fixes the death of the real and one James in the year A. D. 63. Eusebius judiciously connects his death with Paul's appeal to Rome (II. 23). Until then the hatred of the Jews had been directed mainly against Paul whom they tried to kill by all means. But by his appeal to Rome he escaped further persecution on their part. But since James had consorted with him at Jerusalem, it was natural that the hatred of many Jews should now be turned against him, the most distinguished representative of Christianity among them. But from this it does not follow that Eusebius intended to say that James was killed as early as the time when the appeal took place; nor does it follow from Eusebius III. 11 that the death of James took place immediately before the destruction of Jerusalem. The notice of Josephus that James was killed after the departure of Festus and before the arrival of Albinus leads to about the time given in the chronology of Eusebius, for Festus was called away in A. D. 62.

"Among the Apostles James is, par excellence, the representative of Christian wisdom, gentleness, mediation and union; as apostolical presbyter-bishop of Jerusalem he is the representative of Jewish nationality and custom in its Christian transformation and transfiguration. As the son of Alphæus he presents a contrast to the fiery, impetuous Judas Lebbæus Thaddæus, and exhibits the character of a sage and a sufferer matured, according to his charisma, in caution by constant spiritual discipline. Thus he was the last and most engaging expression of the Gospel to the Jewish people; and after the stoning of this messenger of faith, the city and people were sealed unto judgment, which was acknowledged not only by Eusebius, but even resented by Josephus. Jerusalem rejected Christianity especially because it hated in it the union with Gentile Christians." (From the article "Jacobus"). #### [EXCURSES ON THE BROTHERS OF THE LORD.]

[The family relations of Joseph and Mary demand more than a passing or one-sided notice. This interesting, but very difficult and complicated subject involves the question: Was Jesus the only child in the Holy Family, or were there other children, and if so, who were they?

The New Testament answers the first part of the question in the negative, and says concerning the second that Jesus had brothers and sisters. They are mentioned with or without their names twelve times in the Gospels (Matth. xii. 46, 47; xiii. 55, 56 (ἀδελφοί and ἀδελφαί); Mark iii. 31, 32; vi. 3 (sisters also); Luke viii. 19, 20; Jno. vii. 3, 5, 10, once in Acts (i. 14), once in 1 Cor. (ix. 5) and once in Gal. (i. 19), where James of Jerusalem is called the Lord's brother.

St. Matthew (xiii. 55) gives the names of the four brothers, viz. James, Josès or Joseph, Simon and Judas.—St. Mark (vi. 3) calls them James, Josès or Josetus, Simon and Juda.

Neither the names nor the number of sisters are mentioned, but they cannot have been less than two.

It is to be noticed that in all the passages referred to they are also called His brothers and sisters, i. e. the brothers and sisters of Jesus, never His cousins (ἀνέψιοι) or kinsmen (συγγενεῖς), and that these brothers and sisters are always mentioned in connection with Mary.

These are the simple facts of the case, and in any other case, the terms used would have been received in their natural sense, the brothers and sisters would have been regarded as brothers and sisters, nothing more or less. But dogmatical prejudices and ascetic extravagances concerning the sanctity of celibacy began at a very early period to apply a non-natural interpretation to the terms brothers and sisters with reference to our Lord. At least three leading theories have been advanced towards the solution of this question.

I. The theory which makes the brothers and sisters of Jesus the children of Joseph by a former marriage, or the adopted children of Joseph.

II. The theory which makes them the children of Mary, the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus, or the cousins-german of Jesus. As a variation of this theory, there is another which makes them His cousins both on the side of Joseph and Mary.

III. The theory according to which they were the children of Joseph and Mary, or the actual brothers and sisters of Jesus.

A condensed survey of these theories will enable us to form an idea of the difficulties connected with our subject.—

I. The hypothesis that the brothers and sisters of Jesus were the children of Joseph by a former marriage or his adopted children is founded on traditional notices drawn from the apocryphal gospels, which represent Joseph as a man of 80 years when he married Mary, the father of four sons and two daughters by his former wife Escha. The names of the children are variously given. This is the earliest tradition concerning the parentage of the brothers and sisters of the Lord, but need not detain us long, because even Jerome, the strenuous advocate of the cousin-theory, denounced it as "deliramenta apocryphorum," as "apocryphal nonsense." But notwithstanding this strong censure of Jerome, and ample margin being left to the reputed age of Joseph at the time of his marriage, it contains nothing intrinsically improbable. It is indeed, and we think justly, pronounced by Stier and Greswell a mere fiction devised to save the ἀειπαρθενία of Mary, and advocated on grounds of expediency by modern authors, but although the children of Joseph might and would be called the brothers and sisters of Jesus, the hypothesis is open to very grave objections, because it makes them the seniors of our Lord, which conflicts with their constant attendance on Mary and our Lord's being the legal heir to the throne of David, a prerogative that could only have been enjoyed by the first-born, not by the last-born; for the people clearly knew nothing of His supernatural origin and here we have to deal altogether with popular impressions.

A modification of this hypothesis is Lange's adoption-theory. He supposes Joseph to have had a brother Clopas or Alphæus, who married a certain Mary, not the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus. He died early and Joseph adopted his children who thus became the legal brothers and sisters of our Lord. Their mother also became an inmate of Joseph's family. It is hard to realize such a state of things, if we consider that Joseph was a poor carpenter, and that Mary the supposed mother of those children should have relinquished her maternal rights over them. The hypothesis, although very ingenious, is purely speculative, countenanced neither by exegesis nor tradition, and evidently the result of dogmatic and critical perplexity.

Lichtenstein makes Joseph and Clopas, two brothers, marry two sisters both named Mary. At the death of Clopas, Joseph took Mary, the widow of Clopas, into his family, and thus the children were doubly related to our Lord, legally on their father's side and naturally on their mother's side—and might therefore after their adoption be styled the brothers and sisters of the Lord.

The Levirate hypothesis, according to which Joseph on the death of his brother Clopas, married his widow, and that the brothers and sisters of Jesus were the fruit of this marriage, belongs under this head, but needs neither discussion nor refutation.

II. We come now to the cousin-theory, which makes the brothers and sisters of our Lord the children of Clopas and Mary, the sister of Mary the mother of our Lord, and alleges that these children by a lax use of the words brother and sister were regarded to sustain the fraternal relation to our Lord.

This theory rests upon the following assumptions, 1. That Alphæus and Clopas are identical; 2. that Mary the mother of James, Joseph, Simon and Jude was his wife and the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus; 3. that the lax use of the term "brother" is a fact. These assumptions are open to weighty objections.

a. The identity of Alphæus and Clopas rests on the slender foundation that James the Less, one of the twelve is called the son of Alphæus (Ἰάκωβος ὁ τοῦ Ἀλφαίου Matth. x. 3; Mark ii. 14; iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13) and that one of the spectators of the crucifixion, called Mary (Clopas=Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ) was the mother of James the Less, because a Mary, the mother of two sons James and Joses is mentioned in Mark xv. 40; and that the Hebrew יְהוֹנָתָן and the Greek Ἀλφαιος are supposed to be different forms of the same name. This is probable but not certain. Matthew or Levi, moreover was also a son of Alphæus, and if the ellipsis in Τοῦδα; Ἰακώβου (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13) is to be filled up, as is commonly done, by inserting ἀδελφός, the Apostle Jude also was a son of Alphæus. Furthermore, if this Mary was also the mother of Simeon, another Apostle, we have the extraordinary fact that four Apostles, claimed by the advocates of this theory as the brothers of Christ, did not believe in Him, for John expressly informs us that His brethren did not believe in Him. (John vii. 3 sqq.).

b. The assumption that Mary the mother of Jesus, and Mary the mother of James and Joses were sisters is founded on a solitary passage in John, which admits however of a very different and far more probable solution. It is Jno. xix. 25, which as punctuated and read by the advocates of the cousin-theory, enumerates the three Marys as spectators of the crucifixion. "Now there stood by the cross of Jesus His mother, and His mother's sister Mary the wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene," but the more correct reading is "Now there stood by the cross of Jesus His mother and His mother's sister (Salome, the mother of John the Evangelist), Mary the wife of Clopas and Mary Magdalene."—We know from Matthew that Salome, the mother of Zebedee's children was present at the crucifixion, and this indirect reference to his mother, accords with the usual delicacy of John.

Instances of two sisters having the same name are indeed occasionally met with, but they are far from common; considered as a question of probability, it must be decided in the negative, and this decision will be corroborated by the other arbitrary and illogical elements of this hypothesis.

Let us look at it from another point of view. The Evangelists enumerate James, Joseph (for that is the true reading in Matthew) Simon and Jude as the four brothers of our Lord. The advocates of the cousin-theory allege that they were his cousins, but were called his brothers. We read also of another Mary the mother of James and Joses, who is nowhere called the mother of Simon and Jude. Now because she had one son, or if you will, two sons, whose names were identical with those of the brothers of the Lord, it is inferred that she was the mother of the brothers and sisters of the Lord. But the most authentic codices and the most reliable critics pronounce Joseph to be the correct reading in Matthew, and this develops the extraordinary logic that because here is a mother of two sons one of whom has the same name as that of a son of a mother of four sons, THEREFORE she is the mother of the four. The acumen of Aristotle, surely, is not needed, to detect this fallacy.—Add to this that the brothers of Jesus appear uniformly in the company of Mary, the mother of Jesus, that the Hebrew מִתְּנִי, the representative of the Greek ἀδελφός, is used only twice in a lax sense, and then only in the case of nephews, that the words ἀνεψιός, consobrinus, or cousin (Col. iv. 10 applied to Mark the cousin of Barnabas), υἱὸς τῆς ἀδελφῆς, sister's son (Acts xxiii. 26), and συγγενής, kinsman or relative form part of the New Testament vocabulary, that nevertheless the Evangelists use the word ἀδελφοί and not any of the new terms, that the brothers did not believe in Christ before His resurrection, that therefore they could not have been Apostles, and that after His resurrection, even as believers they are expressly distinguished from the Apostles, and the inference is all but irresistible that this whole theory, from beginning to end, is involved in chaotic confusion and endless contradiction.

Much stress is laid by the advocates of this theory on the celebrated passage Gal. i. 19: "But other of the Apostles saw I none, save James, the Lord's brother." Read and construed as the verse stands in E.V. it is argued that Paul here declares to have seen at Jerusalem James, a brother of the Lord, who was an Apostle, that this must have been James of Alphæus or James the Less, because James the son of Zebedee was dead at that time, that here is a clear case of the word brother being used in the sense of cousin, and that consequently the Lord's brethren are His cousins, the children of Alphæus and Mary. The passage bears however the very opposite interpretation and some of the best Greek scholars have shown, and we think conclusively, that we ought to render "I saw none other of the Apostles (besides Peter to whom he had referred in the preceding verse) but I saw James, the Lord's brother." In other words Paul distinguishes James the Lord's brother from the twelve. Still it is only fair to add that although James was not an Apostle, yet both on account of his exemplary piety and wisdom and on account of his relation to our Lord, and as first bishop of Jerusalem, he enjoyed apostolic dignity and authority. "That such was the case is evident from various passages in Acts, in the Epistle to the Galatians, from Josephus, Hegesippus and the tradition of the Eastern Church."

III. The only remaining theory is that the brothers of Jesus were His actual brothers, that is: the children of Joseph and Mary. This view is the most natural, but beset by dogmatical difficulties. We will first state the arguments in its favour and then consider the dogmatical difficulties.

1. The language used by the Evangelists is such as to intimate that Joseph and Mary were man and wife.
2. The term 'first-born' although of technical value and importing certain privileges, may fairly be construed as implying the existence of children born subsequently, especially if it is considered that the Evangelists record events as historians after those events had become history, and that if they had intended to say that Jesus was Mary's only-born, it was as easy for them to select that term, which forms part of the N. T. vocabulary as the ambiguous 'first-born,' which although susceptible of a non-natural interpretation, imports generally the existence of later-born children.
3. The Evangelists mention brothers and sisters of Jesus.
4. These brothers could not have been Apostles, for they continued to disbelieve in Jesus during His life-time.
5. The hypothesis that the brothers and sisters of Jesus were the children of Joseph and Mary simplifies the domestic relations of the holy family.
6. The objection which is sometimes brought against this hypothesis that Jesus would not have commended his mother to John, if she had other sons to take care of her (Jno. xix. 26). "But why," asks Andrews if James and Judas were Apostles and His cousins, sons of her sister and long inmates of her family, and it was a question of kinship, did He not commend her to their care? The force of the objection remains then unbroken on the cousin-theory. The true reasons why our Lord confided His mother to John and not to His brothers, seem to have been the following:
  - a. The brothers did not believe in Him, and consequently could not sympathize with Mary in her great sorrow.
  - b. Between John, the most intimate friend of Jesus, who understood and appreciated Him better than all the disciples, and Mary there was the strongest bond of sympathy in their love of Jesus, and John was therefore most likely to uphold and comfort her with filial tenderness in her sad trials.

John, moreover, was the cousin of Jesus, being the son of Salome, the sister of Mary, and the brothers of Jesus were probably married, as the notice of Paul in 1 Cor. ix. 5, seems to imply.

The last two points we do not urge as reasons, but merely state as matters of interest.

These plain facts, drawn solely from Scripture, conflict however with the old and widespread view of the perpetual virginity of Mary and the feeling that it was lowering the dignity of the Saviour and that of Mary to admit the probability or even possibility of further descendants. To preclude the possibility of such an hypothesis was doubtless the ruling motive of those who gave currency to the apocryphal fiction that Joseph was eighty years old when he married Mary.

The cousin-theory which may be traced back to Papias, although made current in the Church by Jerome, clearly originated in the desire to establish the superiority of the unmarried to the married state. Gnostic principles began early to prevail in the Church and to induce the desire to separate Christ as widely as possible from other men. To obliterate, if possible, any and everything He might be supposed to have in common with other men, was believed to add to His exaltation. This exaltation would naturally pass from Him to Mary, and with the development of Mariology and Mariolatry become an article of faith. Due allowance must also be made for the feeling "that the selection of a woman and that of a virgin to be the mother of the Lord, carries with it as a necessary implication that no others could sustain the same relations with her." (J. A. Alexander). It is of course very difficult to account for the extent of this feeling, but there can be no doubt that it is not altogether free from an undervaluation of the honour and dignity conferred by our Lord on our common humanity by His Incarnation. The inspired writers of the New Testament seem to emulate each other in portraying the true humanity of Christ and in showing how He ennobled, glorified, and with reverence be it uttered, deified that nature which at the first came pure and holy from His creative Mind. It is surely an ineffably touching and consoling thought that the holy Jesus passed through every relation of human childhood and from having been a pattern of humility, modesty and forbearance to His brothers and sisters, from having borne with their impatience and want of sympathy, to evidence Himself in this respect also as our true Highpriest that He might be touched with a feeling of our infirmity." And then as to Mary, her memory will not be less dear and sacred to us, as the mother of the brothers and sisters of Jesus, than as the ever-virgin. Marriage is a divine institution and has been made doubly divine by the human mother of our Lord.—

The question has from the earliest times been variously answered; the view that Jesus had actual brothers and sisters is as old as any of the other theories and we believe, with Neander, Winer, Meyer, Stier, Alford and Farrar that it accords best with the evangelical record, and barring dogmatical prejudice or feeling, is at once the simplest, most natural and logical solution of this otherwise hopelessly confused question, which fortunately is an open one in our Church and most of the Reformed bodies.

2. GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLE.

A. Notices which presuppose the early existence and reception of the Epistles in Clemens Romanus Ep. 1. ch. x.; in Pastor Hermas, Similit. viii. 6; in Irenæus, adv. Hæeres, iv. 16. Abraham amicus Dei (Jacob. ii. 23). Tertullian adv. Judæos Cap. ii.: Abraham amicus Dei. See on it Guerike, Isagogik, p. 441, and Huther p. 24.

B. Testimonies. The ancient Syriac Peschito contains this Epistle. Clemens Alex. knew it according to Euseb. Hist. Eccl. VI. 14. He also alludes to James ii. 8 in Stromat VI.—Origen mentions the Epistle of James in Tom. 19 on John and occasionally calls it divina Jacobi Apostoli Epistola. Homil. 13 in Gen. etc.—Dionysius of Alexandria appeals to it in several places and Didymus of Alexandria wrote a commentary on it.—Cyril of Jerusalem and Jerome, Cat. 3 considered it to be genuine (Guerike p. 442).

C. Ancient doubts of its genuineness.—These were the natural outgrowth of the apocryphal Jewish Christian account of distinguishing James the son of Alphæus from James the brother of the Lord. It is certainly not surprising (Kern supposes it is) that the testimony of Hegesippus is wanting for the Epistle in Euseb. ii. 23, where he is only cited as the chronicler of the life and martyrdom of James. But Eusebius takes occasion to mention the Epistle itself in order to add the observation that it was accounted spurious, as many of the ancients had neither mentioned it nor the Epistle of Jude; but that they were publicly read in most of the Churches. The reason adduced is clearly of little weight against the genuineness of the Epistle. Origen may at first have intended to give a faint intimation of existing doubt; but this is rather doubtful (see Guerike 443, note 4). Eusebius placing the Epistle among the Antilegomena simply proves that in his time its genuineness was not universally acknowledged; he himself appears to have essentially shared those doubts, owing to his indecision in his historical view of the person in question. The doubts stated by Jerome are now only regarded as historical references; the alleged contradiction of Theodore of Mopsuestia cannot be authenticated, but even if it could, it would only be the statement of a critical view belonging to a later period.

D. Doubts at the time of the Reformation. Luther, in the preface to the Epistle of James A. D. 1522 says: "This Epistle of James, although rejected by the ancients (which is false) I praise and esteem good withal, because it setteth forth not any doctrine of man and drives hard the law of God (which is incorrect). But to give my opinion, yet without the prejudice of any one, I count it to be no Apostle's writing, and this is my reason. First, because contrary to St Paul's writings and all other Scripture it puts righteousness in works (a misunderstanding; and if it were so, how could he praise it and esteem it good withal?). "Lastly he thought that the Author was some good, pious man." Yes, "some good pious man" who understood better how to warn Jewish-Christians of the insurrection of the Jews than Luther knew to warn the Evangelicals of the insurrection of the peasants.—His opinion is couched in stronger terms in the preface to the Edition of the N. T. of 1524: "On that account the Epistle of James, compared with them (the Epistles of Paul and the remaining Epistles of the N. T.) is a veritable straw-Epistle. For it lacks all evangelical character." It is striking enough that Luther held also to the opinion that the early-deceased James, the son of Zebedee was the author of this Epistle. Similar opinions rejecting the Epistle found in the Table talk (Tisch-Reden) proves that Luther retained this view to a later period although the respective passages were omitted in later editions of the New Testament. (See Huther p. 25). The opinion of Luther was followed by the Magdeburg Centurators, Hunnius, Althammer and others; among the Reformed by Wetstein. It is known that Luther's view could not do justice to the book of Revelation and other books of Holy Writ; it was the enthusiastic prominence he gave to the doctrine of justification (the work to which he had been especially called), connected with his misapprehension of the general tendency of the Epistle and with the new born deep consciousness of evangelical liberty of thought as contrasted with exegetical tradition, that made him pronounce so embarrassed an opinion of our Epistle. In the Dorpat Magazine for Theology and the Church Vol. I. pt. 1. 1859, p. 152, von Oettingen reviewing Huther's Commentary on the Epistle of James says concerning the fore-mentioned opinion of Luther: "This opinion of Luther not only has been recently adopted by the Tübingen school utikler for its tendencies but it has also been repeated by the Gnesio-Lutherans, as is proved by the following hasty statement of Ströbel (in a review of Wiesinger's Commentary in Guerike and Rudelbach's Magazine for Lutheran Theology, 1857, II. p. 356. "No matter in what sense we take the Epistle of James, it is always in conflict with the remaining parts of Holy Writ." Very justly von Oettingen expresses his censure of that opinion in the name of the Biblia Stroebeliana (see in Huther p. 28). In the Roman Catholic Church doubts were uttered by Erasmus and Cajetan.

E. Modern doubts. Forerunners: Faber, Bolten, Bertholdt: James wrote in Aramean, the Greek translation the work of another hand.

De Wette, Introduction to the New Testament. It is difficult to see why James should have written an Epistle to all the Jewish Christians in the world. Its contents are ambiguous. It lacks personality. The missed contradiction of Paul is undignified. Ch. ii. 25 seems to refer to Hebrews xi. 31 and consequently to betray a later author. How could James write such good Greek? For counter-statements see Guerike, Contributions, p. 160 etc.

Schleiermacher:—Introduction to the New Testament, edited by Walde. He finds the opinion of Luther confirmed, the style in part ornate, in part clumsy and as to the contents of the Epistle, he finds much bombast.—

Kern:—The character and origin of the Epistle of James, Tübingen Magazine 1835, II. Why Hegesippus did not mention the Epistle?

Baur:—"Paulus," p. 677; "Christianity of the first three centuries, p. 96."—On the ground of the well-known Ebionite hypothesis and of the assumption that the Epistle teaches a righteousness of good works against Paul. Schweigler in the train of Baur: "The Post-apostolic Age, vol. I. p. 413 etc. Reasons for the alleged spuriousness: 1, The want of individuality; 2, Christian antiquity unacquainted with the Epistle and its later recognition as canonical; 3, the mild form of Ebionitism it sets forth; 4, the internal church-relations assumed in it; 5, its acquaintance with the Pauline Epistles, the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Gospel according to the Hebrews.—Quite new, but also quite untenable is here especially the discovery of Ebionitism. The very name of James, the address to the twelve tribes, the word synagogue for Church are adduced in proof of the Ebionitism of the Epistle; the rich πλοῖστοι—are to denote the Gentile Christians. But in that case, ch. ii. 2 would make the congregations addressed by the author non-Ebionite, Notwithstanding the strong language used against the rich (=Gentile Christians) the Epistle is alleged to be ironical, and said to aim at effecting a compromise between Jewish and Gentile Christians. For further counter-remarks see Huther p. 301 and Reuss § 146, Note. Huther p. 31 treats also Ritschl's view of the Epistle of James (which has however been modified in the 2d edition) and mentions Rauch's attack on the integrity of the passage ch. v. 10–12, which has been repelled by Hagenbach and Schneckenburger (see Guerike p. 448).

Credner considers the Epistle genuine as the production of the brother of the Lord and denies the authorship of James the Apostle. But this point is decided by the right apprehension of the Author's person (§ 1). Moreover it is to be noticed that Schott has revived the view of Bolten etc., that the Epistle is a free translation of the Aramean original; an assumption, devoid of all foundation.

The circumstance of the Epistle not being generally known to the ancient Church at an early date may be accounted for by the following considerations:

1, It was addressed to Jewish Christians (hence it occurs already in the Peschito, because in Syria in particular there were many Jewish Christians; this circumstance is rendered prominent by Ritschl);

2, The Epistle, in its tendency, presented only few dogmatical points, whereas the ancient Church reverted especially to dogmatical points;

3, The absence of the apostolic designation in the title and similar matter. See Guerike p. 444. The chief reason lay probably in the circumstance that the consciousness of the concrete relation of the Epistle, which made it appear in its whole weight, became gradually less prominent.

[Alford: "On the whole, on any intelligible principles of canonical reception of early writings, we cannot refuse this Epistle a place in the Canon. That that place was given it from the first in some part of the Church; that in spite of many adverse circumstances, it gradually won that place in other parts; that when thoroughly considered, it is so consistent with and worthy of his character and standing whose name it bears; that it is marked off by so strong a line of distinction from the writings and Epistles which have not attained a place in the Canon; all these are considerations which, though they do not in this, any more than in other cases, amount to demonstration, yet furnish when combined a proof hardly to be resisted, that the place where we now find it in the N. T. Canon is that which it ought to have, and which God in His Providence has guided His Church to assign to it."—M.]

3. OCCASION, DESTINATION AND OBJECT OF THE EPISTLE, ITS THEOLOGICAL AND STYLISTICAL CHARACTER.

We should be obliged to treat twice of the contents of this Epistle, were we to omit to consider first the question stated at the head of this section. For in order to gain a thorough appreciation of the full import and apostolical value of this Epistle our exposition should be duly influenced by the character of James, by his relation to the Jews and to Jewish Christians, by Jewish affairs belonging to its date and by the Christian-prophetic stylistic which demanded an address to his people. To the circumstance, that the Epistle of James, in most instances, has been dissociated from all these vital considerations, is mainly to be ascribed the manifold misunderstanding of the same. The consideration of the contents according to the leading thoughts and the total impression of the Epistle, to be sure, ought to precede the investigation relating to occasion, object etc., but the exposition of its historic genesis will enable us to understand it with reference to the whole of its glorious contents, that is, then also to set forth its contents in detail.

The title v. 1 shows that the Epistle of James was addressed to Jewish Christians in the widest sense of the term, for the whole people was only one diaspora (dispersion) viewed as a huge whole. The same remark applies to the First Epistle of Peter with reference to the Jewish Christians of Asia Minor and also to the Epistle to the Hebrews with reference to the Jewish Christians of Palestine.—The date of the Epistle of James falls most probably (as we conclude from the developed condition of the Jewish Christian Churches) into the latest period of his life, about A. D. 62. The date of the composition of the first Epistle of Peter we fix with Thiersch (63-64) at about A. D. 64 (see my History of the Apost. Age, I. p. 148 and II. p. 574) not with Weiss and Fronmüller A. D. 54 or 55, because at the latter period the prolonged activity of Peter at Babylon and the multiplication of Jewish Christian Churches in Pontus are entirely out of the question. To the same period, to A. D. 62-64, belongs the Epistle to the Hebrews (see my Apostolic Age, I. 75; cf. this Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, where for good reasons the date given is the interval between the death of James in A. D. 61 or 63, and the beginning of the Jewish war in A. D. 67).

Said three Epistles addressed to Jewish Christians originated therefore in a period when the Jewish revolution against the supremacy of the Romans had already begun to germ and ferment in the minds of the Jewish people. The proper foundation of this revolution had already been laid by the crucifixion of Christ, but especially by the rejection of Christianity sealed with the execution of James (see my Apost. Age, Vol. II. p. 427). Thereby the preserving and saving element had been separated from the Jewish nationality, which henceforth, developed into perfect pharisaism, stood arrayed in deadly enmity both against the pagans and the Christians. The pagan instinct, however, returned this antagonism also in its representatives, the Roman governors and thus provocation and persecution increased on the part of the pagans, and fanatical commotions and tumults on that of the Jews. So already Felix, the proconsul, treated the Jews worse than his predecessors and the Jews in their turn resented his maltreatment by several insurrections, especially under the leadership of an Egyptian who took 30,000 men to the Mount of Olives. Similar jarrings and revolts were repeated under Festus. The Jews on the whole, restrained themselves as yet under the proconsulate of Albinus (A. D. 63-65). But the war broke out in A. D. 66 under Gessius Florus. The rupture among the Jews and Gentiles turned into open revolution first at Cæsarea; immediately afterwards at Jerusalem and the flames of the most atrocious religious war spread on all sides, to Scythopolis, Damascus, Askalon, Ptolemais, Hippo and Alexandria; everywhere the Jews were slaughtered by thousands.

It must be assumed, that the same excited, enthusiastic and fanatical disposition flashed from Jerusalem through the entire Jewish diaspora and that the hope of miraculous deliverance and the impulse of revolutionary self-help and revenge conspired every where with their animosity against the Gentiles, who in their turn were filled with equal deadly hatred.

Such was the situation. But now must be taken into account the powerful effect of such national sympathy and antipathy on the Jewish Christians. Nationally they were still Jews and Jewish blood stirred and boiled in their veins. They were in common with the Jews attacked and tempted on the one hand, by the hatred, contempt and oppression of the pagans; and on the other by Jewish-national sympathy, by their yearning for deliverance and by their chiliastic, enthusiastic hopes. The national movements of modern and quite recent times offer appropriate illustrations of the powerful influence of such a national revolutionary current on the individual members of the respective people. That movement was consequently the great seductive alternative that lay before the Jewish Christians of that period. Standing aloof from the revolutionary movement, they were cursed and persecuted as apostates by their national brethren. We know from history how much the Christians had to suffer in this respect during the later insurrection of the Jews under Bar Cochba in the time of Hadrian. Bare sympathy on the other hand with the chimerical enthusiasm of the Jews, was entering the road to apostasy (for they exchanged the faith in Christ for the hope of a pseudo-messianic deliverance), falling into unbelief of the justice of God in the judgment that was coming on their people and severing the bond of church-fellowship with the Gentile-Christians, while they were restoring religious fellowship with Christ-murdering fanaticism.

Hence the Spirit of Christ on all sides warned them and confirmed their faith in this their situation; and the above-mentioned three Epistles are the documents of this guardian Spirit, and in this light alone can they be rightly understood. They are therefore the most appropriate sequel to the prophetic warnings, cautions and exhortations of the eschatological speech of Christ in Matth. xxiv. 16 etc.

Even if the revolutionary spirit had been less developed during the last days of James, his prophetic forebodings would sufficiently account for his hortatory Epistle (v. ch. v. 1); as in a similar manner a prophetic presentiment of the Church anticipated a dearth (Acts xi. 27); and foretold the imprisonment of Paul (Acts xxi. 10).

James had the immediate and wide-reaching vocation to confirm the Jewish Christians, without incautiously delineating the impending revolution in colours too positive. Hence he issued a circular letter to the twelve tribes in the dispersion.

This address has been variously interpreted: it is maintained that the Epistle addresses converted and unconverted Jews (Grotius, Wolf, Credner etc.), Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians as divided parties (Kern), as a closed society (de Wette and others), Jewish Christians (Neander, Guericke, Wiesinger etc.). See Wiesinger's Introduction. (The views, which assign to the Epistle a wholly particular destination, e. g. Noesselt: to the Christians at Antioch, see in Hertwig's Tables p. 51). Huther (p. 12) lays stress on the consideration that the Author saw only in Jewish Christians true Jews and that there did not then exist so sharp a separation of Judaism and Christianity.

We rather think it necessary to lay stress on the circumstance that James, according to the relations he bore to his people, and as long as that people had not set the seal to their obstinacy in the last symptoms of their apostasy (viz.: the execution of their bishops and their chiliastic revolution against the pagan authorities which involved their renunciation of Christian salvation), not only saw in the Jews catechumens of Christianity by birth, but he also saw in the Jewish Christians the true Jews. Addressing therefore the twelve tribes, he did not address the Jews in a dogmatical sense as associates of the old religious communion, but he did address the Jews as his theocratico-national brethren, the noblest part of whom had already become his brethren in the faith and all of whom were called to become his brethren in the faith. His primary object of course was to warn the Jewish Christians against taking part in the fanatical revolutionary spirit of the Jews, but surely his secondary purpose was to warn the Jews against being carried away by the hostility and oppression of the tyranny into revolt and the final falling away from the patience of Christ. We admit therefore the correctness of the following remark of Guericke (p. 435) "Strictly speaking the twelve tribes in the diaspora certainly denote only those living out of Palestine, but in a more general sense the term does not exclude the Jews living in Palestine and the contents of the Epistle show that the term is here used in the latter sense."

The point, therefore, on which James felt constrained to speak to all his brethren was to advert to the fact that they were exposed to a great and manifold temptation and that they needed great perseverance in the spirit of Christ's patience. Especially he felt called upon to encourage believers (ch. i.); solemnly to threaten those who had thus far persevered in unbelief and self-righteousness (ch. v. 1); variously to instruct, warn and admonish the tempted and manifold-wavering brethren (ch. ii. etc.). On the other hand he had to couch his warning against the chiliastico-political fanaticism of his time in terms sufficiently general and cautious in order to avoid the suspicion of being mixed up with the political issues of the question, that is, he had to treat it on purely religious grounds.

The further destination of his pastoral Epistle for all Jewish Christians, relatively including the Jews, accounts also for the careful Greek diction which is characteristic of the Epistle. It also explains the Hebrew-symbolical character of the Epistle whereby it is related to the prophetic style of the O. T. This character surely is wholly misunderstood, if the Epistle is made to yield the result that in the Churches, whom James addresses, the poor on account of their faith were oppressed by the rich, that the rich were flattered in their religious assemblies etc. As in ch. i. the twelve tribes represent the people of God in its present state of development of actual and future Christliness,* as the ἀνὴρ δίψυχος denotes the man who doubtfully wavers between faith and apostasy, so the poor represent the humble and those who believe through humility, but the rich denote the self-righteous and those who are unbelieving through self-righteousness. And again as in ch. ii. the synagogue describes the assembly of the congregation, and the rich man with a gold ring and a splendid garment denotes the proud, Ebionitising Jewish Christian parading his ring of the Jewish Covenant, while the poor man with a vile garment describes the Gentile Christian, so faith denotes here in the theocratic sense the Jewish theocratic rightness-of-belief (Thiersch, too strong: Jewish orthodoxy), while the work of faith on the other hand signifies the energy and consistency of life exhibited in faith-work, which is the evidence of living faith; the New Testament faith, consistency of life, the work in grandi, which is the evidence of the vitality of the O. T. faith, but especially the N. T. faith as brotherly love towards Gentile Christians (the poor brother, the poor sister). And as in ch. iii. the becoming teachers of many (πολλοὶ διδάσκαλοι γίνεσθε) denotes the doctrinal, propagandistic nature of the Jewish Christians and the Jews (v. Rom. ii. 17 etc.), so the fiery spark which grows into a great conflagration describes Jewish fanaticism. In ch. iv. the wars and disruptions (E. V. fightings) probably denote not only disputes and sectarianism, but the adulterers and adulteresses describe not such persons in a literal but in the O. T. religious sense, viz.: apostates or such as are inclined that way. As ch. iv. 13, 14 contains a prophetic allusion to the sad transformation of the gain-seeking Jewish diaspora, so ch. v. foretells the great judgment impending on the rich, on self-righteous Judaism. These hints may suffice to show that the character of the Epistle answers to its end and aim. For this very reason its specifically Christian character comes out only in general outlines. The wide-reaching destination of the Epistle would hardly admit of a too definite dogmatical treatment.

That the receivers proper of the Epistle were really Christians is manifest from its fundamental Christian tone: "Servant of the Lord Jesus Christ—brethren, beloved brethren,—he begat us with the word of truth—the good (E. V. worthy) name—the killing of the Just—the nearness of the Lord—" etc. see Huther, p. 12. That on the other hand these Christians were Jewish Christians is evident from "the synagogue" ii. 2; the prominence given to monotheism ii. 19; the enumeration of Jewish formulæ of oaths v. 12 etc.; and still more from the characteristic features of Jewish improprieties which are denounced; such as pride of faith, fanaticism, conceit and such like (Wiesinger, Schaff, Thiersch, Huther).

As regards the place of writing, the Authorship of James determines also the place where he wrote the Epistle, viz. Jerusalem: "The conjecture of Schwegeler that the real place of writing was not Jerusalem but Rome, is nothing but a fiction invented in favour of his hypothesis." Huther.

* The German has "in seinem jetzigen Entwicklungsstande gewordener und werdender Christlichkeit"—the literal meaning of geworden is "that to which it already has attained," of werdender "that to which it is attaining, or which it is in process of becoming;" actual and future seemed the best equivalents we could find without a lengthy circumlocution. Christliness is a word of my coining—I had to coin it, because the German Christlichkeit has no English equivalent or representative.—M.]

[Jerusalem was the centre of attraction to the Jews of the Diaspora; many of the Jewish Christians were doubtless in the habit of attending the feasts and thus centrally located, James had every facility of information as to the religious condition of those Jewish Christians and of oral or written intercourse with them.—The physical notices found in the Epistle support the supposition that the Epistle was written at Jerusalem. The author wrote not far from the sea, ch. i. 6; iii. 4; he lived in a land blessed with oil, wine and figs, iii. 12; he was familiar with salt and bitter springs, iii. 11, 12; the land was exposed to drought, rain was a matter of great importance to the inhabitants, vv. 17, 18; the land was burnt up quickly by a hot wind (ch. i. 11, καύσων, a name especially known in Palestine); the author names the former and the latter rain, πρόβιος and ὄψιμος, as they were called in Palestine, ch. v. 7. See Hug. Einleitung, ed. 4, p. 438 etc. and Alford, Prol. to James III., 2, 3.—M.]

On the date of the Epistle opinions are much divided. Pfeiffer (Studien und Kritiken, 1852, Ch. I., p. 95), Schneckenburger, Theile, Neander, Thiersch, Hofmann, Schaff (and in less decided language also Huther) say that it was written before the Apostolic Council at Jerusalem, but Schmidt, Guerike and Wiesinger maintain that it was written after it. Huther gives the following reason: "After that time the Pauline doctrine that man is justified not ἐξ ἔργων but ἐκ πίστεως not only had become generally known but also had so profoundly moved the mind of Christendom, that it is inconceivable that James in view of this circumstance could utter his ἐξ ἔργων etc. in perfect ignorance of it." This reason may also be reversed thus: If James wrote this Epistle earlier in an anti-Pauline sense, he would not have declared at the Apostolic Council that he was in agreement with Paul. We ought rather to distinguish between the historico-theocratic sense (Monotheism) and the specifically-Christian sense of the word faith. The chief reasons for the later date of the Epistles, namely, shortly before the death of James, are these. The spread of Christianity through the entire Jewish diaspora, and the general recognition of the authority of James by the entire-Jewish Diaspora in relation to the death of James (A. D. 62–63) required to be fixed at the latest possible date.—Then we have the important consideration that a general temptation of all Jewish-Christendom to falling away from the faith arose for the first time with the first germinating beginnings of the Jewish revolution or with the more positive opposition of the hatred of the pagans to the fanaticism of the Jews. To this must be added the highly important consonancy in which our Epistle in this respect stands to the first Epistle of Peter and the Epistle to the Hebrews.*

4. THE RELATION OF OUR EPISTLE TO THE PAULINE EPISTLES, THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES, TO THE MOST HOMOGENEOUS EPISTLES VIZ. THE FIRST OF PETER AND THAT TO THE HEBREWS. ITS NEW TESTAMENT PECULIARITY.

A. JAMES AND PAUL.

The apparent contradiction between the doctrine of James (ch. ii. 24) and the doctrine of Paul (Rom. iii. 28; iv. 2) concerning justification and the question connected with it as to the relation of faith and works, did already cause Luther to be greatly staggered, and because he considered the contradiction as founded on fact, to induce him to pass the above-mentioned unfavourable opinion on the Epistle of James. In modern times theology has been much engaged with the discussion of the question whether or not James and Paul contradict each other.

The answer of this question has occasioned a group of different questions:

1. In favour of a real contradiction are Luther and his immediate followers, and recently Strobel, Cyrillos Lucaris (see Neander's History of the Planting etc., Bohn's edition, Vol. I., p. 357), de Wette, Kern, Lutz (Bibl. Dogmatik, p. 170), Baur, Schwegler.

2. For a contradiction against the misinterpretation and the abuse of the Pauline doctrine on the ground of an essential agreement between Paul and James, are several ancient expositors, Augustine, Grotius (see his Annotiones ad N. T. II. p. 973), Gebser, p. 214, and others.

3. There is no contradiction either of Paul himself, or of the abuse of his doctrine; this view starts on the supposition that the dogmatical tropus of James, which differs from that of Paul, took shape sooner than the latter—so Schneckenburger, Theile, Neander, Schaff, Thiersch, Hofmann, Huther (p. 35).

* Only for the sake of noticing it, we have to add that Schwegler has removed the origin of the Epistle to a late period of the second century.

4. There is no contradiction, but an antithesis and difference of dogmatical tropus. Although according to its internal relations it is the first and earliest of the N. T., it does not follow that it must also have preceded the doctrine of Paul chronologically, Schmid, Wiesinger and others.

Ad. 1. It has been supposed that the illustration of Abraham ch. ii. 21 was chosen intentionally in opposition to the application of the same illustration in Rom. iv. 1 etc.; and the illustration of Rahab, the harlot ch. ii. 25 in opposition to the application of the same illustration in Heb. xi. 31. The following circumstances, apart from the otherwise perceptible unity of spirit in the two Epistles, militate against the supposed contradiction.

- a. The historically-proven assent of James to the doctrine of Paul, see Acts xv. and Gal. ii.
- b. The manifest and demonstrable difference of James and Paul in the definition of the terms πίστις, ἔργα, δικαιοῦνθαι.
- c. The actual agreement of doctrine which follows from an unprejudiced conception of the differing points of view and from the exposition of the respective passages. For while with James πίστις does not denote orthodoxism, because this faith may be animated by energy of life or the evidence of works (ch. i. 25), it does denote the historico-theocratical orthodoxy, which is to evidence its efficient power in consistency of life, indefatigable activity (ἐντέλεια) and energy of Christian deportment. And it is this very energy, which St. Paul calls faith, the evidence of which is its working by love.

ἔργα with James are not the dead works of the law (ch. ii. 10) but the living evidence of faith in works (ch. ii. 8). If it is alleged that James had developed a defective idea of faith, it may be alleged with equal force that Paul has developed a defective idea of works. But both would be false. With Paul living faith as the work of works excludes dead works: with James the living work-of-faith as the evidence of faith excludes dead faith. Faith without works is dogma-righteousness, orthodoxism. Works without the foundation of faith are work-righteousness, ergism.

But James as well as Paul acknowledges the δικαίων ἐκ πίστεως; only he calls it λογίζεσθαι εἰς δικαιοσύνην (see ch. ii. 23) while he understands by δικαιοῦνθαι Paul's δοκιμάζεσθαι, σφραγίζεσθαι. See Calvin ad loc. Huther, p. 127, and others; my Apost. Age, I, p. 171; the Article Jacobus in Herzog, p. 417.

But his point of view is not the work-righteousness of the Jews, but the dogma-righteousness of the Jewish-Christians and Jews, a tendency which Paul also has distinguished from the tendency of ergism, as one at once Jewish-Christian and Jewish. See Neander, Plant., Vol. I., p. 358., Brückner on de Wette, p. 199.

Ad. 2. It is not probable, that an abuse of the Pauline doctrine should have spread just among the Jewish-Christians, to whom James wrote. Neander, Plant. Vol. I. p. 359; Brückner, p. 189; Huther, p. 32.

Ad. 3. The supposition that James' dogma-tropus as related to Paul's must be taken as being undeveloped as to its forms (Neander, Schaff and others), cannot be proved.

- a. Because the circular Epistle of James cannot be regarded as a complete development of his system of Christian dogma.
- b. Because the use of gnomic and tropical forms in James alongside of the dialectical forms in Paul does not constitute an inferior degree of completeness, but rather the co-ordination of a Jewish Christian mode of teaching with the Gentile Christian mode of teaching of Paul. In like manner the historical conception of this view which assigns a very early date to the Epistle of James, has not been proved (see section 3).

Ad. 4. The view advanced under this head, as to its most important features, is sufficiently conclusive from the foregoing explanations.

On the other relations of Paul and James, relations of affinity and contrariety, which have been explained as relations of dependence and polemics, cf. Brückner on de Wette's Commentary, p. 188. [The treatise of Bp. Bull, Harmonia Apostolica, discusses this whole question very fully and learnedly, and the eminent author reaches the conclusion that our Epistle is not contradictory, but rather supplementary to the Epistles of St. Paul to the Romans and Galatians. Compare also on the same side Barrow's Sermon on Justifying Faith, Works, Vol. IV., Sermon 5, p. 123.—M.]

B. THE EPISTLE OF JAMES AND THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES IN GENERAL.

Besides its evangelical destination, which this Epistle has in common with most of the Catholic Epistles, it shares with all of them the Jewish-Christian type of doctrine which puts dialectics in the background and gnomical and symbolico-figurative forms in the foreground (see Huther, p. 21). Its gnomical mode of statement establishes its chief affinity to the Epistles of John, its symbolical expression establishes its affinity to the Epistle of Jude, the second of Peter (ch. ii.), and besides, to the Epistle to the Hebrews which is closely connected with the Catholic Epistles.

C. THE EPISTLE OF JAMES, THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER AND THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS, A TRILOGY.

Above we have already pointed out the sole significance of this trilogy. They have in common the tendency of earnestly preparing the Jewish Christians in the impending outbreak of the Jewish war for the great temptation to apostasy, to which they were exposed by the hostility and oppression of the pagans and the fanaticism and revolutionary spirit of the Jews. They all aim at strengthening the Jewish-Christian people for that great temptation and at warning them of the great apostasy (see above). Here James the Apostle [?] starts with the harmony of the Jewish law itself as necessarily leading to its perfection in the Christian law of liberty, the first Epistle of Peter starts with the fulfilment of the promise of the Old Testament-kingdom in the New Testament-kingdom of inheritance, while the Epistle to the Hebrews starts with the superiority of the cultus of the New Testament to the covenant-cultus of the Old Testament. The warning of James describes the principal danger of his brethren as a double-mindedness gravitating at once towards God and the world and the breaking out in impatience the warning of Peter delineates it as indecision and visionary enthusiasm (ch. i. 13), while the warning of the Epistle to the Hebrews characterizes it as unbelief, apostasy and rebellion. But the spheres of their operation also are different. The first Epistle of Peter is addressed to the Jewish-Christians in Asia Minor written at Babylon, the Epistle to the Hebrews is probably addressed chiefly to the Jewish-Christians in Palestine written at Rome or in Italy, the Epistle of James is addressed to the Jewish-Christians throughout the world, written at Jerusalem.

D. THE NEW TESTAMENT PECULIARITY OF JAMES.

Besides the references of our Epistle to the Old Testament, to the book of Jesus the Son of Sirach and to the Gospels in general (ch. i. 17 to Matth. vii. 11; i. 20 to Matth. v. 22; i. 22 to Matth. vii. 21; i. 25 to Jno. xiii. 17 etc.), its references to the Sermon on the Mount also have been particularly noticed. See Brückner on de Wette, p. 187; Huther, p. 18.—James, to be sure, exhibits the glorification of the Old Testament law into the New Testament law of the Spirit, of the inner life (see Messner) in perfect analogy to the manner of Christ in the Sermon on the Mount. And this then is also his peculiar dogma-tropus. It bears as much the character of the New Testament as does the dogma-tropus of Paul and that of John, but in respect of the development of the doctrine of Christ, it occupies the first place among the dogma-tropes of the New Testament, without ignoring however the specific features of the later dogma-tropes (see my Apost. Age, II. p. 577). And this is the peculiarity of James. The wisdom which had been personified individually in the Logos of Truth, is also to be personified in the life of believers by believing heart-decision and thereby to conduct them through the fearful ruin of apostasy into which the fanatical disciples of the double-hearted earthly wisdom plunge headlong (ch. iii. 15) it is to evidence itself in them as steadfast patience in the joyous expectation of the advent of Christ. To this mode of teaching answers the gnomical, New-Testament-Solomonic-calm radiance of his language, the festively sententious form of which exhibits an affinity to the language of John, although unlike the latter it is not the expression of a contemplative intuition, but that of a practical energy.

5. THE CONTENTS OF OUR EPISTLE.

The theme of the Epistle is evidently contained in the macarism ch. i. 12. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation etc." Here it is noteworthy that the reference is not to man in general but to man in a sexual sense and that we read immediately afterwards "The wrath of man (ἀνδρός) worketh not the righteousness of God." We confidently assume that the reference is to a temptation to which Jewish-Christian men were peculiarly exposed; viz.: the thought cherished by the Jewish men that the righteous judgment of God on the pagans would have to be executed by an armed insurrection against them. This fundamental theme is resumed in the final theme, ch. v. 7: "Be patient (persevering in long-suffering) therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord."

The Salutation and Introduction, in the first place, correspond to the leading thought. In the Salutation the Apostle introduces himself as a bondman of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, intimating thereby that in virtue of this servile relation he was freed from the bondage under which the Jews were groaning (Jno. viii. 36). He addresses the Epistle to the twelve tribes of the dispersion because he wants to include in one category the Jews as yet unbelieving and the believing Jews, the category, that is, of theocratico-historical catechumens of Christianity, inasmuch as the final historical hardening of Israel had not yet taken place. His Salutation is couched in the Greek form χαίρειν, and apart from the example of toleration indicated by the selection of this expression, this word serves also the purpose of introducing his first idea. They should not yield to the gloomy and desponding disposition which was animating the rebellious spirits, but rejoice conformably to their Christian faith (v. 2).

The Introduction states that they should also rejoice in their versicoloured temptation (ποικίλος; probably more than divers, manifold), use them for their proof [δοκίμουν—M.] and not to run to ruin by wavering. The means he recommends is prayer, but prayer in faith without doubting; consequently a firm and undivided heart. Along with this the brother, who is crushed by his humble lot (surely with particular reference to his national position), is to glory in his Christian exaltation; but the Jewish-Christian, conscious of his theocratico-national riches, is to glory in his lowness. This can hardly mean his poverty in spirit or his humility before God but his historical lowness, the bondage-form of his Jewish and Christian life of faith. For the time of glory has already gone by, the grass is withered and the flower has fallen. The confident rich man (the Jew in the pride of his theocratic riches) will fade away in his occupation or schemes. Ch. i. 1-11.

The Apostle now expatiates on the theme of the Epistle viz. the exhortation to perseverance in temptation from ch. i. 13—v. 6.

I. The most important admonition, then, the Apostle names first. Let them not in the enthusiasm of self-delusion pervert their temptation into the cause of God, which was really done by the Jewish fanatics. Here James delineates first the contrast between the false, hypocritically decorated phantom of temptation and temptation in its true, hideous and deadly form; secondly the actual providential rule of God in its most universal character, who had made them, as Christians, the first-fruits of His creatures. Ch. i. 13-18.

II. The second admonition warns them against fanatical zeal itself. The wrath of man [sexually=ἀνδρός—M.] does not accomplish the decree of the righteousness of God. Its development must be traced to the rashness and recklessness of self-complacency. Do they wish to avoid it, let them not think that they are pure and rich but laying aside their uncleanness and overflowing riches of malice let them meekly yield themselves to the efficient operation of the implanted word. As doers of this word they will effectually guard themselves against self-deception. But they must steadily contemplate this word and enter into it, as into the perfect law of liberty. The Jew considers himself to be religious [θεῖος=observant of God's outward service—M.] in that his zeal of wrath gives the reins to his tongue; but their Christian true service [θεραπεύειν=outward service—M.] should be evidenced in their care of the orphan and widow (especially of the crushed people in its orphanage and widowhood) and their self-preservation from the pollution of the world. Ch. i. 19-27.

III. The third admonition opposes their contempt of the pagans, especially also their contempt of Gentile-Christians. On this account James starts with faith in Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory which admits of no respect of persons. Hence we see in the man with a gold ring on his finger, in a splendid garment, the portrait of the Jewish-Christian or the Jewish convert according to Jewish notions, in the poor man, on the other hand, in a vile garment the portrait of the Gentile-Christian or of the Gentile convert. [Lange understands by the Jewish convert and the Gentile convert those whose conversion is going on, in process of being, but not yet completed.—M.] They ought to consider both as equals in their synagogue (assembly); yea, they should remember that those poor of this world are rich in faith, while those really rich are the proud Jews, their persecutors and the defamers of their Christian name. They are therefore to observe the royal law "Thou shalt love thy neighbour (co-religionists in a higher sense) as thyself" and to have no respect of persons. The law is a unit. Now in supposing that as true Israelites they avoid the adultery of apostasy, while with their unmerciful fanaticism they kill their Christian Gentile brother (cf. 1 Jno. iii. 15), they are transgressing the whole law. In this form the law itself becomes a law of liberty; its living totality delivers from the bondage of its single letters. In connection with this thought,—faith contrasted with works—denotes further the theocratic, Jewish-Christian orthodoxy, while the works denote the living, energetic proof of faith. The monotheism of the Jew, says James, is altogether insufficient, for the devils also participate in it. True faith must prove its vitality in the work of love, especially in brotherly love. The examples chosen in illustration are most telling. Abraham, sacrificing Isaac his son is a type of the Jewish-Christian who sacrifices his national claims; Rahab, the harlot is a type of the Gentile Christian, who came by the work-of-faith into communion with the people of God. Ch. ii.

IV. The Apostle, in the fourth place, considers it matter of great moment, to dissuade the Jews from their fondness for fanatical teaching, which was their characteristic both in their intercourse with the pagans in particular and with those of a different turn of mind in general (cf. Matth. xxiii. 15; Rom. ii. 19). They transgressed particularly with their irrepressibly-busy, didactic tongue, inclined to condemn and curse. The consequence of such a tendency the Apostle shows to be an earthly, sensual and devilish wisdom, born of envying and strife; with this he contrasts heavenly wisdom with the beautiful attributes of love and the blessing of peace. Ch. iii.

V. The Apostle, in the fifth place, now indicates to the Judaistically prejudiced Jewish Christians and with them to the Jews the infallible mark whereby they may perceive that their stand-point is not true; fanatics, he says, live in strife and war among themselves as well as with others. The root of this quarrelsomeness, he says, are lusts and worldly desires, which in their sensual life are at war with one another; its fruit, disappointment and the failure of all their striving, contention and even of their prayer. Ch. iv. 1-3.

VI. James now proceeds in the sixth place, to disclose the ground of those egotistical, pleasurable lusts. It is the apostasy of the (spiritual adulterers and) adulteresses from the living God by their worldly-mindedness; their friendship with the world (in a spiritual garb) is enmity with God. Here the portrait of Judaism appears in the foreground with increasing distinctness. It lacks the spirit which is opposed to hatred, the spirit of humility to which grace is accorded. Pursuant thereto are the exhortations which follow: Be true Israelites in relation to God; true subjects of God, truly praying and sacrificing to God (v. 8), truly purified and God-affianced (v. 8), truly poor and humble in the sense of the Old Testament (vv. 9, 10). Be true Israelites in relation to the brethren; avoid slandering, condemning and cursing! Be true Israelites in your dispersion-life (Diaspora-life, so German.—M.)! Do not yield yourselves in blind confidence to your planning, to go from city to city with a view to traffic and gain, but realize your transitoriness and dependence on God! Otherwise all your knowledge of good will turn to sin and judgment (vv. 11-17). Ch. iv. 4-17.

VII. These admonitions, the Apostle concludes, in the seventh place, by a powerful denunciation of woe on the rich, doubtless on the Judaizing Jewish-Christians and Jews who called themselves poor but thought themselves rich in their Jewish privileges, and here the affinity of his mode of statement with that of the prophets, becomes quite prophetic. It contains the prophecy of judgment, of a judgment which, with the destruction of Jerusalem, soon afterwards came upon Judaism. Let them weep, i. e. be penitent. Their riches are corrupted etc., i. e. all their self-righteousness has turned to sin and disgrace. They confide in and boast of this treasure before the near day of judgment. But that which brings judgment rapidly near is the crying of the hire withheld from their labourers and reapers, the ingratitude to and the rejection of Apostles and believers, who had undertaken the harvest of Israel. The day of slaughter, which shall come on their pleasure-life, is nigh at hand, and has opened with the condemnation and murder of the Just, who now no longer arrests their running into destruction (ch. v. 1-6).

Then follows the final theme and the conclusion. Once more he addresses the brethren. Let them in long-suffering patience persevere unto the coming of the Lord (v. 7).

1. Encouragement thereto: the example of the husbandman waiting for the harvest (vv. 7, 8).
2. Conditions of that patience.
  - a. They must not murmur against one another in disaffection, i. e. they must not nourish in their hearts the spirit of fanatical hardness and alienation. Examples: the prophets; the patience of Job; the end of the Lord (vv. 9-11).
  - b. The excitement of swearing and complications by oaths they must avoid, and hallow their minds (v. 12).
  - c. They must cheer their minds by prayer, praise, the help of the presiding officers of the Church, and the confession of sins (vv. 13-16).
3. Elias the type of wonder-working [effective—M.] prayer, whose first prayer effected the miracle of chastisement and his second the miracle of mercy (vv. 17, 18).
4. Conclusion. Exhortation containing a promise of blessing on the effort of reclaiming an erring brother. Every one should engage in this work, and whoever succeeds, does thereby save a soul from death and prevent the multitudinous evil of sin (vv. 19, 20). Ch. v. 9-20.

The existing tables of contents do not exhibit a perfect, organical structure of the Epistle, because the idea which animates all its separate parts, has not been laid down as the foundation of the Epistle. The construction of the Epistle has been treated in extenso by Pfeiffer, On the connection of the Epistle of James, Stud. and Krit., 1850, Part 1; in Wiesinger's division in his Commentary, p. 46; in Huther's division in his Commentary, p. 15; de Wette and Schleiermacher see neither plan nor order in the Epistle. # COMMENTARY.

THE EPISTLE GENERAL OF JAMES.<sup>1</sup>

I. INTRODUCTION.

THE SALUTATION OF THE SERVANT OF GOD AND OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST TO THE TWELVE TRIBES IN THE DISPERSION. REFERENCE TO THE VARIEGATED TEMPTATIONS TO WHICH THEY ARE EXPOSED, AND TO THE JOYFUL DESIGN OF THE SAME: THEIR CONSUMMATION.

CHAPTER. I. 1-11.

JAMES, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes which
3 divers temptations.<sup>5</sup> Knowing this, that the trying<sup>6</sup> of your faith<sup>7</sup> worketh patience.<sup>8</sup>
4 But let patience<sup>9</sup> have her perfect work,<sup>10</sup> that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting
5 nothing.<sup>11</sup> If any of you lack wisdom,<sup>12</sup> let him ask of God that giveth to all men
6 liberally,<sup>13</sup> and upbraideth<sup>14</sup> not; and it shall be given him.<sup>15</sup> But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering:<sup>16</sup> for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the 7 wind and tossed.<sup>17</sup> For<sup>18</sup> let not that man think that he shall receive anything of 8 the Lord. A doubleminded man<sup>19</sup> is unstable in all his ways<sup>19</sup>. Let the brother of low 9 degree<sup>20</sup> rejoice<sup>21</sup> in that he is exalted.<sup>22</sup> But the rich,<sup>23</sup> in that he is made low<sup>24</sup>: be-10 cause as the<sup>25</sup> flower of the grass he shall pass away. For the sun is no sooner risen<sup>26</sup> 11 with a burning heat<sup>27</sup>, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth: so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways.<sup>28 29</sup>

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Introduction. Analysis. The address and salutation; v. 1.—Reference to temptation as a proof of endurance tending to joy; vv. 2-4.—The means of endurance, wisdom; hence deficiency in wisdom to be met by the prayer of undoubting faith; vv. 5, 6.—Caution against instability; vv. 6, 7.—Particular advice to the lowly and to the rich (in their own opinion); vv. 8-10.—The fate of the rich; v. 11.

VER. 1. Address and Salutation. James, (on James, see Introduction above) servant of God, applied in the widest sense to Christians in general (1 Pet. ii. 16; Eph. vi. 6), denotes in the narrower sense, in the official use of the word, apostolical men (Phil. i. 1); but here the word in its fullest weight signifies not only the head of the church at Jerusalem, but also the Apostle whose special work lay among the Jewish Christian and the Jewish Dispersion (of which Jerusalem was the centre). Rom. i. 1; Tit. i. 1. [Oecumenius: ὑπὲρ πάντων δὲ κοσμικὴν ἀξίωμα οἱ τοῦ κυρίου ἀπόστολοι τὸ δοῦλοι εἶναι χριστοῦ καλλωπίζοντες, τοῦτο γνῶρισμα ἐαυτῶν βούλονται ποιῆσθαι, καὶ λέγοντες, καὶ ἐπιστέλλοντες καὶ διδάσκοντες.—M.]

Of God and of the Lord.—Of God not the attribute of Jesus Christ, as some expositors have rendered, but God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ represented as wielding one dominion (cf. Jno. xvii. 8); thereby James also wisely takes together the Old Testament and the New. The Apostolical and Christian office is one service; however not service rendered to man but service rendered to God and Jesus Christ with undivided consciousness, obedience and operation. [Oec. "θεοῦ μὲν, τοῦ πατρὸς· κυρίου δὲ, τοῦ υἱοῦ." Bengel: "videri potuisset, si Jesum seips appellaret, id ex ambitione facere, cum esset frater Domini. Atque eo minus novit Christum secundum carnem." It is certainly remarkable that James mentions Christ only here and in ch. ii. 1, while in his speeches (Acts xv. and xxi.) he does not name Him at all.—M.]

To the twelve tribes in the dispersion.—That is, in their Christian calling, and in being called to Christ. To Jewish Christians primarily (so Laurentius, Hottinger, Schneckenburger, Neander and others), but, secondarily also to the Jews, as far as their adoption of Christianity had not yet been given up (sofern sie noch nicht aufgegeben sind als werdende Christen). See Introduction. As yet all were treated as the theocratic-ideal unity of the people of Israel, called to (the reception of) the faith. Of course they are distinguished from the Gentile Christians (against Luther; see Wiesinger).

The twelve tribes (τὸ δωδεκάφυλον Acts xxvi. 7) Matt. xix. 38; Rev. vii. 4-8, etc. The dispersion, see Deut. xxx. 8; Nehem. i. 9; Ps. cxlvii. 2; Jno. vii. 35, etc.

Greeting.—χαίρειν, the Greek form of salutation (χαίρειν sc. λέγει 1 Macc. x. 18; 2 Macc. ix. 19); used also in the Apostolical decree Acts xv. 23 (to which Luther, following Kern, rightly calls attention). The Hebrew שָׁלוֹם Is. xlviii.

22 etc. Cf. the forms of salutation used by the other Apostles; as here, they always correspond with the fundamental ideas of the several Epistles. James desires to preserve to his brethren the true joy and to become instrumental in their securing it. Hence χαίρειν of v. 1 relates to χαρά v. 2, which we seek to express in the translation, "Salutation of joy (Freudegruss)." [See above in Appar. Crit. v. 1.—M.]

VER. 4. References to the temptation and its design. All joy.—πάσα χαρά, not as some of the older expositors render "the highest joy," but all joy, joy throughout (δύας Carpov. Luther; entire joy) unless indeed the joy, as an all-sided one, is to correspond with the ποικίλους πειρασμοὶ ["all sorts of joy," "all conceivable joy," Alford; "rem remera omnique ex parte testam." Theile.—M.]. But this χαρά is not mere gaudendi materia (Luther); rather, they are to convert the objective substance of joy into subjective riches of joy. ἡγήσαθε is therefore emphatic. [The repetition at the beginning of a verse or sentence, of the last word in the one preceding, called by grammarians anadiplosis is characteristic of the style of James; e. g. χαίρειν, χαράν v. 1 and following; ὑπομονήν, v. 8; λεκόμενοι, v. 4; διακρινόμενος, v. 6; compare also v. 13, 19, 21, 22, 28.—M.]

My brethren.—Primarily used to denote community of faith, but here also community of theocratic nationality (see ch. i. 16, 19; ii. 5; iv. 11; v. 7, 9, 19). [Wordsworth remarks that "this address is very suitable in an Epistle like the present, characterized by the language of stern rebuke; inspired like the reproof of St. Stephen, by the Spirit of Love. James, 'the Lord's brother,' having the Spirit of the Lord, addresses even them as 'brothers.'"—M.].

When ye fall into divers temptations.—These πειρασμοί are the chief motive of the Epistle. And certainly they are not only in a general sense the θλίψεις which an unbelieving world prepares for believers (Luke viii. 13; Matth. xiii. 21 (Huther); nor are they parallel to 1 Pet. i. 6. Still less are they in essential antithesis to πειράζεσθαι v. 13 (as Wiesinger thinks), the antithesis is at the most that of objective incitement and its corresponding subjective irritability. It is a very definite, concrete idea, the elements of which may be gathered in part from the circumstances of the time (see Introduction), and in part from the Epistle itself. The Jewish Christians were then tempted, on the one hand by the hatred of the pagans, on the other by the national fanaticism of the Jews (an alternate odium generis humani), and their ever-rising chiliastic desire of rebellion; they were tempted to participate in the antipathy to the pagans and to transfer it to the Gentile-Christians, to sympathize with the visionary Jewish national sentiment and thus to be again surprised by the old legal service. They were tempted to Ebionitism, which was already germinating (ch. ii), and beyond it to zealotry (ch. iii), to insurrection, (ch. iv.), and to apostasy (ch. v.). The temptation came therefore from every side and took the most variegated shapes of alluring and threatening, while their hereditary Judaistic lust presented a counter-impulse (v. 13.). Thus the one great πειρασμός resolved itself into the πειρασμοὶ ποικίλοι. Now since the adjective ποικίλος denotes not only the diverse, but primarily the variegated, it probably contains an allusion to the manifold-dazzling glitter of colours in which the Jewish-Christian and Jewish temptations presented themselves and whereby they might even appear in the guise of Divine revelations and prophetic warnings urging them to be zealous for the honour of God. Into the midst of such temptations they had fallen; on all hands they were surrounded by them (on περιπίπτειν consult the Lexica and Huther). [περιπίπτειν to fall into the midst of anything, so as to be wholly surrounded by it. Luke x. 30; Acts xxvii. 41. So ὅστις ἐν τοιαύταις ἐνφοραῖς περιπέσῃ Plato, Legg. 9, 877. c; μεγάλους ἀνυχήμασιν ὑπ' Αἰγυλῶν, καὶ μεγάλαις σύμφοραῖς περιπεδόντες Polyb. p. 402, l. 5; πανικρὸν περιπεδόντες, Ib. p. 670, l. 6; ἀρσέναις περιπέσας Diog. Laert. 4, 50; κακοῖς, 2 Maco. x. 4, etc.—M.J.]. The design of every affliction of believers to turn by proof (δοκιμή) into spiritual joy (Acts iv. 23; Rom. v. 3, etc.) was consequently in an eminent degree peculiar to this great temptation. But this temptation did doubtless bring many an inconstant Jewish-Christian to ruin before the Jewish war, as did that under Bar Cochbas.

VER. 3. Since ye know that the proof of your faith worketh endurance.—The Participle γινώσκοντες explains ἠγάσασθε and indicates by way of encouragement the manner how they might turn the heart-grief of the proof into joy (hence neither "and know" (Luther), nor "for you know" Pott). Τὸ δοκίμιον (found only here and 1 Pet. i. 7) may mean the medium of proof (the proper signification of δοκιμείον, which occurs as a different reading of this passage, also as opposed to δοκίμιον), but also proof (δοκιμή) as the result of the test. Huther following Oecumenius insists upon the latter sense, Wiesinger with Semler, Theile and others, the former. And rightly so, although in 1 Pet. i. 7 the word signifies proof; for this δοκίμιον is designed to effect the endurance consequent upon δοκιμή. Wiesinger rightly cites Rom. v. 3, 4, where θλίψις effects ὑπομονή, etc. Huther says that then we ought to have τοῦτο τὸ δοκίμιον. But the temptation and the proof are not purely identical. The tempting element of the proof emanates from the evil one, while the proving element of the proof comes from God. Temptation is proof under the aggravating coöperation of evil incitement to evil. This settles also the objection that temptations may result in failure (of proof); for temptation as a test ever contemplates proof on condition of good behaviour. It explains also, how in the concrete manner of the Scriptures proof may be described as temptation (but with reference to existing difficulties in the proof, Gen. xxii.), and temptation as proof. On κατεργάζεσθαι, to work, effect, see Rom. v. 3 and other passages; ὑπομονή manifestly denotes here endurance.—Baumgarten, Theile, Wiesinger, Huther: The μύκων ὑπὸ standing one's ground in temptation. Schneckenburger remarks that if ὑπὸ be emphasized we get the idea of patientia ac tolerantia malorum, if μύκων, that of constantia, firmilas, perseverantia.

VER. 4. But let endurance have a perfect work.—Wiesinger: The emphasis is on τέλειον. The majority of commentators understand the perfect work as the perfecting of ὑπομονή itself. So Huther, Wiesinger: the proof of ὑπομονή (cf. 1 Thess. i. 3). Huther: ὑπομονή is not only passive but also active. This active ὑπομονή is not only to persevere unto the end (Luther: Let patience abide firm unto the end: similarly Calvin, Jerome and many others); ὑπομονή is to be deficient in nothing, neither in joy (Bengel) nor in any essential point; especially, wisdom, confidence, etc.—But James evidently contemplates not only inward demeanour but also and chiefly the outward exhibition of the same, which he deplored to see manifoldly omitted. Hence that interpretation is right, which distinguishes the perfect work, viz., the accomplishing of endurance, as the proof of endurance from endurance itself. So Erasmus, de Wette and others; but these commentators err in limiting this outward proof of endurance to something general, viz.: the exhibition of morality, etc. (see Huther). But James in his Epistle looks at a definite object. The ἔργον τέλειον by which the Jewish Christians were to verify their endurance consisted according to ch. ii. in the unreserved acknowledgment of their Gentile Christian brethren, and according to ch. iii., iv., v. in their open rupture with Judaistic faith-pride and fanaticism. Yes, James cherished the hope of gaining the Jewish Christians and along with them even the Jews themselves, to a greater or less extent, for this perfect work of submitting to the practical results of the Christian life. But if the more general sense is preferred, we have the meaning that Christian endurance must evidence itself in the full carrying out of the practical consequences of the Christian faith. An ἔργον τέλειον of the ὑπομονή in our day would consist in the thorough acknowledgment of Christian humanism and the thorough renunciation of the spirit of sectarianism and fanaticism. Ἐξέτω is decidedly emphatic. To this endurance must hold, this it must receive, acquire and this it must have to show. It is therefore at once=κρατεῖτω (Schulthess) and παρεχέτω (Pott).

That ye may be perfect and entire;—iva decidedly expresses the word [used in the telic sense.—M.], and is explained by ch. ii. 22. Τέλειοι and ὁλόκληροι are not altogether synonymous (Huther), although the LXX. use both for ἁπλόως. The former expression denotes perfection in the sense of completed development or vitality, the latter perfection in its completed manifestation. [Alford defines ὁλόκληρος as "that in which every part is present in its place," and cites Plato, Tim., p. 44, c. and Corp. Inscrip. 853, 26.—M.]. But it denotes here specifically: If you want to become entire Jews and close the entire Jewish development, you must become entire Christians; but if you want to sustain the character of entire Christians you cannot dispense with the mark of perfect fraternization with the Christians, also with Gentile-Christians, and that of being opposed to the world, and also to the Judaistic world. For the τέλειος is one who has reached his τέλος, the ὁλόκληρος one, cui totum est, quod sorte obligit (Wahl=—nulla parte minus). The Jew was by origin a symbolic κληρος; as a Christian he was to become a real κληρος and thus ὁλόκληρος. The primary reference here is manifestly neither to moral perfection in general (Huther), nor to perfection hereafter, but to the rudimental [German: principiell] perfection of the faith of Christians as Christians; but the expression of James involves also the rule of absolute Christian perfection.

In nothing deficient;—λείπεσθαι means primarily to stay behind, to be inferior to another, but also to be wanting, deficient in a thing (v. 5). The latter sense is advocated by Theile, de Wette, Wiesinger, Huther with reference to v. 5 and 1 Cor. i. 7, the former by Storr, Augusti and others, whose view we consider correct notwithstanding the modified sense of the word in v. 5. For the opposite of having reached the end, or of being τέλειος is just the having stayed behind. The decay consequent upon quiescence and retrogression, the very characteristics of Ebionitism developed at a later period, and of Nazarite-Christianity, is the primary idea which corresponds with the connection of the whole Epistle. The Jewish people itself became most emphatically the λειπόμενοι of the world's history. James with a prophet's eye foresaw all this growing (werdend) decay. It springs indeed from a guilty deficiency in spiritual things or at least from a deficiency that might have been avoided, a point to which James refers immediately after. The sequel moreover shows that he sees in a perfect outward proof of life the full expression of character.

VV. 5, 6. Wisdom a condition of endurance; prayer for wisdom in undoubting faith.

But if any of you;—εἰ δὲ points hypothetically, and with reference to individuals, to a manifold probable or rather perceptible deficiency in general. Deficiency of wisdom has the form of the Judaistic and Ebionite element.

Deficient in wisdom.—Σοφίας without the Article acknowledges in a forbearing manner this lack of wisdom, supposing the deficiency to exist only in part. Oecumenius defines wisdom as τὸ αἶτιον τοῦ τελείου ἔργου, Huther as the insight of the problem of life as a whole as well as in its particular phases, which incites us to work. The reference here is not only to the Proverbs of Solomon, the Wisdom of Solomon and Jesus the Son of Sirach. The New Testament stadium of theocratical insight was objectively wisdom manifested in person (Matth. xi. 19), and therefore subjectively the right perception of the signs of the time and the christological fulfilment of the theocracy in the Church as well as in the faith of individuals.* The distinct relation of this want of wisdom to the temptations (Calvin) cannot be denied with Huther, although, wisdom, to be sure, must not be identified with endurance. As it is a fundamental condition of the same, so it is also one of the chief modes of its exhibition according to ch. iii. 17.

Let him ask from the God.—See Matth. xx. 20; Acts iii. 2; 1 Jno. v. 15. The further definition shows how important it is that real prayer must be free from the admixture of any conception which obscures the holiness and goodness of God. The Judaizer did also pray, but his conception of the Deity was a Jewish God, partial, legal and measuring His blessings according to merit. The position of the words τοῦ διδόντος θεοῦ (Cod. A. τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ δίδοντος) gives prominence to the idea that God is a giving God (Huther). See v. 17. Wiesinger: "Who is known to give." The sense is: a giving comprehending every thing that is good, hence no object is indicated (Gebser and al.).

To all.—Huther with Calvin and others supply τοῖς αἰτοῦσιν; but God's giving in the most general sense may not be measured by man's asking, although He is wont according to the measure of asking and beyond asking to give good gifts and even the Holy Spirit. [Any and every qualification of πάντων reflects on the graciousness of the Giver.—M.].

Sincerely.—ἀπλῶς occurs only here in the New Testament. Huther [and Alford—M.] renders simply and sees in it an exclusive reference to the gift (nothing else is added to it with reference to Wisd. of Sol. xvi. 27), but the reference is not to the quality of the gift, but to the mode of giving; on this account the definition candide, sincere (Kerne, Theile and others), is preferable. Sincere (pure) giving is opposed to calculated giving which according to the view of the law, is at once suspicious and half compulsory. It refers indirectly to the source of benignitas (Bede and al.) and also to the liberality of giving (affluenter, Erasmus and al.) [Wordsworth explains: "who giveth ἀπλῶς, liberally, that is, sinu laxo, expanding the lap of his bounty and pouring forth its contents into your bosom. Cf. 2 Cor. viii. 2; ix. 11, and the use of the word ἀπλοῦν, dilatare, by the LXX. in Is. xxxiii. 23; and therefore the word ἀπλῶς is rendered affluenter here by the Vulgate, and copiously by the Syriac version."—M.].

* The Jews indeed had already before that time been deficient in the right comprehension of the Solomonic doctrine of wisdom, that is, of the universalism of the Old Testament, and for this very reason they had misunderstood and misinterpreted the Davidic Messianism from a particularistic point of view; just as Evangelical theology for the same reason has fallen short of its task in consequence of not sufficiently appreciating Christian humanism.

And upbraideth not with it.—Negative explanation of the preceding or of that which is consequent upon God's sincere giving. Wiesinger also explains μη βρωδιζοντος with Luther: "and upbraideth none with it" with reference to Sir. xli. 28: μηδὲ τὸ δοῦναι μὴ οὐδιδίξαι; ch. xx. 15; xviii. 17 (see Huther's note from Cicero). Huther disputes this exposition; Semler and al. interpret βρωδιζειν: qualemcumque reprehensionem. But then James would utter an untenable sentiment, because God notwithstanding those who ask, in various ways covers men with confusion. The expression also would be too brief in that sense; it is only intelligible if we take it with what goes before as one idea. But the exposition "to put those who ask to shame with a refusal" (Morus, Augusti and al.), is certainly unfounded; although it is less far-fetched than that of Huther; he who afterwards upbraids with his gifts is equally disposed to be hard beforehand and according to circumstances to send away the asker (without claims). "The side-look on the rich, v. 10; ch. v. 9," also, which Huther and Wiesinger detect here, cannot be sustained because it has first of all to be determined whom James means by the rich. The conception of a θεὸς βρωδιζοντος would certainly agree with the religious views of said rich and then also indirectly with their behaviour.

And it (wisdom) shall be given to him.—There is not sufficient reason for taking δοθησεται (with Huther and Wiesinger) impersonally: it will be given to him. See Matth. vii. 7-11; Luke xi. 13; 1 Kings iii. 9-12.

V. 6. But let him ask in faith.—James having objectively defined real prayer as the worship of the true God of revelation, now also defines it subjectively as prayer in faith. See ch. v. 15; Sir. vii. 10; Jno. xvi. 23. It certainly follows (according to Wiesinger) from the appended negative definition that πίστις here designates first of all undivided confiding, full and firm heart-trust. Such trust is only possible as a looking up to the God of free grace according to revelation; Huther therefore rejects without reason the exposition of Calvin: "fides est quæ, dei promissionibus freta, nos impetrandi, quod petimus, certos reddit," as one which lacks sufficient intimations; even the still closer definition of some of the older expositors, "πίστις Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ" would seem to be included implicitly. That is, while Wiesinger rightly observes that πίστις both with James and Paul denotes the mind's moral attitude to God, yet with James this very attitude presupposes a looking up to "the giving God" according to revelation. Hence the μηδὲν διακρινόμενος excludes at once subjective wavering and doubting the certainties of evangelical salvation, because the attempt of fixing the heart outside of the sphere of revelation (in the case of Christians outside of the name of Jesus) would be pure fanaticism. A similar conjoining of "faith and not doubting" also in an objective sense, occurs in Rom. iv. 20; cf. ch. xiv. 23; Matth. xxi. 21; Mark xi. 24. James' conception of faith as given here is consequently his full conception of faith; it is only in such an energy of praying and doing that faith is to him vital, but without it dead. διακρίνεσθαι=being at discord with oneself, being divided in oneself, and hence doubting must be still further defined as inward false discriminating, judging and deciding, and in this root it is joined with false discriminating and judging, ch. ii. 5. The hard and austere mind on the one hand produces a hard and austere conception of God, and on the other a hard and austere deportment. Huther: "While πίστις is 'yes,' and ἀπιστία 'no,' διακρίνεσθαι is the union of yes and no, yet so that the preponderance lies with 'no.'" That is, where διακρίνεσθαι has become habitual, a governing trait of character; this is the force of the Participles. But Huther (after Calvin) also mentions the possibility of doubting alongside of honest, yet weak faith (see Note p. 48).

V. 6. For he that doubteth is like a wave of the sea.—ὅσως occurs only here and v. 24 in the New Testament. Huther sees in the γάρ of v. 7 the repetition of the γάρ in v. 6. That is, he thinks that James gives only one reason, not two and that the figurative description of him that doubteth v. 6, is only intended to bring out a clearer exhibition of the fickle mental constitution of the doubter. But "this apparently helpless disunion" assumes another form if we take v. 6 not only as a colouring but as a declaration that the doubter falls under foreign, antedivine influences. The sea, according to the Old Testament, is the figure of the constrained (unfrei) life of nations, floating hither and thither in pathological sympathies (Ps. xli. 93; Dan. vii. 3; Is. lvii. 20; Rev. xiii. 1). James was doubtless conscious of this theocratic influence at a time, when "the waves of the sea" already began to roar. The symbolical figure of the wind (Eph. iv. 14; cf. ch. ii. 2) however, must be put in the background, because it is only expressed in verbs. But even here we can hardly fail to recognize an allusion to a restless spiritual commotion (Geistesleben) tossing the sea of nations, especially because ἀνεμίζεσθαι is an ἀπαξ λέγ., not found elsewhere (in classical Greek we have ἀνεμωῖσθαι, to be moved by the wind), and βριζέσθαι also occurs only here in the New Testament. On the different derivations of the word, see Huther, Note 2, p. 48; viz.: from ριπής, a bellows or fan, or from βιπής, rush (of the wind) or storm. The latter derivation seems to lie nearest. These expressions are therefore not altogether synonymous (Huther). Bengel makes the former to denote motion from without and the latter motion from within. But both, the wind and the storm come from without; the inner element is here expressed by the sea-nature of the wave. According to Theile, the former indicates the cause, the latter the effect. But the two denote two different relations of degree: the sea in waves, the sea in billows; the breeze, the storm, the excitement of spirits, the rebellious commotion (vide bellum Jud.). From these considerations it seems to follow that the first γάρ has a more limited signification; it pronounces the διακρινόμενος incompetent to pray aright, because he is governed by the evil influences of the world. The second γάρ, on the other hand, bears in a wider sense upon that man's faithless relation to God. We cannot indeed conveniently render γάρ twice by for and repeat it therefore intensiter by 'also.' Calvin makes it=ergo, Huther=namely, that is to say (nämlich), Pott, a particle of transition. The lively figure is charged with prophetic-symbolical matter.

V. 7. Also let not that man think [or as I should prefer to render "Nor let that man think." Mē γάρ as an elliptic phrase denotes absolute denial and an Imper. or Optat. verb is then always supplied; here the context, on any interpretation that may be adopted, involves absolute denial and the nor has intensive force; the meaning is "let not that man by any means think" or "let that man by no means think."—M.]. The second γάρ has particular reference to the doubter's deficiency of faith in God, which is involved in his worldly dependence. Sure, he seeks to supply that deficiency of faith by superstitious or fanatical delusions, but he deceives himself with these delusions. He must become conscious of the nothingness of these delusions before matters can mend with him. The severe handling of false praying is a very ancient characteristic of exhortations to repentance according to Is. i. 15; Luke xviii. 11, this passage and the Reformation.

That man, the one who doubts and has fallen into human weakness. [Alford sees in these words a certain slight expression of contempt.—M.].

That he shall receive any thing.—He receives nothing; see ch. iv. 3 where another reason is specified why he does not receive any thing. [The reference is to the things for which he prays; there are many things, temporal blessings, which he does receive.—M.].

From the Lord.—The reference is of course to God, as in v. 12; ch. iv. 10, etc., but there is a reason for the use of κύριος instead of θεός; James means Jehovah, the living covenant-God, who has now fully revealed himself in Christ. For details, see Wiesinger. [Alford quotes Hofmann, who remarks that where the Father is not expressly distinguished from the Son by the context, the Godhead in its unity is to be understood by θεός; and the same may be said of κύριος.—M.].

V. 8. A two-minded man.—The connection of this sentence with that which precedes it, is variously explained. The expositions of Pott: "ex homini inconstanti," and of Baumgarten who wants to join δίψυχος with λήμψεται may be passed over. Winer, Wiesinger and Huther [also Wordsworth—M.] take it in apposition with the former verse and as explanatory of the figure v. 6, and render "he, a two-minded man." But the explanation of a figure and especially of one so thoroughly self-explanatory would not suit the style of our Epistle. Although the necessity of the Article before ἄνθρωπος (Schneckenburger), if the latter exposition is given, is unfounded, the exposition itself runs into a feeble tautology. Hence we agree with Luther and many expositors in taking ἄνθρωπος δίψυχος as the subject and ἀκατάστατος as the predicate and the omission of the copula (is) as elevating the sententious weight of the proposition. Huther says that this would make the thought too abrupt. But in the masculine gender it is this formal abruptness which elevates the sentence, while in point of matter the connection is perfect. The doubter is delineated first as to how he stands to the world (a wave), then as to how he stands to God (a visionist, a man of conceits), and lastly as to how he stands to and by himself. And here it is noteworthy that James speaks of man in the masculine gender, probably not only on account of his proverbial character, but because the dangers against which James cautions his readers, are more especially dangers which threaten the Jewish male-world. The δίψυχος is not the same as the διακρινόμενος (so Luther and al.). According to Huther this word "characterizes the inward being of the doubter." To be sure, the inward being, not however as the ground of doubting (Huther, Kern, Wiesinger), but as the result of doubting. For two-mindedness is forthwith mentioned as the ground in relation to the manner how the doubter proceeds. Two-mindedness indeed lies already germ-like in doubt itself, but it is doubtfulness which develops wavering and irresoluteness, wherein man has, as it were, two souls, the one touched by God, the other occupied by the world. He is false in both directions, false to God and false to the world by his double reservation, just as he is false to himself by the reservation of his egotism over against his piety and vice versa. But this makes him not forthwith a consummate liar and hypocrite; "he has not only, as it were, two souls in conflict with each other" (Huther), but as yet his enthusiasm glows psychically now for God and now for the world in two changing forms of the psychical life. The word δίψυχος is admirably formed after the analogy of διγλωσσος and similar words; it appears to occur nowhere prior to this Epistle (see also ch. iv. 8), but besides the analogies just mentioned, it has its type in the Hebrew קֶלֶב וְלֵב (see also Jesus

Sir. I, 28), and has been adopted by Clemens Rom. and other church authors (see Huther p. 51). [Alford proposes to make the whole sentence predicate and all to apply to ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐκεῖνος. On the whole, however, we give the preference (with Wiesinger, Huther and Wordsworth) to the certainly most grammatical construction of taking ἄνθρωπος δίψυχος in opposition with v. 6; not as an explanation but as an expansion of the figure in v. 6. This construction is by no means in conflict with the abrupt and predicative style of James, for the transition from the figure of the wave of the sea to the two-minded man is certainly bold, if not abrupt, there is indeed a transition from a physical to a psychical illustration; the word δίψυχος itself, used here for the first time in Greek literature, by its novelty would arrest attention and thus in the language of Lange, "elevate the sententious weight of the proposition."—M.].

An (excited) seditious disturber of peace.—The ordinary rendering 'unstable' [E. V.] or inconstant (Luther and al.) does justice neither to the original nor to the connection. For firstly, the expression is already half settled by what precedes it as well as by the words "in all his ways;" for although the latter phrase may bear a good sense, it seems to be used here in a bad sense (Sir. II, 18 ἐπιβαίνει ἐπὶ δύο τριβῶν). Secondly, the expression, as the representative of σῶν (Is. liv. 11, LXX.), is too feeble in point of degree. And although, lastly, it may passively denote one driven about by the storm as well as actively a storming seditionary, ch. iii. 16 (ἀκαταστάσια) recommends here the use of the active signification. The wavering man, indeed, is exciting and seditious because he is ruffled and driven by the storm (of public excitement). The wave of the sea, related passively to the winds, strikes actively against "the rock."

Particular advice to the lowly [in station—M.] and particular advice to the rich. vv. 9; 10.

V. 9. But let the brother, who is low, glory in his exaltation.—Δὲ indicates a contrast of proper behaviour with what has just been described (Theile), [i. e. with διψυχία—M.]. It directs the brother to turn the particular temptations to wavering into instruments of constancy. Commentators are divided with regard to ἀδελφός. De Wette and Wiesinger apply the term both to the more remote πλοῦσις and to the nearer ταπεινός. Then ταπεινός must not be taken spiritually according to Matth. xi. 29, but like πλοῦσις with regard to outward circumstances, while the exaltation in which the lowly is to glory, would denote his heavenly dignity. But Huther, representing the opposite view, remarks that that exposition conflicts with the connection, which forbids such a distinction of Christians into poor and rich; that the reference is rather to the πειρασμοί; that a Christian, moreover, as a rich man would hardly have required so urgent a reminder of the transitory nature of things temporal. But three things are here overlooked. 1. That the πειρασμοί affect the rich in a higher degree than they do the poor; 2. That the Apostle, as we have seen in the Introduction, treats both of Jewish Christians (among whom were already rich men) and of Jews. Moreover he addresses, at the very beginning of the Epistle, the twelve tribes as his brethren. 3. The contrast between the poor and the rich had as yet not become prominent, but a contrast of those low in station [E. V. brethren of low degree—M.], and the rich. But that the low in station and the poor are, as brethren, nearer to James than the rich, becomes increasingly apparent as the Epistle runs on, especially in ch. v. Primarily, the lowly and the rich are described as brothers, for James indicates also to the rich a means of deliverance. There is still a third view, represented by Morus and Theile, which comprises both ideas: those who are outwardly poor and persecuted for righteousness' sake, Matth. v. 19; 1 Pet. iii. 14. Huther contests this union (p. 52), but afterwards reaches about the same conclusion. We have first to remember, that the brother of low station is not identical with the poor in ch. ii. Glancing at the characteristics of that time, we find that it designates the Jewish Christian and the Jew absolutely in their low, oppressed theocratic condition as contrasted with the heathen world and the secular power; and still more particularly the theocrat, inasmuch as he deeply feels this condition. He is to glory in the dignity of his heavenly and royally-glorious vocation, i. e. to derive from it consolation and joy and to strengthen himself with it. But the rich, i. e. again the Jew and the Jewish Christian, inasmuch as he sees the hopeless situation of the Jewish people in a very different and brilliant light, inasmuch as he is not only rich in the consciousness of his Jewish prerogatives, but also rich in the chiliastic and visionary expectation of the Messianic or pseudo-Messianic restoration of his Jewish theocracy,—he is exhorted to glory in his humiliation, that is, to become reconciled with Christian or pious humility to all his theocratical humiliation, the full development of which in all its fearful magnitude is as yet impending (v. 11), in order that he may find in this Divine judgment turned into deliverance, the source of rejoicing and exaltation and of real glorying.

And here a general explanation must suffice for our passing on to the general import of the double antithesis: the low-in-station and the rich; the poor and the rich. For we hold the opinion that, after the type of the Old Testament and the Gospels, these expressions are throughout prophetic-symbolical, and that the common literal acception of this antithesis has unspeakably flattened the Epistle, weakened its purport and obscured its interpretation. Is it possible to suppose that in the time of James, in all the Jewish Christian congregations among all the twelve tribes the rich were in the habit of slighting the poor and that the unbelieving Jews were everywhere the rich? And that James was so reliably informed on that point, as to feel constrained to call all the twelve tribes to account for it? Such conduct, I should think, could not be generally charged on the Jews proper. The rich among the Jews, as a rule have at all times exhibited much sympathy with and regard for their poor. And this very regard is supposed to have been wanting in such fearful generality in the Apostolic age, at a time where even in Gentile-Christian congregations collections were made for their Jewish Christian brethren! Nor was this the only point on which James felt bound to reprimand, but it is still further supposed that he had to denounce the sexton-rudeness of assigning good seats to the rich and of allowing the poor either to stand or to sit on the bare floor, which rudeness had become prevalent throughout all the twelve tribes! If James, "the good, pious man" had only received a little more credit [for capacity—M.], i. e. the Apostolical spirit united with prophetic-symbolical style, doubtless more would have been found in his Epistle.

The brother must therefore be taken in a general sense, like v. 2. The low (in station) is the Jewish Christian or the Jew who as such (not primarily as a private individual) felt his theocratic humiliation; this intimates, of course, that he was the more humble just as a being pinched in private affairs might also further such consciousness; this is quite analogous to the Old Testament and the Gospels. (Ps. lxxiv. 21; 1 Cor. i. 27).

Glory.—The stronger rendering for Peter's (1 Pet. i. 6) ἀγαλλιάσθαι, analogous to Paul's expression in 2 Cor. xii. 9. A real glorying or a rendering prominent by glorying, inasmuch as such glorying is in contrast with egotistic self-glorying; or also the condition of Divine grace and assistance.

In his exaltation; tv denotes the object in which they shall glory, as a foundation of their well-being. It is the glory, given now already in the form and inwardly, which hereafter however shall also be outwardly manifest (see 1 Pet. 1), the process of its development being diametrically opposite to the rich man's flower. Ἦθος is therefore not=steadfast courage (Augusti), or only future exaltation (de Wette), but=sublimitas jam præsens, sed etiam adhuc futura (Theile, Huther).

V. 10. But the rich in his humiliation.

Here we must evidently repeat καυχάσθω. As to the irony contained in this clause (Thomas, Beza and al.), it is not much greater than that in the preceding sentence: let the lowly glory in his exaltation; for 1. such glorying emancipates from vain-glorying, 2. the rich also finds a source of comfort and praise in the full knowledge of his humiliation and its blessed import (see Matth. v. 3).

Because as a flower of the grass.—An Old Testament figure applied to man in general, Job. xiv. 2; Ps. ciii. 15, to the ungodly with particular emphasis, Ps. xxxvii. 2 (Ps. xcii. 8). But here it is not to be explained with reference to the ungodly (so Huther), but as a historical figure with reference to the decay of the Old Testament glory, which in a surprising manner exhibits the realization of the law of the universal decay of human glory, even as foretold by Is. xl. 6 etc. to which this passage doubtless has special reference. But in this decay there lay really concealed a consolation (just as in the universal decay of man), at which the thoughtful theocrat might well rejoice. The flower of the Old Testament glory was decaying, but the fruit-time of the Gospel of the New Testament had set in; "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people!" Hottinger has erroneously referred ἀνθος to Is. xi. 1, where the LXX render ῥόδον by ἀνθος. The words "flower of the field" (Is. xl. 6) are changed into "flower of the grass" with reference to v. 7 "the grass withereth and the flower fadeth." So in the parallel-passage 1 Pet. i. 23, 24.—

The fate of the rich. v. 11.

V. 11. For the sun rose (already).—This again is not only the colouring of the preceding, but considering the reference to Is. xl. 6 etc., this passage contains an application to Jewish history perfectly intelligible to an Israelite. What Isaiah had represented as having been done in the Spirit, was now fulfilled in reality; the old theocratic glory of Israel had passed away with the crucifixion of Christ. Hence the Aorists ἀνέτειλε etc., as symbolical expressions, must retain their literal force and neither be construed as used for the Present (Grotius and al.), nor as the mere representation of whatever repeats itself in one past fact (Huther). This historical style serves, of course, the purpose furnishing us with a lively picture in the rapid succession of the separate stages of the process of decay (Winer).

The sun with the burning heat (wind).—Grotius, Pott and al. distinguish ὁ δαίνων, the

ing from the desert of Arabia scorches the plains of Palestine) from the sun itself, referring to Ezek. xvii. 10; xix. 12; Hos. xiii. 15 etc. Huther, however, applies the expression to the scorching heat of the sun and cites Is. xlix. 10, Matth. xx. 12; Luke xii. 55. But in Is. xlix. 10 the heat of the sun is expressly distinguished from the sun, as a higher degree of the ordinary sunshine which oppresses Orientals, and the reference is to the relation of this incumbrance to men, so also in Matth. xx. 12, while in Luke xii. 55 the sun is not mentioned at all. The supposition that sunrise and the development of the sun's heat are forthwith imperilling vegetation, would be almost too strong even to an Oriental imagination. To this must be added the presence of the Article before δαίνων. But the view, that the sun with the development of its power frequently wakens the hot wind, as a kind of supplemental counterpart of its beneficent operation, is current in Holy Writ. So according to Mal. iv. the day of the Lord comes hot as a burning oven on all the proud, while the Sun of Righteousness rises with healing in His wings on all that fear the Lord. So Matth. xiii. 6, the scorching heat is distinguished from the rising sun; in the interpretation of the parable v. 21 it is called tribulation or persecution because of the word. Now, as we Occidentals make use of the well-known symbolical language, "the rising sun calls up vapor, fog, and thunder gusts," so the Oriental is wont to say, "it wakens the hot wind." Hence the application of this passage to Christ (Laurentius), was not far from its real meaning, but we do not press it; at all events the hot wind of the law, which scorched the glory of Israel, was developing with the sun of the finished revelation. And indirectly it was also the effect of the sun itself ("a stone of stumbling etc.").

And the beauty of its appearance.—Huther connects the second αὐτοῦ not with τὸν χρόνον but with τὸ ἄνθος. But we cannot imagine that a fallen flower is still to lose its beauty; the flower is gone with the falling; the flower itself and not only its beauty. And thereby (by the falling of the flower) the grass or the plant itself lost all its beauty, the dress of its appearance, without, however, having wholly perished. And this was then precisely the case of Israel. Its flower had fallen away in the most significant manner; like grass, low on the ground, it continued vegetating in its cumbersome existence. The word εἰσπρέτεια occurs only here in the New Testament; πρόσωπον often denotes outward appearance. Ps. civ. 30; Matth. xvi. 3 etc.

Thus also shall the rich man, that is: the fate of the withered, stunted plant, or the general fate of the Jewish people will also be the fate of each individual Jew or Jewish Christian if he persists in the conceit of his riches, or refuses to learn to glory in his humiliation. οὕτως=so quickly, so thoroughly." Wiesinger. "Μαραίνεσθαι, ἀπαξ λεγ-" in the New Testament occurs in the LXX. as the translation of יָרַשׁ Job xv. 30, in the same sense, Wisd. of Sol. ii. 8." Huther.

In his journeyings.—Luther has “in his possession,” which rendering rests on the false reading ropia (= europia, good way, favour of fortune, wealth). Herder, following Laurentius and Piscator, “in his journeyings,” with reference to ch. iv. 12. Huther, “in his ways” (= odōis, v. 8; cf. Prov. ii. 8). Wiesinger, “in his walk,” with reference to de Wette, “in his luxurious enjoyment of life.” The word denotes in classical language 1, a going, a journey; 2, walking along, course. In LXX, way, Nah. ii. 5; Jer. xviii. 15; Jon. iii. 8, 4; but also a journey, 2 Macc. iii. 8; cf. Luke xiii. 22. From these passages it is evident, that ropia is not used as much as odōis in a metaphorical sense. We avoid therefore this expression and render: in his journeyings (of fortune). Huther: “The prominent idea is, that the rich man, overtaken by judgment, perishes in the midst of his doings and pursuits as the flower in the midst of its blossoming falleth a victim to the scorching heat of the sun.”

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. If the purely evangelical character of the Epistle of James has ever been impugned, its opening words may be referred to as furnishing proof that we are moving not on the ground of the Old Testament, but on that of the New. Joy as the burden of salvation is the watchword given to the first readers of the Epistle, who, however, were troubled by manifold temptations. Luke ii. 10. The beginning of the Epistle of James sounds like an echo of Christ's first sermon at Nazareth, which the Author had probably heard, Luke iv. 18, 19. This χαλπεω makes him homogeneous with Paul (Phil. iv. 4) and Peter (1 Pet. i. 6), the beginning of whose Epistle exhibits a remarkable agreement with the beginning of that of James. James, like Elihu, knows a God “who giveth songs in the night.” Job. xxxv. 10.

2. The very beginning of the Epistle testifies of the truly Christian as well as of the morally exalted character of its Author. The demand “to count it all joy if one has fallen into manifold temptations,” has so lofty and bold a sound as to prompt the question whether such a demand is not beyond the reach of man's ability. Cf. Heb. xii. 11. Such a demand must severely strike the natural man as a piece of consummate folly and scandalize him. For counting temptation all joy is infinitely more than to be silent in it and to pray, even more than to be grateful for it; it is not sufficient that we readily submit to temptation, but we must glory in it that it is so and not otherwise, and this not only in isolated temptations but in the many temptations which spring from the sufferings of earth. Cf. Rom. v. 3. Such a demand makes the Festuses exclaim “James, thou art beside thyself.” Acts xxvi. 24. But the Christian, hearing this first word, feels and is conscious of the spirit of him who addresses him in that word. For how could flesh and blood have been able to reveal what is here so clearly and explicitly put on record, viz. the Christian's deepest grief at once the source of his highest joy? No other religion, beside the Christian, had raised the suffering of earth to a new ground of gratitude. Bacon's saying is well known: “Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament, adversity that of the New.” Compare the treatise, still worth reading, of F. V. Reinhard, de præstantia religionis Christianæ in consolandis miseris etc., and on the other hand the Diatriba de consolatione apud Græcos, auctore A. C. van Heusde, Traj. ad Rhen. 1840.

3. Since ye know.—In order to make a joy like that which he had just recommended to them possible to their πίστις, James now points to the fruit of their γνώσις. Faith also had a science of its own, but a science, different in kind although not inferior in value and reliability to the knowledge whose province is purely natural. On the one hand even Christians are constrained to acknowledge “we are but of yesterday and know nothing,” Job viii. 9, but on the other, the things which were hidden from the wise and prudent are revealed to them, Matth. xi. 25, 26. And this science is fully competent to enable him to secure the joy here recommended; he knows from whom the temptation comes, he knows the purpose temptation serves, viz. the proof of faith. This view alone is calculated to reconcile him to the sufferings he has to endure. It is not chance if the Christian, more than many others, falls into manifold temptations, as little chance as if the smelter, in order to refine gold or silver, heats the furnace to a certain degree. Still less is it a just punishment but rather a means of purification, improvement and education, without which it is impossible for us to attain any degree of greatness in the kingdom of God. Thus we have here also a confirmation of the words of Seneca: “Opus est ad notitiam sui experimento. Quod quisque possit, nisi tentando haud didicit.”

4. Christian endurance is infinitely diverse from stoical indifference with its motto: “res mihi, non me rebus subungere conor.” It has a more sublime origin, a milder character, a greater duration, a more glorious fruit.

5. It is remarkable that James insists in the very beginning of the Epistle upon Christian perfection, so that in v. 4 the same word is twice used. So also the perfect law, ch. i. 25, the perfect man, ch. iii. 2, etc. Cf. the beautiful essay of Ad. Monod in his Adieux, 1856: “Tout dans l'Écriture est idéal.”

6. The exhortation in v. 4 contains the profound hint that where endurance has its perfect work, the Christian, as to principle, is perfect and in nothing deficient. For where Christian endurance holds sway, there the power of sinful selfishness is broken, of selfishness which perchance would love to take a position either independent of God or higher than God, but in no event under God. For the heroism of faith is evinced in two ways, it is suffering or militant. The former is higher than the latter, because it demands the greatest self-denial, and he who really attains to it, by so doing carries also within himself the principle of Christian perfection.

7. The short Epistle of James treats relatively much of prayer, see ch. i. 5; iv. 2, 8, 8; v. 13-18. Herein also the Apostle appears as the true servant of Him who not only did conduct His disciples to the school of prayer, but was to them in this respect also a pure and perfect pattern, Luke xi. 1. The manner in which James speaks of prayer shows clearly that he recognizes a direct connection between prayer and its answer, not only in the sense of modern unbelief that prayer can only psychologically exert a beneficial influence on the heart of the person praying, but also that prayer is the Divinely appointed means for the direct obtaining of our wants, which also without such prayer we should certainly not receive. If prayer were only psychologically operative on the person praying, it would be altogether inexplicable why James also so earnestly and emphatically enjoins prayer for others (intercession, ch. v. 13-18), as in the former case prayer could not possibly be of any use to them. Cf. this commentary on 1 Tim. ii. 1-7.

8. The Christian never needs more wisdom than when in temptation everything depends upon his enduring it in the right manner and according to the will of God. We often speak of the wisdom which men need in prosperity lest they become ungrateful, haughty or arrogant and this assertion is correct. But in adversity also we need the Divine light not less if we would truly understand the lesson God is teaching us thereby and not be driven by our own excited feelings into lamentable error. This was duly understood and appreciated by the sacred bard, Ps. xciv. 12. There never was a sinner converted by the highly praised benefit of tribulation alone, as long as the Lord Himself did not render the wholesome chastisement efficacious with the rod of His Word and the light of His Spirit. In the day of tribulation we probably need Divine wisdom even more than in the days of joy; wisdom in order that we really choose the true way without turning to the right or to the left; wisdom, in order that we may understand what God wants us to do when He denies us the realization of some cherished desire, or when He lays on us a heavy burden, etc.

9. What James says of the indispensable necessity of faith in prayer, is also taken from our Lord's own teaching, Matth. xxi. 21, 22. His charming figure of the waves of the sea originated probably in his own recollection of the lake of Gennesareth. The striking truth of this figure is best understood, if we apply it to our inward experience of life. The soul is like the sea, but doubt blows over it like a tempest which upheaves the waters from their lowest depth; in such a condition, the heart of the δύσυχος is not susceptible of the enjoyment of answer to prayer. Cf. 1 Kings xviii. 21, where the expression "to halt between two opinions" [German: "to halt on both sides."—M.] indicates a similar inward breach, with a probable allusion to a bird limping from twig to twig without finding rest anywhere.

10. James seems to present us with a new paradox in the exhortation (v. 9) "Let the brother, who is low, glory in his exaltation." There is however an exaltation seen by God and the Lord, which does not depend upon earthly honour and perishable riches and is mostly to be found where superficiality would last and least look for it. To be humiliated can only be irritating and disagreeable to flesh and blood; but if it happens for the sake of Christ's name, if the humiliation is borne with the eye turned to Christ and united to Christian nobility of soul, then it is not counted a disgrace, but borne as the highest honour. Cf. Matth. v. 11, 12; Acts v. 41, 42. Here we are involuntarily reminded of Pascal's beautiful saying concerning man: "Gloire et rebut de l'univers, s'il se vante, je l'abaisse; s'il s'abaisse, je le vante."

11. The number of the rich who were able to glory in their humiliation has always been small. Cf. Matth. xix. 23-26. Still history here and there shows us individuals in the fire of the fiercest assault and temptation. Hear only e.g. the splendid language of Chrysostom in his speech after the fall of Eutropius, Opera, vol. 3, p. 586, ed. Montf. "Why did we not tremble? Because we do not fear any of the adversities of this life. What could inspire us with terror? Death? We run so much the sooner into the haven of repose. The loss of earthly riches? Naked I came out of my mother's womb and naked I shall return into the mother-womb of the earth. Exile? The earth is the Lord's and what therein is. False accusations? Rejoice and be exceeding glad when men shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for great shall be your reward in heaven. I saw the swords above me and looked up to heaven. I expected death and thought of the resurrection. I looked at earthly adversities and counted up the blessings at the right hand of God. I looked upon the perils and my eye beheld in spirit the crown of glory. What I am constantly preaching in my sermons, was constantly preached by the deed in the market-place. The wind blows and scatters the leaves, the grass withers and the flower fades." (The last sentence probably contains an indirect allusion to James i. 11.)

12. The crown of life, of which James here speaks, presents not only a contrast to the perishable laurel-crowns for which the Greeks contended in the games, but also to that fading flower to which James referred in the preceding verse (v. 11). In the doctrine of the reward of grace accorded to persevering faith, James is in perfect agreement with our Lord and His other Apostles. Cf. Matth. xix. 28; 1 Cor. ix. 24-27; 1 Pet. v. 4; Rev. ii. 10; iii. 21. His mentioning the crown of life which is ready for all who love the Lord, affords a not indistinct view of "the election of grace."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

V. 2-8. Epistle for 8d Sund. in Lent, v. 9-12 Epistle for 22d Sund. after Trinity in the Grand Duchy of Hesse and elsewhere. [V. 1-12 Epistle for St. Philip and St. James's Day in the Church of England and the Prot. Epis. Church in the U. S.—M.]

How the vocation of being servants of Jesus Christ was especially committed to the authors of the New Testament and how it still is the prerogative of all believers.—The servant of Jesus Christ can do nothing better than to strengthen his brethren.—In Christ is joy for all people.—How Christianity renders possible what seems to be impossible.—The sufferings of this time the Christian's proof of faith. It is this very fire-proof [noun, to give the full force of German "Feuerprobe"] which establishes 1, the genuineness 2, the standard and 3, the intrinsic value of this gold of faith. Cf. 1 Pet. i. 7.—Endurance under all temptations the daughter of faith, the mother of all other virtues.—The Christian life a God-consecrated sacrifice which must be without spot or blemish. “Ask, what I shall give thee,” 1 Kings iii. 5.—The difference between Divine and human benevolence, cf. Sir. xviii. 18. The great value of believing prayer and its indispensable necessity in times of great temptation. The curse of wavering; the value of Christian decision of character.—Riches and poverty viewed in the light of faith.—Abasement the way to exaltation, want the way to enjoyment, fighting the way to the crown.—The beatitude of the servant of Christ (v. 12) compared with the beatitudes of the Master, Matth. v. 8-12.

On the whole section vv. 1-12.—The Christian's threefold duty in temptation: 1. Suffering (v. 2-4), a. with grateful joy; b. with enduring patience; 2. Prayer (v. 5-8), a. for a precious gift at the hands of a magnanimous giver; b. in simple faith without any doubt; 3. Glorying (v. 9-12), a. in the present conflict; b. in the expectation of the future crown.

STARKE:—To be the servant of God is to a believer a precious title of honour, in which he may always glory.

CRAMER:—The Church of the New Testament is not confined to one locality as in the time of the Old Testament, “but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him” Acts x. 35.

QUESNEL:—One of the chief cares of conscientious teachers is to comfort those who suffer for the Lord's sake, 1 Cor. xiv. 3.

HEDINGER:—Great art! To laugh in weeping, to be glad in sadness. But there is still time to learn it; our strength is nothing, it is altogether God's work and doing, Phil. iv. 11-13.

CRAMER:—Different medicines are required for different maladies, different chastisements for different sins, Tit. iii. 3.

STARKE:—Sincere faith is not dead but alive and works all manner of good, 2 Pet. i. 5, 6.—Crosses and suffering promote patience just as the wind strengthens the roots of the tree, v. 2.

—He that has begun well must persevere unto the end or all former labour is lost.—Patience in the first hour is not sufficient. The end brings the crown.—It is great wisdom to bear suffering aright, and that wisdom is of God's supplying.

HEDINGER:—A rich man who is charitable is a rare spectacle; to be giving and never tire of beggars is more than human; but to give above all that we can ask is Divine (Eph. iii. 20).

OSIANDER:—Because God does not angrily upbraid us with His benefits, therefore we should still less reproach our neighbour with the good we show him.

LANGH OP.:—The highest honour which a creature can confer upon God is to trust Him in every thing by faith and to rely in the full assurance upon His promises, which is also the purest worship, Rom. iv. 20, 21.

QUESNEL:—Faith is the fountain of Christian prayer; the stream does not flow, if the fountain is dried up, Rom. x. 14.—True believers are not fickle and changeable, but constant and steadfast, Col. ii. 5.—Would you serve God, then let it be your serious endeavour not to tempt God.—A divided heart longs not for God, Matth. xxii. 37.—A poor believer is as much a brother in Christ as a rich, Philemon v. 16.—Humility and abasement have been made by Christ true exaltation, Job. xxii. 29.

HEDINGER:—Riches are not culpable in themselves, but they may easily make men haughty.

CRAMER:—God willeth that the rich and the poor should dwell together.

LANGH OP.:—The transitoriness of life and instability of outward prosperity are to be well considered.

HEDINGER:—Rich and ungodly—a double hell-robe. Take care that avarice put it not round your neck, 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10.

LANGH OP.:—Believing Christians are not only the subjects but the sharers of Christ's reign, as those who rule and govern with Him, 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3.

CRAMER:—What is marred by the crown of thorns, which we have to wear here on earth, will be amply compensated by the crown of life in heaven, 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18.

STIER:—In order to do justice to the deep, rich meaning of every word and sentence of this Epistle, we have ever to begin with the beginning without ever exhausting its fullness. What a sermon might be preached on the single joy (χαίρειν) which sounds into our tribulation.—What a lofty saying is the verse connected with it—“Count it all joy if you fall into manifold temptations,” etc.

HEUBNER:—Proofs (trials) a Divine blessing.—To have a good beginning and to omit the prosecution is disgraceful.—Wisdom, that is not from God, is no wisdom.—Faith and prayer are mutual conditions.—Where the will is still wavering, there is no trust.—1 Sam. ii. 30 holds good of belief and unbelief.—Christianity exalts a Christian above his station.—It is a touching spectacle, that commands respect, to see a Christian, whose position in the world is commanding, clothed with humility.

II. THE THEME.

THE BEATITUDE OF ENDURANCE IN TEMPTATION AS A WARNING AGAINST YIELDING TO IT.

CHAPTER I. 12.

12 Blessed is the man<sup>1</sup> that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord<sup>2</sup> hath promised to them that love him.<sup>3</sup>

Verse 12. <sup>1</sup> The reading ἀνθρώπος in Cod. A. and several minuscule Mss., being a false correction, calls attention to the significant ἀνὴρ.

<sup>2</sup> ὁ κύριος is wanting in A. B. Cod. Sin., and rejected by Lachmann, Tischendorf, (Alford—M.) and al. Theile retains it with G. K. (C. without the Article) and al. the Syriac, (Armenian—M.) and other versions. Several minuscule Mss. and versions [Vulg. Syr. Copt. Aeth. and al.—M.] read ὁ θεός. As the insertion is more readily accounted for than the omission, we may presume that the Apostle in ἀνθρώπος reverts to ἀνθρώποις τὴν ὁρμήν τοῦ κυρίου [v. 7—M.]. But summary sentences have generally a summary mode of expression. We follow therefore Bouman. p. 63.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

That this verse contains the proper theme of the whole Epistle and indicates the dominant fundamental idea of the same follows from the twofold consideration that 1. the same thought comes up already in the Introduction v. 2 and 2. that it is repeated in a corresponding final theme at ch. v. 7. It is a beatitude after the manner of the sermon on the mount and moreover the last of these beatitudes of our Lord, in which all the preceding ones blend (Matth. v. 10, 11), appropriately adapted to the situation of the readers in the time of James.

Blessed (is) the man.—ἀνὴρ instead of ἄνθρωπος not only with reference to Ps. i. 1, for it occurs repeatedly (see v. 5, here, v. 20 and ch. iii. 2) and we have already intimated that it may be accounted for by the temptations of the time, which James had in view, making the round especially among Jewish men. Thomas appears to have noticed, but not to have understood this characteristic, as would seem from his comment: "beatus vir, non mollis vel effeminatus, sed vir."

Who endureth temptation.—[Bengel reads with K. L. ὑπομένει, Future; but ὑπομένει is the ordinary reading and, the blessing being absolute, the tense is immaterial.—M.]. Although the proposition is valid and will be valid as a general dogma, the πειρασμός here does not primarily denote the concrete unity of all the πειρασμοί mentioned in v. 2, for the reference to these very πειρασμοί runs through the whole Epistle. Therefore not: δραν περιπέτειν (Wiesinger). Hence ὑπομένει like ὑπομονή in v. 8 and μακροθυμεῖτε ch. v. 7, etc.

Because when he has become approved. One who has become approved, not only proved: one who has become approved by the fact of proof. [He has stood the test of the δοκιμὸν v. 2 and thereby has become δοκιμὸς—M.]. The idea is identical with that expressed in ch. ii. 23: Abraham has become the friend of God by δικαιοσύνην. And here we see how James and Paul agree in their dogmatical views, for Paul also mentions the δοκιμή as the consequent of ὑπομονή Rom. v. 3. But the subjective and inner side of this proof is σφραγίζεσθαι according to Eph. i. 13. Krebs, Augusti and al., have found here an allusion to the trial preceding the contest of the athletes, but such an allusion is out of place, so is that of Gebser, Theile and al., to the refining of metals by fire, for that figure presupposes the idea of refining, which although involved in the trial or proof, is not identical with it. The same situation presupposes the certainty of success in refining, questions it in the trial and endangers it in temptation. De Wette and Wiesinger reject a figurative reference; but the crown of life, which is here promised, at least reminds us of the idea of the race-course also in Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 24; 2 Tim. ii. 5.

He shall receive the crown of life; στέφανος, garland, chaplet of victory or honour in its fullest significance. denotes a crown and in this sense we are warranted to take it here, according to Matth. v. 9 and Rev. v. 10.—Τῆς ζωῆς is explained by Huther as the Genitive of apposition: "The ζωή i. e. eternal, blissful life is the crown of honour wherewith he that endures is adorned." But Jno. iii. 36 says: "he that believeth hath everlasting life"; does "the crown of righteousness" 2 Tim. iv. 8 signify "righteousness is given me as a crown?" If the crown denotes the crown of honour of the finished proof, matured in the life of faith but also objectively awarded and glorified by God, it is the crown of life, i. e. the crown granted to a life which has developed itself into coronation, as life, the Summum of life as life's prize of honour; our Genitive is consequently the Genitive of possession or dependence. Cf. 1 Pet. v. 4, Rev. ii. 10. If the legal men [i. e. sticklers for the Jewish Law. M.] of that time were perhaps wont to say with reference to Ps. i.: Blessed is the man that ever keeps to the law, he is the tree by the rivers of water, his leaves do not fade i. e. his life shall retain perpetual freshness, the beatitude of James expressing his continuance and promise of life would receive a peculiar significance. Although we cannot assert with Zwingli, Michaelis, Wiesinger and al., that the foundation of this figure is as in 1 Cor. ix. the idea of the Grecian games, it may be shown that the Jews also regarded the crown or diadem not only as "a symbol of peculiar honour" (Huther referring to Ps. xxi. 4; Wisd. of Sol. v. 16, 17), but also of an honour accorded by God to a well-endured warfare of life. Both the Jews and the Greeks started with the presumption that persevering wrestling in a higher course of life constituted the condition of the diadem and that presumption repeats itself more or less among all mankind in the most diversified forms. This law of life was recognized in the Old Testament especially in the case of the typical Judah, of David, of the ideal man (Ps. viii.), and of the Messiah (Ps. cx.). The crown of believers is contrasted with the perishable garland of honour in 1 Cor. ix. 25 and it is also alluded to in 1 Pet. i. 4; v. 4. Why is the antithesis here wanting? The Jews and the Jewish Christians of that time might readily remember it; all their visionists wanted to see the day of the kingdom of Zion, of the coronation of their chiliastic Messiah, the crowning of the Jewish rulers of the world. On this account Peter also points the suffering Christian pastors to the crown of glory (1 Pet. v.) and the promise of the Epistle to the Hebrews also is the kingdom which cannot be moved (Heb. xii. 28).—

Which He (the Lord) has promised.—See Critical Note. "If ὁ κήρυξ is the right reading, it signifies not Christ (Baumgarten, Schneckenburger), but God (Gebser, Theile, Wiesinger [and Alford—M.])." Huther.—But that means nevertheless: God revealed in Christ. But might not James by this very omission have designed a supplying which he had prepared in v. 1?—

To them that love Him.—Ch. ii. 5; Ps. xcvi. 10; cxlv. 20; Rom. viii. 28; 2 Tim. iv. 8. The love of the Lord, with James and Paul is consequently the real and eternal nature of faith, its root, its sap and its crown; and it is love which proves itself in endurance and by it attains to completion. Cf. Jno. xv. [Amor parit patientiam. Bengel.—M.].

[In Shemoth Rabba, sect. 81, p. 129 and in Rab. Tanchum p. 29, 4, we read: "Blessed is the man, who stands in his temptation; for there is no man whom God does not try. He tries the rich, to see if they will open their hands to the poor: He tries the poor, to see if they will receive affliction and not murmur. If, therefore, the rich stand in his temptation, and give alms to the poor, he shall enjoy his riches in this world, and his horn shall be exalted in the world to come; and the holy blessed God shall deliver him from the punishment of hell. If the poor stand in his temptation, and do not repine, he shall have double in the world to come."—M.]

III. FIRST ADMONITION WITH REFERENCE TO THE FIRST FORM OF TEMPTATION: VISIONARINESS.

CAUTION AGAINST THE VISIONARINESS WHICH REPRESENTS THE TEMPTATION AS GOD'S CAUSE. THE HIDEOUS FORM OF THE SELF-TEMPTATION OF THE ERRING AND THEIR END, DEATH.—THE OPPOSING IMMUTABILITY OF THE FATHER OF LIGHTS IN HIS BLESSING RULE AND THE EXALTATION OF HIS PRINCELY CHILDREN BORN BY THE WORD OF TRUTH.

CHAPTER I. 18-18.

(VV. 16-21. Epistle for Fourth Sunday after Easter.)

13 Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God:<sup>1</sup> for God cannot be 14 tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man: But every man is tempted, when 15 he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it 16 bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. Do not err, 17 my beloved brethren. Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is<sup>2</sup> no variableness, neither sha-18 dow of turning.<sup>3</sup> Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures.

Verse 13. <sup>1</sup> Only several minuscules sustain the reading  $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ . [ $\tau\omicron\upsilon$  is omitted by A. B. C. K. L.—M.] Cod. Sin. reads  $\epsilon\upsilon\tau\omicron\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ , but in v. 17 erroneously  $\delta\omega\sigma\kappa\iota\sigma\mu\alpha\tau\omicron\varsigma$ . Lange: "No one, who is tempted [stands in temptation] shall say: I am tempted from God, for God is not temptable in respect of evil things, but He Himself tempteth [out of Himself] no one."

[Let no man, being tempted, say that ( $\delta\tau\iota$  rectantis) I am being tempted from God; for God is not experienced in respect of evil things, but He Himself tempteth no man.—M.]

Verse 14. Lange: . . . tempted in that he is drawn away [rendered an apostate] by his own lust and allured [by his evil inclination.]

[ . . . being drawn away and lured by his own concupiscence.—M.]

Verse 15. Lange: . . . conceived [is impregnated] . . . , but sin, when it is completed [has ripened] bringeth forth death.

Verse 16. Lange: M. Be not ye deceived, my beloved brethren.

Every good giving and every perfect gift [donation] cometh [and cometh] down from above, from the Father of the lights [beings of light], with whom there is not existing a change, nor a shadow-casting of a turning.

[Every good bestowing and . . . coming down from . . . with whom there is [essentially] not a change or shadow of turning.—M.]

Verse 18. Lange: Pursuant to free decree hath He begotten us by the word. [of His own Will [because He willed it, Alford; by the act of His own will, Wordsworth.] etc.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

ANALYSIS:—The first form of temptation—visionariness. The representation of the tempting thought as of God's cause and caution against the deceptiveness of this temptation, v. 13.—The hideous form of the self-temptation of the erring and their end,—death, vv. 14-16.—The opposing image of the true God in His blessing rule and His fixed immutability, v. 17.—The exaltation of His princely children begotten by the word of truth, v. 18.

The first form of the temptation—fanaticism, represented as a glorious cause of God, or a Divine admonition.

VER. 13. Let no one who is tempted say. —Caution against the deceptiveness of the temptation. It is incorrect to affirm that James opposes  $\delta\varsigma\ \epsilon\pi\omicron\mu\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\iota\ \pi\epsilon\iota\tau\alpha\sigma\mu\acute{\omicron}\nu$  to  $\delta\varsigma\ \pi\epsilon\iota\tau\alpha\zeta\epsilon\tau\alpha$ , etc.; something like Huther, Pott, Olshausen, Schneckenburger and al. For how could any one abide the temptation, without having first been tempted? James in this dehortation refers indeed to those who really say that they are tempted from God (which is also indicated by the forcible participial form) but even these he desires to reclaim while warning his better readers against their error. According to Calvin (and Wiesinger) James here treats of alio tentationis genere. But the matter is simply this; James now explains the one great  $\pi\epsilon\iota\tau\alpha\sigma\mu\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$  according to the separate  $\pi\omicron\upsilon\kappa\iota\lambda\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \pi\epsilon\iota$

παρῳκός and begins with the first form of the temptation.—[The force of the Participle should be brought out in the translation.—M.]

Shall Say.—λέγτω according to Schneckenburger and al.—cogitet or sibi persuadeat, which is of course implied but not all, as Huther justly observes, [Bengel: corde aut ore—M.]. James connects this saying with the uncommonly much-saying of the Judaizing Jewish Christians and Jews, to which he alludes.

I am tempted from God.—Grotius, Hottinger and al. have rightly felt that the word 'tempt' bears a somewhat different sense in the two places, while Huther asserts without sufficient reason that the sense in both cases must be identical, viz.: to be inwardly solicited to sin. Let no one say: I am inwardly solicited to sin of God; but with such an exhortation James could not possibly have warned the twelve tribes. Said expositors miss however the correct distinction by saying that in the one instance it denotes: adversus pati, and in the other malis ad defectionem sollicitari. It is a sententious oxymoron conveying the idea: Let no one say that the impulse, which to him is really a temptation, and in the end a devilish one (ch. iii. 15), in which he is already entangled (πειραζόμενος), is a monition of God, a cause of God, an incentive to maintain His honour. For this the Jews at a somewhat later period did really say in their uprising against the Romans, this they said even then in their fanatical utterings against the pagans, and the Judaizing Jewish Christians said in a similar manner: It is the will of God that we maintain His law and therefore separate from the Gentile Christians, as far as they do not receive the whole law or only in part. But James doubtless chose this poignant mode of expression in order to reproach those sayers with their making, though unconsciously, God the Author of evil. But it cannot be absolutely assumed that he is here inveighing against an impertinence generally or variously current among Jewish Christians, which made them charge God with temptations to evil, of which they were conscious, for we have no data to warrant such an assumption. This was not the language of the Sadducees, nor of the Pharisees, or Essenes (as has been thought by Bull, Ittig and Schneckenburger with reference to their doctrine of the εμπαρμένη), still less could he aim at Simon Majus (Calov); on the other hand the reference is not simply to the general bias of the natural man to charge God somehow with the πειράζουσαι, which the Jews might strengthen by misinterpretations of the Old Testament (Huther; see also the Note p. 59; Prov. xix. 8; Sir. xv. 11, 12); for our Epistle deals throughout not with mere generalities, but with concrete relations.—ἐστὶ is a much used formula of quotation; ἀπό, as Huther observes, is not as strong as ὑπό. [See Winer, p. 382, ἀπό = through influences proceeding from God.—M.]

For God is not temptable.—The reasons for the foregoing in a twofold assertion respecting God. First, He is ἀπειραστος. This ἀπαξ λεγόμενον in the New Testament must not be confounded with the classical ἀνείρατος (in the sense of inexperienced) as denoting: God has no experience of evil (Schulthess, de Wette, Huther). Equally objectionable is the active construction of the word (Luther following the Vulgate 'intemptator'), for its weak grammatical basis, the Genitive κακῶν, its tautology both with respect to what goes before and to what follows forbid the active construction. The passive-adjective construction, however, not tempted, not temptable, which is generally adopted is not only not against grammatical usage as Huther maintains, (see the adjectival ἀκατάστατος v. 8), nor against the connection, as he thinks also. For James wants to strengthen the debortation, "Let no man say, etc." For this saying, like all fanaticism, was a tempting God, and therefore vain and impious, because God does not suffer Himself to be tempted. Hence we might feel inclined to take κακῶν in the Masculine and to denote evil men; but this would probably be expressed more definitely. To think of evils (Oecumenius) is somewhat far-fetched, but also the evil in the Singular would be too general; the Plural in the present connection points to concrete and intensively evil things. [But there is an insuperable objection to Lange's derivation of the word from πειράω; for ἀνείρατος is = untempted, not temptable: but James argues not concerning God being tempted, but concerning God tempting. I therefore prefer the common usage of the word 'inexperienced in'; so Alford, Winer and (in part at least) Wordsworth, who adds, "that James may perhaps refer to the false tenet of some of the heretics of the early Church, who said that it was the duty of men to have experimental knowledge of all evil, in order to the attainment of perfection." See Palm and Rost's Lexicon and Weststein for examples in favour of 'inexperienced in'.—M.]. Secondly: But He Himself tempteth no one.—[Lange takes no notice of ὁ which has here adversative force and makes therefore against his rendering 'not temptable,' while it favours the rendering 'inexperienced in,' and ὁ here is—"not so, but," Alford.—M.]. Second negation aimed at the substance of the proposition "I am tempted from God" (Huther). Αὐτός is construed differently; Huther takes it as antithesis to what follows in the sense: it is not He who tempts, but every man is tempted etc. Theile and Wiesinger take it in contrast with what goes before: He Himself (self-active). And this is probably right; He suffers Himself not to be drawn by God-tempting fanatics into their unholy interests, but He Himself becomes tempter to no man; the solicitation to evil, in the trial which He appoints, is not from Him. Stress must therefore be laid on both—not He, tempteth not any one. [Lange hardly does justice to Huther whose view is very lucid. "Let no one say when he is tempted to evil, from God I am tempted: for God has no part in evil: but as to the temptation, He tempts no man etc."—M.].

[Wordsworth here quotes Augustine, Tractat. in Joann. 43 and de consensu Evang. ii. 80, who raises a question on this passage. If God tempts no one, how is it that He is said in Scripture to tempt Abraham (Gen. xxii. 1)? To which he replies that St. James is speaking of temptations arising from evil motives with a view to an evil end. No such temptations are from God. But God is said to have tempted, that is, to have tried Abraham, from a good motive and for a good end. He tried him, in love to him and to all men, in order that he might become the Father of the faithful and be an example of obedience to all ages of the world." See also Tertullian de Orat. c. 8. "God forbid that we should imagine that He tempts any one, as if He were ignorant of any man's faith, or desired to make any one fall. No, such ignorance and malice belong not to God, but to the devil. Abraham was commanded to slay his son, not for his temptation but for the manifestation of his faith, as a pattern and proof to all, that no pledges of love, however dear, are to be preferred to God.—Christ, when tempted by the devil, showed who it is that is the author of temptation, and who it is that is our Guardian against it."—M.]

With reference to the seemingly contradictory passages Gen. xxii. 1; Deut. viii. 2 and others, it is first of all necessary to distinguish as much between temptation and obduracy as between Abraham and Pharaoh. According to the concrete expression of the Old Testament God tempts Abraham by subjecting him to a trial to which the popular idea, handed down by tradition, clings as an element of temptation. He tempts Pharaoh by subjecting him to a trial in which the judgment of his self-delusion must reach its consummation. God therefore has no part whatsoever in the temptation itself as a solicitation to evil but throughout concurs in it, in the beginning trying or proving, at the end judging, at the intermediate stages chastising and punishing. It is with reference to the punishing feature in temptation that we pray: lead us not into temptation. God, as Calvin remarks, is never the author of evil.

The hideous form of the self-temptation of the erring by evil conscience and its fruit—death. vv. 14–16.

Vers. 14. But every one is tempted.—Wiesinger wrongly insists upon the necessity of distinguishing the being tempted in this verse from the falling into temptation v. 2, as an intrinsic occurrence. The representation of tempting lust under the figure of an unchaste woman rather shows that James thinks of the lust belonging to the person tempted objectively in some folly which he encounters extrinsically, just as in Prov. vii. 5, etc. But he is quite right in opposing the above drawn course of good demeanour in temptation to the now drawn course of misdemeanour. But this point we shall touch further on. The objective folly, therefore, encountered by the person tempted, is, according to the Apostle's idea, really nothing else than his very own (idia emphasized) lust; first, because it springs also, as the temptation of Satan and the world, from the same ungodly ἐπιθυμία, from the alter ego of his own sinfulness, and secondly, because his evil lust which has now become objective can only control him by his subjective evil lust. If, according to a well-founded distinction, we are tempted by the world, the devil and our own flesh and blood, we must further explain this thus: the temptation of the world and the devil also is in its nature uniformly homogeneous worldliness and selfishness and it is only in a man's self-own and subjective evil lust that temptation is able to become to him an ensnaring temptation in a narrower sense. Thus the great temptation of that time was everywhere only one temptation both to the Jews and the Jewish-Christians; all those glittering, variegated visionary expectations which seductively met the individual, had sprung from the matter of the chiliastic, world-lusting, spiritual pride. It is on this property in the dazzling object that James lays principal stress, because every one must overcome the world and Satan in his own strength by overcoming himself. In the first place we have now to inquire why he renders the idia ἐπιθυμία objective in the figure of the unchaste woman. According to Theile and Wiesinger the words: Every one, etc., should be construed thus: Every one is tempted by his own lust in that he is lured etc. The pure expression of the antithesis: "tempted from God," "tempted by his own lust," seems to favour it. But this construction wipes out the figure that follows in its very conception. The sense is rather: "Every one is tempted, in that he" etc., according to the construing of Luther, de Wette and Huther; viz., his own inward concupiscence meeting him as a soliciting unchaste woman. For this image is immediately indicated by the verbs ἐξέλκειν and δεδράζειν. Schneckenburger observes on it: Verba e re venatoria et piscatoria in rem amatorium et inde in nostrum tropum translata. ἐξέλκειν (in N. T. ἀπ᾿ αὐτῶν λέγ.) and δεδράζειν are not synonymous (Pott: prolatere in litibus), in fact it has hardly a specific meaning in the res venatoria (Schultess: elicere bestias ex tuto); but in the res amatoria we may distinguish it from allurements proper in that it draws men from their intrinsicity and independence by dazzling interest (to draw off and to allure—Germ. ablocken and anlocken); δεδράζειν (from δὲλεαρ—escas exposita ad capiendam animalia) occurs also 2 Pet. ii. 14, 18, and is used also by the classics metaphorically, always in a bad sense. Now we must not overlook the force of the Participles ἐξελκόμενος etc., they denote the process of development (becoming) in the course of which temptation becomes entanglement as far as man continues in it. He is first drawn out from his inward self-control and fortitude and then attracted (drawn to) by the unchaste woman's allurings. [This is the reason why I have retained the Participles in my translation.—M.] But the intrinsic decision proper is further expressed by εἰς ἀνλλαβοῦσα. Ἐπιθυμία however does not denote "innocent sensuousness." "The word occurs here, as it always occurs in the N. T. (except where its specific object is indicated, as in Luke xxii. 15; Phil. i. 23; 1 Thess. ii. 17) also without the addition of κακῆ, σαρκικῆ, or some similar adjective, in sensu malo." Huther. Ἐπιθυμία is not, indeed, birth-sin per se (as Huther rightly observes), but just as little only an evil lusting for the commission of the deed springing from birth-sin, as he argues against Wiesinger, whose almost equivalent exposition he scruples to admit. It is birth-sin itself in its concrete activity ("prava concupiscentia") viewed from its positive side as worldliness and selfishness, assuming in different situations innumerable variations. Maintaining with Pott the figurative description of different personifications, we find that the reference is not to four but to three generations. We have in succession the unchaste mother or the ἐπιθυμία, the unchaste daughter or ἀμαρτία in the narrower sense of deed-sin and the son and grandson of the voluptuous mothers, the murderer-son death. Man yielding with his will to the allurements of evil lust, his moral relations assume a kind of natural sequence and the rest follows of itself. Lust becomes impregnated and brings forth sin, while sin brings forth (as it were out of itself or pursuant to its essential connection with ἐπιθυμία—hastening along with its own maturity the maturing of the hereditary death-germ) death.

V. 15. Then, when lust hath conceived.—This denotes man's proper surrendering to his evil lust in a manner which indicates that it was to be expected because he kept standing (continued,) in the allurements (δεδωζόμενος). The evil lust is fecondated i. e. it has obtained the mastery over the will of man.

It bringeth forth sin. (וְהָרָה וְיָלֵד).—

De Wette and al. make ἀμαρτία denote the intrinsic act of sin and ἀμαρτία ἀποτελεσθεῖσα the extrin-sin. But Wiesinger and Huther are right in saying that the intrinsic act is involved in συλλαβοῖσα. On the other hand Calvin, Schoenecker, Wiesinger and al. take the ἀμαρτία ἀποτελεσθεῖσα to denote the whole sinful life. But Huther says that it denotes the equal deed-sin, yet, in its entire development passing through its different stages until it subjects man to itself so that all reaction is at an end. "For ἀποτελεῖν is neither = perpetrare (Pott), nor = operari (Laurentius), nor = τελεῖν (τελεῖσθαι, Baumgarten), but = to complete; hence ἀμαρτία ἀποτελεσθεῖσα = sin advanced to the completeness of its development. Now since sin makes its first appearance as a new-birth the allusion to the now matured unchaste young woman which several commentators have found in the ἀποτελεσθεῖσα, is not outside the cycle of James's thoughts; the expression certainly brings out the idea that she did reach a false τέλος which is the opposite of the τέλος to which the believing Israelite attains in virtue of his well-demeanour. True Judaism has matured into Christianity, Judaizing into anti-christian apostasy. In point of meaning the exposition of Wiesinger coincides pretty much with that of Huther, but the latter has the preference of firmly keeping up the image of sin itself in its process of completion.

Bringeth forth death.—"The word ἀποκτεῖν (found in the N. T. only here and in v. 18) differs from τίκτει only in that the former indicates more clearly that the ἀμαρτία is from the outset pregnant with the θάνατος," Huther.—Huther and Wiesinger explain death both of temporal and eternal death, Rom. vi. 23. But between the two lies the historical, indeterminate (unabsehbar) death (which being indeterminate must therefore be distinguished from absolute death [Untergang]), and as soon as we consider the concrete import of this passage, this feature of death becomes of the utmost importance. And here we have to call attention to the antithesis which Wiesinger has found between vv. 3, 4 and this passage. The first proposition that "the trial of faith by tribulation answers to the incitement of the will by lust" we consider to be false; to fall into temptation and to be tempted are identical. But the consciousness of the πειράζεσθαι and the ἐξελαόμενος and δεδωζόμενος in connection with the antithesis of operative πίστις there and operative ἐπιθυμία here, this is one real antithesis; the second is the ἵπομονή there and ἀμαρτία here. Again the ἔργον τέλειον there and the ἀμαρτία ἀποτελεσθεῖσα here; lastly the τέλειον there (connected with the στέφανος τῆς ζωῆς v. 12) and the θάνατος here. The last two antitheses Wiesinger has taken together. Applying now the whole passage to the circumstances peculiar to the time of James, the completed sin denotes the completed apostasy of the Jewish people and death their historical judgment (see ch. v. and Rom. x.). This of course does not exclude the more general meaning of our passage which opens the prospect of eternal death as well as the most specific meaning according to which every mortal sin is followed by spiritual death. We have still to notice the different dogma-tropes: sin brings forth death (James), sin is followed by death as its wages or punishment (Paul), sin is death (John).—Likewise we must guard our passage against the [Roman] Catholic inference that sin as such must be distinguished from evil concupiscence (lust) with Calvin: "Neque enim disputat Jacobus, quando incipiat nasci peccatum, ita ut peccatum sit et reputetur coram deo, sed quando emergat." James, to be sure, and all Holy Scripture prompt us to distinguish intrinsic deed-sin or the evil counsel of the heart from the direct and natural motions of sinful desire. Lastly we must avoid the presumption that James by the use of this frightful image simply wanted to didactically prove that temptation does not come from God; he also wanted his readers to understand it as to its real nature, origin and working. Hence the further admonition: "Be ye not deceived." [Alford develops another view of the above image. "The harlot ἐπιθυμία, ἐξέλαει and δεδέδεκε the man: the guilty union is committed by the will embracing the temptress: the consequence is that she τίκτει ἀμαρτίαν sin, in general, of some kind, of that kind to which the temptation inclines: then ἡ ἀμαρτία that particular sin, when grown up and mature—herself ἀποκτεῖν, 'extrudeth,' as if all along pregnant with it, death, the final result of sin. So that temptation to sin cannot be from God, while trial is from Him."—He also recalls the sublime allegory in Milton's Paradise Lost (Book II) where Satan by his own evil lust brings forth sin ("out of thy head I sprung"), and then by an incestuous union with sin

At first and called me sin, and for a sign
Portentous held me; but familiar grown,
I pleased and with attractive graces won
The most averse, thee chiefly, who full oft Thyself in me thy perfect image viewing
Becam'st enamour'd, and such joy thou took'st
With me in secret, that my womb conceived
A growing burden.—)

causes her to bring forth Death.—M.]

V. 16. Be not ye deceived.—Although this sentence refers also to what follows (Theile) and not solely to what goes before (Gebser) the reference to the latter (Wiesinger) is greater than that to the former. The expression, moreover, has the full pregnancy of a warning against objective images and spirits of temptation, according to de Wette, "be not ye deceived," and not with Gebser, "err not." The warmth of this caution is heightened by the address:

My beloved brethren, although they were to find the means of strengthening and confirming this exhortation in the subsequent instruction concerning the true God of revelation. Huther: "The same formula is found in 1 Cor. vi. 9; xv. 33; Gal. vi. 7 (a similar one 1 Jno. iii. 7 [ὑποεῖς πλανᾶν ὑμᾶς—M.], in all these passages it follows up a thought peculiar to the Christian consciousness, by which an antecedent statement receives its confirmation." [Wordsworth: The formulas μὴ πλανῶ "be not thou deceived," and μὴ πλανᾷσθε "be not ye deceived," are the preambles used in Scripture and by ancient Fathers, in order to introduce cautions against, and refutations of some popular error, as here.—M.].

The opposing image of the true God, etc.

VER. 17. Every good giving (bestowing).—

We ask leave to reproduce the Hexameter (see Winer, § 68, 5a, p. 663) because nothing but a close consideration of the text has led us to do so. [The German rendering is as follows: "Jegliche gute Bescherung und alle vollkommene Gabe"—the Greek original reads thus: πᾶσα δὲ ὑμῖν ἁγὰ ὁθὴ καὶ πᾶν δῶ|ρῆμα τέ|λειον, the last syllable in the second foot σις being lengthened by the arsis.—M.]. Standing by the side of δῶρημα, δόσις can hardly have the same meaning as the former (as Huther maintains); δόσις rather denotes primarily the act of giving and secondarily the gift. But alongside of δῶρημα, which denotes gift, donation, present, it becomes at all events the lesser giving, while δῶρημα is the more weighty expression. To this must be added the gradation of the adjectives ἀγαθὴ, τέλειον. It is certainly unfounded to apply δόσις to gifts of nature and δῶρημα to gifts of grace, but this does not involve an identity (so Huther) which is here very tautologically expressed. Τέλειον must be made the starting-point of the exposition. According to the New Testament idea of τελείωσις, τέλειον corresponds with the ἔργον τέλειον and the Christians as τέλειοι, and with the ἀμαρτία ἀποτελειοθεῖσα, v. 15. And just as the perfect work can only be understood as the consistent practical exhibition of the theocratical faith in Christianity, and as the τέλειος describes one who has decided for Christ, while sin completed denotes the sin of Christ-inimical apostasy, so also δῶρημα τέλειον signifies the gift of God completed in Christianity. Our δῶρημα reminds us of Christ as χάρισμα, Rom. v. 15; but here the reference is probably to the Christian revelation in the fulness of its gifts. This would make πᾶσα δόσις to denote everything which served to prepare this completed gift in the olden time, especially in the old covenant, according to the analogy of Heb. i. 1. The readers here and there should know that the one and only God presides over the difference and antithesis between the Old Covenant and the New. It is not to be wondered at that several commentators (Raphelius, Augusti) were tempted to take πᾶσα and πᾶν in an exclusive sense, for the antithesis lay near: God tempts no man, nothing but good comes from Him. This would be a more distinct statement of the antithesis, but James wanted to present it in a richer form: not only does no evil come from God, nay rather all good comes from Him. It is moreover ἀνθεὶν καταβαίνων in uninterrupted permanence, a perpetual rain and sunshine of gifts. The Participle is to be duly considered and we ought really to render: it comes and comes. The word gift for δῶρημα is rather weak and donating would be more weighty than donation. [Bengel renders δόσις datio and δῶρημα donum. On the whole δόσις=datio=giving, and δῶρημα=donum=gift, is probably the nearest rendering which the Latin and English tongues admit. Bp. Andrews, who has two sermons on this text, vol. iii. p. 36, and vol. v. p. 311 observes p. 313, that δόσις ἀγαθὴ, donatio bona or good giving, represents rather the act of giving which bestows things of present use for this life, whether for our souls or bodies, in our journey to our heavenly country; but δῶρημα τέλειον or perfect gift, designates those unalloyed and enduring treasures, which are laid up for us in eternity. I have retained the Participle in my translation.—M.].

From the Father of the lights.—Huther and Wiesinger agree with the majority of modern commentators that the lights here signify the heavenly bodies. But we do not believe that a single passage of Holy Writ can be produced in support of such an abnormal mode of expression. Ps. cxxvi. the LXX. say concerning the stars τῷ ποτίσαντι φῶρα μεγάλη, Jer. iv. 23 τὰ φῶρα αὐτοῦ. But Scripture as well as the Nicene Creed uniformly distinguish make from create and beget. Job xxxviii. 28 surely does not mean that God is the father of rain. Setting aside the following explanations of the lights: knowledge (Hornejus), joy (Michaelis), wisdom or goodness (Wolf), it is hardly necessary to think of the Urim and Thummim (Heisen) and even the reference to the angels (Kern and Olshausen) cannot be retained. But the reference to the Sermon on the Mount, with which James is so intimately connected, is less remote. In Matth. v. 14, the disciples are called τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου and in v. 16, they are actually distinguished from their light as candlesticks or light-bearers. The Messiah is often called a Light in the Old Testament (Is. ix. 2; xlix. 6, etc.) and in the New Testament it is an appellation by which He describes Himself (Jno. viii. 12; cf. ch. i. 4 and other passages). Also John the Baptist He calls a light Jno. v. 35 and Phil. ii. 15 Christians are referred to: ὡς φωστῆρες ἐν κόσμῳ. If in favour of the aforesaid exposition it is alleged that God Himself is called φῶς 1 Jno. i. 5 (cf. 1 Tim. vi. 15) it is necessary clearly to distinguish that ethical idea from the physical. The subsequent metaphors: παρ' ᾧ, are claimed in favour of the disputed exposition; but they constitute an antithesis between God, the Light without shadow and the symbolical bodies of light, which are not without casting their shadows. Besides all this, believers as God-begotten children are distinguished in v. 18 as an ἀπαρχή from the κτίσματα. The Scholion ap. Matth. ἦτοι τῶν ἀγγελικῶν δυνάμεων, ἢ τῶν πεφωτισμένων ἀνθρώπων, seems accordingly to be right in the last clause in the sense that the whole line of organs of revelation from Abraham to Christ as the representatives of all good spirits is what is meant here, [Bengel: Patris appellatio con-

gruens huic loco; sequitur ἀπενήνεον. Ipse Patris, et matris, loco est. Est Pater luminum etiam spiritualium in regno gratiæ et gloriæ. Ergo multo magis Ipse Lux est, 1 John i. 5. Lucis mentione statim, ut solet, subiungitur mentio vitæ, ex regeneratione. v. 18. There is no reason why the two interpretations should not be combined. God is the Father of all lights, the lights of nature and the lights of grace; the Father not only of the light of reason and conscience, the light of knowledge and goodness but also the Father of the children of Light. To enter in this connection upon hair-splitting distinctions between create, make and beget, seems hardly the thing. Whatever is gross and material is of course eliminated from the meaning of any of said three expressions, and if the spiritual conception of the Divine character as Maker, Creator and Father, has once been reached, metaphysical quibbles may well be dispensed with.—M.]

With whom (as peculiar to whom) there is not existing.—We give this construction of the passage on account of ἐν, without discussing the question whether ἐν is a peculiar form (Buttmann, Winer), or an abbreviation of ἐνὸς (Meyer, Huther).

A change or a shadow-casting.—In the first place it is to be remembered that these words are ἀνὰς λέγ. in the New Testament. Then the first word, being the more general, must be explained by the second and more definite one. The Greek commentators limit the figurative to the ἀποσκίασμα (Oecumenius, Theophylact and al.): with God there is no mutation or a shadow (i. e. a trace or appearance of a change, or also of a reservation; they are followed among modern expositors by Morus, Rosenmüller, Hensler, Theile). The Latin commentators, on the other hand (Justinianus, Estius, a Lapide and al.) apply the expression ad solis vicissitudines et conversiones. Then also Luther (see the Translation), Grotius, Wetstein, Flatt, Schulthess. For a full treatment of the passage see Gebser, who explains it of the shadows cast by the solstice. Wiesinger suggests changes of the moon, solar and lunar eclipses and regards the shadow as the effect of τροπή; similar is the exposition of Huther: the shadow cast on the heavenly body, effected by its changing position. But solar and lunar eclipses are phenomena too rare and transient in order to give a pregnant expression to the idea in question. And although there may not be used here any termini technici of Astronomy (as Huther observes) in their strict sense, the contemplation of the world in every age led probably to a sufficient knowledge of astronomy in order to recognize in the diurnal phenomenal revolution of the sun, the moon and the stars the cause of all nocturnal obscurings of the earth. The sun has not only its annual but its diurnal solstice. In like manner the moon and the stars rise and set and leave us in absolute night. But God is in a very different sense the Light of the world, a Sun that never sets. To this refer Ps. cxxxix. 9, 12; Job. xxxiv. 22; it was also symbolized by the pillar of fire in the camp of the Israelites. Now if the expression τροπή ἀποσκίασμα denotes such a phenomenal shadow-casting of the revolving heavenly bodies, we can hardly take παραλλαγή in a purely general sense (Huther)=mutation, but as a figurative description of a change of position (standing-place). This alternation is the first thing: the constant progression of the celestial bodies, the turning, follow as the result. Now if the heavenly bodies, as the created symbols of the Divine being of light, possess the property of being not without shadow and night we get the antithesis that God, the Father of the Lights is eternally the same, not only per se, but also in the phenomena of these lights: that is to say, He makes no revolution with the Old Testament which could cast a night-shadow on the New (as the Talmud at a later period attempted to make such a revolution), nor does He suffer the New Testament to cast a night-shadow on the Old (according to the later opinion of the Gnostics and of all rationalists). The Father of the lights remains unchanged even in this antithesis. ["God is always in the meridian." Wetstein.—Bengel's note will be found useful: "παραλλαγή δicit mutationem in intellectu; (vide LXX. 2 Reg. ix. 20), τροπή mutationem voluntatis. In utroque vocabulo est metaphora a stellis, huic loco, ubi luminum mentio fit, aptissima. παραλλαγή et τροπή est in natura (vid. τροπὰς Job. xxxviii. 33) quæ habet quotidianam vicissitudinem diei et noctis, et longiores modo dies modo noctes: in Deo nil tale est. Ipse est Lux mera, παραλλαγή et τροπή, si qua accidit, penes nos est, non penes Patrem luminum. ἀποσκίασμα interdum dicit ὁμοίωσις. Sic enim Heyschius interpretatur. unde Gregorius Naz. τὸ τῆς ἀληθείας ἰσὺαίμα καὶ ἀποσκίασμα tanquam synonyma ponit: et apud Tullium, Budæo observante, adumbratio rei opponitur perfectioni ejus; sed hoc loco opponitur luminibus, adeoque magis proprie sumitur, ut ἀποσκίασμα τροπῆς sit jactus umbræ primulus, revolutionem habens conjunctam. Idem Hebraismus genitivi mox, abundantiam malitiæ, ex quo colligere licet, τὸ transmutatio opponi τῷ datio bona, quemadmodum vicissitudinis adumbratio opponitur τῷ donum perfectum. παραλλαγή aliquid majus est. Hinc gradatio in oratione negante: ne quidem vicissitudinis adumbratio. Hoc datum efficit perfectionem; illud bonum est. Perfectior est, qui ne quidem vicissitudinis adumbrationem habet."—M.]

The exaltation of the children of God begotten by the word of truth.

VER. 18. Pursuant to free decree hath He begotten us.—The connection of these words with what goes before is differently construed: 1. as coördination: God the Father of lights is also the Author of our regeneration (Theile); 2. as exemplification: generatio spiritualis, quasi exemplum aliquod donorum istorum spiritualium (Laurentius, de Wette); 3. as an inference drawn from the general idea of the former (Huther). But regeneration, as matter of experience, cannot be inferred from a dogma concerning God; 4. as proof or demonstration (Gebser, Kern). Wiesinger's remarks are excellent: "The greatest δῶγμα (v. 18) which consists in the Divinely effected regeneration of man by the word of truth, is now mentioned by the author in lieu of everything else as the brightest actual proof that nothing evil, but all good comes from God. This act of His holy love is at once the strongest exhortation to a demeanour well-pleasing to Him. (v. 19 etc.)." The Apostle shows therefore how the heaven-descended δόρημα τέλειον had evidenced itself as such by its effect, viz. the regeneration of believers. Now in thus laying the strongest emphasis on the exalted dignity, the ὑψος of Christians following from their regeneration, he also emasculates thereby the fallacy of that seductive fanaticism, which would fain mislead them to pursue a false phantom of this exaltation on chiliastic and revolutionary paths. At the same he presents to all Jews this true life-picture of their exaltation. Βουλῆθε is the emphatic beginning of the sentence. "Pursuant to his established (Aorist) free decree." The element of love (Bengel: voluntate amantissima) lies primarily not in the word itself but in its connection. The antithesis is (according to Bede, Calvin and al.) the meritoriousness of good works. It lies however nearer to see the primary reference to the Jewish claims to the kingdom (Rom. ix.), especially because the βουλῆθε is at any rate contains the element of voluntary determination. The verb itself, used here, shows plainly that reference is made not to natural birth, but to regeneration, ὡς ἀποκτείν is the synonyme of γεννᾶν etc. (1 Jno. iii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 23; 2 Pet. i. 4)." So Huther rightly answers Pott, who wants to explain ἀποκτείν by facere, efficere.

Us, i. e., the Christians. But the objective regeneration of humanity in Christ was primarily also designed for the Jews as the regeneration of the nation and the theocracy, and to this teleological element the sequel constrains us to give a proper share of our consideration. Besides this objective element, subjectively realized by believers, we must also take cognizance of the emphasis: begotten by the Father of lights and thus destined to the enjoyment of the most exalted dignity. [Bengel, as usual, gives us the pith of the whole riches of thought in a nutshell and supplies commentators with mental food. Much of Lange's view may be traced back to Bengel, and some of the beautiful reflections of Wordsworth, which we shall produce under Doctrinal and Ethical, seem to flow from the same source. He says: βουλῆθε, volens, voluntate amantissima, liberrima, purissima, secundissima. Hebr. אֲבָרַח ab אֲבָרַח voluit; cf. Jno. i. 13. Congruit ἔλεος, misericordia, 1 Pet. i. 8. Antitheton, concupiscentia cum conceperit.—ἀπεκρίσεν. Antitheton, ἀποκτείν, v. 15 (cf. also what he says on v. 17, Ipsē (Deus) Patris et matris loco est.—M.).]

By the word of truth.—The Gospel as the completion of the whole word of revelation. The word of truth regarded not only as opposed to the law as such, or even to the tradition of the law, but especially also as opposed to the lies and frauds of fanaticism which promised to make the readers of the Epistle sons of the kingdom. This also chimes in with the antithesis in time: what the temptation promises you in a phantom, the word of truth has already made us in reality. The word of truth, i. e., the word which is truth (Genit. Appos. [cf. Jno. xvii. 17: ὁ λόγος ὁ σὸς ἀλήθεια ἐστίν.—M.]), but also the expression and life of truth (1 Pet. i. 23; cf. Eph. i. 18; Col. i. 5=εὐαγγέλιον; 2 Tim. ii. 15). The whole Epistle shows that James meant the mediation of this word by Christ, but the idea is more general because by this completion, he comprehends into one whole the entire Old Testament as Christianity in process of being (or becoming). [These words are also susceptible of a different interpretation. According to it the λόγος is personal and denotes the ETERNAL WORD, the Second Person in the Holy Trinity, by WHOM we have been born again (cf. 1 Pet. i. 23), "Who for our sakes became Incarnate and by being Incarnate gave "to those, who receive Him power to become sons of God," who are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God (Jno. i. 13), and through whom we cry "Abba, Father" (Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iii. 26), and become "partakers of the Divine nature." Wordsworth. The noble array of authorities, in favour of this interpretation, will be found under "DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL."—M.].

That we should be; not that we should become. But the teleological mode of expression is probably chosen in order to indicate that the Jews should become what Christians already are.

A (kind of) first fruit.—Calvin: ἡ δὲ similitudo est nota; nos quodam modo esse primitias. So Huther, Wiesinger, Gebser and al. But James hardly needed to give prominence to this symbolical mode of speech in an Epistle, symbolical throughout. It was self-evident. But on that account we are hardly prepared to understand the reference in the word with Bengel: "quendam habet modestiam, nam primitie proprie et absolute est Christus." Christ is here included as Mediator of the Christian first fruit. But James, using this expression, might well recollect that the angels of God are a different kind of first-fruit of the creation. It has been inferred from this passage that Christians are also superior to the angels; at all events they are coördinated with them as a different type of celestial first-born. The frequent occurrence of this word in a symbolical sense (Lev. xxiii. 10; Numb. xviii. 12; Deut. xxi. 2) removes all doubt that ἀπαρχή alludes to the God-consecrated first-fruit in the Old Covenant (Laurentius: allusio est ad ritum legalem in V. T. de consecratione primogenitorum, frugum, jumentorum et hominum). The word therefore involves also the idea that Christians are a people consecrated to the service of God, even as the first-consecrated in relation to the future conversion of the Gentiles and "the glorification of the world." (Huther.) But this does not warrant the inference drawn by Huther and Wiesinger that the first-born in point of time settles the idea of first-fruit in point of dignity. Even in the province of nature the idea of the first-born or matured is more or less connected with the idea of the excellent. In the New Testament, however, this idea of the word in a spiritual sense, is repeatedly made prominent (1 Cor. xv. 20, 23; xvi. 15; Rev. xiv. 4). But there is yet another element of the idea, which has to be decidedly held fast. As the first-fruit was at once the prophecy and surety of the whole subsequent harvest, so Christ as ἀπαρχή of the resurrection is surety for the subsequent stages of the resurrection, so the Holy Ghost in believers is surety for the subsequent glory (Rom. viii. 23); so the first believers of Israel in their unity are sureties for the future conversion of the whole nation, Rom. xi. 6. We see no reason for abandoning any one of these three elements, 1. The God-consecrated first-fruit people, 2. the first dignity of the real children of God involved in it, 3. the living security for future conversions, even for the glorification of the world. Huther objects to the second element that instead of τινὰ we ought to have κτισμάτων followed by νέων or καινῶν. But the difficulty with regard to τινὰ has been settled above, and Huther's exposition, not ours, would require a νέων. Even the taking of πρώτοι in the sense of τιμώτατοι or some similar word (in Oecumenius) is not against the Apostle's idea; it only presents modifications and consequences of πρώτοι.

Of His creatures.—This expression which relates generally to the whole creation but particularly to God's moral institutions in mankind, brings out primarily the second sense of ἀπαρχή, as in Pa. viii.; Rom. viii.; 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3; but also the third sense. Christians as God's ἀπαρχή are not only superior to the doings of the moral world and to the propensities of the natural world, but they are also as God's ἀπαρχή sureties for the glorification of the world. The κτίσματα τοῦ θεοῦ, although they are not really the καινὴ κτίσις (Olshausen), but the ἀπαρχὴ τοῦ θεοῦ belongs also to them, as a surety that they will ripen into the καινὴ κτίσις, just as the first-fruits are an ἀπαρχή of the ripening fields. The depth of Christian knowledge contained in this passage has been admirably set forth by Wiesinger, p. 88, etc., to which the reader is referred. [We give it below under "DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL."—M.] Particular note should be taken of the striking accord of this passage in James with the fundamental ideas of the doctrine of Paul, in βουλήθεις, election, free grace; in ἀπεκρίσεν the doctrine of regeneration and the new creature, in the λόγος ἀληθείας the antithesis of law and symbol, in the ἀπαρχή not only the relation of Christians to the world, but in particular the relation of the Jewish Christians to the Jews (Rom. x.), and in the κτίσματα his doctrine of the glorification of the world by Christ, Rom. viii.; Eph. i.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

If there is one question, which for centuries has engaged and exhausted the reflection of the most celebrated philosophers, it is this: whence is moral evil? Moral evil, disorder in the dominion of a God of order and justice, a discord in the harmony of creation, an ever-flowing spring of misery by the side of so many and copious fountains of happiness opened for us by a higher Love. Who is the author of its disastrous existence? Does it come from God? If so, how could God be just and holy? And if it does not come from Him, how could it originate, continue and rule from the world's first dawn until now? There is no thinker who has not stood in silent contemplation of the riddle and there is also no thinker who has been able to resist the temptation of making at least an effort towards its solution. The various schools of Greek philosophy exhibit the most contradictory principles. The most different gnostic systems of the second century we see revolve round this problem as if it were their immutable centre. And even the speculative philosophy of our century, no matter how often its idealism departed from the maxims of experience, found it impossible wholly to overlook this dark back-ground of all human self-consciousness and had to include the investigation of evil in the course of its contemplations, if for no other purpose than that of denying the reality of sin as constituting the guilt of mankind. The most important efforts of human thought to explain the origin of moral evil have been discussed in a masterly manner by Julius Müller in his classical work, "Die Christliche Lehre von der Sünde" (new edition, 1844.)

2. The principal features of the doctrine, which James here presents concerning the origin of sin, may be compressed into one sentence, viz.: Sin is in no event God's fault but altogether our own. Every explanation of the origin of sin which makes God directly or indirectly the causa efficiens mali, James condemns in toto (as to its inmost ground), as does also Paul, Rom. iii. 8.

3. Nothing is more common than the endeavour to charge God directly or indirectly with the guilt of our transgressions. Even the heathen sought shelter in the subterfuge that some divinity or irresistible demon had impelled them to evil and the Jews asked "Why does he yet find fault?" Rom. ix. 19. The most ancient art of sinful mankind was the sewing of fig-leaves (Gen. iii. 7), and also the modern rationalism of our century in this respect seems neither to have learnt nor to have forgotten any thing. Sin, in the opinion of modern rationalists, is a relative, yet an altogether unavoidable evil. Is God not the Almighty who creates light and darkness, the Infinite from whom, by whom, and to whom are all things absolutely, the Omniscient, who foresaw the abuse of moral freedom and might easily have prevented it? It is therefore plainly thus: man could not but altogether fall and he falls not only with the high sanction but also according to the will and arrangement of God. Sin is a wholly indispensable part of our earthly plan of education just as a child would never have learned to walk without having previously stumbled. Sin is the inseparable shade-side of the light of perfection, which as it shines is inconceivable without a shadow. Sin is a want of development, an imperfection, grounded volens volens in the organization of our race, for which we can no more be held accountable than for having feet but no wings. Thus sin, which is free choice and a daring opposition to God, is fundamentally made to be a rule and what might yet be wanting to the fair-seeming theory, appears in still more glaring colours in practice. Even the dullest mind becomes inexhaustible in wit and understanding if it is necessary to excuse the commission of evil. There is nothing more difficult even to infant lips than the admission of personal guilt. Now it is the fault of others or of circumstances in which we find ourselves placed, again it is the fault of our temperament or the natural infirmity of an originally excellent heart. Aye, how many a Christian seeks to lessen his guilt with the pious sigh that God had let go his hand for a moment, that the Lord had hidden His countenance from him so that now he could not evince himself as a child of light; that the flesh had proved too strong for him and it was really not he that kept on sinning, but the invincible principle of flesh within himself. If James were to revisit us, he would not have any occasion to withdraw his exhortation as superfluous: "Let no man, being tempted, say, I am tempted from God."

4. It is only necessary to enter somewhat more profoundly into the idea that God in the most absolute sense of the word is ἀπειραστός κακῶν in order to perceive the infinite superiority of the Christian conception of God to the ethnical. James, in this respect, occupies not only a lofty religious but also a purely ethical standpoint. Just as the conception of God with many is obscured by sins, so on the other hand, the Christian conception of God corrects many confused or one-sided theories of the origin of sin.

5. In order that we may thoroughly understand the teaching of James respecting the origin of sin, we must in particular not lose sight of the point, that it is not so much his intention to account for the origin of sin among mankind as to describe it in the human individual: in other words that he here treats of the matter rather psychologically than metaphysically. Rationalistic commentators who consequently use James i. 14, 15 as a weapon against Gen. iii. and Jno. viii. 44, act most arbitrarily. The matter has two sides only one of which is touched by James, while he does not invalidate the other, no matter how true it may be in itself. Cf. Jas. iv. 7. What he describes is the history of sin in every individual man, and that in three different periods: in its beginning, its progress and its end.

6. James in declaring that lust, having conceived, brings forth sin, does by no means imply that ἐπιθυμία per se is not altogether sin. The concupiscentia in this case is already prava, but it is here expressly set forth not as the mother of the sinful principle but of the sinful deed. The Protestant Church at every period has rightly opposed to the pelagianizing tendencies of [Roman] Catholicism the assertion that also the ἐπιθυμία of man, which eventually becomes deed-sin, is sinful in itself (per se). Paul also denies that the law is sin, not that lust is sin, Rom. vii. 7. Besides the history of every more signal sin, e. g., that of Adam or Pharaoh, David, Ahab and many others furnishes the most striking proofs of the correctness of the delineation here given. "This passage is greatly abused if it is cited as a proof that evil desires are not sin, provided man withhold his consent. For James does not discuss the question when sin begins, when it is sin before God and imputed as sin, but when it breaks forth. Thus he gradually progresses to show that the completion of sin is the cause of eternal death, but that sin is rooted in a man's own lust; whence it follows that men shall reap in eternal ruin the fruit which they themselves have sowed." Chrysostom.

7. The idea of guilt, which is here so emphatically expressed by James, is of the utmost importance to the whole development of scientific theology. Not until sin in its true nature is acknowledged as guilt, are we able to appreciate the depth of the doctrines of the atonement and of redemption. But then it must be equally acknowledged that only a Redeemer, who was really God-man, was able to deliver us from eternal ruin. The right conception of Soteriology and Christology is thoroughly rooted in the deeper insight into Hamartology.

8. It is impossible that God should be at variance with Himself, that His holiness should conflict with His love. The same God whom James describes in v. 17 as ἀπειραστός κακῶν he sets forth in v. 17 as the eternal source (German primal source) of light from whom all gifts and only good gifts flow to us. This declaration also reminds us of the Sermon on the Mount, Matth. vii. 11. God is here called the Father of lights, as elsewhere He is described as the Father of spirits, the God of the spirits of all flesh, Heb. xii. 9; Numb. xvi. 22. James describes the inexhaustible riches of the goodness and the glory of the immutability of God in a form at once poetical and metrical "πᾶσα δόσις ἀγαθῇ, καὶ πάντων δόρημα τέλειον," in order to show also thereby that the inference "that such a God could yet be the cause of sin" contains the strongest contradictio in terminis. For it is impossible that the Father of lights should love darkness; He, with whom there is no change, cannot possibly cause to-day the evil which yesterday He did forbid or punish; detestable sin, so often condemned by Him, in no event can belong to His good and perfect gifts. "The New Testament positively opposes the repulsive assertion of a self-development of God." Heubner.

9. The greatest proof of the absolute impossibility of God being the cause of sin lies in the opposite experience of believers themselves (v. 18), where the greatest and most glorious of all good gifts (v. 17), although stated in general terms, is yet specifically named. The history of the birth of sin (v. 15) is opposed (v. 18) to the spiritual history of the birth of Christians in order to shed thereby the brightest light on the fact that God who effects regeneration, cannot possibly be the author of its contrary—evil. Those who attach but little importance to the Epistle of James in a dogmatical point of view would do well to give their earnest and thoughtful attention to his dictum classicum concerning regeneration, v. 18. We have here in fact the depth and riches of Paul in a brief compendium. See the exegetical notes on the passage. James' mode of statement exhibits also a surprising agreement with that of Peter (1 Pet. i. 23).

v. 16. Bp. Andrewes (Sermons, 3, p. 374): "Though of man it be truly said by Job, 'he never continueth in one stay' (Job. xiv. 2); though the lights of heaven have their parallaxes; yes, 'the angels of heaven, he found not steadfastness in them' (Job. iv. 18); yet for God, He is subject to none of them. He is 'Ego sum qui sum' (Ex. iii. 14); that is, saith Malachi, 'Ego Deus et non mutator' (Mal. iii. 6). We are not what we were awhile since, what we shall be awhile after, scarce what we are; for every moment makes us vary. With God it is nothing so, 'He is that He is; He is and changeth not.' He changes not his tenor; He says not, before Abraham was, I was; but 'before Abraham was, I am' (Jno. viii. 58).

Yet are there "varyings and changes," it cannot be denied. We see them daily: True, but the point is per quem, on whom to lay them? Not on God. Seems there any recess? It is we forsake Him, not He us (Jer. ii. 17). It is the ship that moves, though they that be in it think the land goes from them, not they from it. Seems there any variation, as that of the night? It is umbra terræ makes it, the light makes it not. Is there anything resembling a shadow? A vapour rises from us, and makes the cloud, which is as a pent-house between, and takes Him from our sight. That vapour is our lust, there is the apud quem. Is any tempted? It is his own lust doth it; that enticeth him to sin; that brings us to the shadow of death. It is not God. No more than He can be tempted, no more can He tempt any. If we find any change, the apud is with us, not Him; we change, He is unchanged. "Man walketh in a vain shadow." (Ps. xxxix. 6). His ways are the truth. He cannot deny Himself.

Every evil, the more perfectly evil it is, the more it is from below: it either rises from the steam of our nature corrupted; or yet lower, ascends as a gross smoke, from the bottomless pit, from the prince of darkness, as full of varying and turning into all shapes and shadows, as God is far from both, who is uniform and constant in all His courses. —The lights may vary, He is invariable; they may change, He is unchangeable, constant always and like Himself. Now our lessons from these are—

1. Are they given? Then, quid gloriaris? Let us have no boasting. Are they given, why forget the Giver? Let Him be had in memory, He is worthy so to be had.

2. Are the "giving" as well as the "gift" and the "good" as the "perfect," of gift, both? Then acknowledge it in both; take the one as a pledge, make the one as a step to the other.

3. Are they from somewhere else, not from ourselves? Learn then to say, and to say with feeling, Non nobis, Domine, quia non a nobis (Ps. cvi. 1).

4. Are they from on high? Look not down to the ground, then, as swine to the acorns they find lying there, and never once up to the tree they come from. Look up; the very frame of our body gives that way. It is nature's check to us to have our head bear upward and our heart grovel below.

5. Do they descend? Ascribe them then to purpose, not to time or chance. No table to fortune, saith the prophet. Is. lxx. 11.

6. Are they from the "Father of lights?" (Jer. x. 12) then never go to the children, a signis cæli nolite timere: "neither fear nor hope for anything from any light of them at all."

7. Are His "gifts without repentance?" (Rom. ii. 29). Varies He not? Whom He loves, doth "He love to the end?" (Jno. xiii. 1). Let our service be so too, not wavering. O that we changed from Him no more than He from us! Not from the light of grace to the shadow of sin, as we do full often.

But above all, that which is ex totâ substantiâ, that if we find any want of any giving or gift, good or perfect, this text gives us light, whither to look, to whom to repair for them; to the "Father of lights." And even so let us do. Ad patrem luminum cum primo lumine: "Let the light, every day, so soon as we see it, put us in mind to get us to the Father of Lights." Ascendat oratio, descendat miseratio, "let our prayer go up to Him that His grace may come down to us," so to lighten us in our ways and works, that we may in the end come to dwell with Him, in the light which is φῶς ἀντοπερον, "light whereof there is no eventide," the sun whereof never sets, nor knows tropic—the only thing we miss, and wish for in our lights here, primum et ante omnia. [A part of the above really belongs to "HOMILETICAL and PRACTICAL" but I doubt not that the reader will be thankful to me for not having attempted to sever the practical element from the doctrinal—M.].

[V. 18. WORDSWORTH:—With reverence be it said, in the work of our Regeneration, God is both our Father and Mother; and this statement well follows the declaration of the Apostle that every good giving and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights. He is a Father, the Father of lights, and He is like a Mother also, and gives birth to us by the Word of truth.

Compare the use of the maternal word ᾠδίνω, parturio, used by St. Paul in one of his tenderest expressions of affectionate yearning for his spiritual children, Gal. iv. 19.

By this word ἀνεκτίσθην, He brought us forth, St. James declares God's maternal love for our souls. Is. xlix. 15. Ps. xxvii. 12.

—The view which makes ὁ λόγος personal is not in conflict with the common view; it is based on the recognition of the two senses in which St. James and St. Paul use it. Cf. Heb. iv. 12; Eph. v. 26; Tit. i. 3; Gal. iv. 19. The comparison of this verse (James i. 18) with i. 21 shows that James passes by a natural transition from the Incarnate Word to the reception of the Inspired Word.

ATHANASIUS (contra Arianos iii. § 61, p. 488): "Whatsoever the Father determines to create, He makes and creates by Him (the Word), as the Apostle says. By His will he brought us forth by the Word. Therefore the will of the Father, which concerns those who are born again, or which concerns those things that are made by any other way, is in the Word, in whom He makes and regenerates what He thinks fit."

IRENÆUS (ii. 25, 8):—"Thou, O man, are not uncreated, nor wert thou always coexistent with God, like His own Word, but thou art gradually learning from the Word the dispensations of God who made thee."

TERTULLIAN (c. Prazean. c. 7) illustrating the word ἀνεκτίσθην says: "Christus primogenitus et unigenitus Dei proprie de vulva cordis Ipsius."

NOVATIUS (de Trinit. 81):—"There is one God, without any origin, from whom the Word, the Son was born. He, born of the Father, dwells ever in the Father."

THEOPHILUS of Antioch (§ 10):—"God, having His Own Word indwelling in His own bowels (σπλάγχχνος), begat Him, having breathed Him forth before all things, and through Him He hath made all things; and He is called the Beginning, because He is the Principle and Lord of all things which were created through Him."

HIPPOLITUS (Philos. p. 334):—"The One Supreme God generates the Word in His own mind. The word was in the Father, bearing the Will of the Father who begat Him; and when the Father commanded that the world should be created, the Word was executing what was pleasing to the Father,—The Word alone is of God, of God Himself; wherefore He is God. The Word of God regulates all things, the First-born of the Father. Christ is God over all, who commanded us to wash away sin from man; regenerating the old man, and having called man His image from the beginning; and if thou hearkenest to His holy commandment and imitate in godness Him who is good, thou wilt be like Him, being honoured by Him, for God has a longing for thee, having divinized thee also for his glory."

BR. BULL (Def. Fid. Nic. III. ch. ii.) says: "The Son of God, born from Eternity, is said by the Fathers to have certain other births in time. He was born into the world when He came forth to create the world. He was born again in a wonderful manner, when He descended into the womb of the virgin and united Himself to His creature. He is daily born in the hearts of those who embrace Him by faith and love."

BR. PEARSON (p. 219) says: "This use of the term Word was familiar to the Jews, and this was the reason that St. John delivered to them so great a mystery in so few words." Wordsworth adds that the same remark is applicable to the language of St. James.

BR. BULL (Def. Fid. Nic. I. ch. i. § 17-19, and Harm. Apost. Diss. 2. ch. xv.). In the latter passage he declares the meaning of St. James to be that our Christian graces proceed from "the good pleasure of God through Christ, and from the regeneration which the Holy Spirit works in us through the Gospel."

WORDSWORTH:—"They whom St. James addressed, being born again by adoption and created anew in Christ Jesus, the Eternal Word (Eph. iii. 10), might well be said to be designed by God to be a first-fruit of His creatures, for they were new creatures in Christ (Gal. vi. 15; 2 Cor. v. 17), who is the first begotten of every creature (Col. i. 15), the beginning of the creation of God (Rev. iii. 14), by whom all things were created (Col. i. 16). By virtue of His incarnation and of their incorporation and filiation in Him, who is the first-born among many brethren (Rom. viii. 29), they were made the first-fruits of creation, being advanced to a high preëminence and primacy, beyond that which was given to Adam before the fall (Gen. i. 28) and even above the angels themselves. Cf. Heb. i. 5-13; ii. 5, 7-16."—"This higher sense of λόγος includes also the lower one, God brought us forth by the Word of truth, preached to the world."—M.]

[The Note of Wiesinger, referred to under "Exegetical and Critical" is as follows: "this passage is among those which reveal the depth of Christian knowledge, in which the practical and moral exhortations of the writer are grounded: lying as it does expressly (διό v. 19) at the basis of them. We will here bring together in a few words the teaching of the passage, for the sake of its important bearing on the rest of the Epistle. It teaches us

1. As a positive supplement to vv. 14, 15, that the life of man must be renewed, from its very root and foundation;

2. It designates this renewal as God's work, moreover as an imparting of the life of God (ἀπεκρίσας), as only possible by the working of the Spirit, only on the foundation of the objective fact of our redemption in Christ, which is the contents of the λόγος ἀληθείας;

3. It sets forth this regeneration as an act once for all accomplished (ἀπεκρίσεν, Aor.) and distinguishes it from the gradual penetration and sanctification of the individual life by means of this new principle of life imparted in the regeneration.

4. It declares also expressly that the regeneration is a free act of God's Love (βουλήθεός) not induced by any work of man (Eph. ii. 8, 9; Tit. iii. 5), so that man is placed by God in his right relation to God, antecedently to all works well-pleasing to God: for this the expression ἀπεκρίσεν involves: cf. ἐξελέξατο, ch. ii. 5, and in so far as this ἀπεκρίσεν necessarily implies the justification of the sinner (the δικαιώσθαι of St. Paul), it is plain also, that St. James cannot, without contradicting himself, make this δικαιώσθαι, in the sense of St. Paul, dependent on the works of faith.

5. λόγος ἀληθείας is specified as the objective medium of regeneration; and herewith we must have πίστις as the appropriating medium on the part of man himself: of the central import of which πίστις in St. James we have already seen something (ch. ii. 5, 14, etc.).

6. Together with this act of regeneration proceeding from God, we have also the high destination of the Christian, which the Apostle gives so significantly and deeply in εἰς τὸ εἶναι x. r. λ. And that which God has done to him, is now in the following verses made the foundation of that which the Christian on his part has to do: by which what we have said under 3, and 4, receives fresh confirmation. This passage is one to be remembered, when we wish to know what the Apostle understands by the νόμος τέλειος (i. 25; ii. 12) and what he means, when (ii. 14, etc.) he deduces δικαιώσθαι from the works of faith. As regards the dogmatical use, which we make of this passage, wishing to show that regeneration is brought about by the word, as distinguished from the Sacrament of Baptism (Tit. iii. 5-7), we may remark, that seeing that λόγος ἀληθείας designates the Gospel, as a whole, without any respect to such distinction, nothing regarding it can be gathered from this passage. The word of the Lord constitutes, we know, the force of the Sacrament also. "Accedit verbum ad elementum et fit Sacramentum." And it is meant to be inferred that the readers of this Epistle were not baptized."—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

It is impossible to pursue the course of life while we regard God in any way the cause of sin.—The attempt of charging God with the guilt of one's transgression: 1, The traces of this perverseness: a, in the Jewish world, b, in the heathen world, c, in the Christian world. 2. Sin not God's fault but solely our own, a truth, 1, which man is only too prone to forget (v. 13), 2, which confirms the history of the development of sin (vv. 14, 15), 3, which a glance at the being of God (vv. 16, 17) and at the work of God (v. 18), removes beyond all doubt.—On the conclusion: "Do not err," v. 16. "Do not err," how James here cautions us against a threefold error: 1, Do not err, ye who expect the highest good from beneath (the earth): all good giving is from above, 2, Do not err, ye who dwelling on the goodness of God, forget His holiness: the Giver of all good is also the Father of lights, 3, Do not err, ye who think that His holiness in your case would cease to be just: with the Father of lights is neither variableness, nor a shadow of turning.

[WORDSWORTH: v. 18.—Here is an Apostolic protest against two errors prevalent among the Jews, 1. that men are what they are either by necessity, as the Pharisees held, or else 2, as the Sadducees taught, by the unaided action of their own will, independently of Divine grace. See Maimonides in his Preface to Pirke Aboth, and Josephus Ant. xiii. 5, 9; xviii. 1, 3. Bp. Bull, Harm. Apost. Diss. 2, ch. 15. Thus they disparaged the dignity of the Divine Will.

[RABBINICAL: v. 13.—This is the custom of evil concupiscence; to-day it saith, Do this; to-morrow, worship an idol. The man goes and worships. Again it saith, be angry.—Evil concupiscence is, at the beginning, like the thread of a spider's web; afterward it is like a cart-rope.—M.]

[MACKNIGHT: v. 15.—The soul, which the Greek philosophers considered as the seat of the appetites and passions, is called by Philo τὸ ὄψλον, the female part of our nature; and the spirit, τὸ ἄρρεν, the male part. In allusion to this notion, James represents men's lust as a harlot, who entices their understanding and will into its impure embraces and from that conjunction conceives sin. Sin being brought forth, immediately acts, and is nourished by frequent repetition, till at length it gains such strength that in its turn it begets death. This is the true genealogy of sin and death. Lust is the mother of sin and sin the mother of death; and the sinner the parent of both."—M.]

[BP. SANDERSON: v. 13.—St. James therefore concludes positively, that every man's temptation, if it take effect, is merely from his own lust. It is then our own act and deed, if we are Satan's vassals: disclaim it we cannot; and whatsoever misery or mischief ensueth thereupon, we ought not to impute to any other than ourselves alone.—M.]

[ABP. SECKER: v. 14.—Temptation has no power, the great tempter himself has no power, but that of using persuasion. Forced we cannot be, so long as we are true to ourselves, our own consent must be our own giving: and without it the rest is nothing.—M.]

[DR. JORTIN: v. 17.—The unchangeable nature of God suggests very powerful dissuasions from vice. The Scripture contains no decrees concerning the reprobation and salvation of particular persons, without regard to their moral qualifications. But there is a law which declares that obstinate and impenitent vice shall end in destruction. This law is as eternal and unchangeable, as the nature of good and evil, or the nature and perfections of God. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but this decree shall not pass away: and therefore a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the everliving and immutable God. Yet this unchangeable nature of our Creator, considered in another view, affords no less comfort and peace to the greatest offenders, if they will repent and turn to Him. Their offences cannot be greater than His mercy and goodness, which endures to all eternity, ready to receive those who by an effectual repentance and reformation, through the satisfaction of Christ, make themselves proper objects of His mercy.—M.]

CAUTION AGAINST YIELDING TO THE WRATH OF MAN (SEXUAL), WHICH THINKS ITSELF COMPETENT TO ADMINISTER THE JUSTICE OF GOD BUT IS INCOMPETENT TO DO IT. THE INSTRUMENT OF DELIVERANCE AND PRESERVATION FROM THIS ZEAL: THE CULTURE OF INNER LIFE IN FAITH AND THE VERITABLE RELIGIOUS PROOF OF THIS FAITH IN ACTS OF MERCY.

CHAPTER I. 19-27.

(V. 22-27. Epistle for 5th Sunday after Easter).

19 Wherefore,<sup>1</sup> my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath: For the wrath of man worketh<sup>2</sup> not the righteousness of God. Wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the 22 engrafted word, which is able to save your souls. But be ye doers of the word, and 23 not hearers only,<sup>3</sup> deceiving your own selves. For if any be a hearer of the word, 24 and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass: For he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man 25 he was. But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this<sup>4</sup> man shall be blessed in 26 his deed. If<sup>5</sup> any man among you<sup>6</sup> seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, 27 but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain. Pure religion and undefiled before God<sup>7</sup> and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

Verse 19. iste is the most authentic reading. A. B. C. Vulg. al. iste found in G. K. [Rec. L. Sin.] is evidently a correction designed to establish a clearer connection, which has however obscured the peculiar import of this section. De Wette and Wiesinger, indeed advocate the retention of iste on internal grounds against Lachmann, Huther and al., but the internal grounds are also in favour of iste and even Tischendorf's reëdoption of the reading of the Text. Rec. cannot affect the question. We also read with A. B. after iste and καὶ before εἴσω. Tischendorf now decidedly favours iste; so does Bouman p. 84 sqq.

Lange: Know however ..... also let every man etc. [ye know it ..... but let etc.—M.]

Verse 20. ἐπαγγέλα: A. B. [C.†] Sin., Lachmann; κατεπαγγέλα: C.* G. K. al. Tisch. The former seems to preponderate, but ἐπαγγέλα has here surely a peculiarly emphatic meaning.

Lange: For the man's [vir] wrath doth not accomplish [execute] etc.

Verse 21. Lange: Wherefore, removing all filthiness and all out-flowing [communication of life] of malice [malignity] acquire in gentleness the word implanted in [and among] you, which etc.

Wherefore putting off all filthiness and superabundance of maliciousness, receive in meekness the innate Word, which etc.—M.]

Verse 22. μὴ δοκῶν before ἀποκαταί Rec. A. C. K. L. Thell.; after B. Vulg. Alford.—M.]

Lange: But become ye doers ..... as those who ensnare themselves. [But become ye .....deceiving etc.—M.]

Verse 23. Lange: For if .....this man is like to a man who observes the countenance [image of appearance] of his birth [of his development-image, of his life-form, the momentary formation of his continual development] in a mirror.

Because (ὅτι) ..... this man is like to a man considering the face of his birth in a mirror—M.]

Verse 24. Lange: For he observed himself and went away and forthwith forgot of what manner he was. For he considered himself and is gone away ..... what he was like (ὅμοιος ᾤ, i. e. how he looked in the mirror)—M.]

Verse 25. <sup>4</sup> A. B. C. Sin. and al. omit ὁ ὅς before ἀποκαταί, so Lachmann; Tischendorf following G. K. [and Rec.—M.] inserts it. The omission may have arisen from the supposition that the word was superfluous, its pregnant force having been misapprehended.

Lange: But he, who became absorbed in the completed law, that of liberty, and remained thus, who became not a hearer unto forgetting, but a doer of the work, the same shall be blessed in his doing. But he who looked into the perfect law, that (τὸν) of liberty, and perseveres doing so, being ..... in his doing—M.]

Verse 26. <sup>5</sup> δὲ after εἰ, inserted by Lachmann following C., has the most important Codd. against it. It weakens also the recapitulatory character of the sentence.

<sup>6</sup> A. B. C. omit ἐν ὑμῖν. Lange: If any man [among you] sanctieth himself to be a religious man [one theocratically zealous of the honour of God] etc.

German for religious man, "Gottesdiener"—a servant of God, one observant of God's outward service; religion "Gottesdienst"—outward service of God.—M.]

Verse 27. <sup>7</sup> τῷ before θεῷ recommended by A. B. C.* Sin. al. and Lachmann. This reading is also in consonance with the thought, the reference being to the God of the Christian revelation.

Lange: A pure and unprofaned religion [outward service—M.] before the God and Father is this: to be careful of the orphans and widows in their tribulation [to have the oversight of them, and not to be engrossed with politics], to preserve himself unspotted from the world.

..... before our God and Father (τῷ θεῷ καὶ πατρί) etc.; παρὰ—with, in the estimation of Alford.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Analysis. Caution against the second form of temptation—fanatical, angry zeal. The clemency of the man who is called to be the child of God or who is already begotten, should be in conformity to the clemency of God v. 19.—The wrath of man [sexual] is not adapted to the ministering of the righteousness of God, v. 20.—They were to purify themselves from this temptation, by acknowledging said sin as a pollution (not peradventure as zeal for Judaistic purity) and as natural maliciousness and putting it off, and on the other hand, by thoroughly appropriating with meekness the word of Christian truth unto the furthering of their salvation, v. 21.—Such an appropriation of the word will be most readily accomplished by their becoming doers of the word and by ceasing to be mere hearers, v. 22-24.—The real doer of the word has two distinguishing marks: he is absorbed with the eye of faith in the contemplation of the perfect law, the free law of Christian truth and proves his perseverance in this contemplation by the full consistency of Christian activity (as described more particularly). By such full energy of life he attains the enjoyment of blissful life v. 25.—Whoever imagines that he is a real worshipper of God and a zealot for the honour of God and corrupts his heart in giving the reins (in fanatical zeal) to his tongue, his religious service is vain. But the counterpart, true worship of God corresponding to the true image-of-God-the-Father, is Christian care of the helpless members of the Church accompanied by a decided shunning of polluting worldly-mindedness. vv. 26, 27.

Vers. 19. Know however, my beloved brethren.—The connection indicated by the reading ὁρατε (see App. Crit.) deduces from the clemency of God the exhortation that the Christian also should exhibit corresponding clemency. But that reading makes this verse dependent on what precedes, as if it were simply an application, which is not correct. On the contrary we have here the beginning of a new leading thought, viz.: the guarding of Christians against the temptation of fanatical zeal by fully yielding to the spirit of meekness and liberty in Christianity. Hence the reading ὁρατε is also preferable on internal grounds. Huther's observation is correct: "v. 18, connects primarily with the exhortation to hear—and then with the further exhortation in v. 22 to be not only hearers but doers of the word." "But the hearing here insisted upon must evidence itself as decided, (according to Matth. xiii. 23) as a full and unreserved yielding to the word of truth and consequently as the foundation and not as the contrast of doing. Semler takes ὁρατε as an Indicative; non ignoratis istud carmen Sir. v. 11, but apart from the difference in expression there and here, the indicative sense weakens without reason the energetical tone of the exhortation. Huther remarks that ὁρατε answers to the μὴ πλανᾶσθε v. 16, which view is further confirmed by the use of the same address: ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί here and there; cf. also ch. ii. 5. [But it is not necessary to connect the ὁρατε taken indicatively with the exhortation at all: it therefore cannot weaken its energetical tone, on the contrary it strengthens it by its very abruptness. Adopting the indicative sense of ὁρατε I connect it therefore with the preceding, as follows: Ye know it, my beloved brethren, but let every man, etc.; or paraphrasing: Ye know that these things are so, but possessed of this very knowledge let every man, etc. ὁρατε is used in this sense in Eph. v. 6; Heb. xii. 17.—M.]

Also let every man.—καὶ (see App. Crit.) indicates that the conduct of man should be in conformity to the conduct of God. It remains to be ascertained in what sense we are to take this sentence. Laurentius and al. make it a general direction; Gebser, Wiesinger and al. give it a distinct reference to "the word of truth;" Huther, Theile and al., say that the general direction had primarily the specific aim of inculcating upon Christians the right conduct also in respect of the word of truth. But all this hardly does full justice to the double antithesis in the words: slow to speak, slow to wrath. The Apostle indicates the point in which Christ and Christian religiousness should evidence itself as humanity, but true humanity also as piety—even the centre of faith and humanity as contrasted with inhuman and impious conduct. Hence the express declaration: πᾶς ἄνθρωπος. It is a fundamental law of humanity, which is here described by the antithesis ταχὺς and βραδύς (found in Philo, but in no other place of the New Testament, and expressed by Rückert thus: "thou hast two ears and one mouth.")—Being swift to hear denotes entire readiness, constancy and thoughtfulness of hearing (Matth. xiii. 23) and shows that such real hearing contains the germ of obedience to the truth, just as real "tasting and seeing" involves the experience "that the Lord is good." Being slow to speak of course does not exclude all speaking but rash, immature, thoughtless and immoderate talking (λαλεῖν), especially dogmatical speaking ch. iii. 1, although the expression is not confined to it (Pott and al.). The Apostle demands cautious, thoughtful speaking, a speaking flowing from an inward calling and therefore a weighty speaking. Being slow to wrath applies in like manner to anger, which is consequently not absolutely disallowed (as Horneus has truly remarked). Eagerness in speaking by warmth leads one easily to eagerness of passion [Alford: The quick speaker is the quick kindler.—M.]. Huther justly rejects the reference of this wrath to God (Calvin, Bengel, Gebser: "impatience towards God on account of persecution"). For in that case James ought not to have allowed any slowness to wrath. Huther capably explains this wrath of "carnal zeal aiming at the mastering of our neighbour, the fruit of which is not εἰρήνη but ἀκαταστασία ch. iii. 16; the caution is directed against Christians, who—as did the Pharisees in respect to the law—instead of using the Gospel for their own sanctification, were abusing it in gratifying their love of condemnation and quarrelsomeness." Thus our exhortation in its particular direction is addressed not only to the Jewish Christians but to all the twelve tribes, whose ancestors in fanaticism, Simeon and Levi (Gen. xxiv.), disapproved by their father (ch. xxiv. 49), were afterwards mentioned as, patterns worthy of imitation (Judith ix.).

Vers. 20. For the wrath of man worketh not.—Our verse gives the reason of the preceding one, but contrasts the two modes of conduct, the right one there and the wrong one here. We attach importance to the distinction that in the former verse reference is made to the wrath of man in general and here to the wrath of man sexually. Thomas perceives in the expression an antithesis between the man and the child, Bengel one between man and woman but neither does conform to or satisfy the historical significance of our expression. We agree with Huther that this sentence must not be referred to the state of being righteous before God (Gebser, Grashof), and with Wiesinger that it must not be to the personal doing of men which is well-pleasing to God (so Huther following Luther—δικαιοσύνη—τὸ δικαίον a meaning of frequent occurrence in both Testaments); but we cannot stop with Wiesinger at the interpretation of Hofmann that "the wrath (zeal) of man is unable to effect in others (i. e., as a zeal of conversion) the righteousness of God, i. e., that "state of being righteous" [Rechtsbeschaffenheit], which God begets by this word of truth. For James evidently has respect to the fanatical delusion of wrath, which imagines to administer and work out in the world the righteousness of God especially with reference to unbelievers by passionate words and deeds, in that it only gives reality to its unamiable ebullitions. Such was specifically the Judaistic delusion, which begot Ebionism and the Jewish war and which also found afterwards its expression in Mohammedanism and even in the Christian crusades, in the ecclesiastical persecutions of heretics and also in several fanatical heretics (Eudo de Stella, Thomas Münzer, etc.). But that the subjects of this delusion at the same time believe that their wrath (zeal) is the true way of converting men, that thus they are doing a work well-pleasing to God and that thus they will become righteous before God are features which, although we cannot set them aside, must remain subordinate to the leading idea of passionate ebullitions in maiores gloriam Dei, i. e., here justitiam Dei. Our translation would be more strongly expressed by the reading καταργήσεται than by the better authenticated ἐργάσεται; but the latter taken in a pregnant sense, does also give the force of the former.

* We consider this term, which through Hofmann has crept into theology, as an abortive improvement on the term "righteousness" (German: Rechtschaffenheit or *Ge-

Shunning the temptation to unholy and hypocritical wrath (zeal) by means of true sanctification, negatively and positively.

V. 21. Wherefore removing etc.—James bidding his readers purify themselves from the false zeal for their imaginary Jewish purity sounds like an oxymoron; for it is just their kind of zeal for purity which he characterizes as impurity and their imaginary piety as inhuman maliciousness. But true purifying is to him sanctification, that is, it is on the one hand the result of a negation (putting off impurity, etc.), and on the other, the result of a positive act, viz., the full receiving of the word of truth. However the two acts do not absolutely succeed one another (remove and receive), but with the removing of impurity (take note of the Participle) the real appropriating of the evangelical word of God is to take place. The negative element, however, has here a conditional precedence, repentance before faith (Mark i. 15); hence it is here subordinated by the Participle to the positive element on which it depends (cf. Rom. xiii. 12; Eph. iv. 22, 23). But the Participle must also be noted as enforcing constancy in purifying.—ἀποθίμενοι we cannot translate "putting off," for the reference is not figuratively to the putting off of filthy garments and to the opposite putting on of clean ones. The antithesis is: to remove, do away with; and to acquire, appropriate (see Eph. iv. 25 and other passages).

All filthiness (impurity).—βυπαρία (in the New Testament only here) is doubtless a stronger expression than ἀκαθάρτια (Rom. vi. 19). It denotes filth in a religious, theoretical sense like the filthy garment ch. ii. 2, like βόρος 1 Pet. iii. 21, and βυραρός and βυραρεύειν Rev. xxii. 11. To take the word in a general sense of moral uncleanness (Calvin and al.), is inadequate; still less apposite are the specific renderings "avarice" (Storr), "whoring" (Laurentius), "intemperance" (Heisen); but least of all its reduction to an attribute of the following kakia (Huther: putting off all uncleanness and abundance of malice; similarly Theile, Wiesinger and al.). It is sufficiently manifest that James sees in the carnal wrath (zeal) exerted in the interest of piety an antithesis, viz., impurity towards God (on the Atheistical in the heart of fanaticism see Nitzsch System, p. 39), and malice towards man.

All out-flowing (communication of life) of malice.—Huther: περισσεία, foreign to classical Greek, denotes in the New Testament "abundance," really superabundance. The substantive and the corresponding verb περισσεύειν signify in the New Testament the overflowing of a fulness of life, on the one hand as a development of life (a passing over into the life which continues to procreate itself Matth. v. 20; Rom. xv. 13, etc.), on the other hand as a communication of life (a passing over upon others, Rom. v. 16, 17; 2 Cor. viii. 2; ch. x. 15, etc.). Here the word is evidently used in the latter sense. This follows also from the proper definition of the term kakia, which here is not synonymous with πονηρία (1 Cor. v. 8)—vitiositas (Semler, Theile and al.), but according to the connection as the opposite of ἐν πραότητι, as Eph. iv. 31; Col. iii. 8; Tit. iii. 3; 1 Pet. ii. 1. A more specific idea, namely the inimical disposition towards one's neighbour, which we express by "animosity" (Pott)! Huther.—(Wiesinger: δυσή, Rosenmüller: morositas; Meyer: malice). The overflowing of maliciousness is therefore the malicious, hateful communication which passes from the fanatical wrath (zeal) of the propagandists on those whom they influence, according to Matth. xxiii. 15; Rom. ii. 24 and according to ecclesiastical history, especially the history of the persecution of the Donatists, the Paulicians and the Camisarda, etc. The definition of περισσεία = περίσσωμα (Bede); outgrowth, efflorescence (Schneckenburger, de Wette);—the remnant surviving from former times (Gebser and al. = περίσσωμα), are thus set aside. [Alford joins βυπαρίαν with περισσείαν, as belonging to the Genitive kakias and remarks that "it seems better for the context, which concerns not the putting away of moral pollution of all kinds, but only of that kind, which belongs to kakia. And thus taken it will mean that kakia pollutes the soul and renders it unfit to receive the ἐμφυτός λόγος. It is very possible that the agricultural similitude in ἐμφυτός may have influenced the choice of both these words, βυπαρία and περισσεία. The ground must be rid of all that pollutes and chokes it, before the seed can sink in and come to maturity; must be cleaned and cleared. περισσεία, if the above figures be allowed, is the rank growth, the abundant crop."—M.]

Receive (acquire, appropriate) in meekness.—In meekness, in virtue of a meek disposition, and not only with meekness. Meekness stands first in a pregnant sense. In meekness acquire, i. e. a meek demeanour, the opposite of wrathfulness, exhibited towards their brethren of different opinions is not only the condition, the vital element of the reception of the Gospel on the part of the Jews but also of the right appropriation of the same on the part of the Jewish Christians. Although the word denotes not directly the docilis animus (Grotius, similarly Calvin and al.), yet the first condition and proof of the same. The reference, to be sure, is not to meekness as the fruit of the reception of the word (Schneckenburger), although the morally calm and gentle spirit engendered under the influence of Christianity must be manifested in its highest perfection as its fruit. Want of meekness destroys the power of the Gospel (Matth.

xviii. 23, etc.); the fourth and the seventeenth centuries prove this in a remarkable manner. Receivē. δέξαοθε is emphatic and denotes the right attitude under right hearing with right doing. The rooting and growing of Paul is here strikingly described as a fuller making one's own [appropriation], because the Jewish-Christians were in great danger of again losing their own (property) and the Jews were on the point of losing their ancient title to it (cf. 1 Thess. i. 6).

The word implanted in [and among] you.—This word is the objective Gospel (Huther: neither "innate or connate reason" [Oecumenius], nor the inner light of the mystics, for δέχου forbids that) as in v. 18, but in its subjective form of life, as the spiritual and vital principle in believers or as the seed of regeneration (1 Pet. i. 23). In this form it is implanted in believers but likewise implanted as a principle of conversion in the Jews as a whole; the latter meaning must not be passed over. Hence the δέξαοθε is relevant both with reference to the first reception and the further appropriation of it. In consequence of the difficulty arising from the idea of receiving a word already implanted, Calvin made ἐμψυρος proleptic and explained it "ita suscipite, ut vere inseratur;" and others similarly. But the word received subjectively does not thereby cease to be objective and to be received. [It is doubtful whether Lange's solution of the difficulty will stand the ordeal of logical analysis. There is no such double sense in ἐμψυρος. Nor is the more clearly expressed exposition of Alford more satisfactory. He sees in ἐμψυρος an allusion to the parable of the sower and makes "the λόγος ἐμψυρος—the word which has been sown, the word whose attribute and ἀπερὶ it is to be ἐμψυρος, and which is ἐμψυρος, awaiting your reception of it to spring up and take up your being into it and make you new plants." His exposition is open to the same objection that something which is already sown in another soil can be implanted in us, if he understands by λόγος ἐμψυρος the word written or preached. Adhering however to the real meaning ἐμψυρος—innate, τὸ ἐν φύσει (Hesych.) we may remove all difficulty. Then the λόγος ἐμψυρος is—the innate Word, that is, the Word which has been born in our nature, i. e. Christ. So Wordsworth who produces much illustrative matter of the use of ἐμψυρος and thus sums up the whole: While it is true, that Christ by his Incarnation is properly said to be ἐμψυρος innate, born in us, and to be indeed Emmanuel, God with us, God manifest in our flesh, God dwelling forever in the nature of us all; or, if we adopt the other sense of ἐμψυρος, while it is true, that Christ is indeed grafted in us as our Netzer or Branch (see Matth. ii. 23), yet will not this avail for our salvation, unless we receive Him by faith. We must be planted in Him and He in us by Baptism (Gal. iii. 27), we must dwell in Him and He in us, by actual and habitual communion with Him in the Holy Eucharist, we must abide and bring forth fruit in Him, by fervent love and hearty obedience. Christ, who is the Branch (Zech. vi. 12), is engrafted on the stock of our nature; but a scion grafted on a tree will not grow unless it is received and take root in the stock; so His Incarnation will profit us nothing, unless we receive Him in our hearts and drink in the sap of His grace and transfuse the life-blood of our wills into Him, and grow and coalesce with Him and bring forth fruit in Him."—M.]

Which is able to save your souls.—The idea of individual salvation is allied here with that of the national deliverance of the Israelites as in Jno. x. 28. Hence stress is here laid not only on the salvation of the soul but also on the salvation of the life and τὰς ψυχὰς ὑμῶν is stronger than simply ψυαίς. [Alford says: "It is the ψυχή which carries the personality of the man; which is between the πνεῦμα drawing it upwards and the σάρξ drawing it downwards; and is saved or lost, passes into life or death, according to the choice between these two. And the λόγος ἐμψυρος, working through the πνεῦμα and by the Divine πνεῦμα, is a spiritual agency, able to save the ψυχή."—M.] It is able (cf. Rom. i. 16, δύναμις θεοῦ), but you are unable, incompetent for the carrying out of your Judaistic plans of salvation. [Calvin: "Magnificum celestis doctrinæ encomium, quod certam ex ea salutem consequimur. Est autem additum, ut sermonem illum instat thesauri incomparabilis et expetere et amare et magnificare discamus. Est ergo acris ad castigandam nostram ignaviam stimulus, sermonem cui solemus tam negligenter aures præbere, salutis nostræ esse causam. Tametsi non in hunc finem servandi vis sermoni adscribitur quasi aut salus in externo vocis sonitu inclusa foret, aut servandi munus Deo ablatum alio transferretur. Nam de sermone tractat Jacobus qui fide in corda hominum penetravit: et tantum indicat, Deum salutis auctorem evangelio suo eam peragere."—M.]

But you will really appropriate the word by becoming doers of the word and by ceasing to remain hearers only, vv. 22–24.

VER. 22. But become ye doers of the word.—γίνεσθε=be ye (Huther against Wiesinger, Theile and al.) who render=become ye. Huther refers to Matth. vi. 16; x. 16 and other passages. We take it with Wiesinger, of course not in the sense of Semler, as if the word indicated perpetuum successionem horum exercitiorum, but in the sense of a perfect development of their Christian life. This demand on the Jewish Christians and the Jews was the cause of the martyrdom of Simon, the brother of James under the reign of Trajan; it was also the cause of the early martyrdom of James, not long after he wrote this Epistle, and this is just his idea of the deed, the doing and the work, as it here for the first time takes a distinct shape: you must become wholly consistent Christians, if Christianity is to effect your salvation. As the warning against apostasy forms the negative side of his Epistle, so this exhortation to consistency constitutes its positive side. For the word is more clearly defined in vv. 18, 21 as the Gospel. They must become doers of the same in respect of its organic unity: this cannot be done by isolated acts, but only by one general act of practical life. Cf. ch. iv. 11; Rom. ii. 13. The ποιητής, who as such is the real ἀκροατής, is contrasted with the μὲνον ἀκροατής. To the theocracy in its practical direction the ἀκροατής as such is insufficient, while the Greek school understood by ἀκροατής per se a praiseworthy hearer. Cf. Matth. vii. 21; Luke xi. 28; Jno. xiii. 17.

As those who ensnare themselves.—See v. 26; Col. ii. 4; Gal. vi. 3; 1 Jno. i. 8; παρὰ λογισμόν—to reckon beyond the mark, to reason falsely, to use fallacies,—in its practical tendency becomes deceiving, cheating and ensnaring by fallacies. Thus the “hearer only” deceives and ensnares himself. Huther refers παρὰ λογισμόν to γινέσθαι in opposition to Gebser and Schneckenburger who connect it with ἀκροαταί; but the latter are right, because the imaginary merit of hearing is the fallacy whereby they deceive themselves and thus properly ensnare themselves.

VER. 23. For [because] if any is a hearer.—Demonstration of the preceding by means of a simile, which is not, however, a mere figure. Is like to.—The ὅμοιός emphatically repeated.

A man.—There must be some good reason for the recurrence of the specific man (sexual) and not only of man in general. Huther ought not to have despatched as curious the exposition [of Paces—M.] “virī obiter tantum solent specula intueri” [muliebri autem est curiose se ad speculum componere.—M.]. The exposition of the word άνθρωπος is connected with that of κατανοεῖν which according to Rosenmüller, Pott and al. is here used in the secondary sense of hasty observation, but is disputed by Wiesinger and Huther. Now it is correct that in Luke xii. 24, 27; Acts vii. 31, 32; xi. 6, the word denotes attentive contemplation or consideration. Primarily it signifies simply, to observe, perceive, contemplate, understand, and if the expression is opposed, as is the case here, by the more important contemplation παρὰκρίνειν, and we have in narrative form the statement, that the man observed himself, went away and forthwith forgot etc., the reference is only to a somewhat imperfect, momentarily-sufficient self-contemplating, such as before the mirror is rather peculiar to man than to woman. It is moreover to be borne in mind that the ideas “to hear the word,” and “to contemplate oneself in a mirror” do not exactly coincide; it is only in the moment of a knowledge of oneself, of an incipient repentance that the word, which per se however is a mirror throughout, becomes efficient as a mirror. The countenance or πρόσωπον, although it need not denote the whole figure (so Pott and Schneckenburger), is not necessarily confined to the face (so Huther); the addition τῆς γενέσεως renders the word more expressive. Γένεσις denotes according to Wiesinger and Huther only the sphere of sensuous perception as distinguished from the ethical sphere, the face, such as a man has by natural birth. That is, James is again made to remind his readers that he only refers to a figure. We consider such an interposed explanation of the figure here also not only superfluous but inappropriate to symbolical diction. For what is the real meaning of τροχὸς τῆς γενέσεως ch. iii. 6? According to Wiesinger, to be sure, “the wheel revolving from a man’s birth;” but that would be an unintelligible expression and the exposition of Grotius and al. “curvus natura” has more in its favour. For life is also a genesis in a higher degree, and the fluctuating πρόσωπον is just the signature of the stages and states through which this genesis runs. This would also enable us to fix the reference of αὐτοῦ here to γένεσις (Huther), as opposed to its reference to the general idea (Wiesinger).

The Jews, as Jewish-Christians, for a while attained self-knowledge, in that they saw [knew, recognized—M.] themselves in the mirror of the Gospel according to their national and individual course of development, and thus they saw also the maculas of this development and appearance, hence the allusion to this circumstance (Wolf) must not be rejected with Huther. In a more general sense, πρόσωπον etc., can neither denote the natural corruption of man per se (Pott), nor the ideal form of the new man (Wiesinger). To stop at the figure itself (with Huther) would be tantamount to making the figure unmeaning. But it simply signifies the image of the inner man’s appearance as to his sinful condition modified now this way, now that way by his actual conduct. On the mirrors of the ancients see the respective article in Winer.

VER. 24. For he observed himself.—The narrative form represents as in v. 11, an incident quickly accomplished in the rapid succession of the fleeting stages of its brief duration. The εὐθέως ἐπελάθετο is the most important point, as Huther remarks, but each separate stage has a meaning of its own. The stage of self-knowledge in the mirror of the word, believing hearing, is followed by speedy departing, the averting of the mind from the objective fullness and depth of the word (not only from what had been heard subjectively, as Huther explains); the departing is attended by the forgetting of the mirror-image, i. e., the loss of self-knowledge conscious of the necessity of salvation which would have impelled the man to the consequence of Christian renovation of life. The loss accruing from such a course, is referred to by James in v. 26, but especially in ch. v. [The Perfect ἀπελήλυθεν standing between the Aorists κατενόησεν and ἐπελάθετο is striking and imports that the departing denotes a permanent neglect and disuse of the mirror.—M.].

The real doer of the word according to his marks of distinction: his being absorbed in the contemplation of the free-making word, his constancy, the blessedness.

VER. 25. But he who became absorbed.—The pure antithesis of the former figure. Huther: “παρὰκρίνας corresponds with κατενόησεν, παρὰμείνας with ἀπελήλυθεν, and οὐκ ἀκροατῆς ἐπιλησμονῆς with ἐπελάθετο.” The Participles have the effect of strengthening the already strong expressions, especially in the Aorist, while taken together they indicate: γενόμενος, that it is only by constancy that a man becomes a real doer of the word. This passage must not be construed as if James wanted to distinguish the doing of the word as something separate from the looking into and abiding in it. The παρὰκρίνας and παρὰμείνας, as such, is ποιητὴς ἔργου γενόμενος. This has an important bearing on the right understanding of the passage and is also very—Pauline. Constant looking into the word of salvation by faith is preeminently the doing which is followed by outward proof. This construction therefore must not be altered by resolving γενόμενος into γίνεται (Pott), or by saying with Wiesinger that right hearing and appropriating leads to doing and (thereby) to the blessedness of doing. Even Huther, who rejects Wiesinger’s exposition, does not strictly adhere to the full energy of the idea, for he says that the doing of the law is the necessary consequence of persevering looking into the same; although prominence must be given to the fact that he characterizes the consequence as necessary.—Παρακίπτειν to stoop aside, to stoop over a thing in order to examine it closely (Luke xxiv. 12; Jno. xx. 5, 11; 1 Pet. i. 12); to sink into it, to be absorbed in its contemplation. Schneckenburger thinks: perhaps ad imaginem speculi humi aut mensæ impositi adaptatum. But this is not the most fitting way to look into a mirror. The remaining, persevering in it, Wiesinger explains as appropriating. But it is just the remaining in the yielding oneself to the object by contemplating it, whereby the appropriating of it is effected. [One of the best illustrations of the force of παρακίπτειν is given by Coleridge, Aids to Reflection, p. 15, note: "It signifies the incurvation or bending of the body in the act of looking down into; as, for instance, in the endeavour to see the reflected image of a star in the water at the bottom of a well. A more happy and forcible word could not have been chosen to express the nature and ultimate object of reflection and to enforce the necessity of it, in order to discover the living fountain and spring-head of the evidence of the Christian faith in the believer himself, and at the same time to point out the seat and region where alone it is to be found. Quantum sumus scimus. That which we find within ourselves, which is more than ourselves, and yet the ground of whatever is good and permanent therein, is the substance and life of all other knowledge."—M.]

Into the completed law.—We translate completed because of the weighty adjective τέλειος, which here again makes prominent the N. T. completion of the O. T. (cf. the τέλειοι and the ἔργον τέλειον v. 4, and the ἀμαρτία ἀποτελεσθείσα, v. 7; the Sermon on the Mount, the πληροῖν Matth. ii., etc.). It is not therefore the lex naturalis (Schultheiss), or in general the λόγος ἀληθείας, inasmuch as it is the means of regeneration and the norm of the new life (Wiesinger, Huther: the norm of the new life), or on the one hand the O. T. law as simply perfect, or on the other the Gospel in a general sense; but it is the Gospel conceived as that completion of the law which transforms the outward, enslaving law into a new principle of life communicating itself to the inner man and absolutely liberating him. And just as the expressions of Paul: the law of the Spirit (Rom. viii. 2), the law of faith (Rom. iii. 27), always contain an oxymoron alluding to the higher unity of the antithesis: law and spirit, etc., so likewise in the expressions of James: the perfect law, the law of liberty, although an imitation of Pauline modes of expression is out of the question (Kern). The law as law made men servants (slaves); in its N. T. completion it makes them free. In the same sense it is also called the νόμος βασιλικός which is fulfilled by love (ch. ii. 8), and again the law of liberty (v. 12). The passages of the Old Testament, which speak of the glory of the law (Deut. xxxiii. 2, 3), or of its sweetness (Ps. xix. 8), denote the prophetic transition from the Sinaitic standpoint to the Evangelical, which was decidedly foretold by the prophets (Jer. xxxi. 33). Those who attribute to James an Ebionite glorification of the law, put him back behind Jeremiah or rather remove him even out of the Old Testament. But James had special reasons for calling the Gospel a law of (liberating) liberty inasmuch as his people were tempted to seek in their O. T. zeal for the law the means of chiliastico-revolutionary liberation (cf. Jno. viii. 32, etc.). The Gospel is moreover a law of liberty in that it asserts, along with the Christian's liberty of faith, the liberty of conscience of those of a different mind and in this form also breaks the fetters of fanaticism.

Not a hearer unto forgetting.—Properly a hearer of forgetfulness (ἐπιλησμονής, ἀπαρ λγ. in the N. T.), stronger than a forgetful hearer. The antithesis κοιτης ἔργου brings out the idea that forgetfulness was, as it were, the object of hearing ("in futuram oblivionem"). The expression "doer of the work" (as follows from the construction as stated above) cannot signify here a work-activity separated from, or only clearly distinguished from faith, but it denotes the perseverance of the life of faith, which owing to its oneness of energy leads of its own accord to a consistent exhibition of corresponding outward deeds.

The same shall be blessed.—See the beatitude v. 12.

In his doing.—(ποιῶν in the N. T. ἀπαρ λγ. occurs only, besides here, in Sir. xix. 20, not in his deed. In the ever diligent (efficient) energy which is the soul of his deeds. Schneckenburger: "ut ipsa actio sit beatitudo."—The striving spiritual life-motion or the doing becomes a festive spiritual life-motion, perfect joy. This factual becoming blessed lies according to circumstances in confession, and Rom. x. 9, 10 exhibits a near affinity with this passage. It is noteworthy that Paul also in that passage was particularly referring to Jewish Christians and that James above all things felt anxious that the Jews should confess Christ and that the Jewish Christians should make full and common cause with their Gentile brethren.

False and true religious service or zeal for religion and the glory of God. vv. 26, 27.

VER. 26. If any man fancieth himself.—Δοκεῖν denotes primarily to suppose with reference to appearance and without any higher ground of certainty (Matth. xxiv. 44; hence 1 Cor. vii. 40, an expression of modesty), hence according to the connection also to imagine erroneously (Matth. vi. 7) or as here to be spiritually conceited, [i. e., the man thinks, fancies that he is religious.—M.]

To be a religious man.—Θρησκός is peculiar to James. The sense of the adjective is clear from Acts xxvi. 5 and Col. ii. 18. James has formed the adjective in a masterly manner: one who plumes himself (seeks his being in) on his pretended serving of God. The word certainly implies the exhibition of a presumed εισέβεια in external acts of religious worship (Huther), not exclusively however in the outward observance of religion, but in the permanent soldier- or knight-service for the glory of God. So the Jews supposed that they were the servants of God among the nations (Rom. ii. 17), so did the Mohammedans and Crusaders at a later period and so the Jesuits suppose now. But at that time the Jewish Christians, conceited of their God-serving, in various ways separated themselves from intercourse with Gentile Christians and in preparing for the Jewish war, the Jews supposed they were making ready for "the glory of God." [There is no one word in English which gives the exact meaning of θρησκός and θρησκεία. The words religious and religion at one time were used in the sense of outward ceremonial worship. An example from Milton and another from the Homilies may prove serviceable. Some of the heathen idolatries Milton characterizes as being — "adorned

With gay religions full of pomp and gold."
Par. Lost. 61.

"Images used for no religion, or superstition rather, we mean of none worshipped, nor in danger to be worshipped of any, may be suffered." Homily against Peril of Idolatry. See Trench, Synonyms of the N. T., p. 233. A propos of this θρησκεία, Coleridge (Aids to Reflection, p. 14) has these beautiful remarks: "The outward service of ancient religion, the rites, ceremonies and ceremonial vestments of the old law, had morality for their substance. They were the letter, of which morality was the spirit: the enigma, of which morality was the meaning. But morality itself is the service and ceremonial (cultus exterior, θρησκεία) of the Christian religion. The scheme of truth and grace that became (ἐκτέλετο) through Jesus Christ, the faith that looks down into the perfect law of liberty, has light for its garment: its very robe is righteousness." — M.]

Not bridling his tongue.—Not exempli causa (Rosenmüller); nor must we with the majority of commentators resolve the Participle into "although," as Huther rightly remarks, adding: "James wants to censure those to whom zeal in talking was a sign of θρησκεία." That is: those who by their fanatical zeal wanted to make good their pretensions of being the true soldiers of God. Χαλινάγειν, an expression found only in profane authors of the later period has been added by James to the fund of N. T. language (cf. Acts. iii. 2).

But deceiving his heart.—Ἀπατῶν καρδίαν αὐτοῦ is not exactly synonymous with παράλογος (εἰσθῆαι τανόν (Huther), but denotes the same act of self-deception in a much higher degree. From the inward self-deceit of the thoughts protrudes false zeal and this has the effect that the zealot completely deceives his heart by false self-excitement (échauffement and bad consequences). The fanatic, by false exaggerations outwardly, at last makes himself inwardly a false and bad character.

His religion (in the sense as defined above, his zeal for the imaginary cause of God) is vain.—The blinding effects of his blinding passion yield no fruit of blessing to himself and others and pass as follies (Quixotisms in a higher style) from history into the judgment.

VER. 27. Religion pure and unprofaned.—The two adjectives are not strictly synonymous (Theile, Huther), nor do they simply denote the contrast of the outward and the inward (Wiesinger and al.). The expression "pure" requires the Christian realization of the symbolical, theocratical purity; the sequel shows that it is to exhibit itself in the pious life of merciful love. The expression "unprofaned" (we supply this rendering in order to give more marked force to its literal meaning; the difference between ἀμίαντος and ἀσπίλος also must be brought out in the translation) requires in the same sense real preservation of purity and purifying. The legal Jew became unclean by natural and pagan uncleannesses, the Christian must keep himself clean and cleanse himself from worldly-mindedness and vain worldly doings. Such a Divine service, therefore, denotes here the true life and work for the glory of God.—

Before the God and Father.—This again lays stress on the Christian conception of God, as in vv. 5, 17 and παρὰ τῷ θεῷ refers not only to the Divine judgment (Huther) but more especially to the attitude of the servant before the face and mouth of the commanding Lord. (Huther rightly observes concerning καὶ πατρὶ "God in virtue of His love can only consider pure that religious service which is the expression of love." [Chrysostom in Catena says: οὐκ εἶπεν ἐὰν νηστεύητε, ὁμοιοὶ ἐστέ τῷ πατρὶ ὑμῶν, οὐδὲν γὰρ τοῦτων παρὰ θεὸν οὐδὲ ἐργάζεται τι τοῦτων ὁ θεός· ἀλλὰ τί; γίνεσθε οὐκτιμονες ὡς ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς· τοῦτο θεοῦ ἔργον· ἐὰν οὖν τοῦτο μὴ ἔχη, τί ἔχεις; ἔλεον θέλω, φησί, καὶ οὐ θυσίαν.— M.]

To be careful of the orphans and widows.—We translate thus because it brings out the antithesis to be careful of worldly affairs, which James has doubtless before his mind's eye, like Peter in his ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, 1 Pet. iv. 15. Although the verb is frequently applied to visiting the distressed (Huther: Matth. xxv. 36, 43; Jer. xxiii. 2 etc.), it has also in this form a wider meaning (Theile: the species pro genere). The wider sense: to be careful of, to care for, to protect one, is directly brought out in Acts. xv. 14; Heb. ii. 6 and elsewhere; Philo calls ἐπίσκεψις providentia. "The ὀρφανοὶ are named first as those in want of help, as in Deut. x. 18; Job xxix. 12, 18 etc." Huther. This Divine service answers to the fatherhood of God; those who engage in it do His work in love and compassion, because He is a Father of the orphans and a Judge (a Protector of the rights of) the widows, Ps. lxxviii. 6 and other passages. Now according to the book of Tobit it was the ideal of a true Israelite to protect the distressed among the captives of his people and Tobit i. 6, 7 we read that it was an integral part of the religious service of Tobit that every third year he gave the tithe to the strangers, the widows and the fatherless. In this manner the Israelite of the New Testament was called upon to help his poor people especially the distressed in their affliction. The state of affliction in its concrete form is most frequently and most touchingly exhibited in the distress of widows and orphans. In this direction we may have to seek the sense of keeping oneself unspotted from the world; and this probably explains the asyndeton of the two sentences (cf. Huther). They are not strictly coördinate, but the second is the reverse or the sequence of the first, its pure antithesis. Hence ἀσπίλον comes emphatically first. Cf. 1 Pet. i. 19; 2 Pet. iii. 14. The expression ought really to be resolved into two ideas, firstly, to keep oneself from the world, secondly to keep oneself unspotted from the world, that is, from the world is connected with the two elements of the sentence: to keep oneself unspotted. The ethical idea of κόσμος is everywhere the personal totality of life converted into the Impersonal, i. e. mankind as to its ungodly bias. The peculiarity of this idea in James comes out more clearly in ch. iv. 4. What heathenism was to the Jew, the antithesis of the holy people, to which it might apostatize by spiritual idolatry, such was to the apostolical mind, the ungodly doing of the world, whether manifested in Judaistic visionariness or in a heathen form. Oecumenius's idea of the δημιόσης καὶ συρρετὸς ὄχλος, ὁ κατὰ τὰς ἐπιθυμίας τῆς ἀπάτης αὐτοῦ φερόμενος was consequently not far from the image of the excited condition of the world, which was floating before the Apostle's imagination; but the Judaistic ὄχλος assumed a prouder and more spiritual shape. This specific reference, of course does not exclude the more general. [Alford: "The whole earthly creation, separated from God and lying in the sin, which, whether considered as consisting in the men who serve it, or the enticements which it holds out to evil lust (ἐπιθυμία) is to Christians a source of continual defilement."—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The purity of the moral teaching of James also is conclusive from what he says concerning wrath. James is far from holding a quietistic or ascetico-rigoristic view which did approve of all anger absolutely, as unworthy of man or the Christian. He recognizes with Christ (Matth. v. 22; Mark. iii. 5) and Paul (Eph. iv. 26) lawful anger as opposed to unlawful. As in the case of the Master, so also in that of the disciple anger should be the extreme point of the flame, with which love strikes. But although anger is permitted up to a certain degree, it is nevertheless restricted within fixed limits by the limiting direction βραδὺς εἰς ὀργήν. One has only to look at the deplorable mischief that may be produced by excessive anger in order fully to justify the necessity and wisdom of this precept. Particularly Christian is the triplex officium, which in v. 19 is commanded in so brief and pithy a manner. The exhibition of such a frame of mind affords proof that the regeneration spoken of in v. 18 is a reality. The natural man is the very opposite: he is slow to hear, swift to speak and swift to wrath. It is also note worthy that v. 19 contains properly the text, the exposition and development of which are treated of in the remainder of the Epistle. The exhortation to be swift to hear is expounded from v. 21—ch. ii. 26 with simultaneous reference to a fruitful hearing; the admonition to be slow to speak is emphatically urged in ch. iii. and that to be slow to wrath in ch. iv. and v.

2. Because on the Israelite standpoint no justification before God was possible without the fulfilling of the law, the chief demand of which is love, while wrath is the very expression of the most unbridled selfishness, there are no ideas more decidedly opposed to one another than ὀργή ἀνδρός and δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ.

8. Slowness of hearing was, it would seem, an evil not peculiar to the first readers of this Epistle, but also common to others, and particularly to Jewish Christians. Cf. Heb. v. 11; x. 26. The emphatic urging of the opposite quality is therefore not superfluous. Here also the words of James echo the words of Christ. Luke xi. 28; Matth. vii. 24–27; xiii. 28.

4. Real inward hearing is ever to receive anew the word, implanted and already extant within us as the seed of regeneration, which in an inexhaustible richness of forms is ever brought home to us as a new word of life. What would the preached word avail unless it had hidden points of contact in the hearts and consciences of Christians? cf. 1 Thess. i. 6. The forgetful hearer, whom James describes in vv. 22–24 fully corresponds with the second class of men depicted by our Lord in the parable of the sower (Matth. xiii. 20, 21).

5. James' view of the connection of faith and hearing is identical with that of Paul. Rom. x. 14–17.

6. The representation of the Gospel as the perfect law of liberty is as correct as it is important. Paul, who contrasts generally the law and the Gospel, acknowledges a law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, Rom. viii. 2. This law is perfect because it presents at once the most perfect and most judicious directory of the life of believers; it is the law of liberty because the faithful practice of it leads men to true, moral liberty. Here the saying is fully valid legum servi sumus ut liberi esse possimus. Cf. Jno. viii. 36; Matth. v. 17–20.

7. Care must be had that James be not misunderstood in the description of the pure and unspotted religious service (v. 28), as if these words contained an exact definition of the inner side of true religious service in general. Any onesomewhat philanthropically inclined and at the same time keeping himself outwardly free from worldly contamination is on that account far from being entitled to say that in so doing he is practising the pure and unspotted religious service in the sense of James. In order to prevent any possible misapprehension of his language we have to notice that he refers not indefinitely to the Divine service, but to a pure and unspotted service (θρησκεία without the Article) and states merely in a general way what is above all things essential to the being and efficacy of a practical religiousness in its outward manifestation. "As if one addicted to drink were to boast of his morality and were to be told in reply that a moral man does not get drunk, it would not be the latter's purpose to represent thereby the sum-total of a Christian conversation." Chrysostom. The great and principal condition is taken for granted, viz.: repentance and faith; besides, this exhortation is also addressed to Christians already regenerate, v. 18. James insists upon the duty we owe to our neighbour, who is here represented by widows and orphans as those most in want of help, and upon the duties we owe to ourselves by the practice of self-denial and vigilance. These two points reveal at the same time the true disposition toward God. Besides James does not say that the man who applies himself to the discharge of these duties shall be blessed by this his doing but that he shall have even here a taste of bliss in this his doing (ἐν τῇ ποιήσει) so that this doing as such is to him the highest bliss. v. Gerlach: "In this doing of the law he will feel himself truly blessed, as he must be esteemed blessed. To fulfil the commandments of God, to progress in holiness, is an ever-growing enjoyment of blessedness, granted more and more to the believer and the faithful already here on earth."

8. Widows and orphans so highly favoured even by the Mosaic law (Ex. xxii. 22-24 and elsewhere), are also emphatically protected by Christian morality. The difference between the philanthropy of the Church and that of a mere humanism.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Christians are called constantly to adopt the prayer of David, Ps. cxli. 3.—It is impossible that the bitter root of wrath can produce the sweet fruit of righteousness.—Difference between holy and unholy anger.—Ira furor brevis.—The causes and excuses of the frequent dullness of hearing.—The development of spiritual life ever conditioned by the use of the means of grace.—The preaching of the Gospel a constant watering of the seed of regeneration already planted in us.—What we have to lay aside and what we have to bring with us in order to serve God in public (i.e. make a public profession of religion).—Many hearers put rigorous demands on the preacher but hardly any on themselves; it ought to be the reverse.—True meekness in the hearing of the word.—The Gospel a power of God unto salvation etc. Rom. i. 16.—The self-deception of the hearer of the word who becomes not a doer, cf. Prov. xvi. 25; 1 Cor. iii. 18.—Three classes of men: 1, those who neither hear nor do the word; 2, those who hear it but do it not; 3, those who both hear and do it.—Even Herod heard John the Baptist gladly and for his sake did many things, but not the one thing needful, Mark vi. 20.—The word of God a bright mirror which must be attentively looked into, would we attain true self-knowledge. The true hearer of the Gospel looks as carefully into the mirror as do the angels into the plan of salvation, 1 Pet. i. 12.—The Gospel 1, a law; 2, a perfect law; 3, a perfect law of liberty.—The blessedness of the doer of the word, Ps. cxix. 1 etc.—The absolute incompatibility of the service of sins of the tongue with a truly religious life.—The Christian life a service of love.—Only that Divine service is the true, which is a Divine service before "God and the Father," 1 Sam. xvi. 7.—The practice of the duties of love must be joined with conscientious watchfulness of ourselves.—The Christian's relation to the world: 1, to its distressed ones; 2, to its temptations.—The fruit of righteousness is a tree of life, Prov. xi. 30.—How eloquently James has recommended his instruction concerning active fear of God by his own example.—(vv. 19-27). A direction for and ecology of the right hearing of the Gospel. James urges us 1, to devout hearing (vv. 19, 20), 2, to meek receiving (v. 21), 3, to active practice (vv. 22-24), and 4, to constant searching of the word (vv. 25-27).—(vv. 25-27) 1, What one enjoys (v. 25), 2, avoids (v. 26), and 3, practises in the way of active piety.—True Christianity the most practical matter in the world.

STARKE:—Believers are more eager to learn than to teach, for the cause of regeneration makes us real hearers of the word. Jno. viii. 47.

LUTHER:—Blessed is the man whose mouth is in his heart and whose heart is not in his mouth; the one is wisdom, the other folly.

STARKE:—He who along with other sins does not overcome his carnal anger, cannot enter into the Kingdom of God, Gal. v. 20, 21.—Sins are also in believers, who must more and more cleanse themselves from them, Heb. xii. 1.

QUESNEL:—He only loves the word of God in truth, who performs it by love, 1 Jno. v. 3.

LANGH OF:—To deceive others is bad, to deceive oneself worse, and the latter is more common than the first, Prov. xxiv. 8.

STARKE:—The word of God is here compared with a mirror not only on account of its intrinsic brightness and purity, but chiefly because of its use and benefit. For it not only shows us (according to the law) the detestable and sinful form of our souls which we derive from the first Adam and wherein alas, we resemble Satan, but it shows us also (according to the Gospel) the beautiful, glorious and lovely form which we may receive from Christ, the second Adam, and His Spirit by means of the new birth and wherein we resemble Him.

QUESNEL:—He that doeth not what he heareth, forgetteth more than he heareth and his latter end will be worse than the beginning, 2 Pet. ii. 20, 22.—Blessed is the man who receives his own testimony against himself. 1 Cor. xi. 31.

STARKE:—Fear not, believers, if you hear the Gospel called a law and that it enters as much and more into hearts of poor sinners with lightning and thunder than the old law of Sinai; for it is a law of liberty. Such a liberty which is more valuable than all treasures, more pleasant than life itself and more precious than all the goods of the world; none know what it is worth but those who have lost it and those who have it, although they esteem it most highly, yet do they not esteem it according to its value, Gal. v. 1-13.—Whoso truly serves God in the spirit, his tongue also is governed by the Spirit of God, Ps. xxxix. 2.—Many whose mouth is full of the praise of the truth and who are proud of their Divine service are their own worst deceivers and seducers, Rom. ii. 23.—Many a service is well-pleasing to God which is despised and even rejected by men, Acts xxiv. 14.

CRAMER:—Widows and orphans are privileged individuals before God.—He that keeps himself unspotted before the world, does the will of God and is greatly blessed, 2 Cor. vi. 17, 18.

Vv. 16-21. Epistle for the 4th Sunday after Easter (Cantate).

LUTHER:—Because the Epistle of James ch. i. has been read from of old on this Sunday, being also good for instruction and exhortation, we will also retain it for those who would have it continued and say something concerning it, lest it be thought we wanted to reject it, although the Epistle has not been written by an Apostle nor does set forth everywhere the manner and stamp of apostolical teaching nor quite conformable to pure doctrine. Therefore James concludes.

"Let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath." That is: be taught, admonished by God's word, reprov'd and comforted, be swift in these things; but be not fluent in speech, in murmuring, cursing and railing against God and man. Hereby he does not forbid us all speaking, reproving and being angry, if the commandment of God or necessity require us so to do, but that we for ourselves shall not rashly and vehemently engage in it, although we be irritated thereto—and the rather hearken to and suffer us to be taught by the word; which is the true and real word, which we should ever let govern and lead us, and from which should flow whatsoever we say, blame and rebuke. Hence it is said soon afterwards to receive the word with meekness, that we may not be angry if it reprove us, or murmur if we have to suffer somewhat for it.

HEUBNER:—Talkativeness the mark of a weak mind.—The word of God the best bridle for the government of the tongue and the affections.—Never act while thou art angry.—(vv. 18–21.) The Christian's belief in the presiding control of an all-good God. 1. Nature and reason, 2. Effects of this belief.—Self-deceit in the service of God.

POBUSZKY:—Of ungodly anger. 1. What is anger? 2. What does anger? 3. How is anger conquered?

COUARD:—Contemplations on the precious gift of the Gospel.

KAPFF:—Whereto we are impelled by the absolute perfection of God.

PALMER:—Good works: 1, their inward origin (vv. 16–18), 2, their outward form (vv. 19–21).

SOUCHON:—Receive the word daily.

STANDT:—What we may expect from God: 1, what He gives (vv. 16–18), 2, what He removes (vv. 19–21).

VON HARLESS:—Who walks in the right way to the end of life?

ARNDT:—The sins of the tongue.

HERBERGER:—Like as a wagon runs in two ruts, like as a man stands on two legs unless he be a cripple, like as he consists of two parts, body and soul, so Christianity also runs in two parts, in faith and works. 1. God the good gives good gifts, 2, and expects good to be returned to Him.

LISCO:—The fountain and the vessel of all good gifts.—Spring's threefold address to us the children of God.—The holiness of God in its incompatibility with human sin.

FUCHS:—The word of truth as the perfect gift of God.

Vv. 22–27. Epistle for 5th Sunday after Easter (Rogate).

HEUBNER:—Other laws bind and are often burdensome to us: the law of God delivers us from the bands of sin.—Those, otherwise free from gross sins, yet sin with the tongue.—Selfishness turns even religion into an instrument of self-sufficiency.—All religion must be moral.—We should take to the necessitous not only our gifts but ourselves.—Comparison of the true and false religious service as to 1, their nature, 2, their influence and 3, their relation to God.—Caution against the abuse of the doctrine of justifying faith.

POBUSZKY:—Be doers of the word and not hearers only!—Our Divine service is a surrender to God.

LÖHKE:—There is no doer but is also a true hearer. First a hearer, then a doer; true hearers, true doers.

LANGE:—If the word seizes not thyself, it will be a burden to thy head.

STIER: v. 27.—He refers less to the work itself than to the disposition and impulse of heart which impels us to the distressed in their affliction. Hence he says nothing of our feeding, clothing and providing for widows and orphans, but he specifies our visiting them in their affliction, protecting them, assisting them and carrying to them the best of our possessions, true consolation. We understand, it is to be hoped, how much this requires, how the duty of love drives us constantly into the world and among men, and how it is incompatible with pharisaic or pietistic separateness and monkish solitariness.—How the hearing of the word is to become saving work.

VON KAPFF:—Who is blessed in his doing?

FLOREY:—How differently Christians use the mirror of the Divine Word!

SCHMID:—The apothegm of wisdom concerning self-vigilance: 1. Mirror aright and see thyself; 2. See aright and know thyself; 3. Know (thyself) aright and think thee small; 4. Who thinks him (self) small is wise in all.

HERBERGER:—The keeping of God's word makes it ours unto salvation.

COUARD:—Caution against self-deceit in Christianity.

SOUCHON:—Be doers of the word.

WESTERMAIER:—The same.

J. SAURIN:—An excellent sermon on v. 25, entitled: Sur la manière d'étudier la Religion, Sermon. Tom. iv. p. 1–48.

LISCO:—Of true religion.—Be doers of the word and not hearers only. 1. When we shall be it? and 2. Whereby it is seen that we are it.—Of the nature of true religion.

LEDDERHOSE:—The right hearing of the word.

NEILING:—Ye shall be not only hearers of the word, but doers also [in a rhyme which hardly deserves reproduction.—M.].

V. THIRD ADMONITION WITH REFERENCE TO THE THIRD FORM OF TEMPTATION. EBIONITE CONDUCT.

CAUTION AGAINST JUDAISTIC PARTIALITY, AGAINST FAVOURING THE RICH (THE JUDAIZING CHRISTIAN) AND DEPRECIATING THE POOR (THE GENTILE CHRISTIAN) IN THEIR CHURCH-LIFE. CONSISTENT PROOF OF FAITH DEMANDED IN THE WORK OF CHRISTIAN BROTHERLY LOVE AND IN THE ACKNOWLEDGING OF UNITY OF FAITH IN THE FAITH-WORK OF ABRAHAM THE PATRIARCH AND IN THE FAITH-WORK OF RAHAB, THE GENTILE HARLOT. DEAD AND LIVING FAITH.

CHAPTER II.

My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with 2 respect of persons. For if there come unto your assembly<sup>1</sup> a man with a gold ring,<sup>2</sup>
 3 in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment: And ye have<sup>3</sup> respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him,<sup>4</sup> Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here<sup>5</sup> under my footstool:
 4 'Are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts?
 5 Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world,<sup>6</sup> rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom<sup>7</sup> which he hath promised to them that love him?
 6 But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you<sup>8</sup> before
 7 the judgment seats? Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye 8 are called? If ye fulfil the royal law according to the Scripture, Thou shalt love thy 9 neighbour as thyself, ye do well: But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin,
 10 and are convinced of the law as transgressors. For whosoever shall<sup>10</sup> keep the whole 11 law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. For he that said, Do not commit adultery,<sup>11</sup> said also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, 12 thou art become a transgressor of the law. So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall 13 be judged by the law of liberty. For he shall have judgment without mercy,<sup>13</sup> that 14 hath shewed no mercy; and<sup>15</sup> mercy rejoiceth against judgment. What doth it profit,<sup>14</sup> my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? can 15 faith save him? <sup>15</sup>If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute<sup>16</sup> of daily food, 16 And one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what 17 doth it profit? Even so faith,<sup>17</sup> if it hath not works, is dead, being alone.
 18 Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without<sup>18</sup>
 19 thy<sup>19</sup> works, and I will shew thee<sup>20</sup> my faith by my<sup>21</sup> works. Thou believest<sup>22</sup> that 20 there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble. But wilt 21 thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?<sup>23</sup> Was not Abraham our 22 father justified by works, when he offered Isaac his son upon the altar? Seest thou 23 how faith wrought with<sup>24</sup> his works, and by works was faith made perfect? And the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto 24 him for righteousness: and he was called the Friend of God. Ye see then<sup>25</sup> how that 25 by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. Likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers,<sup>26</sup> and had sent them 26 out another way? For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without<sup>27</sup> works is dead also.

Verse 1. Lange: My brethren, do not practise the faith in our Lord Jesus, the Christ of glory [the Messiah in His glory exalted above Judaistic expectations] with respectings of persons [personal considerations, partialities.]

Verse 2. 1 [ . . . . . hold not ye the faith . . . . [the Lord] of glory in respecting of persons.—M ] εἰς τὴν. A. G. K., Tischendorf; omit τὴν B. C. Sin. al. Lachmann [Alford—M.], an important variation, showing that the reference is not to particular synagogues.

[ χρυσοδακτύλιος—golden-ringed.—M.]

Lange: For if there had entered into your common assembly (συναγωγῆς) a man with a gold finger-ring, in a clean splendid garment, but there had also entered a poor man in an unclean garment.
 [For if there come into your place of assembly a man with golden rings, etc.—M.]

Verse 3. εἰς βαλίσκην δὲ. B. C. K., Tischendorf [Alford], is more expressive than καὶ εἰς βαλίσκην A. G. Lachmann.

- <sup>4</sup> The omission of  $\alpha\upsilon\tau\tilde{\omega}$  A. B. C. Sinait. keeps the expression more general and gives it more dogmatical colouring [than its insertion, Rec. K. L. Vulg. and al.—M.]
- <sup>5</sup>  $\delta\delta\epsilon$  inserted in C.<sup>22</sup> G. K., is omitted by A. B. C.—The addition of  $\tau\tilde{\omega}\nu\ \pi\epsilon\delta\tilde{\omega}\nu$  in A. Vulg. [Syr.—M]. Lachmann, seems to be exegetical and intensive, but may have been dropped owing to a moderation in expression.
- Lange: And ye were looking upon [made a looking up, a demonstration of] him who wore the clean splendid garment and should say [to him] (thou), sit thou here on the best place, but should say to the poor, [thou] keep standing here [on the standing place], or sit [here] under [down at] my footstool.
- Verse 4. <sup>6</sup>  $\kappa\alpha\iota$  omitted before  $\sigma\iota$  by A. B. C. Sinait. may have been objected to in the apodosis as a striking form.
- Lange: Did ye not then separate [divide] among ourselves, and become judges according to evil considerations?
- <sup>7</sup> Did ye not distinguish [invidiously] among ourselves etc.—M.]
- Verse 5. <sup>7</sup> Rec. reads  $\tau\tilde{\omega}\nu\ \kappa\acute{\omicron}\sigma\mu\omicron\nu\ \tau\tilde{\omega}\upsilon\tau\tilde{\omega}\nu$ ; [A.<sup>22</sup> C.<sup>22</sup> K. L.  $\tau\tilde{\omega}\nu\ \kappa\acute{\omicron}\sigma\mu\omicron\nu$ —M.];  $\tau\tilde{\omega}\nu\ \kappa\acute{\omicron}\sigma\mu\omicron\nu$  A.\* B. C.\* Sin. etc. The variations seem to be exegetical illustrations.
- <sup>8</sup> For  $\beta\alpha\sigma\iota\lambda\epsilon\iota\alpha\varsigma$  [A. and] Sin.; read  $\epsilon\omega\gamma\gamma\epsilon\lambda\iota\alpha\varsigma$ .
- Lange: . . . hath not God also chosen the poor [according to the world], who are rich in faith, heirs of the [glorified Messiah—] kingdom . . .
- Verse 6. <sup>9</sup> For  $\upsilon\mu\tilde{\omega}\nu$  A. Sinait. read  $\upsilon\mu\epsilon\varsigma$ —M.]
- Lange: . . . [But] is it not the rich who oppress you? Is it not just they, who drag you to the courts of judgment?
- [Is it not they that drag you into courts of justice?—M.]
- Verse 7. Lange: Is it not just they who blaspheme that fair [glorious] name, which hath been made to you a surname?
- [ . . . that glorious name, which was invoked over you?—M.]
- Verse 8. Lange: If indeed ye fulfil [complete under the New Testament] the royal law [the law of the kingdom] according to the Scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye act beautifully [conformable to the beautiful name of Christ as Christians].
- [If however, ye fulfil etc.—M.]
- Verse 9. Lange: But if ye practise respect of persons, ye practise sin, convicted by the [very] law as transgressors.
- [But if ye respect persons, ye work sin, being convicted by the law as transgressors.—M.]
- Verse 10. <sup>10</sup>  $\tau\eta\eta\sigma\eta$  and  $\pi\alpha\tau\iota\sigma\eta$ , the most authentic readings. So [A. B. C. Sinait.—M.] Lachmann, Tischendorf.
- Lange: For whosoever should observe . . . in one thing [commandment] the same hath become guilty of all.
- [For whosoever shall have kept etc.—M.]
- Verse 11. <sup>11</sup> A. B. C. Sin. have the Present  $\mu\omicron\kappa\chi\upsilon\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ ,  $\phi\omicron\nu\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ .
- Verse 12. [ . . . as those about to be judged by the law of liberty.—M.]
- Verse 13. <sup>12</sup>  $\delta\alpha\upsilon\lambda\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$  not  $\delta\alpha\upsilon\lambda\epsilon\omega\varsigma$ , is the true reading. So A. B. C. [K. Alford—M.] Lach., Tisch. On the form, itself and variations of spelling it see Huther.
- <sup>13</sup>  $\kappa\alpha\iota$  before  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\kappa\upsilon\chi\epsilon\iota$ , found only in minuscule codd;  $\delta\delta$  after  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\kappa\upsilon\chi\epsilon\iota$ , is probably also a stylistic insertion; the variations  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\kappa\upsilon\chi\epsilon\sigma\theta\omega$  in A. [Vulg.— $\chi\alpha\sigma\theta\epsilon$  C.<sup>22</sup> M.];  $\chi\alpha\upsilon\epsilon$  are exegetical efforts to render the text more easy.— $\delta\lambda\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$  instead of  $\delta\lambda\epsilon\omicron\nu$  supported by A. B. Tischend. [Alford.—M.]
- Lange: For the judgment is merciless to him who did not practise mercy, and mercy boasteth [triumphantly] against the judgment [thus Christian mercy triumphantly excels the judging legalistic spirit of Judaism.]
- [For the judgment [will be] merciless to him who wrought not mercy. Mercy boasteth [triumphantly] over judgment.—M.]
- Verse 14. <sup>14</sup>  $\tau\tilde{\iota}\ \tau\tilde{\omega}\ \delta\phi\epsilon\lambda\omicron\varsigma$ , Tischend. following the majority of Codd. Lachmann:  $\tau\tilde{\iota}\ \delta\phi\epsilon\lambda\omicron\varsigma$ . So also in v. 16.
- Lange: . . . [what profit doth it bring] if any man were to say that he hath faith, but were to have no works. Faith [in such a case] surely cannot save him?
- [ . . . can his faith [ $\tilde{\eta}\ \pi\iota\sigma\tau\iota\varsigma$ ] save him?—M.]
- Verse 15. <sup>15</sup>  $\delta\delta$  the most authentic reading; omit  $\delta\delta$  B. Sinait.—M.]
- Lange: But if a brother or sister were naked and bare and destitute of daily food.
- Verse 16. <sup>16</sup>  $\delta\sigma\omicron\nu$  after  $\lambda\epsilon\iota\pi\epsilon\delta\mu\epsilon\nu\omicron\iota$  in A. G. Lachmann, is unimportant as to sense. Sin. [B. C. K. Syr. Tischend. Alford.—M.] omit it.
- Lange: And one of you should say to them: Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled, but ye were not to give to them those things which are needful to the body, what would that profit?
- [And some one from among you say to them . . . but ye give them not the necessities of the body, what is the profit?—M.]
- Verse 17. <sup>17</sup>  $\epsilon\chi\eta\ \epsilon\pi\gamma\alpha$  [A. B. C. K. Tischend. Alf.—M.], is the most authentic and most emphatic reading.
- Lange: So also faith, if it has not works, is dead for itself.
- [So also faith, if it have not works, is dead in itself ( $\kappa\alpha\theta'\ \epsilon\alpha\upsilon\tau\tilde{\eta}\nu$ —M.)]
- Verse 18. <sup>18</sup>  $\chi\omega\pi\iota\varsigma$  A. B. C. Sin. Lachmann, Tischend. [ $\epsilon\kappa$  Rec. K. L.—M.]
- <sup>19</sup>  $\sigma\omicron\nu$  after  $\epsilon\pi\gamma\omega\nu$  omitted by A. B. [Tischend. Alford.—M.]
- <sup>20</sup>  $\mu\omicron\nu$  after  $\epsilon\pi\gamma\omega\nu$  wanting in Vulg. Syr. B. C. It seems to have originated in the parallelism of this sentence with the one preceding it according to its rejected readings.
- <sup>21</sup> B. C. omit  $\mu\omicron\nu$  after  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\iota\nu$  [A. K. L. insert it.—M.]
- Lange: But some one will say [to a man of such faith]: thou hast faith and I have works: show me thy faith without the works [how canst thou do it?], and I will show thee my faith out of [by] the works.
- [Nay, some one will say . . . show me thy faith without [apart from] the works, and I will show thee my faith by [out of  $\epsilon\kappa$ ] my works.—M.]
- Verse 19. <sup>22</sup> Different readings, Rec. with G.  $\theta\epsilon\delta\epsilon\varsigma\ \epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \epsilon\sigma\tau\iota$ ; A. Sinait. Lachmann,  $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\nu\ \delta\ \theta\epsilon\delta\epsilon\varsigma$ ; B. Tischend. [Alford]:  $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \delta\ \theta\epsilon\delta\epsilon\varsigma\ \epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\nu$ . The strongest emphasis of A is also the most probable.
- Lange: Thou believest [the article of the law and of doctrine] that God is one: that thou doest well therein; the evil spirits [the demons] also believe that and shudder.
- Verse 20. <sup>23</sup>  $\pi\epsilon\kappa\pi\acute{\alpha}$  A. C.<sup>22</sup> G. K. [Rec. Vulg. Copt.—M.], opposed by  $\epsilon\pi\gamma\eta$  in B. C.\* etc.: the latter more probable (Lachm. and Tischend. support it) because the former seems to have been occasioned by v. 17.
- Lange: But wilt thou know it, O empty man! that faith without works is useless [inefficient]? [ . . . that faith without [apart from] the works is useless [bootless. Alford]?—M.]
- Verse 21. Lange: . . . justified [proved righteous] by works [out of works] when he offered Isaac, his son, on the altar of sacrifice [Gen. xxii.].
- [ . . . When he offered Isaac, his son, on the altar.—M.]
- Verse 22. <sup>24</sup>  $\sigma\upsilon\nu\epsilon\pi\gamma\epsilon\iota$  A. Sinait.—M.]
- Lange: Thou seest that his faith was energetically joined with his works [was manifested as one with his works] and that faith was completed by works [out of works].
- [Thou seest that faith was working together with his works and that by [ $\epsilon\kappa$ ] works faith was made complete.]
- Verse 23. Lange: And thus also was fulfilled . . . righteousness [in justification proper Gen. xv. 6.]
- Verse 24. <sup>25</sup>  $\tau\omicron\iota\upsilon\nu$  wanting in A. B. C. Sin. [Tisch. Alf.—M.] etc.
- Lange: Ye see [therefore] that by [out of] works man is justified [proved righteous as man] etc.
- Verse 25. <sup>26</sup>  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\sigma\kappa\acute{\omicron}\delta\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ , C. G. seems to be taken from Heb. xi. 31.
- Lange: . . . and sent them forth by another way.
- Verse 26. <sup>27</sup>  $\chi\omega\pi\iota\varsigma\ \epsilon\pi\gamma\omega\nu$ , B. Sinait.—M.]
- Lange: For as the body without spirit etc.

§ 1. CHAPTER II. 1-18.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

ANALYSIS: Caution against partiality in the Christian Church-life, that is against the Ebionitizing preference of the Jewish Christian and putting back of the Gentile Christian, in connection with the demand of the proof of faith in the exhibition of brotherly love.—Leading points: Reference to the abolition of respect of persons by the Christ of glory.—Ebionite conduct in a parable, vv. 1-4.—Reference to the faith of the poor (in a symbolical sense) as well as to the unbelief of the rich (cf. Matth. xxii. 1-10), vv. 5-7.—True fidelity of the law or the fulfilling of the whole law in the royal commandment of love, as well as the damnable transgression of the whole law in sinning against this commandment, vv. 8-13.—The true life of faith or faith evinced by the mercy of brotherly love and dead faith illustrated by heartless demeanour, vv. 14-17.—The proof of faith by the works of faith or the believer's justification before the consciousness of the Church; vv. 18, 19.—The two examples of the proof of faith by works as a general example of the unity of the living faith of Jews and Gentiles, vv. 20-26.

V. 1. My brethren, do not practise.—The Apostle does not, as is generally supposed, pass from the doctrine of charity to a particular example of charity. If this were so, the example would be ill-chosen, for respect of persons does not violate primarily the duty of charity but the law of justice and equality. He rather passes on to a new form of the temptation.

This clause is not (as Schneckenburger and Kern take it) interrogative, not because the fact in question is beyond all doubt (Huther), for the interrogative form would express this more definitely (is it not so that ye, etc.), but because the form of a warning exhortation makes it imperative. The interrogative construction is inadmissible not only because of the analogy in ch. i. 16 but also on account of the parable which shows the form of the temptation to which they were exposed.

Do not practise:—ἔχειν denotes not only, "do not hold your faith as if it were shut up in προσωποληψίας" (Huther); still less, "do not detain your faith" (κατέχετε Grotius), but still stronger "do not hold, cherish it in this form." The faith of fanaticism is not only allied with particularisms but the particularisms constitute its very glory. The Plural προσωποληψίαι points to the ever returning and diversified occurrences of this kind.

The faith in our Lord Jesus, the Christ.—Different constructions: 1. The faith in our Lord of glory, Jesus Christ (de Wette, Wiesinger, and al.; reference to 1 Cor. ii. 8). This construction is inadmissible on account of the position of τῆς δόξης. 2. δόξα taken in a different sense from its ordinary signification=opinion (Calvin: the knowledge of Christ obscured by the respect paid to wealth). Wholly inadmissible, because this mode of expression would be most remarkable and because the faith of Christ itself could not be thus disfigured. 3. τοῦ κυρίου etc. Genitive of the subject: the faith, derived from our Lord Jesus Christ, on the glory (Huther). 4. Bengel: τῆς δόξης is in apposition to Christ ut ipse Christus dicatur ἡ δόξα. Gloria. Luke ii. 32; Eph. i. 17 etc. Christ, the glory not sufficiently developed, although the idea that Christ is the Schechinah would otherwise be quite suitable. 5. Laurentius unites δόξης with Χριστοῦ, Christus gloriæ, but Huther objects that this construction would require the Article before Χριστοῦ. This would however occasion an error as if a twofold Christ were conceivable. In German however we have to emphasize the Article, as far as it is in τῆς δόξης. The sense is plain: faith in the Christ of glory is incompatible with estimating persons according to carnal respects. See the analogous idea 2 Cor. v. 16 and Eph. ii. 16, 17. Christ in virtue of His exaltation has also acquired the κυριότης of the unbelieving Jews. See Matth. xxvi. 64; Rom. ix. 5. [But on the whole it seems best, because it is the least forced construction, to govern τῆς δόξης by κυρίου, see 1 Cor. ii. 8.—M.]

V. 2. For if there had entered; γάρ gives the reason not of the whole exhortation as such, but of the reference (connected with it) to the glory of Christ, which Luther has made prominent in his free translation; Do not suppose that faith in Jesus Christ, our Lord of glory, suffers respect of persons. The construction which makes the antecedent extend to the end of v. 4 and then makes the consequent begin (Michaelis, Herder etc.) has been justly set aside by Huther; v. 4 is the consequent. The reference of the following exhortation to misconduct in worship has led to the opinion that James is primarily addressing the Church-wardens (Grotius etc.). We have already shown that this view over against the grand prophetic-symbolical expression of the Apostle is inadequate. The misconduct to which James refers is so general and important as to preclude the literal acceptance of what follows. In the first place it cannot be assumed that such a grievance as that of assigning bad places to the poor had spread throughout the entire Jewish Christian dispersion and in the second, it is even more improbable that James should have received reliable information concerning a disorder so universally prevalent. The ἔάν also and the Aorist indicate a relation which has become historical and is still in course of development.

Into your common-assembly.—Schneckenburger and al. interpret the Jewish synagogue, Huther, the place of the Christian assembly, de Wette, with reference to Heb. x. 25, the religious assembly. But the Article indicates that the one synagogue of the entire Jewish Christian dispersion is meant, that is their religious community symbolically described by the name of the Jewish place of worship. The symbol is the more appropriate in that it characterizes the family-bias to union in Judaism. The reference to civil judicial assemblies, which Herder and al. find here, is altogether unfounded. We have endeavoured to bring out in the translation the uniting element of Christianity.

If there had entered a man.—The Aorist not only aids the imagination by its picturesque force but indicates the historical fact that believers with Judaistic pretensions had already entered the Church.

With a gold finger-ring.—The character of the parables delineating and censuring on the one hand the factious conduct of the Jewish Christians towards the Judaizers proper and on the other towards the Gentile Christians, comes out in the most decided manner. According to Wiesinger and Huther our text gives only an example instar omnium for the representation of that sinful προσωποληψία, while many older commentators see in it only a figure of the preference of the rich to the poor, and these are the common views. These views give only rise to the question whether the rich and the poor are to be considered members of the Christian commonwealth (Knapp, Theile, de Wette), or unbelievers or hospites (Pott, Kern, Schneckenburger). Wiesinger, in support of the former view, alleges that the Epistle being addressed to Christian readers, the oppressive disparities between rich and poor should be taken as introcongregational (ch. iv. 1; vv. 18—15; v. 1); Huther, in support of the latter, that the rich are distinguished from the brethren etc.; Weiss (Deutsche Zeitschrift für Christliche Wissenschaft, 1854, No. 51) makes the rich a non-Christian, the poor a Christian. Schwegler is altogether wrong in making the rich the Gentile Christian and the poor the Jew, for it would follow from this that the Jewish Christians did exhibit partiality towards the Gentile Christians. But he is on the right track in that he sees in the Epistle a reflection of the circumstances of the time. Now we hold that the rich here and throughout the Epistle is not less symbolical than the rich in the Gospel (Matth. xix. 24 etc.) and just so the poor. But the attributes of the rich indicate whereof he is proud. He is in the first place a χρυσοδακτύλιος (the word ἀπαξ λεγ.). That rings with the ancients, especially among the Jews (as a signet-ring) were highly esteemed is evident from Gen. xli. 42; Esther iii. 10; viii. 2; Luke xv. 22. Received as a gift it denotes the prerogative of representing the donor; in the parable of the prodigal doubtless the restoration to the filial state. But the man with the gold ring cannot be any other than the Judaist priding himself in and boasting of his covenant-right and sonship (which to the humble was indeed a veritable gold-ring see Rom. ix. 1), as a χρυσοδακτύλιος, a gold-finger-ring-wearer by profession. He is further described by wearing a splendid garment (λαμπρός) which according to Rev. xv. 6 involves in particular the idea of purity and connected therewith denotes the Jewish pretensions to purity and holiness or glory. In like manner the garment of the poor, that is, of the Gentile Christian, is not stained in the ordinary sense but from a religious point of view, as is proved by the ὑπαρξός Zech. iii. 8, 4. In Rev. xii. 11 also it denotes the opposite of the Holy in a symbolical sense. According to the Jewish conception of purity the Gentile Christians had entered the Church in such a garment; but that James notwithstanding accords to them the wedding-garment is evident from v. 25. Raphaelius on

VER. 3. And ye were looking upon.—Ἐπιβλέπεν is emphatic (Pott). Upon the ὁ φορών τὴν ἐσθῆτα, also very significant, he who wears that and carries himself in wearing it. Instead of experiencing disgust at the spectacle of vanity, which manifestly looks out of that proud dress, they suffer themselves to be deceived by that glitter, which in their estimate should have been valueless, and to be awed by the haughty claims to it. This rich man is first looked at, contemplated in astonishment, then complimented, he also stands first; meanwhile the eye is averted from the poor man, who is furthermore despatched in a hurry. "The difference of speech to the one and to the other strongly marks the contrast; they are first distinguished by σὺ—σὺ, then κάθου and στήθι, ὦδε and ἐκεῖ, καλῶς and ἐπὶ τὸ ἰκκῶν μου are opposites" (Huther). The addition "or sit thou here, etc.," as allowing him to be seated, is intended to modify the hardness of the word "keep standing there," but becomes a further humiliation, "sit here under my footstool." This means certainly "down at my footstool," but the expression involves contempt; as it were under one's feet. Not on the footstool. The Judaist either wanted to acknowledge the Gentile Christian merely as hospes in the Church, or to concede to him at most an inferior right of communion. As the reading ἐκί [for ἰκκῶ B*—M.] indicates a tendency to soften the harshness of the expression, a similar tendency may have omitted τῶν ποδῶν before μου.

VER. 4. Did ye not then separate among yourselves.—The comments on this passage are wide apart. Some plead οὐ as a declaration, others as a question. 1. Those who take it declaratorily: then, partly ye would not have distinguished (according to sound judgment) among yourselves, partly ye would have judged after an evil manner of thinking (Grashof); or, "then ye are not any longer distinguished among yourselves, i. e., godly and ungodly" (Oeder); or, "then ye have not rightly judged among yourselves" (Oecumenius, Bengel); or, "then ye have not yet judged yourselves" (Heisen); "not yourselves but your garments" (Cajetan). But the construction is decidedly in favour of the interrogative form, particularly the hypothetical form and the brevity of the consequent. Hence 2, interrogatively: a. διακρινεσθαι—to doubt in the sense of having scruples concerning a thing. "Ye had no scruples, etc.?" (Theile). b. to doubt in the literal sense: "have ye not become doubters in your faith? or similarly (de Wette, Wiesinger, Huther); c. the verb—to judge: do ye then not judge among yourselves?" (Augusti); or the Verb passive: "Do ye not condemn yourselves?" (Paræus). d. to make difference; did ye not make differences (in a bad sense) among yourselves?" (Grotius, Knapp and al.). This interpretation passes into e. to separate, to divide in a Passive or Middle sense. But the Middle sense lies nearest: do ye not separate, divide yourselves in or among yourselves? (Semler, Gebser, Schneckenburger). We hold with Schneckenburger that the beginning of dissension in the Church primarily takes rise in the minds of those factious Christians. They are also at schism in themselves, which schism although it begins with doubting (ch. i. 6) means more than doubting, as is the case in our time with those confessional zealots [confessional=pertaining to a confession, used in German almost as the synonyme of denomination—M.], who suspend the communion of the Lord's Supper with other Evangelicals while they are willing otherwise to hold fraternal intercourse with them. Creating dissensions reacts on the zealots themselves so that they become divided in themselves. Wiesinger and Huther allege in favour of their exposition that διακρίνεσθαι in the New Testament constantly signifies to doubt, which it does in many passages. But the Middle of our verb occurs in our sense in Jude 5, 22 and the transition from the Active (Acts xv. 9) to the Middle lay quite near. καὶ intensifies the question. We have endeavoured in our translation to bring out the paronomasia of κρίται and διακρίθητε [In German: zerschieden and Schiedsrichter.—M.]. From the evil schism in the heart springs evil judging in the life. Richter: after (according to) evil considerations (motives), not the evil, etc. That is, according to the motives of national preferences, claims and prejudices, outward position, etc.

Reference to the faith of the poor in a symbolical sense as well as to the faith of the sick vv. 5-7.

VER. 5. Listen, my beloved brethren.—The painful earnestness of the Apostle's mind in view of the dangerous symptoms he had described may be seen in his animated exhortation, his lively address (see ch. i. 16) and his questions.

Did not God choose the poor?—Cf. 1 Cor. xii. 28. Huther: "poor to the world" [Germ. für the world.—M.]. Wiesinger: "poor as regards the world." In the latter sense reference may be made to the analogous ἐν πτωχείᾳ Matth. v. 8. But that condition of poverty as to the Spirit, simultaneously expresses a longing for the Spirit. But such an element would be out of place here, hence the sense "to the world" is more appropriate. These persons whom you call poor, because they are Gentile Christians, are rather poor to the world according to their relation to the world; but to you they ought to be rich, seeing they are rich in faith. The fact that the Ebonites afterwards called themselves poor as regards this world, presents no obstacle to this exposition. Their usus loquendi was doubtless rather formed after the pattern of James than vice versa, just as the Gnostics did probably borrow many of their expressions from Paul, not Paul from them. [But the sense "poor as regards the world" is after all at least as good as that given by Lange; it is general, and there is no reason why even Lange's interpretation may not be included in it: the Dative of reference here simply shows that these persons were poor with reference to the world objectively or subjectively or both.—M.].

Rich in faith.—Not rich in the possession of much faith [nicht reich an Glauben. GERM.—M.], but they are rich in virtue of their faith. Still the stress lies not only on the general being rich, the result of the general condition of believing, but also on the particular measure of their being rich as contrasted with the false being rich of the Judaists. Who are rich in faith. Huther: Πλουτοῦντες ἐν πίστει not in apposition with τοῖς πτωχοῖς (Erasmus, Baumgarten, etc.), but the complement of ἐξελέξατο, stating whereto God did choose the poor (Beza, Wolf, Wiesinger, etc.). But taking James' choosing as exactly synonymous with Paul's we consider to be not proven. Here the word evidently signifies rather calling, with reference to ethical good behaviour to the Divine revelation. That is: "the decree (more definitely the election) of God is here viewed (indicated) in respect of temporal manifestation." Wiesinger. Still an essential element of the idea of election is held fast. The nearer definition of the election lies in καὶ κληρονομοῦντες sc. εἶναι. That is: Did not God choose these poor according to the world (from among the Gentiles) who prove themselves rich in faith, that they also may be heirs of the kingdom? Cf. Acts xv. 14, etc.; Eph. ii.—It is to be borne in mind that only the poor to the world were also the "rich" among the Jews. But this characteristic was not enough here, while the correction "poor to the world, rich in faith" was sufficiently definite. James therefore here utters the same idea, on which Paul laid peculiar stress as the characteristic of his evangelization, Eph. iii. 8-8, etc.—κληρονομοῦντες here, points not to the kingdom as future (so Huther), but as καὶ κληρονομοῦντες to the joint participation in the true υἰοθεσία of the Jews.—

Heirs of the kingdom.—It is the kingdom of God, the real theocracy completed in the New Testament, progressing towards eschatological completion, not the latter only, as Huther maintains. James separates from this kingdom whatever is particularly Jewish, describing it as the kingdom, that peculiar kingdom which God has prepared for those who love Him. The common construction gives a proposition not limited like 1 Cor. i. 26-28, and not sufficiently proven by Matth. xix. 23, 26; viz.: "chosen the poor in this sense that those whom God did choose belong to this category, while those belonging to the category of the rich have not been chosen." (Huther). It is impracticable to take the one expression literally, the other figuratively.

VER. 6. But ye dishonoured the poor (man).—ἀντιθέσις denotes the antithesis of θεός, ἡμιμάκαρ the antithesis of ἐξελέξατο, as Huther rightly observes. Still the Aorist is used, not only because reference is made to vv. 2 and 8, and because the case is general, but its historical force points to a historical fact, in which Judaizing Jewish Christians have already taken part with the Jews, viz.: the dishonouring of the Gentile Christians.

But is it not the rich?—These rich, who use violence towards themselves, i. e. the Christians, (of. the expressions Matth. xx. 25). The reference here is not any more to the rich in general than before to the poor (both according to Huther). The populace took as much part in the persecution of the Christians as the nobility, the former indeed were conspicuous in it. Nevertheless it was with the Judaists who fancied themselves theocratically rich, that the impulses to the persecution of the Christians did then still originate. So e. g. the first persecution of the Apostles, the execution of Stephen. καὶ αὐτοί, it is just they. All sympathizing of Christian ultras with Judaistic Jews contained the germ of want of self-respect, as is the case nowadays with all sympathizing of the evangelical ultras with the ultramontanists and that of pietistic ultras with the confessionalists. Is it not just they who excommunicate you? one might ask in the latter cases.

VER. 7. Is it not just they who blaspheme that fair name?—Favouring those rich ones would involve not only want of self-respect but even a participation in the guilt of their blasphemous conduct in respect of the fair name. This blaspheming cannot be taken figuratively as if it did denote insult heaped on that fair name by the evil works of the Christian rich men themselves, as Huther rightly observes in refutation of the views of several commentators (also of Wiesinger, whose citations, e. g. Jer. lii. 6: ὁ θεὸς τὸ ὄνομα μου βλασφημεῖται and similar ones, do not prove that βλασφημεῖν has the direct meaning "to dishonour"), nor can the reference be (according to Hensler) to the Christian name, for that is just the transfer of that name to them; the name of the poor is altogether out of the question. It is only the name of Christ to which reference is made, whether believers were already called χριστιανοί (which was the case, in part at least, Acts xi. 26), or not. The name of Christ was transferred to them as a surname denoting at once their peculiarity and to whom they belonged. [They were Christ's χριστοῦ, 1 Cor. iii. 23.—M.]. The expression is formed after the Hebrew model שם נקרא על (Deut.

xxviii. 10; 2 Chron. vii. 14; cf. Is. iv. 1; Gen. xlviii. 16 and Acts xv. 14, 17). In virtue of the fact that once the name of Jehovah was called over Israel, Israel was described the people of Jehovah; in like manner Christians are now the Christian people (the people of Christ—M.) in virtue of the name of Christ. His name is called fair, in opposition to the insulting blaspheming; it is the fair, the glorious name κατ' ἐξοχὴν; the name of the Lord of Glory (ch. ii. 1), in which is all salvation (Acts iv. 1; Phil. ii. 10, Wiesinger). The Christian rich men could not any more be reproached with the sin of blaspheming the name of Christ (βλασφημεῖν always denotes abusive language, Huther), than the non-Christian rich men in general (the names even of Pilate, Gallio, Agrippa, Festus and al. may here be called to mind); the reproach fitted solely, if the Judaists were the rich in a figurative sense; to them it was wholly applicable.

True fidelity of the law or the fulfilling of the whole law in the royal commandment of love, as well as the damnable transgression of the whole law in sinning against this commandment, vv. 8-18.

VER. 8. If, indeed, ye fulfil the royal law.—The connection, by the introduction of μέντοι, is difficult, but only, if doubts remain as to what precedes. James had just now reproved his readers for being partial to Judaists, proud of the law and fancying themselves rich, i. e. because they themselves were not free from legal oneness. The progress of the thought fully accords therewith: "The whole consistency of true fidelity to the law, to be sure, ye ought to exhibit, according to the commandment, thou shalt love, etc.; but your partiality is a breach of the law." According to Huther and many others (Calvin, Theile etc.) James wants to meet the excuse of his readers that their respect of the rich was the outgoing of love; but surely no Jew could have thought of representing προσωποληψία as love. Although in this case μέντοι is rendered certainly (indeed, German freilich) the sense is different: igitur (Schneckenburger) and yet (de Wette) are also set aside by our explanation. [Whichever particle be chosen, μέντοι is clearly adversative.—M.].

The royal law.—The law denotes here not a single commandment (as Huther maintains with reference to Jer. xxxi. 88, Heb. viii. 10; x. 16), for the commandment cited immediately afterwards embraces the whole law as completed in the New Testament. It is royal not only because it is supreme and the most excellent (so Wiesinger with reference to Philo, Plato and also Theile, Schneckenburger and al.). Although Christ, placing Himself on the Jewish stand-point calls it first and great, immediately afterwards He describes it as all-embracing and principal (Matt. xxii. 39), and this New Testament conception of it is found also in Paul, Rom. xiii. 8-10; Gal. v. 14. Now if this principal [i. e. original, initial, elementary—M.] nature of the law and this its oneness, Mark xii. 32, are inferred from the Oneness of God, the Giver of the Law, the explanation that it is called royal because it proceeds from God its Author, is not so far-fetched (Raphelius, Wetstein and al.), as Wiesinger supposes, who says that this is true in respect of the whole law; but this objection lacks point, inasmuch as the cited commandment is really the whole law; but it leads to the exposition that the "royal commandment is the commandment of Christ" (Grotius). Its applying to kings as well as to other men (Michaelis) its being a via regia (Calvin), are explanations which do not reach the fundamental idea; its making kings (Thomas) is less remote; but it is probably called here the law royal and the law of the kingdom, because of the authority of rich men and the contrast between rich and poor must completely vanish before the authority of the king. Before Christ, the Lord of Glory, who has comprehended all laws in this one law, the rich are low and the poor rich (ch. ii. 1; i. 9 etc.) Negatively, the law completed in the New Testament is a principle of perfect liberty (Acts i. 35), Positively it is a royal principle exacting perfect obedience to the Lord. Hence we have here once more the word τελεῖν conformably to the previously repeated allusions to the New Testament τέλος. [But why not take νόμον βασιλικόν in its plain and obvious sense, the law royal, "the law which is the king of all laws" (Alford)]? This rendering (with reference to Rom. xiii. 10) suits the context well.—M.]—κατὰ τὴν γραφὴν refers not only to τελεῖτε but to the whole sentence νόμον βασιλικόν τελεῖτε for the νόμος Ex. xx. in its higher royal form is already traced beforehand, Lev. xix. 18, while that discursive form of the law is referred to the ministration of angels (Gal. iii. 19).

Ye do well. (German: "ye act beautifully,") —That is: conformably to the beautiful name, which those men blaspheme. Christianly beautiful, answering to the spiritual beauty or the glory of the name of Christ. Huther's remark that here something is to be conceded, not without irony, to the opponents, lies outside of the context.

VER. 9. But if ye respect persons.—προσωποληψίαν is ἀπαξ λεγ., and admirably chosen by James to denote Judaizing Christianity. By such conduct they suppose to avoid sin, but he tells them: by this very thing ye are working sin (ἐργάζεσθαι is stronger than ποιεῖν, Matth. vii. 23, etc.).

Convicted by the law.—The reference here is certainly to the specific prohibition of prosopolepsy [respect of persons—M.] Deut. xvi. 19 and similar interdictions (Huther denies it), inasmuch as it formulates the commandment of love literally and at the same time in the light of it acquires a more general sense; that is, the law of love in its oneness, as applied to the question under notice, runs into an express prohibition of prosopolepsy. The very law therefore on which the Judaist plumes himself, convicts him as a transgressor. The choice of the word καρτέω has here, as in Rom. ii. 25, and like καρτέω ch. v. 14, a peculiar emphasis; the Judaistic-Ebionite transgression of the law as completed in the New Testament is, as it were, a second fall. Cf. Gal. ii. 18.

VER. 10. For whosoever shall have kept the whole law.—Hypothetical case, put so as to apply at once to the Jewish stand-point in its full consequence and to the Christian, without being ambiguous, because the full consequence of Judaism leads to Christianity. The uniform solidarity of the law is also acknowledged by the Jews; hence Rabbi Jonathan says; "quod si faciat omnia, unum vero omittit, omnium est singulorum reus." ἐν τῷ is to be taken agreeably to the preceding. Not the one definite commandment of love (Oecumenius, Semler), which embraces the whole but any one point of the law. Since νόμος is rarely used to denote the Mosaic commandments one might feel inclined to take ἐν as a neuter (with Schneckenburger and Kern), but since the following πάντων, according to Huther and al., renders the construction difficult, it is better to assume James entering into the Jewish mode of view which he potentiates in saying that every separate ἐντολή has also the full force of a νόμος. Wiesinger says that James takes the most favourable case in order to make his statement as convincing as possible. But James is hardly willing to yield this most favourable case to the reader. The point to be made is the demonstration of the absolute inviolability of the law. The πᾶν may be understood as well of a slight offence as of a gross offence, the declaration holding good in either case; but the context seems to require the latter construction which is also favoured by the preposition ἐν. Whosoever offends in one point so as to fall, is preeminently a transgressor of all laws, i. e., he is an apostate. This sense follows more clearly from the sequel. Such an one is ἐνοχος, i. e., held fast in guilt [Germ. arrested—M.] for satisfaction by the suffering of punishment. Each separate law becomes as it were a judge who arrests him.

VER. 11. For He who said.—The unity of all commandments lies primarily in the unity of the Lawgiver, Mark xii. 32. This implies of course the One Spirit of all commandments according to which all commandments are included in each separate commandment and the one sense: the requirement of love and the one recompense.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.—Different explanations have been given of the selection of these two commandments. Baumgarten: Because their transgression was punished with death; Wiesinger: because the readers are nowhere charged with μοιχεύειν (see for the contrary ch. iv.), whereas μη φονεύεις has the commandment of love as its kernel, because these are the first duties under the law of love to one's neighbour. However we have here once more to call attention to the symbolical character of this Epistle. To the Israelite the prohibition of adultery was at once the prohibition of religious apostasy to heathenism (which probably accounts for the transpositions Mark x. 19, etc. of which Huther makes mention), and the prohibition of murder at once that of lovelessness [coined from the German Lieblosigkeit, for want of a current English equivalent—M.] towards our neighbour. The sense therefore is probably as follows: the same God to whose commandment you appeal in your fear of intermingling with heathenism, has prohibited murder, of which you may become guilty by your hatred of men. We have no doubt that also 1 Jno. iii. 15 refers primarily to Ebionite conduct towards Christian fellowship (ch. ii. 19). The connection of the words with Matth. v. 17-19 is clear.

VER. 12. So speak ye and so do ye.—Application drawn from what has gone before, but not a new section (Semler). Huther wants to connect οὕτως with what follows, not with what has gone before. But the double οὕτως as well as the anteposition of λαλεῖτε refer strongly to what has gone before. The readers of the Epistle are charged not only after the manner of laymen to judge according to the anti-judaistic conception of the law, which had been laid down, but also to assert it in their respective spheres as witnesses of the truth (see, ch. iii). Thus they were first to speak and to testify but then of course also to act accordingly.

As those about to be judged by the law of liberty.—This is not the explication but the reason of the preceding exhortation. The question comes up why here again James calls the New Testament the law of liberty as in ch. i. 25 and not, as above, the royal law? The law of liberty is the New Testament principle of the new life in the Gospel of Christ, which frees us from the restraint of the law. Conscious that according to their faithful or unfaithful conduct with reference to this law they are to be judged, true Jewish Christians and Israelites must cheerfully testify against Judaism and its legalism and exhibit Christian fellowship. It is true that this νόμος, as such, admits least a non-observance of this or that commandment (Huther), but this is hardly the reason why it is called νόμος ἐλευθερίας.

VER. 13. For the judgment is [will be] merciless.—Unmerciful is inadequate. Cf. Matth. v. 6; ch. xviii. 23; xxv. 85. The saying is primarily true objectively. The judgment will be rigidly enforced according to the love displayed in our life by mercy shown to the poor, the suffering and the despised. But the saying holds also good subjectively. A hard, merciless man reacts by his conduct upon his own consciousness; he makes himself a hard self-tormentor, who cannot but see the judgment in all his experience and a merciless judicial decree in all judgment.

Merely boasteth over judgment.—The asyndeton intensifies the antithesis. Since κατακαυχᾶσθαι with the Genitive denotes boasting oneself against or over (see Rom. xi. 8; Jas. iii. 14), ἐλεος must not be completed by θεοῦ (so Calvin, Bengel and al.), nor interpreted as the triumphant exaltation with which mercy by its assurance of grace confounds (puts to shame) the terrors of the judgment (so Wiesinger), or transforms them into signs of redemption, as says our Lord (Luke xxi. 38); but it rather signifies the triumphant assurance with which the evangelizing mercy of believers, especially that of a James, a Peter or a Paul or the Gentile world excelled the judging spirit of the Judaists, the cheerful Gospel excelled the gloomy Talmud, the Church of the world the synagogue of the Jewish quarter and the evangelical confession the inquisition of the Middle Ages, to say nothing of the triumph of Christian philanthropy over modern particularism.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Against the genuineness of the Epistle of James there is probably not raised an objection apparently more just than that the person of Christ is less prominent in it than in other Epistles and that the author occupies a comparatively lower Christological standpoint than the most famous Apostles. It certainly does not contain the richly developed Christology which characterizes the writings of Paul and John. The Christology of James in general is on a level with that of his brother Jude and not essentially different from that of the synoptical Gospels. The mind of James is rather practical and ethical than dogmatical and speculative. Even in respect of insight into the nature of Christ there was among Apostolic authors doubtless a diversity of gifts, cf. 1 Cor. xii. 7. It is also very probable that James in his wisdom as a teacher deemed it more judicious to refer the readers whom he addressed, more to the moral precepts of the Gospel than chiefly to the Person of the Redeemer. On this account the comparatively few passages in which he speaks of Him with decision, as e. g. in ch. ii. 1, deserve the greater attention. On the sense of the remarkable expression τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τῆς δόξης see under Exegetical and Critical. This single passage proves conclusively how far James was from conceiving Christ (as some maintain) according to the old-Ebionite manner to have been a ψιλλὸς ἀνθρώπος. Describing himself as the servant (bondman) of Jesus Christ (ch. i. 1) shows unmistakably how far he places the Master above himself, and describing Him as κύριος τῆς δόξης, he not only attributes to Him a royal rank but, indirectly at least, a higher Divine nature far exalted above all creatures. Cf. Ps. cx. 1; Heb. i.

18. Nor must we overlook his mentioning the Lord Jesus Christ at the very beginning of his Epistle in immediate connection with God Himself, and his constant reference to God as the Father shows not indistinctly that in doing so he had before his mind's eye the high and holy relation of God the Father to the Son. Of equal importance in estimating the Christology of James is the circumstance of his unequivocally calling Christ the Lord, that is transferring to Him the Old Testament name of God with which he was familiar from his earliest childhood; ch. v. 7, 8. Such an appellation was only possible on the conviction that He, who in the Old Testament is universally called Jehovah (Jahve), has revealed Himself in the New Testament as God (the Father) and as Christ. Cf. Wiesinger's Commentary on James, p. 65, and Dörner's Entwicklungsgeschichte der Christologie, 2d ed., I, p. 95.

2. We should wholly misunderstand James' reproof of the sin of respect of persons, were we to infer from it that he was aiming at the establishment of a perfect equality in daily life or even in the assemblies of the Church. God Himself sanctions difference of rank and station, Prov. xxii. 2; Matth. xxvi. 11. But it is contrary to the will of God, if men overstep the line of demarcation which He in wisdom has drawn, turn it into an impassable gulf and with the existing difference overlook the higher unity. The arrangement therefore, which especially in former times was so frequently prevalent in many evangelical churches, of assigning splendid seats of honour to the distinguished and of putting back the poor as much as possible, would surely be contrary to the spirit of James. It is one thing to recognize a Divinely appointed difference, but it is another to make arbitrary distinction in the public worship of God.

3. James also teaches the doctrine of God's eternal election of grace irrespective of wealth or poverty or any outward prerogatives whatsoever. Although it is true that poverty per se is no recommendation and wealth per se presents no insuperable obstacle (cf. Matth. xix. 25, 26; Jno. xix. 38, 39), it is on the other hand not less indubitable (and also a real compensation for so many things of which the poor are deprived in this world), that comparatively by far the greatest number of those who are rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom are found among the poor.

4. The idea of Christian Church-life involves among other things the non-existence of lawsuits among believers, or at least the settling of their differences among themselves. Cf. 1 Cor. vi. 1-4. The readers of the Epistle of James appear however to have been far from realizing this ideal, and as a rule it was just the rich who in this respect most oppressed their poor brethren. This is therefore an additional reason for not showing them any greater honour than that to which they were legitimately entitled.

5. David was held guilty of having caused the enemies of God to blaspheme in consequence of his sin with Bathsheba and Uriah, 2 Sam. xii. 14. Equally guilty are in James' eyes those who by their oppressive conduct cause the goodly name of the Lord to be blasphemed to the Church, the name which in Baptism was invoked over His people. This is again an indirect proof that he ascribes to the Lord Jesus Christ a really Divine dignity.—

6. "The giving of the law on Mount Sinai took place mainly by the Son of God, who as the Angel of the Lord had led the children of Israel through the wilderness and is on that account called by the prophets King of Israel (Jer. xxiii. 5, 6; Numb. xxiv. 17; Jer. xxx. 21; Jno. i. 49; Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 16), and King of all kings; hence the words royal law refer particularly to Christ, who in His sayings and sermons did so strongly inculcate the duty of love (Matth. xxii. 38, 39; Jno. xv. 12, 17; 1 Jno. ii. 5; iv. 20, 21). To love oneself, that is in a well-ordered manner, is nothing else than taking care of one's temporal, spiritual and eternal welfare, so that one's spiritual welfare may also promote one's temporal prosperity. This is done, if we are truly the servants of God, believe on Him and love Him. Now where this love of oneself is well-ordered, it is also a rule of a well-ordered love of one's neighbour; see Matth. vii. 12." Starke.

7. "A single sin against the commandment of God (though he have kept all others) condemns the sinner and burdens him with the curse. If it is presumptuous and intentional, it deprives him of spiritual life, destroys faith, etc., as in the case of David by adultery, in that of Peter by denial and in that of Adam by eating the forbidden fruit. If it is committed through infirmity and haste, sin as sin carries within itself the venom of damnableness, although preserving grace and forgiveness prevent its execution. The law is, as it were, a garment, which is torn altogether, although you only take away a piece thereof; it is like harmony in music which is wholly spoiled if only one voice is out of tune." Starke.

8. "If a man transgress only one commandment and, if it were possible, should keep all the other commandments of the law, he would still be guilty of the whole law, because he has offended the same God who gave the whole law and insists upon its being kept not according to one commandment only, but wholly according to all its parts; whence every man may abundantly know that there is not any single sin so trifling and bad as not to be liable to damnation, since also the most trivial offence against the law is a transgression of the whole law. But God forgiving the penitent even the grossest offences in their justification, is done for Christ's sake, just as in the case of the converted their daily sins of infirmity, although damnable in themselves, for Christ's sake are not imputed unto damnation." Starke.

9. The moral life of the Church of Christ was at all times exposed to the peril of two opposite rocks; moral rigorism on the one hand and antinomian latitudinarianism on the other. The doctrine of James (vv. 10-12) concerning the indivisible unity of the Divine Law is admirably adapted powerfully to counteract both maladies. In no event does he favour ascetical rigorism which only too frequently degenerates into soul-killing formalism. The law for which he is zealous, is a law of liberty in the loftiest acceptance of the term, yea the entire antithesis of authority and liberty is converted on his standpoint into a higher unity. The Divine law by no means opposes the Christian as heteronomy, but if he has received it through faith and love into his inmost consciousness, it becomes to him daily more and more an autonomy [heteronomy literally another law, then, living according to another law; autonomy literally one's own law, then, living according to one's own law, self-government.—M.]. But if on the other hand latitudinarianism arrives only too soon at being rigid in some points and yielding and lenient in others, James stands up with inexorable severity and administers the unity of the Divine law as that of an indivisible whole. Even the best Christian involuntarily is easily inclined pharisaically to overrate some commandments and to underrate others (cf. Matth. xxii. 36; xxiii. 23). Many a man, e. g. who would fear and tremble at the thought of murder would little hesitate in bearing false witness against his neighbour. Here comes in the admonition, "Whosoever shall have kept the whole law yet offend in one point, has become guilty of all." It is self-evident that James here does not speak of sins of haste, ignorance or infirmity but of intentional, presumptuous or principled transgressions (transgressing on principle) of one of the commandments. Whosoever has thus become guilty, has disturbed the harmony of the Divine law. Of course not in the sense that a murderer is therefore also a thief, an adulterer or a defamer, but because the transgressor of any one commandment disgraces love, which is the key-note and sum-total of all the commandments. The favourite notion of many people that the province of morals recognizes a greater or a smaller number of adiaphora therefore is here emphatically denied. He who obstinately transgresses one commandment without actually violating the others, omits doing so only because at that instant he does not feel himself incited to a definite act of disobedience. For did he feel it, he would doubtless withdraw himself with equal swiftness from the restraint of any other commandment. But where is then his respect of the Divine law in its totality? Whichever commandment be transgressed, such transgression always reveals selfishness opposing on principle the chief requirement of love.

10. The passage, "Mercy boasteth over (against) judgment" (v. 13) is not any more isolated than that it contradicts the evangelical doctrine of free grace. In the Old Testament also the idea is repeatedly expressed that love and mercy disarm to a certain degree the severity of that Divine judgment. See e. g., Is. i. 17, 18; Dan. iv. 27. John the Baptist described and insisted upon actual exhibitions of love as one of the marks of a repentance by which men might flee from the wrath to come, Luke iii. 8-11. Our Lord described the blessedness of the merciful (Matth. v. 7) and set forth love as the standard in the last judgment, Matth. xxv. 34-40. This is also the spirit in which James thinks and speaks and no further intimation is needed to show that he refers to no other Christian mercy than to that which is the fruit of living faith and genuine renovation of the heart. Not only he, who loved much, may therefore hope for forgiveness but also he who asked for much forgiveness, will now also love much, and may look forward to the judgment with greater calmness because this love of faith supplies to him and to others unequivocal proof that he has passed from death unto life. Cf. 1 Jno. iii. 14.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The glorified Christ, the Lord of the Church, the object of faith. Sincere faith may still be very imperfect. Love and faith are indissolubly united, but love is irreconcilable with partial respectings of persons.—Agreement of the love insisted upon by James and that described by Paul, 1 Cor. xiii.—Rich and poor should appear in the house of prayer at unity among themselves.—Christian liberty, equality and fraternity.—The catchwords of the revolution only caricatures of a Gospel watchword.—The communion of saints is disgraced by lovelessness and party-spirit.—Loveless judging of others ill-becoming to one who will be judged himself.—The prerogatives of the believing poor! 1, They are the elect of God; 2, they are rich in faith; 3, they are heirs of the kingdom of heaven which God has promised to them who love Him.—The Gospel opposed both to mobocracy [German 'Proletariat,' a word always used in a bad sense; this must be my apology for the hybrid mobocracy.—M.] and despotism.—"He that oppresseth the poor, reproacheth his Maker, etc." Prov. xiv. 31.—Poverty evangelically considered.—It is, 1, a great sin, 2, a great shame, 3, a great harm, that the goodly name of Christ, which was invoked over us in Baptism, is dishonoured for our sake; cf. Rom. ii. 28, 24.—Love the foremost requirement made by the royal law of Christianity, Jno. xiii. 34, 35.—The inviolable unity of the Christian code of morality.—"Whosoever shall have kept the whole law, but have offended in one point, etc." This saying 1, is apparently strange 2, but nevertheless perfectly true and therefore 3, calculated to solemnize our minds in the judgment we pass on ourselves and to render us careful in that which we pass on others.—The Christian must not, consider the commandments of the second table to be less holy than those of the first.—We shall be judged by the law of liberty; the meaning, the truth, the solemnity and consolation of this thought.—The connection between faith, love, judgment and acquittal.—The thought of the impending judgment—1, wherein it may alarm the Christian and 2, wherein it may again calm his fears.

On the whole pericope, vv. 1-18.—Of respect of persons. 1. The character it discloses: it manifests itself a. among Christians (v. 1), b. in religious intercourse (vv. 2, 3) and c. it springs from impure foundations (v. 4). 2. The wrong it inflicts: a. on the poor (v. 5), b. on the rich (vv. 6, 7), c. on ourselves (vv. 8, 9). The judgment it deserves; this is a. terrible (v. 10), b. just (vv. 11, 12), c. inevitable (v. 13).—

STARKE:—The Jews had the regulation that if the rich and the poor had a cause before a tribunal, both had either to stand or to be seated.

QUESNEL:—Godliness forbids not the difference of posts of honour but simply disapproves of the rich only being respected and the poor despised, 1 Cor. xi. 22.—Whoso on account of his occupation has outwardly to wear a vile garment, let him so much the more wear the beautiful garment of Christ's righteousness. Is. lxi. 10.

STARKE:—The masses always look more at those who are splendidly attired before the world than at those who are gloriously attired before Christ.

LUTHER:—The rich enjoy greater privileges than others in things temporal, but not in things spiritual, Luke vi. 24.

LANGH OP.:—There are rich in the world who are also rich in God, but there are also poor in the world who are likewise poor in God and these are most miserable for time and for eternity, Gen. xiii. 2.

HEDINGER:—To be a beggar but a true Christian is more than being emperor or king without it.

CRAMER:—Bodily poverty should not hinder but promote one's salvation Luke xvi. 22.—Those who do not honour Christ in His members are not worthy to be honoured themselves, Luke x. 16; 1 Sam. ii. 30.

QUESNEL:—There is nothing greater than the name of Christ, but nothing more to be feared than to bear it unworthily.

STARKE:—The royal law of love makes all to be kings, who are however the subjects of the King of kings, 1 Pet. ii. 9; Rev. xviii. 6.

CRAMER:—By seeming trifles also the law may be transgressed, Numb. xv. 32, etc.

NOVA BIBL. TUB.:—The law exacts perfect obedience.

HEDINGER:—Like as the believer fulfils all the commandments of the law, so the ungodly transgresses all the commandments, 1 Jno. iii. 22.—If any man will allow only one sin to have dominion over him, he cannot receive forgiveness of sins, Ps. xxxii. 2.

STARKE:—It is as culpable to be silent when we ought to speak as to speak when we ought to be silent, Is. lvi. 10.

LUTHER:—The Divine law is the only rule of conduct in whatsoever we do in word or deed, Ps. cxix 9, 16, 22.

QUESNEL:—To be unmerciful, especially towards the innocent and believers, is a sign of men being merely natural and consequently exposed to the wrath of God, Ps. xxxvii. 26.

LUTHER:—The unmerciful will be damned without mercy and the merciful will be saved of mercy, Jer. xv. 6; Hos. i. 6.

LISCO (ver. 1-9):—True faith is remote from all sinful partiality.—(vv. 10-18). Of disobedience to the Divine law.—Christianity aims at equalizing the differences among men.

HUBNER:—All haughtiness is a denial of faith. Unchristian distinguishing between sins.—What a contradiction! to see Christians dishonour the poor whom God honours.—Without esteeming and keeping all the commandments alike the keeping of this or that is worthless in the sight of God.—The assurance which love gives in the judgment.

VON GERLACH:—The Apostle calls Christ the Lord of glory in order to show the nothingness of all human distinctions in His sight.—The law of liberty has freed us from the bondage of sin, from mercenary work-holiness; we should consider therefore what a testimony there will arise against us in the judgment if we make exceptions and do not keep it in voluntary and childlike love.

SILVER:—The Christianity of the rich is more frequently unguine and not proof than that of the poor.—If a father setting out on a journey lays down ten commandments to be observed by his child during his absence, and the child reserves one to be transgressed by him—dares such a child appear before his father and say: Father I have obeyed thee, nine of the ten commandments I have well kept! Every sin, thus reserved and remaining, every continuing transgression of one commandment given by the same God cancels our righteousness before the law, so that all its fair numbers turn into so many ciphers.

NEANDER:—Diversities and inequalities founded on the natural relations and organizations of society were not to be abrogated by Christianity but rendered less burdensome, they were to be equalised by the common bond of love and to become matter for the exercise of that Christian love.

VIEDBANDT:—The devil has well succeeded in a double trick: 1. In making the rich think that faith is the disturber of all enjoyment and pleasure, 2. In convincing the poor that faith brings no help.

[V. 1. Social differences are allowed among Christians, Rom. xiii. 7; but invidious distinctions and partiality in spiritual matters are disallowed and unchristian. In the use of the Sacraments, in prayer and praise, in the hearing of God's Word Christians are on a level. The pew-system is unprimitive and unchristian. The Church is the Lord's house, as its name implies (ἐκκλησία), and in the Lord's house the rich and poor alike ought to be provided with equal accommodation for worship without any invidious, unchristian and worldly reference to their pecuniary ability.—Ecclesiastical preferment of personal friends and relatives, as such, is another form of respectings of persons.—M.]

WORDSWORTH:—Contemplate the Lord of glory (1 Cor. ii. 8), who humbled Himself, and took the poor man's nature, and joined all in Himself, and promises glory to humility (Luke xiv. 11; Jas. iv. 10). This consideration is the groundwork of the Apostle's argument and exhortation. This is the glory which Christ Himself offers to you—not the vain glory of this world, which ye seek by preferring the rich to the poor, and by having men's persons in admiration for the sake of advantage to yourselves (Jude 16).

She has silver wings like the dove, and feathers of gold, and soars aloft, and is clothed with divine glory, and stands by the throne of God; when we are in danger of being condemned, she rises up and pleads for us, and covers us with her defence and enfolds us in her wings. ## § 2. CHAPTER II. 14-26.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The true life of faith or faith evinced by the mercy of brotherly love and dead faith illustrated by heartless demeanour. v. 14-17.

VER. 14. What doth it profit, my brethren, if a man were to say etc.?—James, having illuminated outward legality as lacking the principle of love, now takes it up as outward faith (Gläubigkeit) lacking both love and the energy of practical demonstration (Thatbeweis). The sequel shows what he means by practical demonstration; it is the full communion with believing brethren in love and life. The following section (vv. 14-26) supports his demand by examples from the Old Testament. Here it is to be remembered "that with James πίστις is the necessary ground of σωτηρία, which is evident from ch. i. 18-21, but of course that πίστις which is not without works. In disputing the former delusion, James adopts his characteristic mode of first stating in clear and well-defined language the fundamental thought on which all the rest depends and he does it by the introduction of brief interrogative sentences, which reject that false opinion." Huther.

What doth it profit? The Article makes ὅτελος emphatic; what is the use, what profit does it bring? That is, all the blessing of the theocratic faith, ultimately also in Jesus as the Messiah, is lost if this faith does not lead to vital fruit. That faith itself is then not true; hence: "IF A MAN WERE TO SAY, THAT HE HATH FAITH. λέγει is emphatic, so also Gataker, Stier, de Wette and al. Although de Wette's rendering "IF A MAN PRETENDS," be probably too strong, the assertion of Huther, that the sequel does not give the lie to λέγει, is incorrect. This is certainly done conditionally in v. 18 where it is maintained that the existence of faith cannot be proved without works. Only thus much may be admitted, that James allows the faith which is merely outward and traditional to pass as a kind of faith, on account of its objective truth he cannot call it false, but on account of its subjective untruth he calls it dead and the contrast of dead and living shows that he distinguishes faith from faith. Now the faith which he calls living needs no further complement; it is a unit as to its living energy, while the faith without works, lacks owing to the absence of works the demonstration of energy of life. If we say "the dead body is without the soul," it does not follow that we think also: "The living man consists of body and soul." Schneckenburger with reason sees something significant in the absence of the Article (ἐὰν πίστις). Huther rightly asserts that πίστις does not denote here nuda notitia or professio, because this idea is identical with real faith in the opinion of the speaker; but he is wrong in supposing that πίστις always denotes the same thing in the mind of James. For saying, that πίστις in one is different from πίστις in another, amounts to nothing and it is false to affirm that fiducia cannot be denied even to dead faith. Why then is the subject of this faith uniformly the διψυχος? [The distinction is manifestly between theoretic belief unaccompanied by the practice of good works and vital faith abounding in good works. Faith is the inward, works the outward. Works are the outward sign and pledge, the demonstration of faith within. The man dramatically introduced in the text has faith (v. 19), but his faith is theoretic belief. There seems to be no necessity for making λέγει emphatic.—M.].

But were to have no works—That is, the works specifically belonging to and characteristic of faith. That James particularly refers to the works of brotherly love, is manifest from the sequel.

Faith surely cannot.—The remarkable character of this proposition as contrasted with the doctrine that faith does save is variously gotten over. Some commentators emphasize the article ἡ before πίστις: that faith, such a faith [Bede, "fides illa, quam vos habere dicitis"—M.]. In reply, Wiesinger and Huther observe that the Article is used, because there is a resumption of the previous idea, as ch. i. 8 with reference to ἵππομονή, and ch. i. 15 with reference to ἀμαρτία. But the resumption of the previous idea is sufficient to settle the point that the reference is here to such a faith which has no works. The demonstrative therefore is not contained in ἡ only, but in ἡ πίστις and one might translate, "thus faith surely cannot save him." Huther thinks that αὐτόν is emphatic, "him who thus conducts himself, faith cannot save;" but this would make faith an abstract objectivity. The reference therefore is simply to the faith in question, and the explanations of Theile (false faith), Pott (faith only) and similar ones are exegetical. Huther in his explication of αὐτόν returns to the definition "the faith which has no works," whereas, in order to be consistent, he ought to say, "the man who has no works."

Save him.—σώσαι relates not to the attainment of future salvation, as Huther maintains, but denotes, according to the idea of the New Testament σωτηρία the present, principal salvation of the redemption already experienced and passing through progressive stages of completion to ultimate salvation.

Vers. 15, 16. But if a brother or a sister.—The following example in the opinion of Huther (and Wiesinger) explains the preceding proposition by explaining that compassion also without corresponding works is dead and useless. But the reference to dead love or even to dead compassion would be unheard of. The question in one example also is dead faith, which under certain circumstances hypocritically affects the appearance of love without however evincing the reality of its existence. The absence of the work is just the absence of love or compassion. The brother and the sister are as such fellow-believers (companions of the same faith). And this leads to take these personages also in a symbolical sense. For the duty of relieving the literally needy with food and raiment was already recognized in the Old Testament as a duty of man to man; how much more then under the sense of duty acknowledged in the Christian Church. James doubtless needed not to inculcate this duty on the believing dispersion, and if it was his intention, he could not limit its exercise to Christian brethren. But the case stood differently with regard to the relation of the Jewish Christian to his Gentile-Christian co-religionist or also to the Gentile-Christian Church. That they were not literally poor and naked does not affect the question, for on the one hand they were indebted to the Apostles, who were more merciful than the Judaists, for their spiritual prosperity, and on the other hand they would still appear as very poor to the Judaists; γίνουσι, as those wholly stripped of proper and respectable apparel, after having laid aside their vile raiment (see v. 2; Huther's pressing of γίνουσι yields no gain), and destitute of daily food (the different senses in which ἐφθμερος is construed, amount to the same thing), i. e. destitute of positive familiarity with the word of God according to Judaistic ideas. The Jewish Christians, to be sure, had progressed so far as not to damn the poor believers (even as the Jews already affected friendliness towards the proselytes of the gate); they acknowledged the brotherhood in a general way and perchance would unctuously express that acknowledgment in the words "Go in peace," wished them perhaps also all manner of good in the self-satisfying of their (the poor brethren's) Christian wants, but having gone to that stretch of liberality, would also dismiss them, without having any other dealings with them or entering with them into the communion of devoted care and love (just as nowadays the Confessionalists dismiss the Evangelicals with unctuous sour-sweet words). Be warmed! be filled! These words are surely not uttered optatively in the sense, "May some one else help you" (Hottinger, Grotius and al.), nor imperatively in a liberal sense (Huther), but connected with the valedictory salutation of peace they denote a cant-wish of blessing, "may you succeed in getting warmed etc." The reproach of pauperism is at the same time clothed in hypocritically sparing terms, hence "be ye warmed" not at once "be ye clothed" (Laurentius and al.), but alluding to it and in like manner "be ye filled" in allusion to their hunger.—The one who thus speaks represents the general tendency but points to the unctuous speakers who understand to couch the unsparing dismissal as much as possible in fair and sparing language. Instead of such conduct they were one and altogether to show love to the poor. But our example presupposes the case that they did not even give them necessities.

What would that profit?—See v. 14. Such a benediction (wish-of-blessing) would purely have no value and the acknowledgment of brotherhood on which it is founded would accordingly be equally void, just as the faith on which it is founded. The whole demeanour would be unprofitable egentibus (Hottinger) and dicientibus (Semler); in general to the kingdom of God.

VER. 17. So also faith, if it have not.—If it does not show the life-sign of animating works, which are intrinsically its property.

For itself. [i. e. in itself.—M.]—As it is dead as regards the brethren, so it is dead as regards itself. Kaθ' εαυτήν not pleonastic (Grotius), not "sides sola" (Knapp), but joined with κατά τῶν indicative of being dead or rather of having died, whereby the life of faith and consequently the life of the believer himself is denied. And this being dead is not only the cause of this want of works (Olshausen) but also the consequence of the reaction of that want. It dies ever more and more of not being energizing. See Matth. xviii. 23 etc.

VER. 18. But some one will say.—Different explanations are given for the introduction of an objection by ἀλλ' ἐπεὶ τῆς, although the sense of the passage especially with the reading καρπὸς τῶν ἔργων is abundantly clear. The possession of faith without works may be asserted but not be proved, since the corresponding works constitute the proof of faith, while the faith may be proved by the right works. The works therefore are the exhibition, the evidence of faith. Difficulties have been found. 1. In James' introducing this proposition as the expression of another person and not as his own; 2. in his introducing it by ἀλλ' ἄρα. The second difficulty disappears with the first. James could not well take the place of the objector because it was remote from the mind of his readers to deny the genuineness of his faith; but many among them were inclined to deny it in the case of the Gentile Christians. Hence the sense is as follows: but some one will rise up against this dead faith and with it enter the lists in proving the genuineness of his faith by his works of faith. In this sense the passage has a grand prophetic character. The Gentile Christian world has proved by its works of faith that it had the true faith, but Ebionism with its want of consistency in Christian works of love that its orthodoxism was not a living faith. ἀλλ' ἄρα therefore is here not the formula of a dialectical objection, as in Rom. ix. 19; 1 Cor. xv. 85, but the introduction of an actual historical antithesis. That the speaker's faith (v. 14) is dead is primarily a mystery of an inward state of death, but there will come one who by the exhibition of the contrary will make manifest that death. James makes him express in a definite antithesis what he actually shall do, in order to elucidate the law of life that invisible faith cannot be seen without visible works, while the visible works enable us to see the invisible faith. Wiesinger therefore rightly maintains that the speaker sides with James. On the other hand the artificial explanation of Huther can only be accounted for by the embarrassment he experienced with respect to ἀλλ' ἄρα. "But some might say in answer to what I have just stated, defending himself: thou (who hast not the works) hast faith and I, on the other hand (who affirm that faith without works is dead), have works; my one-sided insisting upon works is not any more right than thy one-sided insisting upon faith." This, in the first place, would be no defence of the speaker (v. 14), and secondly it is nowhere said that the speaker (v. 18) has no faith; he rather wants to prove his faith by his works. Stier even maintains that the ἐργα ἔχων, who has the word, is a man of pharisaic tendencies who in the interest of work-righteousness impugns faith; but this is altogether beside the connection, for there is no reference whatsoever to pharisaic works. On the other wide-differing but otherwise unimportant explanations given of this passage compare Huther especially with reference to those of Pott, Kern, de Wette and Schneckenburger. It is proper to add that Huther himself farther on gives a tolerably correct paraphrase of this passage and is equally right in remarking that with the reading ἐκ τῶν ἔργων in Text. Rec. these words should be taken ironically.

VER. 19. Thou believest that God is one.—The Apostle having shown in what precedes that the existence of faith cannot be proved without works, now proceeds to the proof that faith, even if granted in such a form, has a damnable effect, that is one issuing in fear and terror of God. Huther does not justly state the force of the Apostle's thought in saying that James here shows the inadequateness of faith without works to salvation. For the example of the devils who tremble just in consequence of their manner of believing, not only along with their faith, nor even notwithstanding their faith, is not simply designed to intensify the negation that such a faith is without salvation. The condition of not being saved is connected with the state of being damned. The Apostle does not start with the concession that the objector has faith (Huther), but that his faith is worthless. Huther thinks it strange that James does not name that which is specifically Christian as the object of faith. On this account Calvin supposed that this whole section treats not of Christian faith (de fide) but only de vulgari dei notitia. De Wette holds that δρι characterizes the faith as being merely theoretical, in which Wiesinger agrees with him and to which Huther objects without sufficient reason. Huther and al. consider that this article of faith is simply introduced by way of example and that just this article was selected because it distinguishes revealed religion from heathenism (Deut. vi. 4; Neh. ix. 6 etc.). But this suggests the additional remark that it was selected because the Jewish Christians and the Jews not only were particularly proud of this first article of their faith (Schneckenburger), but also were wont to contrast it with the distinctly Christian dogma of the Triune God and the Son of God.—This discloses moreover the further consideration that it was their pride in this increasingly misunderstood article which kept them back as Jews from fully surrendering to Christ and as Jewish Christians from fully surrendering themselves to the Christian faith. The monarchism of the Jews which was opposed to the incarnation of the Son of God continued in the germinating monarchism of the Jewish Christians. In the judgment of James therefore the fruitlessness or worthlessness of that faith is connected with the fact that in the shape of orthodoxism it obstinately remains at a stand-still on a stage of faith which has been laid aside and that in this respect it is a heterodoxy which may become a heresy and ultimately even a devilish antichristianity. It was just by remaining at a stand-still and by resistance offered to the completed revelation that monotheism originally so rich in vitality became dead deism. In a similar way the Greek article of faith has been established in opposition to Roman Catholic development, and the Roman Catholic article in opposition to evangelical faith.* Where vital development is abhorred (perhorrescitur?) faith becomes false confidence in the abstract article. Wiesinger justly calls attention to the circumstance that this passage shows that this Epistle is far from being Judaizing and anti-Pauline.

Thou doest well.—It is questionable whether we are to take these words ironically (Calvin, Theile, Wiesinger and many others), or literally (Grotius, de Wette and al). They cannot be purely ironical, because the article is truth; they cannot be purely laudatory, because the true article is falsely held; Huther therefore rightly observes that the ironical lies in the whole expression; that is, in the momentary appearance as if James in conceding to the objector to believe in such a manner were there-with also conceding to him the true faith. "This irony" says Wiesinger "rises into sarcasm in the combination of πιστεύοντες καὶ φρίσσοντες." It may be doubted whether this conclusion is formally sarcastic. The sarcasm lies here in the naked fact itself. Formally it only flashes out in the splendid καὶ which connects the greatest seeming contradiction and which Huther rightly does not like to see wiped off (Theile: atque etc.).

The devils.—Although we must not think of demoniacs (Wetstein), nor of the demons in the demoniacs (Schneckenburger) they furnish the most intelligible historical proof of the otherwise more transcendental declaration. Huther thinks that the reference is to the demons or apostate spirits according to the view which makes the heathen deities demons (LXX. Deut. xxxii. 17 etc.; 1 Cor. x. 20). But the Apostle's saying is perfectly intelligible without such reference, which may easily lead here to confusion. For as far as the demons are the occasion of polytheism they impugn the Unity of God but as far as they are conscious that they are lying and that the One God will visit them in judgment, they just appear to acknowledge the pride of Judaism and the defeat of heathenism. Holding fast to this reference we ought to pass on to the thought that heathenism also in its deepest demon-background is not without a monotheistic consciousness, and it is just this which constitutes its misery. To give to this idea a more popular shape it would run thus: the demons which as you hold inhabit and constitute the heathen world, are all monotheists but for that very reason they shudder. But if we emphasize the heathen element, we weaken the marked emphasis of the demon element, and this is the reason why we have doubts concerning said reference. Nor do they shudder only, because they expect the judgment, their judgment is already involved in their relation to God. This shuddering φρίσσειν (ἀπαξ λέγ.) is more than trembling (Job iv. 15), a horror with the hair standing on end.—

The two examples of the proof of faith by works as a general example of the unity of living faith of Jews and Gentiles, v. 20-26.

VER. 20. But wiltest thou to know (it)?—These words denote the certainty with which the Apostle announces the convincing proof of the uselessness of faith without works from the Holy Scriptures, the source of all certainty.—The ὡ before ἀνθρώποις intensifies the censure conveyed in the address, "thou empty (not as Baumgarten has it, simply unwise and shortsighted [stupid], but empty as to faith and spiritual strength) man," and which "as applied to persons occurs only here in the New Testament" (Huther). It is not perchance the fiction of an objector but the personification of a mode of thinking which is introduced as an actor, v. 1 etc. and as a speaker in v. 15. The spiritual emptiness of such a man corresponds to the spiritual emptiness or impotence and unproductiveness of his faith. The reading ἀρχή (advocated by Wiesinger against Huther) certainly deserves the preference also in respect of the sense because the Apostle passes from the idea of dead faith through the idea of unproductive faith to

* If Lange alludes to the filioque in the Nicene Creed it is only proper to remark that the position of the Greek Church is sustained by Oecumenical consent, while the insertion of the filioque in the Nicene Creed has never received the sanction of an Oecumenical Council.—M.

the idea of a faith lacking the specific effect of faith (δικαιοῦσθαι). [Oecumenius: κενὸν ἐκάλεσεν ἄνθρωπον τὸν ψιλῇ τῇ πίστει αὐχύνοντα, μηδὲν τῆς διὰ τῶν ἔργων ὑποστάσεως κεκτημένον εἰς πλήρωσιν.—M.]

VER. 21. Was not Abraham our father.—The first example contrasts the father of faith himself with the false orthodoxy-righteousness of Judaism, just as Paul in Rom. iv. contrasts him with their work-righteousness, or more accurately with their pride in circumcision. Abraham, the highest theocratical authority, which they share with him.

When he offered Isaac, his son.—In explaining this difficult passage we have to start with the preliminary statement that δικαιοῦν

(הִצְדִּיק) Sept. δικαιοῦν, δίκαιον κρῖναι) generally denotes in both Testaments: to pronounce, declare, set one forth as, righteous in any forum of justice or judgment, whether in consequence of proved innocence or surrender at discretion, expiation or pardon; although there are passages in the Old Testament in which the sense to lead to righteousness, to make righteous predominates, Dan. xii. 8; Is. liii. 11. The most important instances of the former kind of declaring righteous are the following passages: Luke vii. 29: ἐδικαίωσαν τὸν θεόν and 1 Tim. iii. 16; ἐδικαίωθη ἐν πνεύματι (cf. Ex. xxiii. 7; Deut. xxv. 1; Prov. xvii. 15; Is. v. 23; Matth. xii. 37; Rom. ii. 13); instances of the latter kind occur in Rom. iv. 6; iii. 26 etc. The comparison of these different passages shows that to the Old Testament with reference to man belongs especially the idea of pronouncing the innocent righteous conformably to his innocence, while to the New Testament belongs that of pronouncing the sinner righteous conformably to his faith. Matth. xii. 37 must be carefully distinguished because the last judgment shall be a judgment of the works of faith. But even the Old Testament knew already the imputation of faith as righteousness, Gen. xv. 16. We may say therefore that James for the benefit of his readers adopts the language of the Old Testament in allotting to true faith the imputation of righteousness by the λογίζεσθαι εἰς δικαιοσύνην, but to the proof of true faith the δικαιοῦσθαι. St. Paul, on the other hand, employs the two terms as identical (Rom. iv. 6 etc.; ch. v. 1), although he is well acquainted with the Old Testament meaning of δικαιοῦσθαι as applied to a human forum or even to the last judgment (see 1 Cor. iv. 4, 5). Huther, after enumerating the different interpretations of this passage (Calvin: proved righteous before men; Baumgarten: his justification has been ratified before men; Grolius: he was loved as a righteous man etc.), adds "he has been declared righteous;" but this is really saying nothing concerning our passage, for the question is, in which sense? The difference in the report is noteworthy. Gen. xv. 6 we read: Abram "believed in the Lord and He counted it to him for righteousness," without any further mention of an outward declaration of God concerning it. Both to him and to the Scripture the thing is sure in virtue of the testimony of the Spirit. Very different is Gen. xxii. 16, where the proof of Abraham's faith is followed by the solemn declaration of the angel from heaven, "By myself have I sworn etc." Has not this declaration become a manifest deposit to the house of Abraham and the theocratic posterity? And that this is a decisive element is also evident from the other proof. So also righteousness was imputed to Rahab, the harlot also, not only in the depth of her heart but along with the proof of her faith. She did also experience a δικαιοῦσθαι in the congregation of God, Josh. vi. 25; Matth. i. 5. The term δικαιοῦν consequently is used by James according to the Old Testament mode of expression in a New Testament deeper sense and denotes that God declares righteous in the theocratical forum before the theocratical congregation conceived as permanent. It is the Divine declaration of the proof of faith in and for the kingdom of God, while the λογίζεσθαι εἰς δικαιοσύνην of James or the δικαιοῦν of Paul describes an act, which transpires solely between God and the sinner in the forum of his consciousness.

Justified by works: ἐξ ἔργων.—Although this Plural is selected with reference to the category in question, yet it must also be remembered that the singular work "when he offered his son" was the culminating point which comprehended all the trials of his faith. Huther justly finds this pronouncing righteous in Gen. xxii. 16; but it was not solely contained in the giving of the promise on the ground of that which he had done; he had previously received less developed promises and moreover in connection with acts of well-doing. It was rather contained in the solemn declaration with which God in consequence of Abraham's proof of his faith now sealed to him His promise with an oath, whereby at the same time a seal was set to the consciousness of Abraham. If the distinction which Holy Scripture draws between the degree of justification and that of sealing, had been better observed, the key to the doctrine of James in its agreement with that of Paul would thereby have also been better preserved (see Jesus Sir. xlv. 20).—

On the altar.—Offering is sacrificing as to its essential element; hence Luther's version "when he sacrificed" is not as wrong as Huther thinks; but the explanation "when he was going to sacrifice" is tautological, unless the term receive the doubtful interpretation of positive slaughtering.

Isaac, his son.—Emphatically describing the greatness of the offering as in Gen. xxii. 16.—The example of Abraham, however, has a peculiar significance to the Jewish Christian readers of the Epistle. As Abraham obediently offered to the God of revelation his theocratic offspring with whom the promise seemed to be indissolubly connected, so were they also to learn to distinguish their natural national feelings from the promise of God and offer them for their entrance into the New Covenant.

VER. 22. Thou seest.—We read the verse with the majority of commentators as an assertion and not as a question (de Wette, Lachmann and al.). And what then? Not, perchance, that the works were added to his faith, but that faith and works flow forth in one gush of the Spirit and doubly cover each other; faith was actively joined with his works as the foundation,

That faith was working together with his works.—Most commentators perceive here the antithesis, "neither faith was wanting nor the works" (Bengel: quid utraque pars alteri conferat; similarly Erasmus etc. Wiesinger.). According to the opposite view the propositions are designed to demonstrate the necessity of works. Thou seest that faith was active in works and had to be completed by works (Estius: operosa fuit, non otiosa. Calvin). Huther, "The second hemistich is not in antithesis with the former, but constitutes its complement: faith being active with its works, itself reached its completion." But James evidently does not wish to lay so one-sided an emphasis on the necessity of works; his object is rather to vindicate the unity of both, as is manifest from vv. 18 and 23. Primarily he demanded works as the proof of faith, he now demands them also with reference to the ἐδικαιώθη v. 22 as the completion of faith. The first proposition therefore stands for the proof of faith, although not as demanding the necessity of faith which was self-evident to him and to his readers. συνήργει certainly cannot mean "faith was auxiliary in his doing" as Huther rightly observes against Hofmann and Wiesinger; nor hardly, "it was the συνεργός of his works, it operated not by itself but with his works" (Huther), which gives not a clear idea. Kern sought to avoid this dualism by taking τοῖς ἔργοις as Dat. commod., "it operated to the production of his works." σύν joined with the verb may be construed as having additional force, i. e. along with, but also intensive-synthetically, i. e. united to, joined with (not to mention that it may mean: quite, thoroughly, συντέμνω etc.) Mark xvi. 20 etc. We take the passage in the latter sense thus: "Faith manifested itself operatively at one with the works." Faith aided in the completion of the work and the work aided in the completion of faith.—

Faith was made complete.—τελειώθη is taken by many as completed proof, that is declaratively (Calvin, Bengel etc.), against which rendering Huther with reason insists upon the expression, "it was completed," not in the sense it had been imperfect but that it was consummated in the exercise. But here again we have to remind the reader of the significance of the term τελειώσις in this Epistle (cf. ch. i. 4, 25; iii. 2; v. 11). Abraham by his faith-offering attained typically and ideally the τελειώσις, which the Jewish Christians were to attain by the full proof of Christian love out of [as the ground and source of—M.] faith and with them all Israel was to attain it.

V. 28. And [thus] the Scripture was fulfilled.—That is the passage Gen. xv. 6 here cited from the Sept. (with the exception of ὁ for καί) which gives a passive rendering to the active language of the original. So Paul quotes the LXX. Rom. iv. 3; Gal. iii. 6. James, it is evident from this declaration, was fully cognizant of the predication of that passage concerning Abraham's righteousness of faith and was far from disputing it. But on that account, as Huther rightly maintains, we are unable to adopt the definition of ἐκληρώθη which is given by the majority of commentators, viz.: then was confirmed, or that of Hofmann: then was proved that God had rightly estimated the faith of Abraham (Wiesinger, "then it was shown (εὐρίσκειν) that the Scripture was right"). The meaning of ἐκληρώθη forbids such definitions. Moreover, strictly speaking this saying cannot be referred to the written declaration of Holy Scripture but to the Divine act on which that declaration is founded, i. e. the λογιστέον, or to the prophetic sense of believing Abraham himself. But, on the other hand, we cannot adopt the exposition of de Wette and Huther, "then was realized," for that righteousness of faith was a reality from the very first. The fulfilling denotes throughout the completed, decided and manifested development of a seed of faith which until then was germ-like concealed, whether it be a prophecy or a type (cf. Matth. ii. 15; v. 23 etc.; 1 Kings ii. 27 etc.). That righteousness of faith of Abraham reached its πλήρωσις or τελειώσις in its proof and verification, as it was sealed by the now openly stated Divine testimony. The act of faith itself and the subsequent sealing in the life of individual believers answer to the Old Testament Abrahamic foundation and the New Testament completion. That proof and verification of faith was on its real side τελειώσις, while, on its ideal side viewed as the completion of the prophetic word of the Spirit on which the written word is founded, it was πλήρωσις. And this πλήρωσις was manifested in his being called the friend of God. Not literally but substantially he was honoured with that appellation from the beginning Gen. xxii. 16, and afterwards also was referred to in the Old Testament as the beloved of God 1 Chron. xx. 7; Is. xli. 8. This honourable appellation has developed the epithet "the friend of God" among the Jews and the Mohammedans (Wolf's curæ, and Thelle.) ["El-Khalil-Allah" or, as he is more usually called, "El-Khalil," simply "the friend," "is a title which has in Mussulman countries superseded altogether his own proper name." Stanley's Jewish Church p. 14. "Abraham is the Zoroaster of the Semitic race; but he is more than Zoroaster, in proportion as his sense of the Divine was more spiritual, and more free from the philosophy of nature and the adoration of the visible world." Bunsen, Bibelwerk, II., 88. See also Max Müller's Essay on Semitic Monotheism in the London Times of April 14 and 15, 1860.—M.] "In Gen. xviii. 17 the LXX. add the words τοῦ παιδὸς μου to ἀπὸ Ἀβραάμ, for which Philo substitutes τοῦ φίλου μου." Huther. Hofmann defines the expression "the friend of God," by "who loved God," while Huther disputes that definition and gives the opposite one "whom God loved." But both entangle themselves in a false antithesis. The friend is at once loving and loved and indissolubly so. And although it remains a fixed fact that Abraham's love was the consequence of God's love to him, it is also evident that Abraham's good conduct, that is his self-sacrificing love, is intended to be brought out. But he was not only made "the friend of God" (Grotius ἐκλήθη=factus est), but he was called and honoured as such. And this was the way in which he was ἐδικαιώθη for the kingdom of God. Wiesinger's assertion is therefore incorrect that δικαιώσθαι refers to righteousness before God and not (as Calov and al.) to righteousness before men. But this "righteousness before men" requires to be defined in the manner indicated above.

V. 24. Ye see that by works a man is justified. Out of (ἐξ ἔργων) works.—The preposition is not interrogative (Griesbach), nor imperative (Erasmus), but indicative (Luther). Recollecting that δικαιούται here as in v. 21 does not refer to justification by faith before God, but to the proof of faith before the congregation or the forum of the kingdom of God (in the sense of being declared righteous to the world, cf. 1 Tim. iii. 16), the seeming opposition of this passage to Rom. iii. 28 and al. is set aside. Per se therefore μόνον might be connected with δικαιούται thus "not only by faith but by works a man is justified," but firstly this would not give a pure antithesis as in v. 18, and secondly, the preposition v. 26 could then not follow. μόνον therefore must be joined adjectively with πίστεως in the sense of bare faith, faith without works (so Theophylact, Grotius, Wiesinger, Huther and al. cf. 1 Cor. xii. 81; 2 Cor. xi. 28 and other passages).

V. 25. But likewise, Rahab, the harlot.—δι indicates the contrast between the two examples, ὅμοιως their similarity. The contrast comes out strongly in the fact that Rahab was a harlot. The Article denotes that she was the historically known personage without intensifying the idea which however must not be weakened by the exposition "hospita" (Lyranus) or "idolatra" although she was both in reality (Rosenmüller). But the circumstance that she was a Gentile is implied. The supposition of de Wette and al. that this example was chosen with polemical reference to Heb. xi. 31, because there she is praised on account of her faith, Wiesinger rejects with the appropriate observation that there as here it is the work-proof of her faith which is rendered prominent, as indeed the whole chapter (Heb. xi) lauds faith as the power of conduct well pleasing to God. Wiesinger (following Calvin) also brings out the real motive for the selection of this example. To the example of Abraham, who was the prototype of all true faith, is now added another as remote from it as possible, "that of a woman, a Canaanite, a harlot." The Apostle's motive, however, must be taken even more concretely. Doubtless Rahab stands here as the representative of Gentile Christians in their works of faith. Just as Abraham by the sacrifice of Isaac, from being a Jew, hedged in by his nationality, became the patriarch of the spiritual Israel, a pattern to the Jewish Christian readers of this Epistle, so the case of Rahab is an example drawn from the Old Testament of the ability of Gentiles becoming by means of their work of faith the spiritual companions of Abraham and his children. Now she was justified not only in that her life was spared (Josh. ii. 6, 22 etc.) but in that she became a highly honoured mother in Israel, as tradition informs us (Matth. i. 5).

When she received the messengers.—One might always think that James selected the word ἀγγελοὶ instead of κήρυκτες (Heb. xi. 31) in allusion to the circumstance that the Gentiles of his time were so ready to receive the messengers of the Gospel. Although the ὁρὸς of the verb may not have the secondary meaning "clam excipere," (Theile) still it suitably intensifies the idea. She hospitably received the messengers and sheltered them, she received them forthwith, as the Gentiles received the messengers of the Gospel rejected and persecuted by the Jews.

And sent them forth by another way.—Cf. Josh. ii. 15. It is not simply that she let them go, but that she thrust them off with saving haste and effort, as it were by force. So Festus the Gentile sent Paul to Rome in order to deliver him from the persecutions of the Jews and so for a time the Roman rulers in general, but especially believing Gentiles protected the messengers of the Gospel from the fanaticism of the Jews. The way of the deliverance of the messengers, however, was not only another way, but an uncommon one (ἐρέτω ὁδῷ [i. e. διὰ τῆς ὑπιδόξου.—M.]).

V. 26. For as the body without spirit.—The spirit can only describe the constant, inward vital principle (and in its actuality), which gives motion to the living body. Consequently not the soul as a quiescent substance, nor that which animates (Wiesinger), and still less the πνεῦμα as "halitus" (Piscator and al.). The spirit in its actuality is the ἐνέργεια of the body, without which it is dead. By comparison therefore faith is dead without (corresponding) works. It is an unnatural condition for the body to exist without spirit; consequently the reference here is to a faith which has passed into an unnatural condition. James, therefore, cannot mean that works must be added to faith; he rather sees in the works (with the Article), the collective phenomenon, that form of life which renders visible the vitality of faith, its animating energy (although not absolutely love, as Theile maintains) or entelechy. The seeming inconcinnity of the figure, to which Huther calls attention, that while on the one hand, the body is visible and the spirit invisible, faith on the other is invisible and the works visible, disappears if it is remembered that the spirit also in virtue of its actuality effects the higher visibility of the body. Being dead and being alive is the decisive antithesis, in which, however, the separate members also are brought into comparison. James is therefore far from forming a dualistic conception of real faith, he rather takes it really as a productive power much as Aristotle does the idea, and with reference to public proof he will recognize it only in its expression by works which almost recalls Hegel's idea that the true in the individual authenticates itself in its process of development as fact.

James's doctrine of faith in this chapter in relation to the doctrine in Rom. iii. 28; Gal. ii. 16, and al.—We refer in the first place to the Introduction, to the foregoing exegesis, to our exposition in the History of the Apostolic Age, I., p. 171; and in the next place to Huther, p. 126, and the Supplement to his Commentary, p. 208. Huther, with reason enumerates three views. 1. James and Paul agree in thought but differ in expression. This was the prevalent view before the Reformation, and in modern times the view of Neander, Thiersch, Wiesinger, Huther, etc. 2. The doctrine of James contradicts that of Paul. So Luther, de Wette, Kern, Baur, Schwegler. 3. There is certainly a difference in doctrine of subordinate importance yet without prejudicing their higher unity. So Schmid (Bibl. Theol.), Lechler, Weizsäcker (see the last supplement in Huther, also the controversy with Weiss and Weizsäcker, p. 130, 131). Ad 1. Theophylact and others. The ἔργα are different in both instances, Paul mentions the opera legis, James the "opera fidei." "This is also right," as Huther correctly observes. Paul deals with the ergism of the Jews, James with their orthodoxism. Huther moreover urges with reason that Paul does not attribute justifying power to the opera fidei. A second distinction in the idea of πίστις was therefore necessary. This has been pointed out by Oecumenius, Neander and al.; viz. "that James takes faith per se simply as the mere notitia, the considering things as true etc." It is evident that he knows such a kind of faith but it is equally certain that he does not acknowledge it as living faith; not any more than Paul, who was equally familiar with Jewish orthodoxy according to Rom. x, but insisted with equal firmness, that faith must work by love or authenticate itself by works (Gal. v. 6). Wiesinger (with whom Huther agrees), however, is right in maintaining against Schmid, Olshausen, Neander and al., that it is one thing to say "to become righteous by (out of) faith authenticated (proved) in works," and another "to become righteous by works in which faith authenticates itself." This brings us to the third and most important distinction, the different senses of δικαιοσύνη. Here Wiesinger and Huther also go asunder. Wiesinger (in connection with Hofmann) maintains that man, having been justified by faith, becomes personally righteous by his works in which faith authenticates itself: that justification in relation to God becomes a justification according to a man's behaviour towards God. Huther, on the other hand, holds that by δικαιοῦν Paul describes that declaring righteous or free [i. e. from guilt and punishment, German Freisprechen—M.] on the part of God which puts the believer into the new filial relation to God, whereas James understands by it that declaring righteous or free on the part of God in virtue of which the man regenerated into a child of God receives in the judgment σωτηρία. But the two views are not quite clear. In the first the idea of the forum is wanting, where the δικαιοῦν is to take place, in the second the forum of the last judgment is improperly anticipated. It is of course understood, that according to Paul also, men will be judged in the last day with reference to their fruits of faith (2 Cor. v. 10), but in that judgment Abraham also has not yet stood, whereas on the other hand righteousness of faith and σωτηρία along with it, are acquired only in an ideal judgment. But between the first Divine forum in a repenting conscience and the last forum in the judgment of the world there lies as a middle forum the public attestation of the believer in the consciousness of the theocratic congregation; outwardly to the Church an authentication, inwardly to believers a sealing. By the selection of the term, therefore, James wished the Jewish Christians to understand that with the Church he could not acknowledge them as believers, if they were lacking the full consistency of Christian deeds.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Both according to James and Paul (Rom. i. 16, 17) the doctrine of the sinner's justification before God is one of the principal doctrines of the Gospel. The question of the true Israelite "What shall I do, that I may have eternal life?" (Matth. xix. 16; Mark x. 17; Luke x. 25), rightly considered, is the most vital question for every sinner desirous of salvation. It is so much the more melancholy that the dispute concerning the doctrine of justification by faith (out of faith), or of justification by (out of) works has in every century of the Christian era given rise to so much misunderstanding and called forth so many attempts to show that James and Paul are irreconcilably contradicting one another. How little the doctrine of the one differs from that of the other, if we understand the meaning which each attaches to the terms faith, works and justify, has been sufficiently illustrated in the exegesis of this passage. See "Exegetical and Critical."—Considering this, we cannot but regard the well-known opinion of Luther on the epistola straminea, which is partly based on James' doctrine of justification, as the fruit of an unfortunate misunderstanding. Nor do we find in these propositions of James any positive opposition to the doctrine of the great Apostle of the Gentiles. But we hold it to be very conceivable that Paul's doctrine of justification was either involuntarily misunderstood or designedly perverted into an excuse for the flesh by the readers of the Epistle of James and that he was on that account constrained powerfully to oppose those who degraded the doctrine of grace into a cloak of sin. He therefore contends not against Paul but against a one-sided Paulinism, which in some hands might easily turn into unchristian Antinomianism and an unholy spirit of emancipation. Both James and Paul are well entitled to a hearing and every view or consideration of the way of salvation, which silences the one at the expense of the other, is decidedly unfair. Paul's preaching is glad tidings to all who are conscious of the absolute impossibility of being saved by their own virtue and strength, and the exhortation of James is a wholesome corrective for all who are apt to forget what Paul himself did teach that true faith must work by love (Gal. v. 6). Paul sets into prominent relief the great antithesis of grace and sin, James (as well as our Lord, Jno. xiii. 17) that of knowing and doing.

2. It is of the utmost importance that while, on the one hand, justification and sanctification must be distinguished the one from the other, on the other hand the one must never be separated from the other. The true preaching of the Gospel involves the necessity of Christ in all His fulness being set forth both in us and for us. If justification and sanctification are confounded, or if the latter is made the foundation of the former we open the door to self-righteousness; if justification and sanctification are separated, we deliver an open passport to injustice. The true union of the "for us" and the "in us" requires that justification be put first, but that sanctification be neither put in the background nor in the foreground.

3. What James says concerning the faith of the devils (v. 19) is important on several considerations 1. As affording proof of the existence of personal, self-conscious evil spirits. 2. As affording proof of their original goodness and communion with God, which consequently shuts out indirectly all reference to dualism in the question of the origin of moral evil. 3. As affording proof of the infinite misery of the fallen angels; to have a faith which yields no consolation but only excites terror and shuddering, must probably be the highest degree of misery. 4. As indicating the low and sad standpoint occupied by one who confesses the Gospel without the exhibition of love-working Christianity; his standpoint is not Christian but devilish.

The way of acquiring the favour and friendship of God in all great essential features was virtually the same under the Old Covenant as under the New. The example of Abraham, in particular (Gen. xv. 1-6), which is also used by Paul (Rom. iv.) exhibits this unity of the way of salvation under both Testaments in the clearest manner.

5. The case of Rahab, the harlot, who is introduced as a pattern to the believers in Christ Jesus (cf. also Heb. xi. 31), affords a striking proof that God exalts the mean and regards the miserable and exhibits a lofty memorial of the spiritual emancipation and exaltation of woman by Christianity. It is wonderful that just the most fallen and disgraced women of the Old Testament are preferred to honour in the New. Do not even Thamar and Bathsheba shine in the genealogy of our Lord? Matth. i.

6. "Whatever is transitory is only a similitude." Nature the symbol of grace, the body permeated by the spirit the figure of living and active faith, but the cold corpse also is the representative of a merely outward form of spiritual life, from which life itself has vanished.

7. "If James calls faith without works a dead faith, he surely cannot mean that the works, the outward and the visible render faith living and that they constitute the life of faith but he had to presume that true faith includes [carries within itself] life, the animating principle, from which the works must emanate, and that this must make itself known in the works. He considers the want of works as proof of the want of vital faith and therefore he calls such faith a dead faith." Neander.

8. Luther (in his Exposition of 2 Pet. Ed. Irmischer, Vol. LXX., p. 223 sq.) excellently says concerning the fruits of faith: "although they belong to our neighbour, in order that they may redound to his benefit, yet does that fruit not fail because it makes faith stronger.—It is therefore altogether a very different strength than bodily strength for it decreases and is consumed; but this spiritual strength, the more we exercise and practise it, the stronger it grows, and it decreases if it is not practised."

[V. 14. On the error which James combats, compare the following passage from Tertullian ('de Poenit' c. 5): "Some persons imagine that they have God if they receive Him in their heart and mind and do little for Him in act; and that therefore they may commit sin, without doing violence to faith and fear; or in other words that they may commit adulteries, and yet be chaste, and may poison their parents, and yet be pious! At the same rate they who commit sin and yet are godly, may also be cast into hell and yet be pardoned! But such minds as these are offshoots from the root of hypocrisy and sworn friends of the evil one."

V. 16. There is opus fidei, the work of faith; fides quæ operatur, faith that worketh; that is St. Paul's faith (1 Thess. i. 8; Gal. v. 6), and faith that can show itself by working, that is St. James's faith (ii. 18). And without works it is but a dead faith, the carcase of faith; there is no spirit in it. No spirit, if no work; spectrum est, non spiritus: a flying shadow it is, a spirit it is not, if work it do not. Having wherewith to do good, if you do it not, talk not of faith, for you have not faith in you, if you have wherewith to show it and show it not. Andrewes.

V. 20. Beveridge (on Art. 12 "of good works"): "Though it be for our faith only, and not for our works that God accepts us, yet our works as well as faith are acceptable unto God, yea, and they necessarily spring out from a true and lively faith, so that it is as impossible there should be true faith without good works, as that there should be good works without true faith; for as without faith our works are bad, so without works our faith is dead. And therefore a true faith may be as evidently known by its works, as a tree is clearly discerned by its fruit [Article 12 of the Articles of Religion established in the Church of England and Prot. Episc. Church in the United States reads as follows: "Albeit that good works, which are the fruits of faith and follow after justification, cannot put away our sins and endure the severity of God's judgment: yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively faith; insomuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known, as a tree discerned by the fruit."—M.]. If I see fruit growing upon a tree, I know what tree it is, upon which such fruit grows. And so if I see how a man lives, I know how he believes. If his faith be good, his works cannot but be good too; and if his works be bad, his faith cannot but be bad too; for whosoever there is a justifying faith there are also good works, and whosoever there are no good works there is no justifying faith." To this last statement Wordsworth adds the following judicious modification. "Suppose the case of a person who has been baptized, and has a lively faith and earnest resolve to serve God, and that he is suddenly taken away from this life, without having time to show his faith by his works. Or suppose the case of an infant dying after baptism. Then Faith saves. No man can do good works without Faith; but faith without works saves a man, if God thinks it fit to remove him out of this life, without giving him time for working, and if God knows that he would have worked, if he had had time for working. Indeed in such a case Faith itself is work; according to our Lord's saying. This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him, whom He sent" (Jno. vi. 28, 29).

V. 25. Wordsworth. "Rahab received the spies, who were sent before Joshua, the type of Jesus, and who were types of the Apostles of Christ, and hearkened to their message and sent them forth in speed (ἐκβαλοῦσα) by a cord, by another way (other than that by which they had come), viz. by the window, from which she tied the scarlet cord by which they were let down (Josh. ii. 15-18), and thus obtained deliverance for herself and family by her faith, when her city was destroyed. Thus she was an example very applicable to those whom St. James addressed, who, by receiving the Gospel preached by the Apostles, might escape the woes impending on Jerusalem, as she escaped those which fell upon Jericho (cf. Heb. xi. 81), and who would be overwhelmed in that destruction, if they neglected so great salvation."—M. J.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The Christian utility-principle.—Faith without works.—A faith that cannot save us, cannot possibly be the true faith.—Love the touchstone of faith.—Pious works behind which lurks not seldom hardness of heart.—Those who unwittingly communicate to other their temporal goods prove thereby that they received of their God only little or nothing of spiritual goods.—The contention of dead and living faith.—Unfruitful monotheism.—The faith of devils in its infinite diversity 1, from the faith of good angels and 2, from the faith of believing Christians.—Abraham the true friend of God: 1. God calls and Abraham obeys, 2. God promises and Abraham confides, 3. God tries and Abraham stands fast.—The friendship of God compared with the friendship of the world. What the friend of God shuns, enjoys and expects. Why is it just faith, provided it be living and active, which makes the sinner so well-pleasing to God? Answer: 1. Because of the honour it gives to God, 2. because of the struggle it costs us, 3. because of the fruit it bears for the benefit of others.—Rahab, the harlot of Jericho a guide to the heavenly Jerusalem.—What the sight of a corpse suggests to a believer of the Gospel.—According to James also the sinner is justified not propter, sed per fidem.

On the Pericope. Commendation of a living faith; 1. The sense in which James exhorts us thereto, 2. The connection of his doctrine with the doctrine of the Gospel, and in particular with that of Paul. 3. The importance it will always have and has now. a. There are men who have neither faith nor works; b. others who have works without faith; c. others again who have faith without works; and d. many whose faith and works leave much to be wished for. For each one of these diseases and one-sidednesses the ever-repeated consideration of James' doctrine is wholesome medicine.

STARKE:—To boast of faith without having it, is very common, Tit. i. 16.—Neither true faith nor true love consists in bare words, 1 Jno. iii. 17, 18.—We usually refer the poor to the Providence of God and it is just this Providence that refers them to us, 1 Tim. vi. 18.—A rich man ought to rejoice in being God's hand, whereby to do good to the poor;—Prov. iii. 27, 28.—Saving faith is not either dead or living, but it is only and always living and this is properly true faith; whereas dead faith is properly not true but false faith. But apart from the article of justification both agree in this respect, that just as true and living faith consists of three parts, viz. knowledge, assent and trust, so false and dead faith consists of these three parts but its knowledge is only historical, its assent only human and its trust only carnal or a conceit of God's grace drawn in carnal assurance, Matth. vii. 21, 22; Luke xiii. 25.—Works are not the life or soul of faith but only an infallible mark of the same, Heb. xi. 8, 17.—The devils believe and know in particular four articles of our faith, Matth. viii. 2, 9. They know 1. that there is a God, 2. that there is a Christ, 3. that there will be a final judgment, 4. that they will then be tortured. But this knowledge does not minister to their peace and salvation, but to their alarm and damnation.

HEDINGER:—If true faith consists only in knowledge and outward assent, the devil also is a believer and consequently blessed, 1 Jno. ii. 8, 4.

LUTHER:—Not fear and terror, but joy, peace and consolation in the conscience work true faith, Rom. v. 1.

QUESNEL:—Even the devil is not an atheist; what then are we to think of those who boast that they believe nothing and are not afraid of anything? Ps. xiv. 1.—Some hope to be saved by a faith which does less to them than the faith of devils, Job xxi. 12, 18.

LANGII OP.:—The emptier a vessel, the more does it sound and resound; just so the hypocrite who lacks faith, Ps. xciv. 4.

QUESNEL:—Works live by faith as by the spirit which animates them, Rom. xiv. 23.

LUTHER:—Works do not make us righteous but cause us to be declared righteous, Luke xvii. 9, 10.—All the world has admired the offering of Abraham; what may not come to pass, since God has offered His own Son? Rom. v. 8; viii. 32.—Faith is the mother who gives birth to the virtues, as her children.

STARKE:—All true believers are the friends of God and this is the peculiar prerogative of believers of the New Testament, Jno. xv. 14, 15.—The faith of converted Jews and Gentiles is uniform, Acts xv. 19.—The grace of God does not charge us with past transgressions, if we are converted, 1 Tim. i. 13.—The weak faith of a Rahab must be as active as the most perfect faith of Abraham, Rom. iv. 19, 20.

LANGII OP.:—This is the only right and safe way to seek righteousness, which enables us to stand before God, solely by faith in Christ out of His merit so that that faith be also actively shown by love, Phil. iii. 9; Gal. v. 6.

HEUBNER:—Unfruitfulness betrays the un-genuineness of faith.—Love never complains of want of ability; the stronger love, the greater the ability.—Dead faith is no faith.

AUGUSTINE:—Such faith is a palsied hand.—The faith of Abraham was imputed to him for righteousness, before it had brought forth works, but it was a living faith, in which the works lay as to the germ.—Works per se are not the spirit, but the faith moving in the works, is spirit.

VON GERLACH:—What James calls faith without works is properly speaking no faith at all; not any more than a love which deals only in pleasant words, is love (v. 15).—Paul opposes the antithesis of dead work-holiness, James the antithesis of a pharasaic pride in empty intellectual knowledge.—Paul met the Pharisees with precisely the same argument, cf. Rom. ii. 6-11; xiii. 27.—Man is not justified by (out of) faith separable from works, not any more than fire (e. g. painted fire) separable from heat and light is able to warm and light us.

LUTHER:—O, faith is a lively, busy active thing, so that it is impossible for it not to be ceaselessly working good! It does not ask either if good works are to be done, but before it asks, it has done them and is ever doing. But whoso doeth not such works, is an unbelieving man, gropes and looks out for faith and good works, and neither knows what is faith nor what are good works, but for all chatters and talks much of faith and good works. Faith is a living, well-weighed assurance of the grace of God, so sure, that he would a thousand times die for it, and such assurance and knowledge of Divine grace renders men glad, daring and merry before God and all creatures, which is the work of the Holy Ghost in faith. Hence man becomes without constraint ready and glad to serve everybody, to suffer many things to the praise of God and from love of God who has been so gracious to him, so that it is impossible to separate works from faith, yea as impossible as it is to separate burning and shining from fire.

STIER:—James by no means affirms that works give life to, produce or create faith; for faith comes by the power of the word, entering into and received by us and by nothing else. But faith grows complete in works, that is the same as Paul's saying or rather the Lord's saying to Paul, that the strength of God may be completed in weakness (2 Cor. xii. 9). The strength of faith, indwelling from the beginning and already received along with the first seizing of grace, becomes fully proved, verified and its operation completed. Thus our calling and election are made sure in the diligence of living and doing (2 Pet. i. 10). Thus Abraham's first call was made sure in his last works and the word concerning justification by (out of) faith already before accorded to him, was lawfully and actually confirmed as a truth.

VIEDEBANDT:—A faith which helps not our neighbour, neither helps ourselves, for it has not helped us to love.—Before faith are the tears of Peter and after faith the following after of Paul.

JAKOBI:—A sacred author tells us of true faith that it is the firm confidence of things hoped for. But the faith of the devils is an assurance not of what they hope for, but of what they fear.

PORUSSKY:—Dead faith cannot save. This is evident 1. from the being of blessedness, 2. from the nature of dead, 3. from the experience of daily life.—Living faith justifies and saves (Reformation-Sermon). Cf. art. 20 of the Augsburg Confession.

LISCO:—Faith and works.—Operative faith justifies us before God.—True Christian faith a sanctifying power of life.

[v. 17. HALL:—As that is a vain and idle charity, which bids a man be warm and filled, yet gives him nothing to feed or warm him with, so is that a vain and dead faith, which, professing an adherence to God, yet is severed from all good works and is void of charity.—M.]

[v. 21. HAMMOND:—Abraham was [the father of the faithful, the great example of faith and justification; but it was not upon his bare belief of God's promise that he was justified, but upon that high act of obedience to God, in being ready to offer up his only son, in whom the promises were made to him.—M.]

[v. 23. ADAM CLARKE:—As among friends everything is common, so God took Abraham into intimate communion with Himself, and poured out upon Him the choicest of His blessings; for as God can never be in want, because He possesses all things, so Abraham, His friend, could never be destitute, because God was his friend.—M.]

[v. 24. HORNE:—In this instance of the father of the faithful, as in a common centre, are the doctrines of both Apostles met: one says a man is justified by faith working; the other by working faith; and this is really and truly all the difference between them.—M.]

[v. 26. BRIGHT:—Justification then by faith, or according to the Christian doctrine as opposed to the law, must be that all men being sinners are justified, and particularly receive remission of sins, the Holy Spirit, and everlasting salvation, from the free and undeserved goodness of God; upon the consideration of the perfect righteousness and the meritorious sacrifice of Jesus Christ, and upon the condition or qualification of a pious temper of heart for the future, to obey the will of God, and consequently to do what is right and just in whatsoever way He is pleased to declare it, but particularly as it is declared by the Lord Jesus Christ; which same condition too we had never been able to perform without the assistance of the grace of God.—M.]

[TAYLOR:—Let a man believe all the revelations of God; if that belief ends in itself and goes no further, it is like physic taken to purge the stomach; if it do not work, it is so far from bringing health, that itself is a new sickness.—M.]

[SALVIANUS:—Hominem fideliter Christo credere est fidelem Deo esse, h. e. fideliter in Dei mandata servare.—M.]

[LACTANTIUS:—Christianorum omnis religio sine scelere et macula vivere.—M.]

[TAYLOR:—There are but three things that make the integrity of Christian faith; believing the words of God, confidence in His goodness, and keeping His commandments.—Believing is the least thing in a justifying faith; for faith is a conjugation of many ingredients, and faith is a covenant, and faith is a law, and faith is obedience, and faith is a work, and indeed it is a sincere cleaving to and closing with the terms of the Gospel in every instance, in every particular.—M.]

VI. FOURTH ADMONITION WITH REFERENCE TO THE FOURTH FORM OF TEMPTATION—PROPAGANDISM.

CAUTION AGAINST THE JUDAISTIC BIAS TO FANATICAL ACTIVITY OF TEACHING. REFERENCE TO THE POWER OF THE TONGUE AND TO THE DEPRAVITY, LICENCE AND DUPLICITY OF THE FANATICALLY EXCITED TONGUE. THE CONTRAST OF FALSE AND TRUE WISDOM IN SPEECH ACCORDING TO THEIR OPPOSITE OPERATIONS.

CHAPTER III.

My brethren, be not many masters, knowing that we shall receive the greater condemnation. For in many things we offend all. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole<sup>1</sup> body. Behold<sup>2</sup>, we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us; and<sup>3</sup> we turn about their whole body. Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds<sup>4</sup>, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever<sup>5</sup> the governor listeth<sup>6</sup>. Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things<sup>7</sup>. Behold, how great a matter a little<sup>8</sup> fire kindleth! And the tongue<sup>9</sup> is a fire, a world of iniquity: so<sup>10</sup> is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and<sup>11</sup> setteth on fire the course of nature<sup>12</sup>; and it is set on fire of hell. For every kind of beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind: But the tongue can no man tame<sup>13</sup>; it is an unruly<sup>14</sup> evil, full of deadly poison. Therewith bless we God<sup>15</sup>, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God. Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter? Can the fig tree, my brethren, bear olive berries<sup>16</sup>? either a vine, figs? so can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh<sup>17</sup>. Who is a wise man and endued with knowledge among you? let him show out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom. But if ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts<sup>18</sup>, glory not, and lie not against the truth<sup>19</sup>. This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish. For where envying and strife is, there<sup>20</sup> is confusion and every evil work. But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and<sup>21</sup> without hypocrisy. And the fruit of<sup>22</sup> righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace.

Verse 1. Language: Become not many teachers, my brethren, since ye know, that we shall [as such] receive a greater [a more severe] condemnation [judicial sentence.]

[... knowing that we shall receive greater condemnation.—M.]

Verse 2. [Cod. Sin. has δυναμεις for δυνατες.—M.]

Language: For manifoldly we offend all: if a man offendeth not in word he is a perfect man, able even to bridle the whole body.

[For oftentimes we all offend ..... word, this man is a perfect man, able to bridle also the whole body.—M.]

Verse 3. [Rec. reads ισον against the most authentic codd. C. and Griesbach read ισε. A. B. G. Sin. and al. Lachmann and Tisch. have ει δε. [So Alford, Wordsw. Ecce enim, Syr. Si autem, Vulg.—M.]

[B. C. C. ει τε. [So Cod. Sin. Alf. Rec. ωδε with A. K. L. (?)—M.]

Language: But if we put bits into the horses' mouths, in order that they may obey us, we guide also their whole body.

[..... the bits into the mouths of horses in order to their obeying us, we also turn about their whole body.—M.]

[ἀνέμῳ δὲ. Rec.—δὲ κλον Sin. B.—M.]

[Cod. Sin. B. read βούλαται for βούληται.—M.]

Language: Behold even the ships, although they are so great and are [moreover] tossed about by fierce winds, even they are guided with a very small rudder, whithersoever the direction [course] of the steersman [guide] may wish.

[..... though so great and driven by ... are turned about by a very small rudder, whithersoever the will of the steersman may wish.—M.]

Verse 5. [The reading μεγάλα αὐγὰ: A. C.* recommended by Tischend. is preferable to μεγαλαυχεῖ.

The difference between ἡλικος and ἡλικον keeps balancing between the authorities and the critics. In point of sense both amount to the same thing with the exception that ἡλικον, the more difficult reading, gives also the stronger expression: what a fire, i. e. what a little fire. ἡλικος is decidedly the more authentic reading. It is in A.* B. C.* Cod. Sin. Vulg. received by Lachmann, Tisch., Alford, Wordsw., de Witte, Huther and others. Alford maintains that ἡλικος is "quantitativus" as well as "quantitativus" and cites Lucian, Hermot. 5.—M.]

Language: Thus also the tongue is a little member and boasteth great things.—Behold what a little fire—what a forest it doth kindle [Jerusalem on fire.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

ANALYSIS: Caution against the Judaistic bias to fanatical activity of teaching, vv. 1. 2.—The power of the tongue vv. 3, 4 (first half). The depravity of the tongue vv. 5, 6.—The untamableness of the tongue, vv. 7, 8.—The duplicity (German "doubletonguedness," Doppelzungenigkeit) of the [fanatically excited] tongue, vv. 9–12.—The contrast of false and true wisdom in speech according to their opposite operations, vv. 13–18.

Caution against the Judaistic bias to fanatical activity of teaching.

Vers. 1, 2. The exhortation progresses from Judaistic visionariness (ch. i.) and from Judaistic particularism and exclusiveness (ch. ii.) to Judaistic, fanatical activity of teaching, to the evil, exciting and pernicious tongue-sins of bitter emulation, cursing, envying and party-strife exhibited in a false, devilish wisdom in contrast with true and heavenly wisdom. That this section is an essential point peculiar to the entire Epistle, is evident from the fact that it has been announced already in ch. i. 17, 26. The fanatical, proselyting and polemical mania for teaching, which is here described by James, had previously been delineated by the Lord Himself, Matth. xxiii., and by Paul the Apostle in Rom. ii. 17; it is here and there illuminated in Acts (ch. xv.) and in the Pauline Epistles (2 Cor. xi. 13; Phil. iii. 2; Gal. ii.), and it is finally condemned in Rev. ii. 9. Wiesinger heads this chapter "against the itch of teaching" and adds the observation—that "the author passes on to the ready-tongued teaching and finding fault with others, because this is the false actualization of the πίστις of his readers, whereby they think themselves warranted to dispense with genuine actualization [i. e. the practical exhibition of living faith by good works.—M.]. Nothing is nearer to a faith which consists in knowledge only than conceit of teaching and dogmatism (cf. Rom. ii. 17 etc.). Thus ch. iii. is the carrying out of the censure James had already passed on his readers in ch. i. 19, 20 and similarly as in ch. i. 26, 27, where the author had indicated inability to bridle the tongue as the characteristic of a purely imaginary religion and the exhibition of compassionating love as the characteristic of true religion, he now returns to [we ought to say: he now takes up in earnest] this subject, and represents to his readers that the human inability, so strongly developed in them, of taming the tongue, ought to cure them effectually of the desire to teach others." Huther: "Words had taken the place of works."

VER. 1. Do not become many teachers.—The exposition of Huther (and of de Wette, Wiesinger) "be not teachers in great numbers," gives hardly a satisfactory sense. For if reference were made to ecclesiastically ordained offices of teaching (as Wiesinger maintains with reference to 2 Tim. iv. 5), the language of the Apostle would hardly convey the rebuke he intends to administer. It is evidently his purpose to censure the false mania for teaching, the dogmatizing contentiousness, which is thoroughly characteristic of the Judaizing Christian. We therefore connect (with Gebser and Schneckenburger) πολλοὶ with γίνεσθαι and so that πολλοὶ and διδάσκαλοι form one idea. Do not end with being a great host of teachers. Luther: "Let not every one dare to be a teacher." The expression has consequently an ironical colouring and even stronger than the μη πάντες of Grotius.

Knowing that we.—They know it and they ought to be conscious of it. [Huther remarks that εἰδότες, being closely joined in the Imperative, is itself hortatory: "knowing, that ye might know." James says here "we shall receive" and in v. 2 "we all offend" and thus forcibly practises his precepts vv. 2, 17, 18. Cf. 1 Cor. vi. 12.—M.J.]

A greater condemnation.—Although κρίμα cannot signify "responsibility" only (so Hottinger and Augusti) the ordinary N. T. usage does not necessitate us to insist with Wiesinger (who remarks however that a sententia damnatoria is out of the question) and Huther on the meaning "punitory sentence." The fact that James includes himself is certainly against the latter construction. "The humility of love" (Wiesinger) surely could not cause him to assert something, which was inapplicable to Himself, and Huther's observation that the punitory sentence might be postponed, does not by any means settle the difficulty. κρίμα denotes primarily judgment, then more definitely a judicial sentence and it generally becomes a punitory sentence by the connection, just as the connection here does not make it so. Moreover, how were the readers of the Epistle to know that all teachers as such have to expect heavy punishment (German, punitory sentences). The increased measure of the sentence may be gathered from various sayings of our Lord (Matth. xxiii. 13 and elsewhere). The increased measure, to be sure, indicates that the severer sentence agreeably to nature may easily turn into a punitive sentence.

VER. 2. For manifoldly we offend all (ἁπαντες).—This assertion is absolutely valid. The Apostle includes himself without any qualification, just as Peter (Acts. xv. 11), Paul (Phil. iii. 12) and John (1 Jno. i. 8) include themselves in similar assertions. Although πᾶσι does not bear directly on the errores, qui docentibus obvenire possint (Grotius), but comprehends moral offences in the widest sense (Huther), the word is so chosen as forthwith to point to moral errors and offences and these occur for the most part in the sphere of teaching (Lehrrede=didactic utterance).

If a man offendeth not in word.—The asyndeton indicates that James progresses in the same sphere of thought and hence aims not at an antithesis, as Wiesinger rightly observes. Although the ἐν λόγῳ may not have to be limited to ἐν διδασκαλίᾳ (cf. ch. i. 19), as Pott maintains, the context requires us to think of didactic offences which were the soul of Judaizing proceedings.

He is a perfect man.—Supply ἐστι. Every word is here significant; οἷος denotes the rarity of such a man, ἄνθρωπος indicates that the Apostle refers in particular to a sphere of males and their doings, τέλειος describes once more the N. T. maturity of faith, principal completion. The proposition may easily be generalized and made to denote the ideal of the Christian life which none can attain here on earth (see de Wette); but James manifestly refers to something attainable, which is evident from what follows.

Able even to bridle the whole body.—This inference is founded on the thought that the tongue is that member of the body over which man finds it most difficult to establish the mastery and that he who does not offend in word, shows that he has established that mastery. Consequently: he who offendeth in no word and thereby shows himself to be the master of his tongue, has obtained the mastery over his whole body. But just as the inference is here not to the physical tongue as such but only as the organ and symbol of readiness of speech, so James does not "set the body as such in opposition to man" as a relative independent power which offers moral resistance to the will of the "Ego" (Wiesinger, Huther), but the body denotes here the organ and symbol of all human action with the exception of speech. The sense in brief is therefore as follows: he who truly masters his words, will also master his works. Life under the law of liberty is most difficult to be evidenced in the mastery of one's speech. Huther also afterwards acknowledges the figurative in the language of James: "The καρδιά indeed is the fountain of evil deeds (Matth. xv. 19), but the lust which is rooted therein, has so thoroughly appropriated the members of man and as it were fixed its dwelling in them, that they appear as lusting subjects and may be represented as such in living-concrete language." But the figures of the horse and the ship, which follow, prove that the reference is not only to opposing sinfulness (the seeming law in the members Rom. vii. 23), but also to the naturalness itself which is subordinated to the spirit and needs guiding; for the horse does not resist its rider, and the ship its helmsman, as the old man resists the new. Huther moreover sets here aside several explanations ("the whole connection of the acts and changes of man" Baumgarten, etc.), which are more or less well suited to define the idea on which the "as it were," in connection with the body needing to be guided, is based. But the organic concretion and membering (Gliederung=articulating) of the lusts of the heart in the sinfully untuned corporeality must be held fast.

James illustrates the power and import of the tongue by two comparisons. In v. 2 he had set it forth as being relatively the most mighty member among the members of the body, he now develops the thought that it is the ruling member, the control of which involves the control of the whole body. He takes for granted that it is only the spirit which can control the body; but the organ of its rule, the instrument to be controlled for the control of the body, is just the tongue. The word is the disposer of acts. "This whole discussion of the wild power of the tongue is not 'bombast' (Schleiermacher), but designed to make clear to his readers their perverseness." Wiesinger. Right, but James knows also a power of the tongue in a good sense.

First figure. VER. 3. But if we put the bit into the mouths of horses.—The Apostle introduces first the figure of horses, because he had already before borrowed therefrom the figurative expression χαλινάγωγησαι (v. 2; ch. i. 25). Hence the Genitive τῶν ἵππων should probably be joined with τοὺς χαλινούς (Theile), and not with τὰ στόματα (Oecumenius and al. Huther). [τῶν ἵππων appears to stand first for the sake of emphasis. Translating literally "But if of horses we put the bits into the mouth" is not English. (Alford). We have therefore expressed the idea in idiomatic English; the distinction of Lange to connect τῶν ἵππων with τοὺς χαλινούς instead of joining it with τὰ στόματα is really a distinction without a difference. We put bits into the mouths of horses, that is real, material bits; of course, such bits we do not put into the mouths of men. The sense is really the same on either construction. The similitude contains the application.—M.] The bits [Lange throughout uses the word Zaum=bridle, but χαλινός is not the bridle, but its metal mouth-piece. I have therefore uniformly rendered Zaum=bit.—M.] of horses as literal bits are contrasted with the figurative. But both kinds belong to the respective mouths: the horse-bit belongs to a horse's mouth, the man-bit to a man's mouth. Thus the principal accent lies certainly on τὰ στόματα. These constitute the tertium comparationis, not "the smallness of the χαλινός, as the majority of commentators suppose" Huther. The apodosis begins with καὶ ὅλον (Wiesinger, Huther); it is not contained in v. 5 (Theile); nor does it require us to supply something in thought (de Wette). μετάγειν occurs in the N. T. only here and v. 4.—

Second figure.—VER. 4. Behold even the ships.—The organ of guiding, probably connected with the natural unruliness of the horse to be guided, was the principal idea of the first figure: the mouth, the tongue; in the second figure it is the contrast between the smallness of the organ, the fine touch required to influence it and the greatness as well as the storm-tossed condition of the ship to be turned. The small reader on which the will of man with almost the stillness of spirits, exerts its impulse, governs the whole great ship with all the fearful reaction of the wind and the waves, which like infuriated elementary spirits oppose the firm spirit of the steersman. Hence the first καὶ, as well as ἰδοὺ, denotes intensification. The participial sentence ὅντα brings out the immense weight which the rudder has to overcome; which are so great, or though so great.—ἐλαύνειν to drive on, set in motion, is used elsewhere in the N. T. of navigating proper [cf. Mark vi. 48; Jno. vi. 19, LXX. for ἵππῃ, Is. xxxiii. 21.—M.], but then also of restless agitation 2 Pet. ii. 17. Fierce winds are the wild navigators of the ship whom the human navigator opposes with his rudder. They have doubtless a symbolical import, as Bede did think, not however as the appetitus mentium originating within, but as the great temptations (πειρασμοί) of the world, coming from without, the place of whose nativity, to be sure, is within (see ch. i. 6). The little rudder is here obviously the antitype of the little tongue. [Bede's exposition may be found useful in point of application, although it is hardly sound in point of exegesis. "Naves magnæ in mari, mentes sunt hominum in hac vita, sive bonorum sive malorum. Venti validi, a quibus minantur, ipsi appetitus sunt mentium, quibus naturaliter coguntur aliquid agere etc."—M.]

Whithersoever the direction.—Although ὁρμή hardly denotes the impulsus externus, the steersman's pressure on the rudder (Erasmus and many others), the translation "eager will, desire of something" (Bede, Calvin, Huther etc.) is hardly sufficient; ὁρμή always indicates active will developed into an effort or onset; hence here the direction, the course of the navigator, kept in action by the rudder. On similar comparisons among the classics see Gebser, Theile. [ὁρμή signifies primarily any violent pressure on-wards (ὀρνεμι), then the first stir or move towards a thing, then impulse, eager desire in the sense of will. I render "will," because the will of the steersman directs the impulse given to the rudder and thereby to the ship.—M.]—"The two similitudes of the bit and navigation have often been connected by the ancients in a similar manner, so that Pricæus even thought that James might have borrowed them from Plato or some other Greek writer." Gebser. Huther further calls attention to the circumstance that the reference here is to the actual εὐθύνων, not to the technical or official εὐθυντής.

VER. 5. Thus also the tongue.—A little member like the little rudder.

And boasteth great things.—Since μεγαλυνεῖ describes absolutely haughty and overbearing conduct, the reading μεγάλα αὐχρεῖ seems to be preferable (see note in Appar. Crit. above). For James had spoken of a great and praiseworthy doing; he could not with οὕτως pass at once from the figure of the rudder to the pernicious doing of the tongue. The ἰδοὺ moreover separates the thought under notice from the contemplation of the pernicious operation of the tongue, which follows. The selection of the term simply intimates that the tongue not only does great things, but boasts of the great things. Bede: "Magna exaltat." The explanation "accomplishes great things" Luther (similarly Oecumenius, Calvin and al.), gives tone to the fundamental idea without preserving the shading [i.e. the gradual shading off.—M.]. Persevering to the idea μεγαλανχει (Huther, similarly Wiesinger) is not based on the context.

v. 8 (second half), v. 6. Behold how small a fire.—ἥλικον gives prominence to the quantity according to the construction, either in point of greatness or smallness; here in point of smallness (Cajetan, Huther). de Wette understands it as denoting a great fire; but the Apostle's design was not so much the aesthetic contemplation of a forest-conflagration, as to point to the wicked origin thereof in a little spark; against this Wiesinger justly lays stress on ἀνάπτει [which is not=consumed, but=lighteth up, kindleth. Seneca (Cont. v, 5) employs very similar language "quam lenibus initiis quanta incendia oriantur."—M.].—Huther, adverting to corresponding descriptions in Homer, Pindar, Philo etc., points out that the concrete sense of ἔλῃ=forest, is preferable to the vaguer materia=combustible etc. [The classical descriptions are found in Homer, Il. xi. 116; Plutarch, Symp. viii. p. 730; Pindar, Pyth. iii. 66; Virgil, Georg. ii. 308.—M.].

VER. 6. The tongue also is a fire.—The figure of a spark or a very small fire producing the conflagration of a forest, is now applied to the incendiary ravages of the tongue. The tongue is fiery as to its nature in general, i. e. the organ of speech, easily inflamed by spiritual fire, by passionate, vehement and consuming impulse. James here passes over the fact that the tongue is destined to become an organ of heavenly fire, Acts ii., for his eye is fixed on the pernicious fire of fanaticism which begins to inflame the Judaistic spirits throughout the world.

It, the world of unrighteousness [that world of iniquity].—Not an elliptical clause, requiring ἔλῃ to complete it in the sense "the tongue is the fire, the world is the forest."—Morus and al. This kosmos then is a further designation of the tongue. According to Wiesinger κόσμος in general, denotes the sum-total of what is created (Matth. xiii. 35; Eph. i. 4), "the cosmos of unrighteousness," hence here "the sum-total of unrighteousness." So Huther citing ὁλος ὁ κόσμος τῶν χρημάτων LXX. Prov. xvii. 8. Calvin: "Acsi vocaret mare et abyssum." Olshausen and al., "it is as it were the unrighteous world itself, which has its seat in the tongue." See the interpretations of Theile, Estius, Herder, Gebser, Clericus (who with others holds the words to be spurious), in Huther. Oecumenius and many others read κόσμος=adornment of unrighteousness: the tongue adorns unrighteousness by rhetorical arts. Wiesinger objects 1. that κόσμος is a passive idea, 2. that the sense would be too feeble. The word need not be taken in the sense of "adornment," but we may nevertheless suppose that James here, as frequently, returns to the original signification of the Greek word. In point of fact it is the tongue which sophistically, rhetorically, poetically, parenthetically and imperatively gives to unrighteousness its worldly, apparently respectable and even splendid form. We therefore suppose that James wanted to say that "the tongue is the form of the world, worldliness, worldly culture, the seemingly beautiful world of unrighteousness." At all events he could have described it as the sum-total of unrighteousness only in a highly figurative sense. We therefore hold with Tischendorf and Neander against Huther and the majority of commentators, that ὁ κόσμος τῆς ἀδικίας does not belong appositionally to what goes before, but belongs to what follows. The addition "the sum-total of unrighteousness" would not explain the proposition "the tongue is a fire." But it is to be understood that the tongue is prominent among the members as the world of unrighteousness. It is however matter of inquiry what is the meaning of καθίσταται? The following interpretations are idle, to say nothing of their incorrectness: it stands, it is placed, it is set; that of Huther also is inadequate: it sets itself, appears in connection with what follows, as that which pollute the whole body. In agreement with the full meaning of καθιστάται and with the context, the word according to the analogy of Heb. viii. 8 and other passages, taken absolutely, denotes the presidency, the domination of the tongue among the members. In virtue of its worldly culture, which understands even how to beautify unrighteousness, the tongue rules among the members. But what a contrast between its works and its position! And it is just it, which from its prominence pollutes the whole body.—Before the world it washes all unrighteousness clean, before God or truth it stains and pollutes the whole body, i. e. the tongue, by the preceding, sinful word paves the way to all the sinful acts of all the members. Although σπιλοῦν does not suit πῦρ (notwithstanding Bengel's explanation "ut ignis per fumum"), it suits the saying "the tongue is the κόσμος," as its perfect antithesis. Apparent comeliness is the most essential deformity of life. How it pollutes the life is apparent from what follows. [But there seems really to be no objection to the rendering "makes itself," which is preferable to Lange's, because it is founded on better grammar than his and gives a good, clear and unforced sense. καθίσταται is used here as in ch. iv. 4. Huther. "The tongue by acting in and upon the members, makes itself to be the defiler of the whole body. It is so made ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ἡμῶν, which, as their name intimates, ought to move in harmonious melody and amicable concert with each other; and so glorify their maker. But the tongue mars their music by its discord. It is even like an intestine volcano; and sends forth a dark stream of lava, and a murky shower of ashes and smoke, and is thus a source of pollution, *sully*ing and staining as with foul blots (σπιλοῦσα) the beauty of all around it; and also like a volcano, it emits a flood of fire." Wordsworth.—M.].

And inflameth.—Wiesinger takes καὶ, καὶ in the sense "as well as," and sets both in the relation of logical subordination to ἡ σπιλοῦσα. We object with Huther, because the following words are not only explanatory but intensive. The tongue inflames

The wheel of the development of life.—That τροχός denotes a wheel requires no further proof (see 1 Kings vii. 30 etc.; Ezek. i. 15, 19, 20). But the question is what is the meaning of γένεσις and what is therefore the meaning of τροχός γενέσεως? According to Huther γένεσις denotes here "as in ch. i. 23" (see the passage), birth, the wheel of birth; that is: the wheel revolving from our birth, i. e. life. Similarly Oecumenius. Taking the separate features differently, Calvin and al. reach the same idea: the wheel is the curvus, the genesis is the natura; the two united—life.—Wiesinger (after Kern) passes from the interpretation "it inflameth the revolving wheel," the spherical course of being (Pott, Schneckenburger), to another: "it inflameth the circumference of our corporeal being" (literally "of that which has become"). As the axis or centre of the circle it diffuses its fire over the whole circumference. However, genesis, taken in the sense of birth, is not life itself but itself only the first revolution of the wheel. Although we need not think (with de Wette following more ancient commentators) of the orb of creation absolutely, or of the cycle of the self-renovation of mankind (תולדות כלל, Wolf and al.);

it does not follow that genesis here should be taken as birth only, and life only as individual life. The genesis of man rather progresses in an ethical sense through the whole of his earthly existence, and if it is said that the tongue setteth on fire the wheel or the revolution of the development of life, the word in this generality applies not only to individual life, but also to the life of humanity, primarily of course, to the life of the Jewish people, but in its widest sense even to the development of the life of this (earthly) cosmos. The fanatical fire, which at first made the development of the life of individual Jews a continuously growing fire of a burning and revolving wheel, at last seized the development of the life of the whole Jewish nation (for chiliastic worldliness lay at the bottom of the crucifixion of Christ and of the Jewish War) and imperceptibly communicates itself to all mankind and to the earthly κόσμος as the causality of the fiery day, the last day—immanent in the world. James is fully right in saying that it is the tongue which changes the wheel of the human development of life into a burning fire-wheel; or we might say: a ship on fire entering the port. Perhaps every man may find in his course of life a proportionate quantity of this feverish fire-impulse (see Ps. xc.) "This verb φλογίζεν is ἀπας λεγ, in N. T.; it occurs in the LXX. Ex. ix. 24. Huther, with whom we should interpret the word of the fire of passion and not with Morus "de damnis quæ linguis dat," although the self-consumption of this sin of burning passion is also alluded to, and the reference is not to a mere kindling (Michælis). [Alford renders "the orb of creation," and Wordsworth "the wheel of nature." The idea in both is really the same. The note of the latter will doubtless be prized; "The τροχὸς γενέσεως is the wheel of nature, the orbis terrarum, the world itself in its various revolutions; in which one generation follows another, and one season succeeds another; and so τροχὸς γενέσεως is used by Simplicius in Epict. p. 94, and other like expressions in authors quoted here by Wetstein, p. 670.—In a secondary sense, this τροχὸς γενέσεως is the wheel of human nature, of human life, of human society, which is compared to a wheel by Solomon Eccl. xii. 6; and so Greg. Naz. (in Sentent. ep. a Lapide), and Silius Ital. 8, 6, "rotæ volvi-

tur xvi," and Boethius (de Consol. 2, pr. 1), "Æne nostra vita est rotam volubili orbe versamus." This wheel is ever rolling round, ever turning apace, whirling about, never continuing in one stay, seeking rest and finding none. So these words of the Apostle are explained by Oecumen., Bede, and Bp. Andrewes, 1, 361; 2, 294, 319.—The functions of a wheel, set on fire by the internal friction of its own axis, are deranged, and so the organization of human society is disturbed and destroyed by the intestine fire of the human tongue; a fire which diffuses itself from the centre and radiates forth to the circumference by all the spokes of slander and detraction, and involves the social framework in combustion and conflagration.—M.].

And itself is inflamed.—Not only once, but habitually (φλογίζουμένη Part. Pres.). It is as unwarrantable to change the participle into the preterite as to explain it of the future, as a prophecy of hell-fire (Grotius and al.).

By hell. Gehenna itself uniformly and throughout to be distinguished from Sheol (besides the synoptical gospel found here only), as a symbolically described fire-region (γέεννα τοῦ πυρός) will not be wholly completed before the end of the world. The positive primitive fire of Gehenna is brought about by the immanent heat of devilish passions which proceed from the devil through his kingdom. This devilish heat, therefore, is here described as the causality of that fanatical heat of men (cf. v. 15). That fiery heat of fanaticism the origin of which the Judaists wanted to refer to God (ch. i. 18). James refers directly to the devil. And in this manner it exhibited itself by hatred, lying and death and particularly by frenzy. The strongest utterance concerning the evil tongue excepting the sayings of our Lord of the blasphemy of the Holy Ghost and the apocalyptic saying of the blasphemies of the beast (Dan. vii. viii.; Rev. xiii.)! Approximating descriptions are produced by Huther, Ps. lii. 4; cxx. 8, 4; Prov. xvi. 26; Sir. v. 15. Wiesinger in addition to the specification of sin according to the members of the body, as here indicated, cites also Rom. iii. 18; Col. iii. 5. But the latter passage belongs to another chapter; the seeming members (Scheinglieder) of the old man.—But Rom. vi. 18, 19 belongs hither.

VER. 7. For every nature of the wild beasts.—γὰρ creates difficulty. Huther thinks that it substantiates, especially with reference to v. 8, the foregoing judgment expressed concerning the tongue. But the assertion concerning the untamableness of the tongue does not substantiate the assertion concerning the depravity of the tongue. Wiesinger makes γὰρ substantiate even the preceding μεγαλαυχῇ, while Pott holds that it simply indicates the transition. In our opinion the γὰρ substantiates the words immediately preceding: "itself is inflamed by hell." Whereby will he prove that assertion? By the untamableness of the tongue. If the nature of the tongue were only animal, man, the power of human nature could tame it as well as every thing animal. But the untamableness of the tongue shows that there is something devilish in its excitement, over which human nature left to itself has no power. Only by the wisdom which is from above v. 15, can be conquered the wisdom which is from beneath, i. e. devilish wisdom, v. 15, and that not in the form of taming, breaking in and enslaving, but in the form of free transformation by regeneration. James first specifies what can be tamed,—universal animal nature, then what can tame it—human nature. Man as man is a match for a beast, but if the animal element in man is strengthened by the devils, he can acquire the superiority of the ἄνθρωπος τέλειος only by Divine grace. James divides the animal world into four classes. He first mentions together quadrupeds (not beasts in general, Pott, or wild beasts in particular, Erasmus etc.) and birds, that is the higher and more noble species of beasts. Then the dismal creeping beasts (not “animalia terrestria” in general [Pott], not only serpents in particular [Luther, Calvin], but amphibia and worms as in Gen. xxiv. 25), and the stupid sea-animals (not only fishes in the literal sense [Huther], nor sea-wonders [Luther], nor sea-monsters [Stier]). Huther: “The classification is here the same as in Gen. ix. 2, which passage may have been before the Apostle’s mind.” James doubtless thought of serpents as the representatives of creeping beasts, with reference to the conjurers of serpents, of trained fishes, dolphins or the like as the representatives of sea-animals. We see here, moreover, that even menageries or the art of taming beasts have some reference to apostolical truth. The opinion of the Apostle really amounts to this: all φύσεις, every φύσις, as further specified is subjected to human φύσις; the condition only, that man understand the natures, which are subjected to him and seize them at the right spot of want, docility or dependence. Huther rightly observes that James does not describe the relation of man the individual to individual beasts, but the relation of human nature to animal nature in general.

By human nature.—So we must take the Dative [it is the Dative of the agent—M.], not as a dativus commodi. Human nature is here the whole power of mankind, as it is made to depend on itself in dependence upon God, Gen. i.; hence not only the “ingenii solertia” (Hottinger), but that ingenuity regarded as the most proper characteristic of human δύναμις in its superiority to animal power.

Is tamed and hath been tamed.—For this is a process which beginning with the most remote past continues to the most distant future. The beasts are more and more subjected to human nature, while the diabolically excited tongue (to which in the modern world must also be reckoned the pen, so that Satan now speaks more to men by the goose-quill [or the steel-pen—M.] than by the mouth of the serpent) becomes increasingly untamable (see Rev. xiii. 6). δάμασθεῖσθαι δύναται is by this process illustrated as a fact, and consequently assumed in the two tenses of the verb, and not limited to the present only (Schneckenburger and al.); δαμάσκειν moreover denotes not the conquest of our resistance (Huther) which also takes place in conversion, but the translation into a coerced-psychico-physical dependence by the use of appropriate means. If it is said therefore that the tongue cannot be tamed by human nature, this implies also that it cannot be tamed in the form of taming. This expression may also affirm with reference to the animal world that man’s original relation to the beasts has not altogether remained the same (see Gen. ix. 2; cf. Gen. i. 28; ii. 20). Wiesinger: “In the opinion of James also man’s dominion over the creatures is not lost (cf. Ps. viii. 7, 9) but it has been modified like his relation to the earth itself.” v. 9 also furnishes a parallel to this verse.

VER. 8. But the tongue no one of men.—Estius and al.: the tongue of others; Huther, one’s own tongue. Doubtless primarily one’s own tongue, for the taming of the tongue must proceed from the heart; but the more general sense must not be lost sight of. Before the human tongue diabolically grown wild natural humanity stands as before a dragon, for whom there is not found a Knight St. George among men as they are. Bengel, who interprets: “nemo alius, viz ipse quisque,” overlooks that the antithesis between the natural power of man and a higher power is here postulated. But that which still causes James to utter an expression of indignation, is the pernicious working of the tongue in the Judaistic world of his time.

The turbulent evil.—We interpret κακὸν in the positive ethical sense as wickedness or evil and the adjective ἀκατάστατον (see App. Crit.) with reference to ch. i. 8 and ἀκαταστάσια ch. iii. 16 according to the meaning of the word in Luke xxi. 9; 1 Cor. xiv. 33; 2 Cor. vi. 5; xii. 20. The revolutionary conduct of the Judaistic tongues became at that time more and more inflamed in order to prepare for the Jewish people nothing but evil, death and ruin. [Alford thinks that the figure here seems to correspond nearly to what is related of Proteus, that he eluded the grasp of Menelaus under many various shapes. Cf. Hermas, Pastor 2, 8, πονηρὸν πνεῦμα ἔστιν ὃ κατελάλη, καὶ ἀκατάστατον δαυμόνιον.—M.]

Full of death-bringing poison.—The diabolical nature, the death-bringing serpent-virulence of the strife of tongues; contains substantially the same idea, as the opinion expressed in the preceding verse; “inflamed by hell,” Ps. lviii. 5; cxl. 4.

The duplicity of the (fanatically excited) tongue, vv. 9–12. The new element which is introduced (but not noticed by Huther and Wiesinger) in v. 9, is the falseness, the duplicity, the self-contradiction and consequently the self-judgment (i. e. self-condemnation) of the tongue. The serpent-like nature of the tongue, v. 8, forms an apt transition to the duplicity of the same, inasmuch as it is simultaneously deceitful and venomous.

VER. 9. Therewith bless we the Lord.—(See Appar. Crit.) ἐν is instrumental. Blessing and cursing constitute a familiar antithesis; the blessing, εὐλογεῖν, בָּרַךְ, as applied to God, denotes however praising Him. The unusual connection “the Lord and Father” appears to have been stated not without design. Although the Lord here does not directly designate Christ, yet it describes God as the God of revelation, who has finally revealed Himself in Christ as Father. In Him even the Jew praises unconsciously and reluctantly the revelation of God in Christ. (Rom. ix. 5).

And therewith curse we men which.—A difficulty, insufficiently noticed by many commentators, arises from the circumstance that the Apostle includes himself in we. In order to escape it, Benson, Gebser and al. suppose that the reference is solely to those who set themselves up as teachers. To be sure the reference is primarily to them, but then also in general to the Judaistic element as a whole. Is the proposition a general confession of sins concerning the abuse of the tongue? or a hypothetical judgment; if we curse men, we do so with the same tongue wherewith we praise God? The design of a particular reproof forbids the former, and the premising of the fact the latter. The difficulty may be solved either by taking the second clause as a question expressive of surprise or by hearing James speak as the representative of his people in the name of his guilty people. [Alford recommends the retention of which instead of who, which would personally designate certain men thus made, while which is generic. This distinction, he continues, which some modern philologists are striving to obliterate, is very important in the rendering of Scripture, and has been accurately observed by our English translators.—M.J.] The latter is probably the most natural solution.

Have been created after the likeness of God.—That is, the subjects of this Lord, the children of this Father according to their destination, or also the images representing this Lord and Father. This is the glaring contradiction. Wiesinger and Huther (the latter with reference to Bengel's "remanet nobilitas indelebilis") here observe that sinful man also remains created in the likeness of God (Gen. i. 26). Without detracting from the general application of the proposition the Apostle may be thinking of such men, in whom the likeness of God (ὁμοίωσις) i. e. the actuality and visibility of the image, has reappeared [Germ. "has become again," wieder geworden—M.J.], i. e. Christians, and particularly according to their majority, Gentile Christians. With regard to them, the contradiction of the cursing Judaists, was perfect; they praised the Father of revelation, they cursed the children of revelation.

VER. 10. Out of the same mouth goeth forth.—It is the sinful mouth as to its fanatical excitement in general, but the mouth of Judaism in particular as at that time it continued traditionally to praise God in the Old Testament and began with talmudical rancor (the source of the later Talmud) to curse the Gospel and its adherents.

It shall not be thus. [ὅν χρῆ, ἀδελφοί μοι, ταῦτα οὕτως γίνεσθαι. These things, my brethren, ought not so to be.—M.J.] This address to the brethren hardly means only: it is not right that these things (denoting the substance) are done thus (denoting the form). χρῆ has its full weight and denotes at once that the thing must not be done according to the oracle [here of course with reference to the revealed will of God—M.J.] and that the thing itself is unprofitable (with reference to χράσται). Moreover the Plural ταῦτα and the emphatic οὕτως are to be noticed. [χρῆ is ἀπαξ λεγ. in N. T.—M.J.]

and the bitter?—βρῖνεν, ἀπαξ λεγ., to bubble over, overflow [Lange renders "bubble" with an evident attempt to find a word as nearly intransitive as possible. βρῖνεν is generally intransitive, but it is used transitively by Anacreon, 37, 2 ἰδε πᾶς, ἔσπος φανέντος, χάριτες πόδα βρῖνονεν. It means therefore "to cause to burst forth," and this is the reason why I render "send forth."—M.J.], ὅπῃ, the opening of the fountain [ὅπῃ is probably connected with ὅψ, ὅπτομαι, to see; Wordsworth adds that so the word Ænon (the place of springs) is derived from the Hebrew אֵינ (ayin), an eye, Jno. iii. 23.—M.J.]; the sweet and the bitter describe the heterogeneous waters applied to blessing and cursing. Such an occurrence is unknown in nature, hence in the moral world also it only appears as something monstrously unnatural. The fountain is not exactly man, but the disposition, the heart. Out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth (the chink of the fountain) speaketh (Germ. Whereof the heart is full, the mouth overfloweth.—M.J.). However here again the reference is not to the moral unnaturalness of this duplicity in general but the concrete bearing of the reproof on Judaism becomes increasingly apparent. It is not the Divine purpose and law that the fountain of Judaism in its historical going forth for the world should send forth such a contradiction between praising God and cursing the children of God. The application to the end of the Christian Middle Ages lies near.

VER. 12. Can a fig-tree, my brethren, yield olives?—The figurative statement of the preceding verse is continued in the figures taken from nature, i. e. the idea that nature does not bring forth that which is contradictory and inconsistent. But if the former figure was meant to say: "your duplicity [double-tonguedness] is like a fountain which sends forth at the same time sweet water and bitter, if it were possible to find such a fountain," the figures which now follow set forth with still greater distinctness the impossibility of such a contradiction in nature. And this certainly brings out not only the reprehensible and morally unnatural character of duplicity, but it also expresses the idea that one of the two must be false, either the cursing or the blessing; so that if their cursing the images of God be true, their praising God must be lying and hypocrisy (Huther). To this must be added that in the metaphors which follow the reference is to the character itself, as is the case in the saying of our Lord Matth. vii. 16.—Thus we infer their double-mindedness of character which is false on the side of godliness (διδυχογῶς) from their duplicity of speech. It may however seem strange that James should use several examples in order to corroborate the thought that as nature is always at unity with itself, true and consistent, so also ought man to be true and consistent. The multiplying of examples has primarily the effect of illustrating more forcibly the general application of the law of life, which the Apostle had laid down. But the supposition might occur that the examples may have also a symbolical import. The fig-tree, the symbol of a luxurious natural life cannot bring forth olives, the symbols of spiritual life. The vine, the symbol of theocracy and ultimately of Christianity, cannot produces figs, happiness [i. e. outward], the fulness of the Jewish natural life. The meaning whereof would be as follows: if you want to be natural Jews you cannot bring forth the fruits of the children of the Spirit; but if on the other hand, you want to be Christians, you must not cherish Jewish ideals, sit under the fig-tree of outward prosperity and expect to enjoy its fruit. This would explain the last figure after this manner: as the salt-spring or the salt-current is a mixture which cannot yield pure and drinkable refreshment of life, so a mixture of Jewish severity and hardness and Christian vitality cannot produce the pure water of life of the New Covenant. We leave this symbolism undecided as a whole, but maintain at all events that the salt water is designed to denote a mixture, in which the two elements pure by themselves, have been stained and corrupted. Salt water cannot be drunk. This would give a train of thought which beginning with duplicity in speech passed on to double-mindedness and thence again to its final cause, doubleness of belief, the mixture of legalism and evangelical vitality. On similar biblical figurative modes of speech among the ancients, see Gebser, p. 290; Theile, p. 196.

The contrast of false and true wisdom in speech as to their origin, character and opposite operations. vv. 18-18.

V. 18. Who is wise and intelligent among you?—The same words occur in LXX. Deut. i. 18; iv. 6. Heb. חָכָם וְנָבוֹן. Wisdom is the knowledge of ends acquired by enlightenment; intelligence (or understanding, German, Einsicht—M.), the knowledge of relations acquired by experience and practice [Wisdom is the gift of God, intelligence and knowledge are the results of education.—M.]. The Apostle's question sounds like an exclamation of the greatest anxiety; it characterizes the desperately bad spiritual situation of Israel. Their few wise and experienced men are to rise and conjure the storm by the wisdom of gentleness.

Let him show out of a good conversation.—James is here more explicit and definite in describing the works to which he had referred as evidences of faith in ch. ii. Such as flow from a good or beautiful life, in which it develops itself. And in order to remove all doubt concerning the main object he has at heart, he adds emphatically: in meekness of wisdom. We refer this clause to the whole proposition which precedes it: all the works of this good conversation are to culminate in meekness of wisdom.—The deviating construction of Neander: let him show it by his good conduct; "his works in meekness of wisdom" is recommended by a certain vivacity and pregnancy, but requires the verb to be mentally repeated; the αὐτοῦ also would be rather in the way while the demand of the exhibition of works, so common to James, would be rather obscured. αὐτοῦ is based on τίς, who wants to advance true claims to being wise. Every weakening of the expression ἐν πραΰτητι σοφίας either by reading "meek wisdom" (Bede and al.), or "wise meekness" (Laurentius), affects the full sense of the words: the meekness wherein wisdom evidences itself (Wiesinger somewhat different: which is proper to wisdom and proceeds therefrom), see ch. i. 19, 20. [Alford: "in that meekness which is the proper attribute of wisdom"—M.]. Wiesinger thinks that it describes the disposition attending the doing; but James obviously calls for the activity of meekness, for meekness itself in corresponding acts. It alone was able to deliver the Jewish Christians as well as the Jews from fanaticism, conjure the storm and save the hope of Israel. See the promise Matth. v. 5.

V. 14. But if ye have bitter zeal [emulation].—This was the real situation of affairs and on this account James addresses them personally on the subject. We render ζήλος not jealousy but zeal, for doubtless the reference is primarily to a religious and not to a moral passion. James means the specifically Jewish emulation which was considered by those who exhibited it as enthusiasm for the glory of God, as Paul describes it Rom. x. The adjective shows that it was a false, unholy zeal; πικρὸν indicates passionateness and animosity; this certainly turns zeal into jealousy, for religious zeal becomes zealous and fanatical through the admixture of jealousy and hostility. Ἐριθεία is really the envy, rivalry and party-strife rooted in venality; so Paul frequently uses the word (Rom. ii. 8; 2 Cor. xii. 20 etc.). ἐχετε denotes not only an active having but a real fostering.

In your hearts.—"In contrast with the word of the readers who make boast of their wisdom." Huther.

Boast not.—The offence of their excited teaching, striving, judging and cursing was twofold: firstly a haughty self-elevation or proud demeanour against others, secondly a more or less conscious lying suppression of their better consciousness. But both sins were more aggravated from being directed against the truth itself. According to Wiesinger ἀληθεία denotes Christian truth (because otherwise ψευδοθε would be tautological: to lie against the truth). Huther seems to understand by it only the real fact that the condition of the heart is in opposition to the word. But with James theocratical truth and Christian truth converge into one truth of the revelation of God, the effect and import of which are in the lives and consciences of men. The boasting and lying therefore was directed not against a mere object and against a mere fact; but it was a haughty and hypocritical insurrection against the very truth which the zealots, with an evil conscience, professed to protect (see Rom. ii. 23). It becomes more and more evident that James addresses not only the Jewish Christians, but his nation in general.

V. 15. [For] this wisdom is not that.—"Negatio cum vi praemissa" Theile. αὐτῇ must be taken in connection with ἡ σοφία, the latter is therefore introduced ironically here as in Matth. xi. 25; 1 Cor. ii. 6; false wisdom the opposite of the true. Luther's translation: "This is not the wisdom which cometh down from above" must be corrected accordingly. The participle κατερχομένην emphatically denotes the continual coming down, as in ch. i. 17; it has therefore adjective force and must not be resolved into the Indicative as do Schneckenburger and al. The expression is a little difficult, but it ceases to be so if we consider that it is the purpose of James to give the most emphatic negation to the false pretence that it was ἀνθεν κἀρεχουμένη. Hence he gives his judgment: it is on the contrary (described false by the use of three adjectives) earthly, sensuous, devilish. It is earthly as to its earthly nature and origin and thus opposed to the heavenly (Phil. iii. 19); it is sensuous or properly speaking psychical (Luther has the improper rendering "human;" the Vulgate better "animalis;" Allioli following it "animal;" Stier and de Wette: "sensuous," which in consideration of the modern idea of "sensuousness" may pass [for want of a better term—M.], having its origin in a psychically restrained passionate constitution deprived of the rule of the Spirit (1 Cor. ii. 14: iii. 8; Jude 19) and is opposed to the spiritual [pneumatical] wisdom—of the spiritual life excited by the Holy Ghost; it is devilish (δαμονιώδης is ἀπαξ λεγ.), proceeding from the devil or inspired by accursed devils and is opposed to the Divine. Hornejus has not wrongly delineated the moral sides of these evil characteristics: "terrena, quia avaritia dedita est, quæ operibus terrenis inhiat; animalis, quia ad animi lubricitatem accommodatur; demoniaca, quod ambitioni et superbiæ servit, quæ propria diaboli vitia sunt." These were surely also the characteristics of Judaistic and Ebionite zealotism. The earthly was peculiarly exhibited in their chiliastic claims to the rule of the earth, the psychical in their fanatical and hateful passions, the devilish in their great errors nourished by haughtiness and hypocrisy.

VER. 16. For where is emulation [zeal] and party-strife.—γάρ makes this assertion the proof of the one preceding it. In what goes before James describes a wisdom properly animated by evil zeal and party-strife, and designates it as earthly, sensuous and devilish. The proof is that that spirit of emulation and party-strife is so disastrous in its consequences. He does not say "where is such wisdom," for he has torn the mask of wisdom from this evil spirit of emulation. In its nakedness it is carnal and devilish conduct. ζήλος occurring here without the adjective πικρός might lead one to think at once of jealousy, but the zeal is sufficiently characterized as evil from being connected with rivalry and party-strife. Everywhere is exhibited the rebellious element. ἀκαταστασία is not only mere disorder but the dissolution of order; in the theocratic sense it denotes rebellion (Numb. xvi.; Prov. xxvi. 28), in church-life a seditious spirit opposing the order of God, who has constituted civil order (Rom. xiii. 1, etc.) and church order (1 Cor. xiv. 38).

And all manner of [every] evil work.—ἐπιλον might be rendered "foul" (German "faul") in an ethical sense. [Shakspeare uses the word in the sense of wicked, abominable. "A foul fault:" "Foul profanation." The current value of "faul" in German is rotten, lazy, its ethical value denotes moral rottenness, evil.—M.] Such was the situation of Jewish affairs at that time. The rebellious attitude broke out everywhere in insurrections against the Christians, which were the prelude of the insurrection against the Romans, with numerous episodes of evil work, and all proceeding from the same fountain of diabolical fanaticism.

VER. 17. But the wisdom from above.—

See Proverbs; the Wisdom of Solomon; Sirach; Matth. xi.; 1 Cor. viii. Its first characteristic is distinguished from the others, as its principle.

Consecrated [pure].—ἀγνή. Really consecrated [or hallowed—M.], i. e. not only pure from the influence or even from the inspiration of worldly, carnal and devilish motives, but only chaste, free from the spirit of apostasy into which the fanatical zealots fell, but also animated by the Divine Spirit and therefore wholly consecrated to the service and glory of God; consequently full of a dignified and priestly character. From this principle flow its social virtues. It is peaceable, ironical (Matth. v. 9), equitably disposed (1 Tim. iii. 3), gladly yielding ([compliant—M.]. Εὐπειθής the opposite of stubborn, ἀπειθής Tit. iii. 5; not "easily persuaded," but well inclined to enter into the views and reasons of others, compliant). All this as opposed to the contentiousness of false zeal. But it not only resists evil, but overcomes evil with good; it is full of compassion (in the widest sense, in its sympathy with the necessitous ch. i. 27; ii. 18) and good fruits, in which compassion is evidenced. The contrast is exhibited in the seditious character and the foul doings of false wisdom. So stood in those days Christianity over against its enemies and so it was to show itself also in the Jewish Christians over against Judaism. This attitude of wisdom induced James still further to add in its praise ἀδιάκριτος, ἀνυπόκριτος! de Wette, Wiesinger and Huther render the first word "without doubting;" that is, consequently, confident, decided. This would give a good sense if 1. the reference here were not to social conduct and 2. if a certain correspondency between ἀδιάκριτος and ἀνυπόκριτος were not necessary.—Now since the word (as well as that which follows) has to be taken in an active sense, although its primary meaning is passive (not distinguished, undecided, so that the first word might mean "undivided," "being a unit" [einheitlich], there being only one wisdom—"non duplex" Wetstein; "simple" Neander—and the second undivided, i. e., without any false admixture) the idea "not separatistic, not sectarian" seems to lie nearest (so Baumgarten, Schneckenburger and al.: "quæ non discernit homines;" Luther, Grotius, etc.: "without partiality;" Vulgate: "non judicans;" Semler: "non temere judicans"): With this corresponds then ἀνυπόκριτος, without hypocrisy, without dissembling, sincere Rom. xii. 9; 2 Cor. vi. 6. [The reader is referred for further information on ἀδιάκριτος to notes on ch. i. 6–8; ii. 4; on ἀνυπόκριτος to ch. i. 22, 26; ii. 1].

VER. 18. Fruit of righteousness.—This difficult expression might be taken literally as follows: the fruit which consists in the life-righteousness as just described (Genit. appos. not only justification, Schneckenburger), is once more turned into seed, it is sown in the world, primarily among erring brethren, in peace, i. e., in the form of peace, in the exhibitions of a peaceful demeanour [not εἰς εἰρήνην, i. e., unto eternal life, de Wette], and then becomes the lot of the children of peace as the harvest of peace and the kingdom of peace. But Wiesinger rightly calls attention to ch. i. 20. "For the wrath of man worketh not, accomplishes not the righteousness of God," and adds "that which the readers pretend to realize by their contentious wisdom, can only prosper under the quickening influence of peace." The righteousness of God in its full manifestation in the world, for which Christians are yearning and for which at that time the Jews in particular were yearning also, is a harvest-fruit which has to be sown by the peaceful demeanour of the peacemakers (τοῖς ποιούσιν εἰρήνην Dat. actionis. Huther). The term καρπός, etc., would be therefore "a pregnant expression for: the seed, which yields the fruit of righteousness, is sown." (Huther). This construction is also favoured by the remark of Huther, made elsewhere, that James is fond of beginning his speech with the teleological leading idea. Huther rightly observes that the sowing is not only teaching proper (Schneckenburger), still it remains a fundamental form of evangelical peace-making. The dat. comm. in τοῖς ποιούσιν "for the children of peace," is reluctantly given up and Wiesinger would like to connect this meaning with the Dat. actionis. It must be observed, however, that the world-historical harvest of righteousness will affect all men, although it will be a kingdom of peace only to the children of peace. The words of the Apostle therefore were primarily an exhortation addressed to his readers, i. e., to the twelve tribes to this effect: if you really seek the righteousness of God, then prepare the future harvest of righteousness in such wise that as children of peace you scatter the seed by a peaceful behaviour (which includes, to be sure, the peace of the Christian righteousness of faith). Sow peace and you will reap righteousness to your joy. But the idea must be so construed that the Apostle is made at the same time to lay stress on the fact that the harvest of righteousness is prepared under all circumstances. Whether you join in or not: that righteousness, for which you suppose to contend in zealous party-strife, is now sown with the patience of the sower (see ch. v. 7) by the peacemakers who are really in the world, by Christians in their exhibitions of peaceful demeanour (ἐν εἰρήνῃ hardly denotes mere mode, but rather the form of the seed, evangelical peace), and at the time of harvest it will appear in its full maturity.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The fault which James reproves in the greater part of this chapter, is nothing but a natural manifestation of the egotism of sinful human nature, a fault which, although suppressed, is by no means fully overcome even in Christians. It would seem that, as elsewhere, there were many among the first readers of this Epistle in particular, of whom the author knew or at least was afraid that they were more fond of speaking than of hearing, more fond of teaching others than of receiving instruction themselves. He therefore seizes the fault, described in ch. i. 19, 26 by the root, at the same time pointing out, that those who set themselves up as teachers, are in the greatest danger of bringing on themselves greater condemnation than their hearers. His doctrine in this respect is in perfect agreement with that of our Lord, Matt. xii. 36, 37.

2. There are not a few in our day who set up as teachers and leaders of the congregation without being sufficiently prepared for this important and difficult work, who thus render more difficult the work of the duly appointed servants of the Gospel and scatter the flock without cause; and there are others who suffer themselves to be duly led and to be prepared for the holy ministry, but whose desire to enter the ministry springs from very impure motives. How desirable that both would seriously lay to heart the teaching of James on this subject! [Ministerial preparation is not sufficiently appreciated by the uneducated portions of the laity and not unfrequently made light of by the ecclesiastical authorities. In a new country, like America, the supply of ministers is not equal to the demand and owing to this circumstance men morally and spiritually fitted but intellectually and educationally unfitted, are frequently put in charge of churches, whose best interests are apt to be grievously affected in such incompetent hands. The moral and spiritual qualifications of candidates for the holy ministry is a conditio sine qua non, but their possession cannot cover or supply intellectual and educational deficiency. How can a man preach the Gospel intelligently and beneficially, if he is ignorant of the first principles of correct interpretation, completely at sea in scientific theology and void of all knowledge of Church History and other cognate branches of a theological education? If these lines are read by any minister, who is conscious of his intellectual deficiency, the writer would affectionately entreat him to remember that he ought to be thoroughly equipped for the study of God's Holy Word and that he cannot teach his people aright, if he does not understand aright. The cacothēs docendi is a great evil in our days and has ruined many a man, who had he only been content to sit awhile on the students' bench might have been eminently successful in the ministry.—M.]. It is of course self-evident that the Apostle's warning is not directed against a great number of teachers as such, which on the contrary is in many respects useful and desirable (cf. Eph. iv. 11), but rather against an eager pressing into the Ministry of the Word, when men touch the Holy illotis manibus. The language of Homer: "οὐκ ἀγαθὴ ἡ πολλοκουανίη, εἰς κοίραν ἔστω." ["The rule of many is not good, let there be one ruler"—M.], applies also to Church government.

3. The familiar saying of James "manifoldly we offend all" is frequently but erroneously taken and used as a dictum probans of the doctrine of the universal sinfulness of human nature. The author speaks not of men in general, but of Christians in particular. He considers not so much gross transgression as sins of infirmity and haste; and particularly the danger to which the hearer is less exposed than the teacher, namely the danger of offending in word. The preacher of the Gospel may very easily offend in word, on the one hand by setting forth his own perverse notions instead of the objectively given truth of salvation, or on the other by onesided preaching or by want of clearness and simplicity. Thus he may even involuntarily give offence and estrange his hearers, or on the other hand, he may lull them into a false sleep of peace and thus do infinitely more harm than good with his preaching. How urgently ought he therefore to press the exhortation that men should not prematurely set themselves up as teachers, since probably they would do much better to continue disciples a little longer! Cf. Heb. v. 12. But this warning ought not to deter any one who sincerely desires to serve God in the ministry of the Word and truly loves the Lord and His Church. By watchfulness and prayer the servant of the Gospel may preserve himself from many sins of the tongue. The best corrective, in this respect, is doubtless the petition Ps. xix. 15; cxli. 8.

4. In order to form a correct estimate of the magnitude of the sins which Christians also commit with the tongue, first of all it must not be forgotten that the faculty of speech is originally a Divine gift bestowed on man. Compare Herder's Origin of Language (1770), a work which is still very valuable. This idea was not unfamiliar even to the pagans. Cf. Hesiod: ἔπος καὶ ἦμα, v. 79; Horat. Od. 1, 10, vv. 2, 3; Ovid, Fastor., v. 667. See also Dr. J. C. Amman's Dissertat. de loquela, Amsterd. 1700, and especially Schubert, History of the Soul, 3d ed. 1839, p. 163-163. "The word uttered is only the outward sound of the begetting inward language of ideas through the corporeal medium." Ennemoser.

5. No Christian moralist may omit to bestow the greatest possible attention on the doctrine of James concerning the sins of the tongue. For speaking is also a doing and a doing of such daily and manifold occurrence, that its good and its evil consequences are all but incalculable. Compare the familiar French proverb: "le style c'est l'homme," and the motto of the well-known diplomatist Talleyrand "le langage est donné pour cacher ses pensées." No wonder that the Old Testament abounds in warnings against the perverse use of the tongue; see e. g. Ps. xv. 24, 34, and other passages.

6. In saying that "if any man offend not in word, he is a perfect man," James of course takes for granted, that such a mastery of the tongue is not solely the fruit of a politic wisdom, but rather the fruit of Christian self-control as the product of faith and love. He who has learned from this principle to set a watch before his lips, may with certainty be supposed to have attained so high a degree of discretion and life-wisdom, that to him the performance of any other duty cannot be particularly difficult, still less impossible. Cf. Prov. x. 19; xiii. 3; xvii. 27. But in order to obtain and to preserve the mastery of one's tongue, one must before have become master of one's most violent emotions and remain collected in one's intercourse with friends and enemies. Ps. xvi. 32. Cf. the language of Plutarch on this head: "de capienda ex hostibus utilitate," opp. ed. Reiskii, Tom. 6, p. 355 sq; also "de gerrulitate," Tom. 8, p. 13 sqq.

7. "Plutarch (de Auditione, p. 187, and in conviv. Sept. p. 556, vol. 6, ed. Reiskii) relates that Amasis, King of Egypt sent a sacrifice to Bias and requested him to send back the best and the worst part thereof: Bias sent back the tongue." Heubner.

8. James who wrote his Epistle as a warning to believers, from the nature of the case could only advert to the harm caused by the abuse of the tongue, not (or only slightly) to the profit that might accrue to the cause of the Lord by the well-ordered use of the power of speech. To realize this light-side of the matter ought to be the daily effort of every Christian, but more particularly that of the Christian teacher.

9. The words of James (v. 9) would be unmeaning, if he meant that only the first man bore the likeness of God, which by the fall was wholly and eternally lost to his descendants. The ravaging power of sin is manifested not in the potentiality but in the actuality of man's likeness to God, and the Conf. Belg. art. 14, is therefore right in speaking of small remnants (scintillule) of the Divine image in fallen man, which are perfectly sufficient to take away all his excuses. [Art. IX. of the Articles of Religion in the Church of England and the Prot. Ep. Church in the U. S. says: "man is very far gone from original righteousness."—M. J. Lange (Positive Dogmatik, p. 299) is perfectly right in saying that "man is the image of God, i. e. the visible form of the Infinite in the totality of his being. The Being of God consists in His eternally embracing Himself perfectly in the clearness and liberty of His Being, in that He is the Absolute Spirit. And in like manner the being of the image of God consists in man's living in himself as a spirit, in his continually taking back the whole manifoldness of his existence into the unity of his consciousness and out of it re-forming it anew."

10. The doctrine of James (vv. 11, 12) exhibits a remarkable agreement with the sayings of Christ in the Sermon on the Mount (Matth. vii. 16-19; Luke vi. 43-45); a new proof that the publication of the fundamental law of the kingdom of heaven could not be forgotten by this servant of the Lord.

11. The bearing of James concerning the wisdom, which is from above (v. 18 etc.) is remarkable for its recalling not only many of the proverbs of Solomon but also many cognate ideas in Jesus Sirach and the Book of Wisdom. James, although occupying a purely evangelical standpoint, is nevertheless full of the ethical portion of the Old Testament, and in part even of the deuterocanonical writings. However it is impossible to examine the doctrine of this entire chapter more closely without discovering that the author himself has and exemplifies that heavenly wisdom, which in vv. 16, 17 he has so admirably and beautifully delineated as contrasted with earthly wisdom.

12. Very important is the connection of knowledge and life, on which James here insists. He who does not prove his wisdom by works, which have the seal of a meek disposition, contradicts himself and gives the lie to his confession of the Lord, which he is constantly making. He may boast in the possession of the truth but he is an opponent of the truth, if he does not receive it as the principle of his life; cf. 1 Jno. iv. 20, 21. His wisdom, as contrasted with that from above, is purely earthly, as contrasted with that of the pneumatical man purely psychical, as contrasted with that of good angels (cf. 1 Pet. i. 12), even devilish.

13. "The peaceable scatter in peace the seed of genuine Christian wisdom, which grows into the harvest of righteousness. This applies not only to teachers but to every one who has received from God wisdom and the gift to influence others." Von Gerlach.

14. The seven qualities which James attributes to the wisdom from above (v. 17) are nothing but the seven colours of the one ray of light of heavenly truth, which has been revealed and has appeared in Christ Himself. He is therefore supremely entitled to the name "the Wisdom of God" (Luke xi. 49).

15. Even the closing sentences of this instruction reëcho notes from the Sermon on the Mount, Matth. v. 8, 9.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

A. vv. 1-12.

The lust of rule one of the most ancient diseases in the Church of Christ.—Even the manifold warnings of Christ (Matth. xviii. 1; Jno. xiii. 12-17 and other passages) have been insufficient hitherto to prevent disputes about precedence among those who confess Him.—The higher the position we hold before others, the greater will be our responsibility.—"Manifoldly we offend all." The remaining infirmity of the elect.—The truth, solemnity and comfort of this saying.—The use and abuse which may be and at different times have been made of this saying.—How the knowledge of our own, manifold infirmities ought to make us judge others leniently.—No matter how much the Christian may offend, he ought nevertheless to advance.—Christian self-control.—Man, lord of the animal creation but not lord of himself.—Even the bravest sailor suffers each time ship-wreck on the rocks of the tongue.—The power of the tongue evident 1, from the harm it can do, 2, from the utter impossibility of wholly subduing it.—The faculty of speech which makes man superior to the beasts is not seldom the means of making him inferior to them.—The sad part acted by the evil tongue in every century of the history of the Christian Church.—The sinful tongue is the sinful man. Sinful man is able to raise himself above every other irrational creature but he is unable to raise himself above his own nature.—That which is impossible with men, is possible with God.—The sad want of many men's conformity to their proper being.—How extremes meet also in the use of the tongue.—That which is never seen united in nature, is often simultaneously found present in men.—Man at once a lord and a slave (v. 5. "Behold how small a fire kindleth how great a forest.") Suitable text for a Reformation-sermon. [That is a sermon preached on the festival of the Reformation, which in Germany is kept October 31, the anniversary of Luther's fastening the 95 theses to the door of the Castle Church of Wittenberg A. D. 1517.—M.]—There is not a thumb's breadth between our strong side and our weak side.—The melancholy inconsistency and the still sadder consistency of the abuse of the tongue.

STARKE:—He who wants to teach others in spiritual things, ought to be first well established himself. A man must be a pure and obedient sheep of Christ before he can become a shepherd. Hos. iv. 6.—Many, although they have not Divine wisdom and experience but possess only a literal knowledge, acquired not in the school of the Holy Ghost, but from the books and writings of men, straightway presume to be guides of the blind etc. Rom. ii. 18.

QUESNEL:—If all men have to observe caution in speech, how much more those, whose office requires them frequently and religiously to discourse of holy things? Rom. xv. 18.—Men must fairly strive to attain evangelical perfection, especially if they seek to be employed in the Ministry, 2 Tim. iii. 17.—

OSIANDER:—If a man is able to govern his tongue so effectually as not to utter any thing censurable, he is doubtless equally able so to govern and guide his body as not to indulge in any vice, Job xxvii. 4, 5.—Many men are more unruly than a horse—men whom God by the infliction of severe punishment has to make somewhat orderly. David cautions us against this disposition Ps. xxxii. 9.—If irrational creatures suffer themselves to be guided and ruled, how much rather ought rational creatures suffer it likewise? Is. i. 3.

LUTHER:—The tongue guides men either to virtue or to vice, 1 Cor. xv. 33.—The tongue of a Christian is ruled only with the bridle of faith and love, Ps. cxvi. 10.

QUESNEL:—Who knows not how to govern his tongue, is like a passenger on a ship without rudder in the open sea exposed to the fury of the storm.—If the rudder of our body is controlled by the Spirit of God, we sail in safety on the sea of the world, Rom. viii. 14.

CRAMER:—Many have fallen by the edge of the sword, but infinitely more by evil tongues, Sir. xxviii. 21.

LANGH OP.:—How easily may an uncircumcised and untamed tongue cause discord in a whole family, so that the best of friends fall out with one another! Sir. xxviii. 15, 16.—God has distinguished us from the brutes by the use of the tongue, and we are distinguished from one another by the good or evil use we make of it, Ps. cxix. 23.

HEDINGER:—Evil tongues and bad lungs have caused the death of many. The former spiritually and mostly. How much murder is committed with the tongue? how forward and swift is this poor member to wound the conscience? Whoso is wise puts a lock to his lips. Sir. xxii. 38.—O God, create us a new tongue, that we may praise Thee! Prov. xviii. 21.—

QUESNEL:—There is no sin, of which the tongue may not be the cause and instrument, and which as a poisoned seed it may not contain, Matth. xv. 18.—Think, O ye liars and slanderers, how shameful and hurtful a member ye carry in your mouth! Ps. lvii. 5.—Whoso desires to be delivered from the sins of the tongue must particularly apply himself to work in faith at the bottom of his heart by repentance and renovation, Matth. xii. 38.—As the Holy Spirit did set on fire the tongues of the Apostles with godly zeal, so contrariwise the spirit of hell sets on fire the tongues of the ungodly with venom and great malice to crush the good name and reputation of their neighbour, Acts ii. 3, 4, 11.—The diligence of men is able to change the wildest natures of beasts! but none is able to change the sinful nature of men, save the Wisdom and Omnipotence of God, Ez. xxxvi. 26.—God must needs take a coal from His altar and touch our tongue or it cannot be tamed. We stammer by nature like Moses, until God makes us eloquent, Is. vi. 5.—The tongue of the hellish serpent has thrown us into the greatest confusion, but the tongues of the Holy Ghost show us again the way to eternal peace, Acts ii. 4, 38.—We shun serpents, yet consort with people that carry poison in their mouths, Ps. xlv. 4; lv. 22.—How ill-suited it is that those should engage in the praises of God, the whole of whose lives dishonour God! A golden collar cannot be so ill-becoming to a sow covered with filth and dirt as the praise of God to a filthy sinner, Am. v. 23.—

LANGH OP.:—The nobility of human nature is very exalted and no man may offend it in word or deed without sinning against God, Gen. ix. 6.—We ought to honour the image of God in every man be he never so bad, 1 Jno. iv. 12.

STARKE:—Man is so perverse, that there is nothing left in the world which is like him. He wants to render impossibilities possible, to do good and evil at the same time, which is contrary to the whole order of nature, Eccl. i. 15; Ps. lviii. 4.—If we want to show others their follies and sins, we must not do it in boisterous scolding, but in compassionating brotherly love, 2 Tim. ii. 24, 25.—Words are fruits enabling us to form an estimate of the heart, i. e. the tree which bears them; if this is pure, the others are not bad, Matth. xii. 23.

STRICK:—Future accountability is solemn and difficult even in the case of our own soul. Who would lightly undertake to be accountable for the souls of others? Indeed is it not written, "Many are called but few chosen"—who will call himself in order to fall with so much more surety into condemnation? Many did it then, and alas! many do it now. "But howsoever, let me, I pray thee, also run after Cushi," said Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, and would not be dissuaded when he was told "thou hast no good tidings ready." He stuck to his "let me run." (2 Sam. xviii. 19-23). There are many such teachers and runners, who are not sent. They surely are not the true teachers and masters that shall shine as the brightness of the firmament (Dan. xii. 3),—but they will stand illy.—"Manifoldly we offend all"—James included himself in this confession in order to put to shame the proud brethren. Not indeed that he intended to expose the supposed errors of his Divinely-inspired Epistle to their criticism or now to ours, but he rather meant solemnly to assert respecting life in general apart from the sacred office, that the perfect man who does not even trip in a word, cannot be found anywhere. Even the Apostles were assuredly not sinless, holy and infallible in their daily and hourly private life; the promise of the Holy Ghost to guard them from all error related only to their sacred office, just as it was with reference to their office and the principal and fundamental truths of their message that the seventy as well as the twelve were told "He that heareth you, heareth me."—Although the proud tongue may boast, I can be silent, or I can thoroughly dissemble myself—it is a thing beyond its control, there it is brought to shame. The most expert hypocrite can never reach such a point of dissembling as to prevent its failing him even in a word; the heart runs over, the hell within bursts out on the tongue. Our speech is and remains the nearest, surest and most irresistible effluence of the heart. What follows lastly from James's sermon against the sins of the tongue? Whither they lead—to the world full of unrighteousness, whence they come—from the inward abyss of corruption—he has shown; it is not difficult to apply here the only remedy.

HEUBNER:—We are more on our guard with respect to sins in deed than with respect to sins in word.—Whoso fails to govern his tongue is like a rider on an unruly horse, or like a sailor in a ship without a rudder.—The tongue is a channel which transmits the evil of hell.—An unconditional impossibility to tame the tongue does not exist. If thy tongue is cursing, it is unfitted for praise.

VIEDEBANDT:—The rule of the tongue is more important than the rule of the world.—What an evil full of deadly poison is many a newspaper tongue!—If Satan has your heart, he also rules your tongue. The tongue and the heart are only a span apart.

NEANDER:—James attacks the being of mock piety at all points. Such is that pious cant which while it utters the praises of God in words, hatefully censures and condemns men, in whom the image of God ought to be honoured, aside.—Thus James points out the fundamental idea of this whole Epistle, that everything depends on that disposition which gives direction to a man's whole life, the recognition of which truth was as remote as possible from that tendency, attacked by him at all points, which only considers the outward, single acts, and the appearance of things.

JAKOBI:—The Apostle shows from the harmony, visible in universal creation, that it is unnatural and therefore ungodly and therefore displeasing to God if the same tongue is used in the service of heaven and hell, and if praises and curses proceed out of the same mouth. God, says another Apostle, is a God of order. Because the fig-tree, the olive tree and the vine bear fruit each according to its kind, figs, olives and grapes, and because sweet fountains and salt fountains always send forth the same kind of water and because of this order in nature, God rejoices in all his works (Ps. civ. 81), and looking down from heaven upon the earth, behold, all things are very good. Therefore it cannot be good and well-pleasing to God, if contrary to the Divinely appointed order the gifts and faculties intrusted to man are employed in opposite uses, if the same tongue which has just stammered the praise of God, utters shameful words, folly and unseemly jests. Therefore as long as this continues to be done among Christians, so long as we who have just had on our tongue the sweet word of God, indulge in bitter revilings of those who share with us the greatest of all blessings, as long as out of the same opening of the mouth there flow such sweet and such bitter streams, so long the sad dissension of sin continues in us, and we do not yet stand in the unity and truth of the Divine life.

LISCO:—The sins of the tongue: 1. They are of all sins the most corrupt; 2. They are of all sins, the most difficult to be avoided.—He who governs himself solves the problem of the Christian life.—The tongue 1, is the communicator of our thoughts and 2, ought to be solely the mediator of good.

PORUSSKY: (vv. 1, 2):—Religious conversation in social life.—(vv. 8-12). The tongue of scandal.

BECK:—Three golden rules for a Christian's life: 1, have humility in your heart (vv. 1, 2), 2, have truth in your mouth (vv. 8-9), 3, practise faithfulness in your life (vv. 10-12).

W. HOFACKER (Sermons p. 635):—Our speaking tongue one of the greatest gifts of God's grace.

Vv. 1-10. Epistle for the 16th Sunday after Trinity in the Grand Duchy of Hesse and elsewhere.

GEHOK:—Watch thy tongue: 1, It looks so little and so small 2, Yet worketh such great things for all; 3, Kindles many a fire of hell, 4, Yet heaven has ordered it so well [German: 1, Sie ist nur klein und scheint gering 2, und richtet an so grosse Ding; 3, sie hat manch Höllenfeuer entzündet 4, und führt doch ein so himmlisch Amt.—M. J.]

RUPPERT:—Several oft-forgotten duties to be practised by the Christian in order that he may become master of his tongue in his intercourse with others.

ALT:—The evil word towards one's neighbour.

B. vv. 13-18.

Vv. 13-18. Epistle for Quinquagesima Sunday in the Grand Duchy of Hesse and elsewhere.

The difference between abstract knowledge of Christian truth and true life-wisdom.—The tree is known by its fruit.—Meek wisdom the crown of Christian virtue.—The intimate union of truth and love on Christian ground. The wisdom which is from above, and the wisdom which is from beneath; the sevenfold more exalted character of the former and the threefold baseness of the latter.—The wisdom from above: 1, how it is evidenced, 2, how it is rewarded, 3, how it is learned.—The harvest feast of the peaceable: 1, the seed, 2, the fruit, 3, the harvest-joy; here in its beginning, hereafter in its perfection.—James himself is in his Epistle a continuing proof of the truth of what he says, vv. 13-18.

STARKE:—The possession of a natural, wise, prudent understanding is a great gift of God, but to be truly enlightened with the light of truth is invaluable, Prov. iii. 13; 2 Cor. iv. 6.

CRAMER:—Our Christianity is then inseparable, for a good understanding have all they that do His commandments, Ps. cxi. 10.—Many men's meekness is a worm-eaten fruit of nature. They are rather tamed lions than meek sheep of Christ, Matth. xi. 29.—

NOVA BIBL. TÛB.:—Wisdom and meekness are noble virtues which ought to regulate the whole of our conversation; they are the springs of all other virtues, Prov. xix. 2.—Those who are ready to dispute and quarrel and are ever at odds with their neighbour, exhibit an infallible token that they are still lacking true wisdom, Prov. xviii. 6; xx. 8.—

be an enemy of all disputing and contention, 2 Tim. ii. 24.

CRAMER:—Cunning is not wisdom. Hence little wisdom in the fear of God is better than much wisdom allied to contempt of God, Sir. xix. 21.—

QUESNEL:—The wisdom of the world is very different from the wisdom of the Gospel. It is only cunning wisdom whose end is to rule on earth, but which is ruled itself by nothing but brutal lusts, 1 Cor. i. 21; ii. 7, 8.—Sin punishes itself even in this world, because man in the service of it does not enjoy his life on account of the great trouble and annoyance to which sin puts him, Ps. xxxii. 10.—

CRAMER:—As smoke causes pain to the eyes and prevents their seeing distinctly, so it happens to reason and wisdom, for if it is disturbed by the passions, it cannot see any thing and decide what is white or black, right or wrong.—The most simple Christian who practises these seven qualities of virtue will be wiser than the seven sages of Greece. Remember only one for each day of the week.—Those who scatter the poison of their evil heart in anger, contention and brawling, will reap from it the unhappy fruit of eternal trouble, tribulation and anguish, Rom. ii. 8, 9.—Be content, ye peacemakers, if your souls are afraid to dwell with those that hate peace, (Ps. cxx. 6), remember that ye shall hereafter dwell forever in a peaceable habitation, Ia. xxxii. 18.—

STIER:—To be only prudent and understanding does not amount to much and is a very doubtful and suspicious thing, but to be wise and prudent, that is the right thing.—Every good gift as well as true wisdom is from above, but that which is passed off for it with lying against the truth, all false wisdom is not from heaven, but earthly; not from the Spirit of God but human, from man's soul, flesh and blood; not from Christ the King of the kingdom of God, the destroyer of the works of the devil, but rather devilish still, from the influence and seduction of evil spirits. Indeed on this profound saying of James might be written a history of all knowledge falsely so called, of all so-called philosophy or even theology.—All the trouble and confusion in the Church, all the disorder and unruliness or rebellion of self-will opposing the Spirit of God originates in the brawling of carnality; hence schism, factions, sects, hence other evils and particularly also evil hypocrisy under coerced unity. Even in the world and in things earthly a family and many a city give unceasing testimony that good cannot mature under the influence of envy and contention, but that these conduce to nothing but evil. Still more lamentable and ravaging are the contentions concerning God's Word in the house and city of God, the carnal wrangling of brethren and members in Christ.—Many are officiously engaged in imparting to others opinions, which are their truths and in disputing away errors—but where is the good fruit of all these efforts? whom have they improved thereby, converted and won for the kingdom of heaven? On the other hand look at many quiet people in the land: they make no noise, they do not deal in great things, they walk everywhere in meekness and gentleness—but wherever they go they carry something along with them, which passes from them like a breath of life;—the words which they utter at the right time, are seeds—all their walk and work burst into fruitfulness around them with a silent, deep power, and many things are recorded on high as the fruit of their righteousness, whereof men know and suspect nothing. Grace works by them, they live in love and this is their deep power.—“Fruits, gentlemen, fruits that shall make men whole.” It was this which the king of Prussia demanded of the University of Königsberg, and truly it was a great royal word, a Solomonic word, in its time. Wholesome, healthy fruits will grow where healthy seed has been sown, but the seed itself had before grown as the produce of ripe fruit; thus righteousness is sown and transmitted from one to another.

HEUBNER: (v. 15).—This is a description truly applicable to those who by their writings,—either immoral, provoking vice, or irreligious, undermining the faith of Christians—especially if they exhibit skill and genius, have exerted the influence of devils upon the world. The subtle and disguised ones are the worst; subtle poison insinuates itself most thoroughly.—Earthly wisdom effects nothing good for eternity.—

NEANDER:—Holy Scripture often designates, by the name of the flesh, all evil, whatever is opposed to the Spirit of God, to the Divine life. If the word is used in this general sense, it includes also man's spiritual nature, reason and the soul, as far as it has not been made subject to the Divine Spirit, but persists in its selfish being, pretends to be something by itself, independent of God, without (extra) God and hence opposed to Him. The term flesh in this biblical sense includes all these ideas. Its meaning is by no means restricted to what we call flesh, sensuality in the narrower sense of the word. Now if we take flesh in this more general sense, biblical usage distinguishes it from that which in the narrower sense is designated as psychical, i.e., the spiritual [part of man], as far as it is made not to conform to God, but to conform to the world [German: “In sofern es nicht vergöttlicht ist, sondern verweltlicht.”]. Reason however cultivated remains still within the sphere of the psychical [i.e. the rational soul not only not influenced by the Divine Spirit but rather influenced by the physical and the cosmical. The German for psychical is seelisch, as stated before.—M.J.]. The seed of whatever is truly good in action, proceeding from righteousness, can only prosper where peace reigns and with those, the end and aim of whose actions is peace. Where all is strife, nothing truly Christian can prosper.

JAKOB: (on the feast of the ingathering of the harvest):—What a description of wisdom! Truly such wisdom cometh from above, from the Father of Light with whom every thing is light, and pure and holy; thence it cometh as the best and most perfect light, communicated by Him, in whom is treasured up the fulness of all good, communicated by the Son of Eternal Wisdom and Love to all those, who renouncing earthly, human and devilish wisdom, and looking to Him alone in simplicity of faith, suffer Him to create in them a pure heart and receive a new sure spirit, the spirit of truth, which is also for this very reason the spirit of true wisdom.

PORUBSZKY:—Wisdom in action.—Envy sets us at variance 1, with God, 2, with man, 3, with ourselves.—

BECK:—Heavenly wisdom the fountain of earthly peace.

SCHMALTZ: The fire of discord.

KÖSTLIN:—Of true, Christian wisdom as contrasted with false, earthly wisdom.

ALT:—With the wisdom of Christians we will overcome the evil of time.

[v. 2. BARROW:—To offend originally signifies to impinge (infringe), to stumble upon somewhat lying across our way, so as thereby to be cast down, or at least to be disordered in our posture, and stopped in our progress: whence it is well transferred to our being through any incident temptation brought into sin, whereby a man is thrown down, or bowed from his upright state and interrupted from prosecuting a steady course of piety and virtue. By an opposite manner of speaking (Ps. xxxvii. 23, 24) our tenor of life is called a way, our conversation walking, our actions steps, our observing good laws uprightness, our transgression of them tripping, faltering, falling. By not offending in word, we may then conceive to be understood such a constant restraint and such a careful guidance of our tongue, that it doth not transgress the rules prescribed by the Divine law, or by good reason; that it thwarteth not the natural ends and proper uses for which it was framed, to which it is fitted; such as chiefly are promoting God's glory, our neighbour's benefit, and our own true welfare.—

— A constant governance of our speech according to duty and reason is a high instance and a special argument of a thoroughly sincere and solid goodness.—

— The offences of speech are various. 1. Some of them are committed against God, and confront piety; 2. others against our neighbour, and violate justice, charity, or peace; 3. others against ourselves, infringing sobriety, discretion, or modesty; 4. some are of a more general and abstracted nature, rambling through all matters, and crossing all the heads of duty.—

Cf. on this subject Dr. Barrow's sermon on this text; Bp. Butler on the Government of the Tongue, an abstract of which is here given; Bp. Taylor's Sermons on the Good and Evil Tongue; On Slander and Flattery; On the Duties of the Tongue.

Abstract of Butler's Sermon on the Government of the Tongue. (Bohn's edition.)

“One of the most material restraints under which virtue places us in the obligation of ‘bridling the tongue.’” Let us then ask

1. What vice is opposed to this precept? and
2. When can a man be fairly said to act up to it?

1. The vice alluded to is not evil-speaking from malice, nor from selfish design. It is talkativeness or a disposition to talk at random without thought of doing either good or harm. Now talkative persons, when other subjects fail them, will indulge in scandal or divulge secrets; or, further, they will go on to invent matter, and all in order to engage attention; and if a quarrel ensue, they will defame and revile their enemy, but without malice.

As all our faculties may be made instruments of evil, so also the tongue. Deliberate and wilful falsehood, indulged in from malice or revenge, does not arise from having no government of the tongue. But there is a vicious habit, without malice, which arises from a desire to arrest attention; and in these people the very least thing excites the tongue, and so gives birth to innumerable evils, especially to strife. Its effects are often as bad as those of malice or envy; it wrongly distributes praise and blame, and, being used at random, always does harm.

2. In what does the government of the tongue consist? We are to measure our faculties by the end for which they have been given to us. The end of speech clearly is to communicate our thoughts to each other, either for real business or for enjoyment. In this secondary use, it contributes to promote friendship, and so is serviceable to virtue and its tendency is to general good.

Corresponding to these two uses is the abuse of speech. As to its primary end, deceit in business does not come within our scope. It is in its secondary sense that it becomes the object of our inquiry, for the government of the tongue relates chiefly to what we call Conversation. Certain cautions are to be observed in governing the tongue. First, that there is a fit time to speak and a time to keep silence. This rule is too often forgotten; and they who forget it, too often, if they amuse at all, amuse at their own expense. The times for silence are when they are in company of their superiors, or when the discourse is of subjects above themselves; and these obvious rules are generally passed over by those who in their talkative mood forget that the very essence of conversation is that it should be mutual, and talkative persons are generally disregarded. Men, then, should be silent, both when they have nothing to say, or nothing but what were better left unsaid.—

In talking on indifferent subjects, the first rule is not to spend too much time on them; the second, to be quite sure, that they are indifferent. Conversation about other people and their matters is often very dangerous; as in such cases we cannot always be indifferent and neutral, or escape being drawn into rivalry. But as we cannot entirely avoid speaking of others, we should take care that what we say, be true. It is important to know the characters of the bad as well as the good, and abuse will scarcely follow, if these two rules be observed: 1st, That to speak evil of a man undeservedly is worse than to speak good of him undeservedly, for the former is a direct injury to the person as well as to society. 2nd, That a good man will always speak all the good which he can of his fellows, and never any harm unless he has some positive reason for so doing; for example, just indignation against villany, or to prevent the innocent from being deceived. For we must always study justice: and we do justice to society at large by exposing bad characters.

Those who observe the above cautions and precepts have due government over their tongues.—M.]

[v. 8. WORDSWORTH:—St. James follows up the metaphor of the preceding verse with an argument a fortiori. We can rule irrational animals with a bit; how much more ought we to be able to govern ourselves! And if we rule our tongues, we do in fact govern the whole man; for the tongue is to man what a bit is to horses, and a rudder is to ships; it rules the whole; let it therefore be governed aright.—M.]

[v. 5. VIRGIL, Georgic 2, 808.

"Nam sepe incautus pastoribus excidit ignis,
Qui furim pingui primùm sub cortice tectus
Robora comprehendit, frondesque elapsus in altas
Ingentem oculo sonitum dedit; inde secutus
Per ramos victor, perque alta cacumina regnat
Et totum involvit flammis nemus; et ruit atram
Ad coelum piceâ crassus fuligine nubem;
Præsertim si tempestas à vertice sylvis
Incubuit, glomeratque ferens incendia ventus."

For the benefit of those not familiar with Latin, I subjoin Davidson's translation. The quotation itself mutatis mutandis forcibly illustrates the incendiary ravages of the tongue.

"For fire is often let fall from the unwary shepherds
Which at first secretly lurking under the unctuous bark, Catches the solid wood, and shooting up into the topmost leaves,

Raises a loud crackling to heaven: thence pursuing its way,
Reigns victorious among the branches and the lofty tops, Involves the whole grove in flames, and darts the black Cloud to heaven, condensed in pitchy vapor;
Chiefly if a storm overhead rears its fury on the woods,
And the driving wind whirls the flames aloft."—M.]

[v. 6. WORDSWORTH:—That world of iniquity, that universe of mischief, as containing within it the elements of all mischief; as the world contains within itself mineral combustibles and volcanic fires, and electric fluid, which may blaze forth into a conflagration.

—By the faculty of speech man is distinguished from the rest of creation: by it his thoughts are borne, as upon eagles' wings, to the remotest shores, and are carried to distant ages; by it they are endued with the attributes of omnipresence and immortality; by it men are reclaimed from savage ignorance; by it cities are built and are peopled, laws promulgated, alliances formed, leagues made; by it men are excited to deeds of heroic valor, and to prefer eternity to time, and the good of their country to their own; through it the affairs of the world are transacted; it negotiates the traffic of commerce, and exchanges the produce of our soil and climate for that of another; it pleads the cause of the innocent, and checks the course of the oppressor; it gives vent to the tenderest emotions; it cheers the dreariness of life. By it virtuous deeds of men are proclaimed to the world with a trumpet's voice; by it the memory of the dead is kept alive in families. It is the teacher of arts and sciences, the interpreter of poetic visions, and of subtle theories of philosophy; it is the rudder and helm by which the state of the world is steered; it is the instrument by which the Gospel of Christ is preached to all nations, and the Scriptures sound in the ears of the Church, and the world unites in prayer and praise to the Giver of all good, and the chorus of Saints and Angels pours forth hallelujahs before His throne.

Such being the prerogatives of speech, it is a heinous sin to pervert the heavenly faculty, to insult the Name of the Giver Himself, or to injure man, made in the image of God. All true Christians will put away profane and impure language, calumny and slander, injurious to God's honour, the welfare of society, and their own eternal salvation. They will abhor it worse than pestilence, and they will pray to Him from whom are the preparations of the heart, and who maketh the dumb and the deaf, the seeing and the blind, who quickened the slow speech of His servant Moses, and put words of fire into his mouth, and whose Spirit on the Day of Pentecost descended in tongues of fire on the Apostles, and filled them with holy eloquence, so to direct their thoughts and words, that both now and hereafter they may ever sing His praise.—M.]

The master said, What is the reason that when I ordered thee to buy me good and bad food, thou didst bring tongues? The servant answered, From the tongue both good and evil come to man: if it be good, there is nothing better; if bad, there is nothing worse."—M.]

REFERENCE TO THE INFALLIBLE TOKEN OF AN UNSPIRITUAL (FANATICAL) MENTAL CONSTITUTION FOUNDED ON WORLDLY-MINDEDNESS, VIZ.: THE WARS AND FIGHTINGS IN THE JEWISH CHRISTIAN WORLD AND PARTICULARLY IN THE JEWISH WORLD BOTH INWARDLY AND OUTWARDLY.—THE CONSEQUENCE THEREOF: FAILURE AND FRUSTRATION OF THEIR STRIVING, THEIR MURDEROUS ENVYING, THEIR WARRING AND EVEN OF THEIR PRAYING.

CHAPTER IV. 1-3.

- 1 From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your
- 2 lusts that war in your members? Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and
- 3 cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not. Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts.

Verse 1. 1 A. B. C. Cod Sin. and al. insert a second  $\pi\theta\epsilon\sigma\upsilon$ .

Language: Whence then [are] wars and whence fightings among you? Is it not hence: from your lusts, which [especially] wage war in your members.

[Whence are . . . ? Are they not . . . —M.]

Verse 2. 2 Rec. and some minuscules read  $\delta\epsilon$  after  $\epsilon\chi\epsilon\tau\epsilon$ . A. B. G. K.  $\omicron\upsilon\kappa\ \epsilon\chi\epsilon\tau\epsilon$ ; C. Cod. Sin. Vulg. Griesbach and al.  $\kappa\alpha\iota\ \omicron\upsilon\kappa\ \epsilon\chi\epsilon\tau\epsilon$ .

Language: Ye desire it and ye have it not, ye murder and ye strive and ye cannot obtain it; ye fight and ye make war, and ye get it not, because ye ask not.

[Ye desire and ye have not: ye commit murder and ye envy, and are not able to obtain; ye fight and make war, and ye have not, because ye ask not.—M.]

Verse 3. 3 Notice the interchange of  $\alpha\iota\tau\epsilon\iota\sigma\iota\varsigma$  and  $\alpha\iota\tau\epsilon\iota\sigma\theta\epsilon$ . Cod. Sin. intensifies the last word of this sentence into  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\delta\alpha\omega$ .

Language: Ye ask and receive it not, because ye ask illy [desirable in your interest] that ye may waste it in your lusts.

[Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may spend it in your lusts.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

ANALYSIS:—See above in summary of contents. The Apostle comes now to worldly-mindedness [i. e. the lust of the world—M.] which lies at the bottom of the fanatical zeal of teaching and wrangling described in the preceding chapter. He began with the appearance of visionariness (ch. i.), passed on to party-spirit (ch. ii.), then portrayed fanatical striving in its outward aspect (ch. iii.) in order to come now to the inward disruptions and breaches among the readers of his Epistle and to worldly-mindedness, which is really the root from which they spring. By and by (ch. iv. 4 etc.) we shall meet it in the shape of selfishness and a bias to apostasy (ch. v.), as self-righteousness ripe unto judgment. The Apostle moreover passes more and more from the Jewish Christians to the Judaizing Christians and from these to the real Judaistic Jews themselves. This suggests the remark that James put this Epistle into the hands of the Jewish Christians in order that it might influence all Jews, as it were, as a missionary instruction to the converted over against the unconverted, and to the rightly-converted over against the badly-converted. Notice the rapid transition from the thought immediately preceding, viz.: that righteousness can prosper only in peace, to the impressive question: πόθεν πόλεμοι, the answer to which is contained in a second question appealing (Wiesinger) to the conscience of the readers (Huther).

VER. 1. Whence then are wars and whence fightings?—Not only dogmatical disputes between the teachers (Schneckenburger), or civil contentions concerning "meum" and "tuum" (de Wette). It is a true picture of the hostile dissensions of the Jewish people. Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, Alexandrians, Samaritans—on this basis sprung up nothing but new dissensions; believing or Christian and unbelieving Jews. The former contained as yet in the germ the opposites of Nazarenes and Ebionites, of Essene-gnostic and Pharisaic-vulgar Ebionites, the latter the shocking discord which appeared in the Jewish war and during the siege of Jerusalem. The πόλεμοι were the basis: the condition of war [warlike attitude], the μάχαι, single quarrels and fightings, which certainly partook occasionally of the character of skirmishes and at a later period even of battles; this is denied by Laurentius: "non loquitur Apostolus de bellis et caedibus, sed de mutuis dissidiis, litibus, jurgiis et contentionibus." [Alford renders "militate." To act the soldier is the real meaning of σπαρτερομένον.—M.].

Is it not hence?—The explanation; for ἐντεθεν is not a separate question: from hence? (Michaelis).

From your lusts.—ἡδοναί are more than ἐπιθυμιαί (Huther); they are desires actualized, a life of sensual indulgence (Luther: voluptuousness, Wollüste). These wage war chiefly in the members. The members need hardly be emphasized as being the camp of the lusts (Wiesinger); nor is the idea that they war against the soul (Rom. vii. 23; 1 Pet. ii. 11; de Wette) the leading idea. Theile, Schneckenburger and others rightly apply the term to the war of the lusts among themselves. Huther thinks it denotes an inward warfare against our fellow-men, but ἡδοναί would hardly be the most suitable word to bring out that idea. We might however think of the members in a restricted and in a wider sense; the members of individuals and the members of the people. From the individual Jew, whose lusts become inimically opposed in his members, the division and dissension between spiritual selfishness and vain worldly-mindedness are communicated to the members of the whole nation. Wiesinger thinks the fightings denote opposition of the ἐπιθυμιαί and the οὐκ ἔχειν. The fruitless struggling however is only an appearance and a judgment of this fighting. It is described in four gradations: 1, desiring; 2, murdering and envying; 3, fighting and warring; 4, praying and not receiving. To the first corresponds not having, to the second not obtaining, to the third an increased not having, to the fourth an increased not receiving. The first grade denotes Judaism full of chiliastic worldly-mindedness up to the time of the New Testament. The second grade describes particularly the attitude of the Jews towards the Christians. The third grade comprises the development of the Jewish war. The fourth is mainly the history of Judaism after the destruction of Jerusalem. Such a definite mapping out of periods was of course not intended by the Apostle, but it describes the process of the development of Judaism as unfolded by history. The common construction that the reference here is either to the desire of individuals or of entire churches, and the limitation of the object of that desire to worldly riches and glory are inadequate to the prophetic relation in which James stood to his people. [Alford cites a remarkable parallel from Plato, Phædo. p. 68, c: καὶ γὰρ πολέμους καὶ στάσεις καὶ μάχας οὐδὲν ἄλλο παρέχει ἢ τὸ σώμα καὶ αἱ τοῦτον ἐπιθυμιαί.—M.].

VER. 2. Ye desire it and ye have it not.—The indefinite object at all events is implied; in the most general sense the object of the chiliastico-judaistic longing for the world [Weltsehnsucht, i. e. longing for the dominion of the world—M.], in the utmost variety of form and colour, nominally the fruit of righteousness, ch. iii. 18. The antithesis pregnantly expresses the fruitlessness of the struggle. Ye have not has of course also the sense: ye receive not (de Wette); but it declares at the same time that they receive not, because they have not, because they are empty (Luke xix. 26). [Desire is not possession; there is many a slip between the cup and the lip.—M.].

Ye murder and ye envy.—This strong expression has induced commentators to submit various modifications of it arising from their supposition that the Apostle here addresses only Christians and refers as yet only to the internal dissensions among the members themselves. Ye kill your own soul (Oecumenius), ye envy (according to the conjectured reading φθονεῖτε, Erasmus, Calvin and many others), ye hate (according to the doctrine that hatred is murder in thought 1 Jno. iii. 15. Luther, Estius, Wiesinger, Huther) ye strive even to murder and death (Carpov, Schneckenburger). Winer rightly advocates the literal sense of the term. That φθονεῖτε is not mentioned first proves nothing: for the two terms are not intended to a stronger and a weaker degree of conduct, but the negative and positive sides of their conduct. They committed murder because they thought they were zealous for the glory of God. With their striving they were hunting for the fleshly ideal of the glorifying of their religion. On that account also murder must come first. The twelve tribes, however, who had already killed the Lord Himself and Stephen, who were in part responsible for the death of the Baptist and James the son of Zebedee, who had already shown the disposition to kill Paul, and who soon after did kill the author of the Epistle himself, had to submit to this address; the Christians among them were at least sympathizing with these national offences. But their acts of murder and strife were wholly in vain, as were afterwards the acts of the inquisition, the hierarchical judicial murders and religious wars of the zeal of the middle ages from the Crusade against the Albigenses to the Thirty years' War. Ye do not attain your terrible, hypocritical end, the Babel of conscience-monarchy in the pseudo-glory of Zion.

Ye fight and ye make war.—These words are not merely explanatory of πόλεμοι v. 1 (Huther), for the primary reference is no longer to the quarrels among the Jews themselves. Their individual words become at last open fighting, and this leads to open warfare. Hence οὐκ ἔχετε is repeated here, and, as we read with Griesbach and Lachmann, with καὶ preceding it, "and yet ye have not, i. e. ye get it not." We join this with what goes before in order to constitute the third antithesis, not with what follows (Huther) to introduce the specification of the cause of all their disappointments.—Not till then follows the reason, not only of the frustration of their warring, but also of their murderous striving and desiring. All lacks the true life of prayer, which purifies, hallows and adjusts our efforts to the Divine disposition of affairs. But the probable protestation of the Judaists: "we pray much," prompts the Apostle to add an ironical self-correction which brings out the fourth and most terrible antithesis. Their asking (αἰτεῖν) is evil praying (αἰρεῖσθαι). The Apostle having introduced an interchange of Active and Middle—see Winer, p. 297: Matthiä II. p. 1097.—he may here either take the Active as denoting importunate asking or the Middle as denoting egotistical praying for oneself. The latter is probably intended, and for the reason that they pray for the help of Jehovah for a fullness of prosperity which they intend to squander in the lusts of their worldly mind. We have here to remind the reader of the visionary expectations of the Jews during the destruction of Jerusalem, of their gloomy lamentations in the post-Christian synagogue (how they make God Himself weep over the unhappiness of His people) and of their vain, worldly striving and their description of the most sensual carousals in the future Kingdom of God.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It is indeed a sad contrast if we oppose the name of Christ as that of the Prince of Peace

(Is. ix. 6) to the wretched quarrels and disputes of those who call themselves Christians and yet not uncommonly carry on such quarrels in His name. The question of James "Whence are wars and whence fightings among you?" may be addressed with equal pertinence to the countless sects and parties in just as many Christian communities in every age of the Church's history. The cause is really still the same now which it was in the Apostolic age, viz.: the carnal mind which exhibits the selfishness of the natural man, after he has been baptized. The Church of Christ, which ought to be a Zion of peace, has in consequence become a Babel of confusion. But the serpent-seed of discord bears even now the same unhappy fruit which it did then. The sword which the loveless man turns against his brother, wounds his own hands, and in proportion as men covet what is their neighbour's, they themselves grow poorer in true peace.

2. There is no greater enemy of the true spirit of prayer than the spirit of quarrelsomeness and contention, cf. 1 Pet. iii. 7. It is impossible to find faith where love is wanting; how then can the unbelieving prayer of an ἀνὴρ διψέχου (cf. ch. i. 6-8) obtain any thing at the Lord's hand? Many a complaint of prayers not answered would surely cease, if men did not confine themselves to hearing their hearts only concerning the disappointment they have experienced, but would also examine their consciences concerning hidden guilt, which renders the hearing of prayer on the part of God morally impossible. Cf. Is. i. 11-15.

3. Prayer in order to be well-pleasing to God must ever go hand-in-hand with a God-consecrated life. There is no greater horror in the sight of God than prayer which irreconcilably contradicts the inward and outward life. Cf. Prov. xxviii. 9; Ps. xxxiv. 16, 17.

4. The Christian is permitted to pray also for outward things, provided it be done in the spirit of absolute submission and resignation to the Divine Will, to the glory of His name and in the name of Christ. The rule Matth. vi. 33, applies also here. If this mind is wanting, prayer will not be followed by peace filling the heart, and this very want of true peace consequent upon prayer is an intimation that we need not expect the fulfilment of the desire uttered by us in prayer. Cf. Conférences sur la prière, par J. Martin, Paris, 1849, p. 111 etc.

5. Prayer is evil first respect of the object, if we pray for some vain, unprofitable or foolish thing; secondly in consideration of the disposition, if we pray in a vain, covetous and boisterous spirit, that is without submission and filial trust, without leaving every thing at the disposal of God. Heubner.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The disputes and quarrels in the Christian Church—a great proof how little the wisdom which is from above is understood and practised, ch. iii. 16.—Every sensual and selfish lust which is not killed in the heart of the Christian, sooner or later must work disastrously to the detriment of fraternal communion.—Disappointed hopes should not fill us with bitterness and hatred against one another, but rather prompt us to humility and believing, confiding prayer.—It is not sufficient to pray only, all depends upon the manner how we pray and in what spirit.—God not a God of disorder, but a God of peace in all churches of the saints, cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 33.—The history of prayers that have not been heard. Examples: Deut. iii. 26; Jno. xi. 8-6; 2 Cor. xii. 8, 9 etc.—Prayer the true thermometer of the spiritual life.—He who prays illy need not expect more than he who prays not at all.—What our Lord said to Salome applies to many a praying man, Matth. xx. 22.—In prayer we must not think first and foremost of ourselves, but chiefly of the glory of God and the welfare of our neighbour.—A Christian prays not that he may bend the will of God according to his will, but in order that he may shape his will according to God's.—No prayer without work, no work without prayer.—

By caring and by fretting,
By agony and fear,
There is of God no getting,
But prayer He will hear.

*Mit Sorgen und mit Grünen
Und mit selbsteigner Pein, Lässt Gott sich gar nichts nehmen,
Es muss erbelen sein.* cf. Ps. cxvii. 1, 2.

STARKE:—Even with believers Satan attempts to bring about all manner of evil. He sows tares among the wheat, Matth. xiii. 25.

LANGIL, OP.:—The wars of the world are nothing but outbreaks of the evil heart, in which the evil lusts fight against God, against man and also among themselves, Ps. cxl. 8.

CRAMER:—Many a man rakes and scrapes and strives to get everything for his own use to no purpose, and labours tooth and nail but only hinders himself therewith.

QUESNEL:—It is a great mercy of God not to hear men if they offer unjust prayers, Ps. lxvi. 18.

STIER:—It is natural that the heathen, before Christ teaches them peace, break the battle-bow (Zech. ix. 10) and live fighting and warring with one another; but where Christendom knows and confesses the name of God, peace ought surely to be there. To be sure, this so-called Christendom upon earth, inclosing (not contrary to the Divine purpose) as a net many nations, is far from being the Church of Saints, the Body of the Lord, animated and occupied by His Spirit; hence to this day bloody wars are waged even between Christian nations, and it cannot be otherwise because of righteousness against unrighteousness; the vigorous conduct of such wars is the Christian duty of rulers and ruled (kings and subjects) in the right place to which the sword put by God into hands [of lawful authority—M.] belongs. Moreover the good fight of faith must go on among Christian nations, states and churches, the sword of the spirit must be drawn against whatever is unchristian and ungodly, just as every holy man must fight for peace with the devil and with the world. But James makes no reference whatever to this good fight; he doubtless includes pure zeal for the truth in love, directed against all unrighteousness and whatever belong thereto in word or deed, in the peace in which the fruit of righteousness should be sown (ch. iii. 18). But for all, enough remains for this cutting question: "Whence are wars and whence are fightings among you, quarrelling and discord in word and deed among brethren and members of the Church of God, evil wars on a small scale like those without among the nations?"

JAKOBI:—Do not even desire that which cannot benefit thee in things pertaining to God, and whatever thou dost desire, desire it only in as far as it furthers thy eternal salvation. But if thou prayest only in order to have and to enjoy, if thou openest communication with God only in order to receive or as it were to extort from Him worldly gifts, thou dost indeed draw nigh to Him with thy mouth and serve Him with thy lips, but thy heart is far from Him.

NEANDER:—James like Paul here presupposes an inward conflict in man, the conflict between flesh and spirit. As Paul calls the powers of evil the law in the members, because the body is the outward manifestation of man and because the dominion of sinful desires exhibits itself on and in the body, so James speaks of the lusts that war in the members.

VIEDEBANDT:—The real trouble-states (Stören-friede=disturbances of peace) in the world are seated deep in the hearts of men—the worldly lusts.—Peace among men is the consequence of peace in men.—Who carries his point among men by quarrelling, is always the loser no matter how much he may gain besides, for he loses with God.—There is relatively little praying in the world and besides, much of that little is evil praying.—Most men desire the gifts of God, not God Himself.—Envy seeks quarrel and quarrel brings woe.—We find often many obstacles in the way by our desires. Why? Because self-will and pride present obstacles to Divine help.

LISAO:—The sinful lusts.—The dissensions of worldly life.—The nature and consequence of lusts.

PORUBSKY:—The deepest root of all strife.

[v. 1. Harmony ought to reign in the members (ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν). The word μέλος signifies 1. a limb, a member; 2. a song and then the music to which a song is set, an air, a tune, a melody. ἐν μέλει, in tune, harmoniously. The Greek word μέλος would suggest the double idea of member and harmony to a Greek ear and I cannot but consider the selection of the word to have contemplated such an allusion), but now they exhibit strife and discord, the confusion of the camp and the violence of an armed soldiery. The lusts act the part of soldiers (στρατιωμένον), they are not only encamped within us and foraging (Alford), but they are acting the part of soldiers, engaging in all the offices of military service.—M.]

[v. 2. φονεῖτε. This was especially true of those bands of logotai, sicarii, robbers and assassins, who, under the name of zealots, infested Jewish society at this time, and at last made the Temple itself a den of assassins. See Matth. xxi. 18. Evidences of the blood-thirsty spirit of rage, which now like a fiend possessed the heart of large numbers of the people, may be seen in the murderous plots and violent and frequent outbreaks at this period, mentioned in Josephus (see below), and in the Gospel and Acts, such as that of Barabbas (Matth. xxvii. 16; Jno. xviii. 40), and of Judas of Galilee, and Theudas (Acts i. 36), and the Egyptian (Acts xxi. 38), and the conspiracy against St. Paul (Acts xxiii. 12-14). There may also be a reference here to the cry of the multitude assembled from all parts of the Jewish dispersions at the Passover, "Crucify Him" (Matth. xv. 13, 14). Wordsworth.—M. J. [WHITBY cites the following passages from Josephus. Bell. Jud. IV. 10; II. 1; Antiq. XVIII. 1; Bell. Jud. II. 28; VII. 81; I. 705.—M. J.]

VIII. SIXTH ADMONITION.

EXHORTATION TO REPENTANCE ADDRESSED TO THE JEWISH CHRISTIANS AND THE JEWS IN REFERENCE TO THEIR BEING ON THE WAY TO APOSTASY. THEY ARE ADDRESSED AS (RELIGIOUS) ADULTERERS AND ADULTERESSES, AS APOSTATES. THEIR FRIENDSHIP OF THE WORLD, WHICH IS THE CAUSE OF THEIR IMPENDING APOSTASY, THEY WERE TO ACKNOWLEDGE AS ENMITY OF GOD, TO REPENT OF IT AND TO RETURN FROM THEIR WORLDLY RUNNING AND WANDERING TO THE QUIETNESS OF A CONDUCT MARKED BY HUMILITY AND RESIGNATION TO THE DIVINE WILL.

CHAPTER IV. 4-17.

4 Ye adulterers<sup>1</sup> and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world<sup>2</sup> is enmity with God<sup>3</sup> whosoever<sup>4</sup> therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy<sup>5</sup> of God. Do ye think that the Scripture saith in vain,<sup>6</sup> The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy? But he giveth more grace. Wherefore he saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble. Submit yourselves therefore to God. Resist<sup>7</sup> the devil, and he will flee from you. Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded. Be afflicted, and mourn, and<sup>8</sup> weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness. Humble yourselves in the sight of the<sup>9</sup> Lord, and he shall lift you up. Speak not evil one of another, brethren. He that speaketh evil of his brother, and<sup>10</sup> judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law: but if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge. There is one lawgiver,<sup>11</sup> who is able to save and to destroy: who art thou<sup>12</sup> that judgest another?<sup>13</sup> Go to now, ye that say, To day or<sup>14</sup> to morrow we will go<sup>15</sup> into such a city, and continue<sup>16</sup> there<sup>17</sup> a year,<sup>18</sup> and buy and sell, and get gain: Whereas ye know not what<sup>19</sup> shall be on the morrow. For what is your life?<sup>20</sup> It is<sup>21</sup> even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and<sup>22</sup> then vanisheth away. For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will,<sup>23</sup> we shall live,<sup>24</sup> and do this, or that. But now ye rejoice<sup>25</sup> in your boastings: all<sup>26</sup> such rejoicing is evil. Therefore to him that knoweth to do<sup>27</sup> good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.

Verse 4. 1 A. B. Sin. etc. Vulg., Bede, Lachmann, Tischendorf and other translations read only  $\mu\omicron\chi\alpha\lambda\acute{\iota}\sigma\epsilon\varsigma$ .  $\mu\omicron\chi\alpha\lambda\acute{\iota}\sigma\epsilon\varsigma$  preceding it in G. K. etc. originated probably in the O. T. symbolical sense having been abandoned and the literal sense adopted.

3 Cod. Sin. reads  $\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$  for  $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\ \epsilon\sigma\tau\iota$  of Rec. and al.

4 B. Cod. Sin. read  $\epsilon\acute{\alpha}\nu$  for  $\alpha\upsilon$ .—M.]

5 Cod. Sin. has  $\epsilon\chi\theta\omicron\rho\acute{\alpha}$  for  $\epsilon\chi\theta\omicron\rho\acute{\alpha}$ .—M.]

Language: Ye [adulterers and] adulteresses know ye not that the friendship of the world is the enmity of God? Whosoever therefore willeth to be a friend of the world, standeth up as an enemy of God.

[Ye adulteresses . . . is enmity of God? . . . shall be minded (Alford) to be a friend of the world, is constituted an enemy of God.—M.]

Verse 5. 1 A. B. Sin. Lachmann, Wiesinger read  $\kappa\alpha\tau'\epsilon\lambda\theta\epsilon\iota\varsigma$  for  $\kappa\alpha\tau'\epsilon\lambda\theta\epsilon\iota\varsigma$  G. K. etc.

Language: Or do ye suppose . . . The spirit that made His abode in us, as opposed to envy, longeth upward? [Or do ye fancy . . . The spirit that He planted in us, jealously desireth? (So de Wette, and after him Alford).—M.]

Verse 6. 1 Language: Still greater however [than is the longing], He giveth grace: wherefore it [the Scripture] saith . . . [But He giveth greater grace: wherefore He saith, God is opposed to the proud but giveth grace to the humble.—M.]

Verse 7. 1 A. B. Sin. Vulg. etc. insert  $\delta\epsilon$  after the verb.  $\delta\epsilon$  is omitted probably in order to give to the sentence a more independent form.

Language: Subject yourselves . . . But resist . . .

[Submit yourselves . . . But resist the devil and he shall flee from you.—M.]

- Verse 8. Lange: . . . Cleanse the hands, ye sinners, and consecrate [make chaste unto God] the hearts, ye double-minded.
[Purify your hands . . . , and make chaste your hearts.—M.]
- Verse 9. <sup>19</sup> A. and Cod. Sin. omit καὶ before καλύσατε.—M.]
Lange: Feel miserable and mourn and weep! Let your laughter turn itself into lamentation and your joy into dejection.
[Be wretched and mourn and weep: . . . , and your joy into humiliation.
[Alford: The old English noun downcast, now obsolete as a noun, is the exact equivalent of κατέφρα and ought to be resuscitated.—M.]
- Verse 10. <sup>19</sup> Cod. Sin. inserts οὐδὲν after ταπεινώθητε.—M.]
The omission of τοῦ does not affect the translation. [A. B. K. etc. Cod. Sin. omit it.—M.]
Lange: . . . before the Lord, and He will exalt you.
[Be humbled, therefore, before . . . and He shall exalt you.—M.]
- Verse 11. <sup>10</sup> A. B. K. Sin. etc. Tischendorf read ἡ κρίνω for καὶ [Rec. etc.—M.]
Lange: Do not calumniate [decry] one another, brethren. He that calumniateth or judgeth his brother, calumniateth the law and judgeth the law.
[Do not speak against one another, brethren; he that speaketh against a brother or judgeth his brother, speaketh against . . . M.]
- Verse 12. <sup>11</sup> καὶ κρίτης omitted by Rec. [with K. L. etc.—M.], is inserted in A. B., many minuscules, almost all the versions, Tischendorf. Lachm. also Cod. Sin.
<sup>17</sup> A. B. K. L. many minusc. Cod. Sin. Vulg. Syr. Copt. al. insert δὲ after οὐ, a reading by all means to be retained on account of the strong emphasis "But thou (almost contemptuous), who art thou?"—M.]
<sup>18</sup> A. B. Cod. Sin. and many minuscules fix the readings ὁ κρίνων and τὸν πλησίον against those of Rec. ὅς κρίνει, and τὸν ἑταίρον.
[K. adds (see Ps. xxxvi. 23) ὅτι οὐκ ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἐστὶν ἡ δικαιοσύνη ἀνθρώπων κατενθύνεται.—M.]
Lange: One is the Lawgiver and Judge, He, who is able . . . . But who art thou, thou that judgest [art judging] thy neighbour? [ . . . But thou, who art thou that judgest thy neighbour?—M.]
- Verse 13. <sup>14</sup> A. G. I. etc. Tischendorf [Cod. Sin. Alford.—M.] read σήμερον καὶ αὐρίον, which is also more authentic and important than ἡ αὐρίον.
<sup>15</sup> Lachmann and Tischendorf following B. etc., several minusc. Vulg., read the Future for the Subjunctive of Rec. In point of matter more suitable. A. has first two Subjunctives then two Indicatives. [So Cod. Sin.—M.]
Lange: Well then, ye that say: to-day and to-morrow we will journey to such and such a city, and will work there one year, and do business and make gain.
[Go to now . . . to-day and to-morrow we will set forth to this city and will spend there one year and will traffic [de Wette, Van Ess, Alilioli etc. Alford] and get gain.—M.]
- Verse 14. <sup>19</sup> The Plural τα (A. Lachmann) is in every case more telling than τὸ (G. I.) Tischendorf.
<sup>20</sup> Lachmann, following A. Vulg. etc. omits γὰρ after ἀγαπᾷς, which makes the expression more difficult, but also more lively. [But A. Cod. Sin. Vulg. Copt. omit not only γὰρ but ἀγαπᾷς γὰρ.—M.]
Lange: Yes ye that know not [understand not] what will be to-morrow [the great tempests of judgment]. For what [of what kind] is your life? A vapour, forsooth, ye are, which appeareth for a little while, and then vanisheth [again].
[Whereas ye know not the things of to-morrow: for of what sort (Alford) is your life? For ye are a vapour which appeareth for a little while, then vanishing as it came.—M.]
- Verse 15. <sup>23</sup> [B. reads θῆλον.—M.]
<sup>24</sup> A. B. Cod. Sin. read ζήσητε and ποίσητε. So Lachmann, Tischendorf [and Alford. K. L. al. have the Subjunctive.—M.]
Lange: Instead of that you ought to say . . .
[Instead of which ye . . . we shall both live and do this or that.—M.]
- Verse 16. <sup>25</sup> Cod. Sin. has κατακαυχᾶσθε for καυχᾶσθε.—M.]
<sup>26</sup> Cod. Sin. has ἵστε for ᾤσατε.—M.]
Lange: But now ye boast yourselves in your [vain] illusions, all boasting of such kind is evil.
[But now ye glory in your vain-boastings; all such glorying is wicked.—M.]
- Verse 17. <sup>17</sup> (A.) reads οὐκ ᾔστα for οὐκ ᾔστω.—M.]
Lange: To him now who knoweth . . . , to him it will turn to sin.
[So that to him who . . . , to him it is sin.—M.]

Reproach of the impending apostasy.

VER. 4. Ye adulteresses, know ye not.—The fact, that the majority of commentators are in favour of the Text. Rec., the authorities to the contrary notwithstanding, and that they consequently read; "ye adulterers and adulteresses," is rightly accounted for by Huther, who says that it arises from their taking the term in a literal sense, "which is expressly done by Augusti, Lachmann and Winer." But we can hardly conceive any thing more extravagant than to suppose that James would brand all Jewish Christians as literal adulterers and adulteresses. It is however in perfect keeping with the symbolical language of the Old Testament that James here describes the Judaistic bias to apostasy from the living God of revelation, Ps. lxxiii. 27; Is. lvii. 8; Ez. xxiii. 27; Hosea; Matth. xii. 39; xvi. 4; 2 Cor. xi. 2; Rev. ii. 22. The wonder is that this passage has not led commentators to learn the symbolical character of the whole Epistle, and more particularly the symbolical character of the rich in ch. ii and ch. v. The only surprising part of this exposition is the occurrence of the feminine adulteresses, a term which Theile considers to be not altogether sitting, which Wiesinger calls singular as applied to individuals, while Huther remarks that the term should be referred to Churches. Besides it is noteworthy that symbolical adultery according to the usage of the Old Testament and according to the figure itself is feminine inasmuch as it describes the apostasy of the Lord's bride. To this must be added that the Apostle is not addressing now the Jewish Christian Churches in particular, but Judaism in general, such as, in the preceding section, he saw it sundered into the most diverse factions. The Plural probably denotes this disruption, not only the several synagogues but also the several factions.

Know ye not.—From your theocratical calling to the covenant with God as opposed to the ungodly world, and from your teaching and knowledge.

That the friendship of the world.—That is befriending and alliance with an ungodly world (ch. i. 27; cf. 1 Jno. ii. 15), not merely inclination to worldly goods (Theile and al.), nor worldly desires (Laurentius), nor both of these together (de Wette). The world is personified in this antithesis; it is idolatry depicted as a whole, the vanity of mankind deifying itself and deified (i. e., ungodliness showing itself in its propensity for the impersonal) connected with the whole visible world frustrated by it. The Judaistic friendship for the world, which must be taken chiefly in an active sense, consisted just in the chiliaristic desire of enjoying a worldly glory which at the best was only dyed hierarchically pious (in sensual enjoyment, honour and dominion cf. Matth. iv.). It is to be noticed that this vain worldliness concealed itself under the garb of a pious fleeing from the world (the hatred of heathenism, even of Gentile-christian, pretended uncleanness).

Is enmity of God.—Here also the predominant active sense must be held fast "on which account the majority of commentators interpret it straightway by ἐχθρα εἰς θεόν (Rom. viii. 7)." Huther. Lachmann following the inimicitia of the Vulgate, has even adopted the reading ἐχθρὰ [which, however, is also the reading of the Cod. Sin.—M.], which greatly weakens the weight of the idea.

Whoever therefore shall be minded to be a friend of the world.—Inference drawn from what precedes. Ὁς βούληθῃ. The difficulty which has been found in this expression, because it seems to involve an intentional choice of evil, is set aside if we distinguish between a formal and a material intention. The Apostle certainly could not suppose his readers to have the formal intention of surrendering to the world. But it was very different with the material intention of taking a direction in worldliness which involved the friendship of the world. But this was precisely the case with the rebellious chiliasm of the Jews, even with the worldly-mindedness of Judaistic Christians. And in this sense the term certainly lays stress both on the conscious intention (Baumgarten) and on the antithesis of their doing which had already become a reality. Whosoever is devoted to the world, although as yet only in his heart (not, as Wiesinger, who for the present is only inclined that way), has stood up as the enemy of God, because our attitude to God is determined by the attitude of our heart. The Lord looketh at the heart. Huther's laying stress on the construction that the world must be taken here as an aggregate of persons, because φίλια then consists in a reciprocity, seems to be an expedient beside the mark. That the world is represented as an aggregate of persons stands to reason; but the question is whether the persons are to be honoured as persons or dishonoured as impersonal things as a means of selfishness. However he rightly observes that καθίσταται here as in ch. iii. 6, must not be weakened, but denotes "he takes the attitude." We render "he stands up," or "appears," because this brings out the as yet inward character of his attitude. [On the whole "is constituted" seems to be the best rendering of the term in English; it does not touch the inward or the outward attitude in particular but involves either and this seems really to be the Apostle's meaning. It is immaterial whether the man's purpose be latent, uttered in words or manifest in deeds, in any case he is constituted an enemy of God.—M.]

Exhortation to a better and higher aim, vv. 5, 6.

V. 5. Or do ye fancy that the Scripture saith in vain.—This passage is one of the most difficult in the New Testament; we must therefore refer the reader to the Commentaries for a full discussion of the question (see Schneckenburger, Beiträge, p. 198: Huther, Wiesinger, etc.). We have first to set aside the really desperate expositions which aim at improving the text (see Huther's note p. 186) and then the connection of πρὸς φθόνον with what goes before. The Scripture saith against envy (du Mont), or: Think ye that the Scripture speaks in vain and enviously (πρὸς φθόνον adverbially, Gebser)? But in that case πρὸς φθόνον ought to precede λέγει. We consider the exposition of Beza, Grotius and al.: "The spirit of man has a natural bias to envy" as underrated by Huther. In that case the words have to be connected with what the Scripture says of the envy of Cain, and similar passages. But that exposition is inadmissible, for 1. The spirit is described as having taken up its abode in us and consequently distinguished from ourselves, 2. μεῖζονα κ. τ. λ. would be without a subject. The first difficulty, indeed, would be obviated if we could take πνεῦμα in the sense of πνεῦμα φθόνον according to Wisd. 2, 24.—διάβολος. Huther undervalues the similar exposition of Semler ad. v. 7, saying, "because of its strangeness we make room for Semler's note on this passage: Jacobus, Paulus, Petrus, Judas uno quasi ore id confirmant, opus esse, ut Romanis et sic (!) Deo se subijciant" and further on: "τῷ διαβόλῳ, qui per πνεῦμα φθόνον vos suscitavit adversus magistratum romanum." But the want of a subject to μεῖζονα deters us from adopting this exposition somewhat as follows: even the Holy Scripture testifies that there has come among us a spirit which excites that envy which is the specific attribute of that love of the world which causes the wars and fightings described above (see the book of Jonah). Less tenable is the exposition which makes the spirit to denote the Divine Spirit but takes the respective words interrogatively, as follows, "num ad invidiam proclivis est Spiritus Sanctus? minime" (so Gabler and similarly Bede, Calvin and al.). Where the citation from Holy Writ introduces the subject, we hardly expect an interrogative sentence. The interpretation of de Wette, Huther and al. is at present urged more than any other. Huther: "Or do ye think that the Scripture speaks in vain? (No) the Spirit, that has taken His abode in us, enviously desires us, but gives (so much the) more grace; therefore He saith," etc.—The parentheses abundantly show how very forced is this interpretation, which is also advocated by Schneckenburger and al. Our objections to it are as follows: 1. The anthropomorphism "that the Spirit of God loves us even unto envy" is too strong. The reference to ζήλος, the jealousy of God in the conjugal relation He sustains to His people, is allowable but ζήλος is not φθόνος, which is uniformly mentioned in Holy Scripture as a source of evil. To this must be added 2. The postulated supplements and the defective antithesis "but He gives so much the more grace," etc. But this mode of expression at first sight grows even more dark, if we understand with Wiesinger τὸ πνεῦμα as the object of the human spirit, supplying ὁ θεός as the subject: Divine Love enviously desires the object of its Love, that is, the human spirit from God (i. e., aus Gott—emanating from God—M.), which turns either to God or to the world. If we bear in mind that θεός had been named immediately before, the envious loving remains in the first place, and then appears as a loving which is only directed to the Spirit. This applies also to the similar interpretation of Theile, who supplies however ἡ γραφή instead of ὁ θεός. However, even if we wished to retain the interpretation of Wiesinger or Huther we should be obliged to go back to the passage Ex. xx. 5. The jealousy of God would be expressed in His visiting the iniquity of idolatry (=adultery) on the children of the third and fourth generation, and the antithesis "but showing mercy unto thousands, etc.," would be adequately expressed in μελίσσονα δὲ δίδωσι χάριν. With reference to the citation in question, we have the following conjectures which we give in brief from Huther: Gen. vi. 8, 5 (Grotius), Gen. viii. 21 (Erasmus, Beza, etc.), Numb. xi. 29 (Witsius), Deut. v. 9 (Schneckenburger), Deut. xxxii. 21 (Heisen), Ps. cxix. 20 (Clericus), Prov. xxi. 10 (Michaelis), Song of Solomon viii. 6 (Coccejus), Wisdom of Sol. vi. 12 (Wettstein). Others again have guessed at passages from the New Testament, at some lost passage in the prophets, at a passage in the Apocryphal book called the Testament of the twelve Patriarchs or at a collective statement of different passages of Holy Scripture. Huther denies the fact of a citation altogether and believes the reference to be to a statement of James and that ἡ γραφή λέγει adverts either to the idea immediately preceding or to the citation introduced with διὸ λέγει in v. 6: ὁ θεός, etc. After all the interpretations given, that of Luther (Gomarus, Bengel and al.) still continues to possess much weight, viz., "the spirit lusteth against hatred=invidia," (cf. Gal. v. 17); in favour of which may be produced the following passages: Ps. xxxvii. 1, etc.; v. 84, etc.; Ps. lxxiii. 8, etc. Huther can hardly dispute successfully that πρὸς φθόνον in point of language may be equivalent to κατὰ φθόνον and that ἐπιποθεῖν may be taken in the sense of ἐκθρῆναι. But we still want the subject for μελίσσονα δὲ κ. τ. λ. and we are driven to recognize it in πνεῦμα itself. Then it is the Divine Spirit in believers on the one hand, mediating in them a longing going beyond the love of the world (Rom. viii. 28-28), and on the other also a grace which is beyond all longing, praying and understanding (1 Cor. ii. 9; Eph. iii. 22). We therefore construe the passage with reference to Ps. xxxvii. 1 and Ps. lxxiii. 8 as follows: "over against and opposed to envy (which is really at the bottom of your worldliness and is the very soul of your wars, fightings and insurrections) the Spirit who took abode among us, utters a higher longing (ἐπιποθεῖ emphatic), and not in vain; for the self-same Spirit mediates also the grace which goes even beyond our longing in Him." The Jews in consequence of the envy of their worldliness became unbelieving with respect to Christianity (Acts xiii. 46; ch. xxii. 22), and rebellious toward the Romans; but the spirit which lived and acted in the true theocrats from Abel to Asaph (Ps. lxxiii.) and from him and the prophets to the Christians, coming in contact with it [envy?—M.] was longing beyond it and its objects for the immortal. And as envy shows itself in the proud whom God opposes, so that longing shows itself in the humble to whom He gives grace. We therefore give our sense of this passage by way of paraphrase. The friendship of the world of which envy is really the soul, and the friendship of God, of which the longing of the Spirit is really the soul are incompatible and inimically opposed to each other. This may be proved from Scripture. For as to our relation to God it says not without reason that the strong longing of the Divine Spirit, who took up His abode in us (who united with our spirit, is the spirit of prayer, of our yearning for heavenly riches; while as the Spirit of Divine consolation and peace He mediates for us a grace which is even greater than our longing), bids defiance to and is opposed to envy which is the truest form of the spirit of the world. But as to the relation of God to ourselves, the Scripture saith: God resists the haughty and proud who are at one with the spirit of envy, while He gives grace to the humble who are at one with the poor in spirit. On the meaning of πρὸς—in relation or in proportion to, or against, in opposition to cf. the Lexica. The sentence, more clearly defined, would read thus: πρὸς τὸ ποθεῖν τοῦ φθόνου ἐπιποθεῖ τὸ πνεῦμα.—The Comparative "greater (more) grace" must consequently not be referred to the antithesis: what the friendship of the world does give (Bede, Gebser and al.), or: "eo majorem, quo longius recesseris ab invidia" (Bengel), or according to an obscure thought: as compared with the case that the πρὸς φθόνον ἐπιποθεῖν did not take place (Wiesinger, de Wette, Huther).

[Without reconsidering this bewildering conflict of opinions, the view which seems to harmonize best with the context and the line of James' argument, is to take πνεῦμα as the object, and understanding the Holy Spirit, to supply ὁ θεός as the subject and to render πρὸς φθόνον adverbially. "The (Holy) Spirit that He (God) planted in us, jealously desireth [us]." The expression is highly figurative and alludes to the conjugal relation between God and the soul of believers. The Spirit of God implanted in us, jealously desireth us, jealously desires us to break entirely with the world and to be wholly consecrated and devoted to God. Any temporizing with the world would be spiritual adultery.—Then as to the citation from Scripture referred to we hold with many commentators that James gives the general sense of Scripture without specifying a particular passage. Alford takes the same view.—M.]

VER. 6. This greater grace is the greater measure of the comforting and satisfying Spirit as related to the longing Spirit. δὴ λέγει, that is the same Scripture, not τὸ πνεῦμα. [But why not refer δὴ λέγει to τὸ πνεῦμα the Holy Spirit? He speaks in us and in the Holy Scriptures.—M.] δὴ is very apposite: just as the Scripture speaks of our relation to God, so it speaks of God's relation to us. The passage in question is Prov. iii. 34 LXX., which has however ὁ κύριος instead of ὁ θεός. [The same variation occurs in 1 Pet. v. 5.—M.] Ἰππεῖσιν (not exactly equivalent to the idea τὰ ὑψηλὰ φρονούντες in Rom. xii. 16) are the same as the rich in ch. v. 1 etc. or in the Sermon on the Mount, Luke vi. 24 etc. In like manner the ταπεινοί represent the poor, the lowly, the wretched in a symbolical sense, so much comforted in the Old Testament, or the poor in spirit, the suffering, the meek and the merciful of the Sermon on the Mount.

The characteristics of conversion to God required of the readers of the Epistle, or theocratic fundamental ideas.—The new allegiance of the people of God. Their approach, purification, penitential mourning and humiliation according to their situation. vv. 7-10.

VER. 7. Subject yourselves therefore to God.—Now follows a series of theocratic ideas in the process of the New Testament fulfilment or completion, which significantly reflect in consecutive order the several moments of Jewish conversion; a circumstance which seems to be not sufficiently noticed by Exegesis. Subject yourselves to God; become once more His real subjects, as the people of God, in opposition to your leaning to apostasy. This is the first and the whole, an exhortation not exclusively addressed to the decided ἰππεῖσιν. Calvin emphasizes the circumstance that the reference is not to obedience to God in general, but to submissio in particular. Semler indeed maintained that they were exhorted "ut Romanis se subijciant, et sic Deo," but it is rather the reverse; they were first to subject themselves to God and then in consequence of it, to the power appointed to rule them. Their submission to the rule of the living God was moreover to exhibit itself in their humbly getting reconciled to the new order of things, the change of Judaism into Christianity, the unity of Jews and Gentiles in Christianity and the existing rule of pagan Rome.

But resist the devil.—Not only because he is the enemy of God and the prince of this world, by the attractions of which they suffer themselves to be enticed, but especially because he is the demon of self-boasting and envy, who assumes the garb of an angel of light, and desires them by representing that his temptation to sedition is a call from God, ch. i. 13.—Being only half-decided and doubting make the tempter bold and strong, while resolute courage in God and resistance unmask him in his impotence; for real courage and real power come from God; the power of Satan is a lying phantom-power (Matth. iv.). It is only in the self-temptation of man that the temptation of Satan can become efficient. [Huther quotes Hermas, Pastor, 2, 12.—"δύναται ὁ διάβολος παλαῖσαι, καταπαλαῖσαι δὲ οὐ δύναται, εἰν οὖν ἀντίστος αὐτόν, νικηθεὶς φέρεται ἀπὸ σοῦ κατὰ χυμμένος."—M.]

Draw nigh to God.—The allegiance of the people of God is followed by their drawing near to Him. נָּקֵב or קָרַב in relation to God is a specifically theocratical idea. Ex. xx. 21; xxiv. 2; Lev. xvi. 1; Ezek. xl. 46; cf. Is. xxix. 13; Heb. vii. 19; hence the expression Korban, that which is consecrated or offered to God. Here drawing near is used in the N. T. real sense=convert yourselves. The particular although not the exclusive reference to prayer.

And He will draw nigh to you.—The antithesis "Resist the devil and he shall flee from you" corresponds to the antithesis "Draw nigh to God and He will draw nigh to you." (See 2 Chron. xv. 2; Is. lvii. 15; Zech. i. 3).

VER. 8. Cleanse the hands, ye sinners.—The first specifically theocratic act. The expression refers to the Levitical purifications, the negative part of Levitical repentance, separateness from the world. The prophets did already apply this symbolical purification to ethical purification or rather interpret it ethically according to its profound import. See Is. i. 16, 16; Ps. xviii. 21; xxiv. 4; "He that hath clean hands and a pure heart." The hands are the organ and symbol of ethical actions. To cleanse the hands signifies therefore to repent (Pott), to become separate from evil works, especially from lovelessness and wrong. This summons does not begin the summons to conversion (Huther), for it is already implied in the words "Subject yourselves to God," which branch out into two moments, the negative "to resist the devil," and the positive "to draw nigh to God." This approach to God, in its turn, branches out into purification and sanctification in the narrow sense.

Consecrate your hearts.—The real consecration of our life to God consists in the consecration of the heart, in its surrender to God (Fr li. 12, 18, 19; Prov. xxiii. 26; Jer. xxxi. 33; 1 Pet. iii. 15 etc.). The words "ye sinners" relate to the cleansing of the hands, the words "ye double-minded" to the consecration of the heart. The term ἀπισταὶ probably alludes more particularly to the unchastity of the heart, as the source of religious adultery. Wavering and unchastity are here alike, so are on the other hand simplicity or decision and chastity.—They are sinners in a particular sense according to theocratic ideas, as far as they are about to excommunicate themselves by their evil actions (ch. ii. 3), to burden themselves with the ban of the real congregation of God (publicans and sinners=those who are liable to the discipline of the synagogue); but the reason lies in this double-mindedness, their wavering (ch. i. 7, 8), their mischievous halting between God and the world, between Christianity and apostasy. Calvin's note is almost superfluous: "non duo hominum genera designat, sed eisdem vocat peccatores et duplices animo." It is evident from vv. 6 and 8 that this exhortation to their own self-activity presupposes the grace of God as the source of strength.

VER. 9. Feel miserable and mourn.—Hardly limited to the mourning which introduces and accompanies the repentance of individuals; the type is found in the Old Testament extraordinary acts of penitence which in situations of uncommon offences and peril were performed to complete the ordinary acts of penitence, viz. purifications and consecrations or offerings, Ex. xxxiii. 4; Judg. ii. 4; Ch. xxi. 2; 1 Sam. vii. 6 etc.—The verb ταλαπωρεῖν (ἀταξ λεγ. in N. T.; the adjective form in Rom. vii. 24; Rev. iii. 17; the noun Rom. iii. 16; Jas. v. 1), denotes primarily to go outwardly through hard work, to endure hardship or distress, then the inward sense of misery on account of outward or inward wretchedness. Grotius and Roman Catholic theologians apply it without reason to castigations. Jewish fasting and other castigations as symbols of penitential sorrow are indeed the type, but Christian penitential sorrow must not be changed back into legal symbolism.

Mourn and weep.—See Neh. viii. 9; Mark xvi. 10; Luke vi. 25; Rev. xviii. 15, 19. The putting on of mourning-apparel or sitting in sackcloth and ashes (Grotius) can only be the type of the Gospel requirement of inward mourning (2 Cor. vii. 10).

Let your laughter be turned.—Is. lxxv. 18; Luke vi. 25. "James passes from the outward manifestation (γέλως-πένης) to the inward state (χαρά-κατήφεια)." Huther.—κατήφεια, casting down of the eyes, literally and figuratively. Hence shame and humiliation, ἀταξ λεγ., Luke xviii. 13.

VER. 10. Humble yourselves before the Lord.—The fundamental idea of the leadings of the Old Testament and the O. T. fundamental rule of piety and of the promises attached to it; it has met its fulfilment in the humiliation and exaltation of Christ and must be realized in the life of believers (Rom. vi. 4; Job v. 11; Ezek. xxi. 26; Matth. xxiii. 12; Luke xiv. 11; 1 Pet. v. 6; cf. Sir. ii. 17). As this humbling must be realized inwardly in the bowing of repentance before God (ὑποκλίνων κυρίου), and outwardly in the patient enduring of the humiliating state of servitude and lowliness (ὑπὸ τῇ χειρὶ τοῦ θεοῦ, i. Pet. v. 6) appointed by Him, so the exaltation also should begin with the inward consciousness of the exaltation, liberty and glory of the Divine Sonship [i. e. the state of being the children of God in Christ=Gotteskindschaft; υιοθεσία, adoption—M.] and come to its outward consummation in the future glory, of which we have however some antepast here on earth. κύριος does not exactly signify Christ (Grotius), nor θεός as opposed to Christ (Huther and al.). James wants to see the living God of revelation recognized in Christ.

Renovation of their conduct towards the brethren. vv. 11, 12.

tion, couched in a milder form than the preceding and exhibiting a contrast in the address, ἀδελφοί being opposed to μοιχαλίδες, ἀμαρτωλοὶ διψήλοιοι, intimates that James now addresses, at least primarily, another class of persons, namely those "who by the worldly ways of the former felt induced to do those things against which he exhorts them." But Wiesinger takes a more correct view as the transition: "The connection is as follows: if they thus humble themselves before God, they must not deny humility in the judgment they pass on their brethren. He therefore exhorts them to put away imaginary superiority to others in judging them, which is really an arrogant usurping of the judicial functions of God. The end corresponds to the beginning. Worldly pride the source of strife, humble submission to God the end thereof." He adds however "he refers particularly to the oppressed." But really there is no reason to see here already a distinct transition from one class to another. Slander and judging were the very soul of their fanatical doings in relation to their brethren. In ch. iii. 1 also he addresses the brethren, although the sequel contains the severest kind of reprimand. καταλαλεῖν found here and 1 Pet. ii. 12; iii. 16. It denotes not only slandering (backbiting, Luther) but also evil contradiction, retorting.

He that calumniateth or judgeth his brother.—The Participles καταλαλῶν and κρίνων are stronger than the indicative: he, whose characteristic consists in that he calumniates his brother. Huther thinks that while καταλαλεῖν always includes κρίνειν=to condemn, the reverse holds not good. This would make the former the stronger expression, but we consider the latter to be so. κρίνειν passes from a loveless and therefore from a hateful judging of one's neighbour to a similar condemnation of him. Wiesinger says indeed that "the context affords not the slightest occasion to think here of quarrels among Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians," but the spirit of the whole Epistle constrains us to think of it, although the word ἀλλήλων shows that the primary reference here is to the internal divisions of Judaism. James probably alludes more particularly to the expressions and accusations which the Jews as Judaists and unfree Jewish Christians were wont to bring against the believing and more believing Jews. This seems to follow from the sequel "He that calumniateth, etc., calumniateth the law." Schneckenburger rightly observes that the epithet brother given to the slandered persons emphasizes the peculiarly reprehensible character of calumny. But the sequel shows that the Apostle, by the use of this word, still aims at something more. Νόμος designates here, as in ch. i. 25 and ii. 9, etc., the Old Testament law in its New Testament fulfilment. Hence the idea of Huther is right that slandering and condemning one's brother is really slandering and condemning the law itself, viewed as the law of the Christian life and more particularly as the law of love, for such conduct amounts to rejecting it as an unjust law; but the Apostle's idea seems to be more comprehensive, viz., the condemnation of one's brother from the standpoint of fanatical motives is a condemnation of the essential νόμος according to its inmost evangelical import and especially as to its tendency of saving and not condemning. Thus the condemnation of one's brother in all cases is not only without the law and contrary to the law, but it falls also upon the law itself. This was perfectly clear in the case where the Jews judged the Christians; they judged the whole revelation (Jno. v. 45, 46); but in the opposite case also, i. e., that is where Christians judged the Jews, judgment was passed on the heart-point of the law, viz.: the promise of grace. De Wette, who sees in the respective expression only a figurative, pointed speech indicating the disregard of the law, dilutes the idea. Surely Grotius, Baumgarten, Hottinger are not altogether wrong (as Huther thinks) in understanding νόμος as the Christian doctrine and perceiving here the idea that whosoever burdens his neighbour with arbitrary commandments, pronounces upon the deficiency of the Christian doctrine and in so far sets himself up as its judge. For this is just the manner of those who condemn; occupying a false standpoint, in particular that of illiberal legalism, they set themselves up as judges over the word of revelation, which judges no man uncharitably and is unwilling that any man should be absolutely condemned and least of all he, who has taken his standpoint in that very word.

But if thou judgest the law, i. e., if thou settest thyself up condemningly over it.

Thou art not a doer of the law.—Although thou boastest, to be zealous and jealous of it to the highest degree.

But a judge.—The question is does this mean 1, a judge who from another standpoint, judges and condemns the law itself, that is a God-hostile adversary of the law, an out and out anomis [ἀνομος, without law, a lawless man.—M.], which would require us to supply the Genitive νόμον after κριτής (so Neander, Wiesinger and al.), or 2, does κριτής denote absolutely the judge who administers the law in judging men? This interpretation is opposed by Huther to the former, with the remark that the former makes this sentence and the one preceding it tautological, that it dilutes the antithesis of doer and judge and that the sequel adverts not to a judging of the law but to a judging of men. As to tautology, it does not belong to the first interpretation, because we have then the climax, not doers but condemners of the law. The antithesis "observer and despiser of the law" is surely much stronger than that of "doer and guardian of the law." Lastly the idea "condemner of the law" is substantiated with what goes before. But the relation is such that the anti-judge is also always pseudo-judge just as anti-Christ is also always Pseudo-Christ.

VER. 12. One is the Lawgiver and Judge.—He is One, which is emphatic, not only as contrasted with all men, of whom this is not true, but also in the unity of the Lawgiver and the Judge (Morus), which does not suffer to rise a contradiction between the spirit of the law and the spirit of the judgment such as it ought to exist if the judging of the Judaists were authorized. Now His power to judge has developed itself in the first place as the power to save or to render blessed and in the second as the power to destroy or to damn. The sequel therefore is not a further predicate: "He is able to save, etc." (Luther), but states the characteristic, "He, who is able." This intimates at least that the Judge is the God of the Gospel, who saves or damns men according to their belief or unbelief, Mark xvi. 16.—He manifests Himself in fact as this δυναμειος and thus establishes His exclusive prerogative to judge. Bengel: "Nostrum non est judicare, præsertim cum cæqui non possimus."

But who art thou.—Impotent before that judicial majesty and power of God, moreover as a sinner guilty of the judgment and in want of grace (see Rom. xiv. 4).

That judgest.—Really who makest judging thy business: ὁ κρινων, with the Article to which Schneckenburger calls attention. But this word evidently serves to introduce the sequel, according to which a great judgment is impending on these judges.

Disuasion from their restless, gain-seeking and self-willed wandering through the world in consideration of the approaching storm of judgment. vv. 13-15.

VER. 13. Well then, ye that say.—Huther, who is supported by many predecessors (Oecumenius, Bede, Semler, Pott, Hottinger and al.), thinks that James now addresses no longer members of the Christian Church, but the rich; viz., rich Jews, according to the forementioned explanation of the term rich. Gebser and al. contradict this view; Wiesinger holds that James addresses simply a particular class of his readers. But the Apostle's address really avoids every definite outward classification. His Epistle is addressed to the twelve tribes by the hands of the Jewish Christian, i. e., primarily to these with the intent that they should use the Epistle for missionary purposes among their brethren. But as James looks upon Judaism as a solidary* guilt and perverseness attaching to the whole people, although mostly to the unbelieving Jews, so all his exhortations and warnings are addressed through the Jewish Christians to all Jews. Still so that the centre of gravity in his address is continually progressing from the Jewish Christians to the Jews. With respect to this section of the Epistle, while it still describes a gain-loving, trafficking Jewish wandering through the world, of which the Jewish Christians as well as the Jews might readily become guilty, at least to some extent, yet it is evidently the transition to the subsequent prophetic lamentation over the rich, i. e., over the hardened part of the Jewish people, especially their leaders, and is consequently addressed more particularly to the Jews.—The interjection ὦτε νυν (here and ch. v.; not found elsewhere in the New Testament), according to Theile—"age audite," refers doubtless to the announcement of the judgment, which comes out quite clear in ch. v. 1, but is here darkly and menacingly alluded to. James is anxious to communicate to *Trench says: "Solidarity, a word which we owe to the French Communists, and which signifies a community in gain and loss, in honour and dishonour, a being, so to speak, all in the same bottom, is so convenient that it will be in vain to struggle against it."—M.

his readers his sorrowful forebodings of the judgment impending on his people. Grotius renders: "jam ego ad vos," de Wette construes it as calling upon them to lay aside the respective fault, Huther as preparing for the κλαίσαι in v. 5.

Ye that say.—οἱ λέγοντες, ye that are in the habit of using such presumptuous and worldly language.

To-day and to-morrow.—See Appar. Crit. καὶ (according to Theile) certainly expresses greater confidence than ἢ; the plan of the journey of the restless traders. Wiesinger understands "and to-morrow" of the different plans of journey of different persons, Huther thinks that it fixed the precise duration of the intended journey. But v. 14 shows that "to-morrow" is also added for the purpose of resenting the false security of the project. "To-morrow" denotes therefore the undefined future subsequent to "to-day," not only a second day; for at that time a two days' journey did not take one very far.

We will journey; we shall journey, πορευόμεθα uttered with false, prophetic assurance.

To such and such a city.—A demonstrative pronoun instead of the name of the city, with the collateral idea that the goal is now one city, now another. [I have adopted the rendering this city, because "such and such," "this or that" is a sense in which ὅδε is not used; at least the best Lexica do not give it, and I agree with Alford, that Winer p. 174, who refers to Plutarch. Sympos. I. 61 for this image of ὅδε—τὸ δεῖνα, does not make his point, and that all that is necessary, is to suppose that τῆνδε τὴν πόλιν expresses in general terms the city then present to the mind of the speaker.—M.]

And will work there one year.—ποιεῖν with a definition of time may denote primarily one's stay at a place; but it probably intimates also that the respective time is spent (Acts xv. 38; xx. 3 etc.). But we take the verb "work" in the sense of "working in the conduct of business." The definition one year again denotes not only the false security of the calculation, but also their restless, unsteady habits; then, they think, we move on or return.

And do business [and traffic—M.]. The hastily following καὶ and the hastily following future are also pictorial expressions descriptive of their immoderate false security. Bengel: "Polysyndeton exprimit libidinem animi securi." Huther assents to Kern's note: "Traffic is introduced only by way of example as characterizing man's doing calculated only with reference to earthly life and as contrasted with the life in God." But it is doubtless an example illustrating the secular aspect of the chief tendency of the Judaism of that time as it already began to develop itself; and the Apostle with a prophet's glance evidently, describes beforehand the fundamental trait of the diabolically excited worldliness of his people, as it afterwards became more and more developed.

V. 14. Yes, ye that know not [whereas ye know not E. V. much more correct and idiomatic than Lange's rendering—M.]. οἵτινες, properly, "ye that are of such a kind." [Alford: "ut qui"—"belonging, as ye do, to a class which."—M.]

What will be to-morrow.—Prov. iii. 28, xxvii. 1. The general idea that carnal security is here met by ignorance of the future and the transitoriness of life (Huther) has here also a prophetic-historical bearing. Hence not only: "Ye know not, as mortal men, whether ye are still alive to-morrow," but also "ye have no presentiment of what the next future has in reserve for you with our people." It is to be remembered that these words were written by an aged Apostle a few years before that great catastrophe, which brought the greatest misery and death on many thousand people not only at Jerusalem (and James considered Jerusalem and Judea to belong also to the dispersion of the twelve tribes in the enlarged sense of the term), but previously also in many cities of the Roman Empire (Caesarea, Sythopolis, Ascalon, Damascus, Alexandria; Josephus, de bello Jud. 2, 18, 1-8; 20, 2).

For what is your life?—Of what sort, ποία. It is not only fleeting and perishable physically, but as the spiritual life of the nation also it is affected with deadly disease and a deadly destiny.

A vapor, forsooth, ye are.—Better "For ye are a vapor."—M.]. On γὰρ see Appar. Crit. The reading ἐστὶ is manifestly a stronger expression than ἐστί, applied to their life. "They themselves are thereby described as a vapor," as it is also said of the πλοῖστος ch. i. 10 that he shall pass away as the flower of grass." Huther. Does ἀτμός denote vapor of fire (smoke, as in Acts ii. 19 in connection with καπνοῦ) or vapor of water, that is, a misty formation, or is there no definite reference designed? We feel inclined to take the former view; 1, on account of the familiar reference to Acts ii. 19; Joel iii. 1-5; 2, on account of the reference to fire in ch. v. 8; 3, on account of the greater volatility of the vapor of smoke as compared with the vapor of water which in the shape of cloudy formation is apt to last longer and in reality does not vanish if it dissolves into rain. But the real tertium comparationis is certainly the volatility of vapor, presenting an affinity with the volatility of the shadow in Job viii. 9; Ps. cii. 12; cxliv. 4. But in the last passage the figure also contains the idea of a breath and Ps. cii. 4 the figure of smoke. Our passage is probably more nearly related to the one named last.

And then (again).—Laying the emphasis on φανόμεν, appearing in splendid extension, say like an illuminated cloud, καὶ might be rendered even: it not only decreases but even vanishes. But as objection may be raised to such an emphasis, Huther's explanation of καὶ is sufficient "as it appeared so it vanished." Thus Israel as a nation, was soon to vanish from the rank of nations.

V. 15. Instead of that ye ought to say.—These words connect with v. 18, but the parenthesis v. 14 has the import of a prolonged characterizing address.

If the Lord will, we shall live.—See Appar. Crit. According to the less authenticated reading of the Text Rec. (καὶ ζήσωμεν), adopted by the majority of commentators, καὶ ζήσωμεν is generally connected with the protasis. Luther: "If the Lord will and we live, we shall do this or that;" Erasmus, Calvin, de Wette. The second καὶ then denotes the apodosis. Here the protasis is divided into two hypothetical ideas: if the Lord will and if we live. Grotius and al. take the whole somewhat differently: "if the Lord will that we live, then the rest also will follow, then we shall do this or that;" but this really runs into the construction of Luther. Most impracticable is Bornemann's construction, who adopting the Text Rec., makes καὶ ζήσμεν the apodosis in the sense: "let us make our livelihood." The better sense also favours the more critically sustained reading. Not only our doing depends on the will of the Lord, but also, first of all, life itself. Hence if the Lord will, we shall live and then do this or that (Wiesinger, Huther.) [I prefer the reading ζήσμεν and render "If the Lord will, we shall both live and shall do this or that," for it is evident that the hypothesis controls both our living and doing. Our life is dependent on the will of God and our doing depends on our living. Cf. Winer, p. 301. —M.]

Reproof of their false security and forewarning of their conscience. vv. 16, 17.

VER. 16. But now ye boast yourselves in.—But now, i. e. instead of their thinking and speaking. Instead of it ye boast yourselves etc., according to the preliminary allusion, v. 15.

In your illusions.—Ἀλαζονεία denotes vaunting or bragging regarded in the light of illusion or deception.—But here we must lay more stress on the objective, vain, arrogant self-exaltation than on the boasting. The clause: "ye boast in your boastings" (de Wette), is rather tautological. Boasting being a joyous testifying of the ground of confidence, the sense is as follows: ye boast in a ground of peace, consisting in those vain illusions or castles in the air, which from their nature are multiform. Huther remarks that ἐν denotes not the object but the ground of their boasting; but in this boasting the ground is really made the object.

All boasting of such kind.—That is, grounded on haughtiness and self-illusion; whereas both James and Paul know a holy boasting (ch. i. 9—that is glorying) grounded on the most opposite qualities, not on self-exaltation in forgetfulness of God and departing from God but on self-abasement in reliance on God and resignation to God.

VER. 17. To him now who knoweth to do good.—This is not only a moral sentence used for the purpose of warning the readers but the concluding forewarning addressed to the Judaists, followed by the announcement of the judgments upon those who still persevere in their obduracy; the great turning-point in the Apostle's argument like our Lord's last address to the Jews Jno. xii. 35 (Matth. xxiii.), or that of Paul, Acts xxviii. 23 etc. And first we have to note that the main stress lies not on καλόν, as the sum-total of good, because this would require the Article (so Wiesinger), but on εἰδόντι with which καλόν κ. τ. λ. must be connected. He therefore who, although he knows better, omits the good and moreover the doing of good which he knows to do, to him it is reckoned as sin. The reference here, however, is not primarily, that a single sin of omission is also sin, but the whole attitude of an impenitent religious knowledge, the whole self-contradiction of a hypocritical and unfruitful orthodoxism is here described as a wholesale sin of omission. As sin, according to Rom. i. 21 began with a great central sin of omission, so it is also sealed with the great, all-embracing sin of omission of impenitence. But this proposition contains also the common doctrine of the single sin of omission. Now concerning this knowledge of good the question arises (according to Huther) whether James refers to the knowledge he had imparted to his readers by his exhortations (Estius), especially by the last (Grotius, de Wette and al.); or whether this knowledge describes one already existing in his readers, as Huther assumes, observing; "the uncertainty of human life is something so palpable that those who notwithstanding talk in their audacity as if it did not exist, as if their life were not dependent on God and contrary to their own knowledge do not that which is seemly but that which is unseemly and therefore is so much the more sin unto them." We consider this antithesis as confusing. It is surely assumed that the readers of the Epistle knew from the Old Testament the rudiments of doing good and that in this knowledge the Gospel had raised them to the full consciousness of the highest degree of doing good; but it is assumed with equal certainty that this word of the whole Epistle, as a final word of exhortation is to them matter of the greatest and most decisive importance. The word should therefore be taken as a final word with reference to their better knowledge of evangelical behaviour in general and not merely as reminding them of their previous knowledge of their dependence on God. We have still to ask what is sin to one who knows and doeth not? The knowledge by itself, or that knowledge as connected with not doing? The former would be more piquant and would mean something like this: to such an one even his Jewish prerogatives turn to ruin (Rom. x.). The Gospel proclaimed to him first, becomes to him a savor of death unto death. However we must distinguish sin from the judgment of sin, hence the reference cannot be to the better knowledge by itself but to the contradiction between knowing and not doing, which runs through the whole Epistle as the object of the Apostle's controversy. This contradiction becomes sin to the perfect ἀνὴρ διψυχος which is reckoned to or reserved for him i. e. unto judgment. This great forewarning introduces the subsequent passage of the judgment. It is noteworthy that James seems to foresee with assurance that the greater part or the mass of Israel would grow obdurate contrary to a better knowledge or with an evil consciousness against doing the truth of the Gospel and that all the Judaistic corruptions of his Christian readers, which he assails, are also connected with such a conscious perverseness in general and in the whole, although not with reference to every individual in every individual case, and although the solidarity of the judgment is suspended in the case of believing Jews.

[The real point of this saying is hardly brought out in Lange's note and not touched at all under "Doctrinal and Ethical" and "Homiletical and Practical." The reference is not to sins of omission, but to sinning against light and knowledge, to doing evil the knowledge of good notwithstanding. καλόν v. 17 is the opposite of πομπόν; and the persons, whom James addressed knew well enough that they ought to do good, but they separated their knowledge from their practice and did evil. This verse (v. 17) contains a sharp rebuke, if not a sarcastic reflection on their inconsistencies.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. One of the most important life-questions of Christian ethics is undoubtedly that of the Christian's relation to the world which surrounds him. In answering it James again fully agrees with our Lord (cf. Matth. vi. 24), and with Paul the Apostle (cf. Rom. xii. 2; 1 Cor. vii. 29-31; 2 Cor. vi. 14-18). He wants Christians neither to conform to the world nor entirely to separate themselves from it, but he insists so much the more on their being distinguished from the world and on their showing that they are governed by a very different principle and a much loftier spirit than the friends of the world. If this is omitted and on the contrary that friendship of the world is sought, which is incompatible with a harmonious and independent development of the Christian life, it must surely lead to the result, that God and His service are ultimately abandoned. The impossibility of uniting God and the world in the heart of a Christian belongs to the nature of the case; cf. Matth. xii. 30. The world demands that we should love ourselves, God requires us to love Him; the world wants self-exaltation, God abasement and humility. The friend of the world and the friend of God are diametrically opposed to each other in principle, inclination and aim. Moreover how can there exist a lasting communion among things that cannot be reconciled? Here applies the saying in Matth. xvi. 26; Luke x. 38-42.—

2. James as well as the other writers of the New Testament receive the γλαφὴ as the highest authority.

3. No sin is more loathsome in the sight of God than pride. We have only to realize for a moment the light in which a holy God cannot but regard a guilty sinner in order to understand that self-exaltation is not only wicked but almost ridiculous before Him. Thus far we may say that parcere victis et debellare superbos is the fundamental law of the Divine government both under the Old Testament and under the New. Then countless examples taken from history prove also the truth of the saying, which is constantly heard in the Gospel. Cf. Matth. xviii. 4; Luke xviii. 14; 1 Pet. v. 5.

4. What James says here (v. 7) of the devil is at once a supplement to his doctrine of the origin of sin (ch. i. 14, 15) and a corrective of those who are wont to dilute the last mentioned passage after the manner of the Pelagians.

5. In writing "Draw near to God and He will draw near to you" James by no means wants to deny that the grace of God is prevenient and free and to teach that the sinner, for his part, must first turn to God, before God is able in grace to turn to him. This would conflict with the nature of the case and also with 1 John iv.

19. But he is here addressing Christians, whom God had already approached before (cf. Is. lvi. 1), but who, by their transgressions, had for a time departed from God and had first to return before they could again enjoy His grace and communion. It is once for all impossible to merit the favour of God by conversion and equally impossible personally to experience it without such a genuine conversion. Now all temporizing [indecision, half-work, German "Halbtheil"]—M., all discord between the outward and the inward life is fundamentally incompatible with such a genuine conversion. Cf. Luke xi. 35-41.

6. True joy is the child of sorrow for sin. Man has therefore his choice here on earth between short grief to be followed hereafter by constant joy and short joy to be followed hereafter by eternal grief. Cf. Matth. v. 3, 4; Luke vi. 21; 2 Cor. vii. 10.

7. Nothing is more sad and pernicious than that Christians also in their intercourse with each other yield themselves so often to loveless calumny and forget the words of the Lord Jesus, Matth. vii. 1-6. In this connection attention should be called to rash contradiction and hasty judging which are often the effects of ignorance or disgraceful passion; to censoriousness which contrary to men's own better conviction magnifies the faults of their neighbour and overlooks his good parts, in direct opposition to the Apostolic precept, 1 Cor. xiii. 4-7; to calumny, slander, tale-bearing, back-biting, etc., on which vices Reinhard's System of Christian Morality, 4th ed. I. p. 681-693 deserves to be consulted. [Also Jeremy Taylor's Sermons, —The Good and Evil Tongue—Slander and Flattery—The Duties of the Tongue.—M.] He justly observes that partial and passionate reviewers are not unfrequently guilty of these vices to an eminent degree. Compare also Bayle's Dissertations sur les libelles difamatoires, in Vol. IV. of his Dictionnaire, and the capital sketch of an accomplished calumniator in Gellert's Moralische Vorlesungen, p. 647 etc. It is self-evident how ill all this accords with the duties of Christian brotherly love. Cf. 1 Cor. iv. 5; Eph. iv. 25; Col. iii. 18.

8. "The law protects our neighbour by the precept of brotherly love; he who notwithstanding injuriously assails him, violates the protecting law itself, sets himself above the law and makes choice of that part of the law he means to observe or not to observe; but in doing so, he ceases to be a doer of the law." von Gerlach.

9. The Christian must also show in his daily life that he is influenced in all things by the sense of dependence which is the real foundation of the religious and moral life. James in concert with Solomon (Prov. xxvii. 1), with our Lord Himself (Matth. vi. 34) and with the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. vi. 3) urges this upon his readers. Many a sinful action would remain undone, many a hasty step would not be taken, if the words "If the Lord will and we live" were not only on the lips but in the hearts of men. Compare the treatise of Morus, "de homine submitente se Deo," in Opusculis, II p. 123. sqq.

10. There is not a more extensive region of sin than that on which James allows us to cast a solitary glance (v. 17), the region of sins of omission, and again none in which not a few exhibit less concern. How many are perfectly satisfied if in their opinion they have not done anything in thought, in word or in deed, which conflicts with the love of God and of our neighbour, although they have never accused themselves of that which unconsciously or designedly they omitted to do! Many secretly object to such simple and self-evident exhortations as those in vv. 13-16, that they have known it all a long time without considering that knowing without doing is altogether inexcusable, cf. Jno. iii. 17.—“The omission of good is the commission of evil. In this manner we actually may become thieves and murderers; e. g., the priest and the Levite who passed by the unfortunate sufferer, offended by omitting to observe the sixth commandment. This omission of good is also connected with slackness in doing good; gradually men become more and remiss in doing until at last all love of and longing for good leaves them and this is the death of which we must be on our guard. Beware, therefore, of procrastination! By deferring a thing we ought to do from day to day, we come to lessen its importance and soon forget it altogether. Such negligences disclose to us the slothfulness of our heart, a most dangerous and critical state of disease.” Viedebandt.

[v. 12. Sanderson: “The words of St. James assert that there is but one Lawgiver—not one selected out of many, nor one above all the rest, but one exclusively; that is, one, and but one alone, who is able to save and destroy. What was usually applied to the prerogatives of Kings, may be justly said of the conscience of every man, that it is subject to none but God, and knows no superior upon earth. Memorable is the observation of the Emperor Mazimilian, “To offer to dominate over the conscience, is to assault the citadel of heaven.” That man is a plunderer of the Divine Glory, and an invader of the authority that belongs to God, whosoever he be, that claims a right over the consciences of men, or usurps upon them. Let the popes of Rome, and the train of canonists, jesuits and sycophants, that flatter and fawn upon them, clear themselves, if they can, of this sacrilege; and let such as submit their consciences to the power of any creature, which only ought to be subject to God, be careful lest by transferring the honour of that service that belongs to God, to any creature upon earth, they make a god of that creature, and so, in effect become guilty of idolatry.”

From this first conclusion thus proved, follows this remarkable inference, that the proper rule of the conscience is that which God, the Supreme Lawgiver, has prescribed to it; and besides that, there is no other that ought to be admitted.

Yet this hinders not, that there may be other lawgivers of an inferior order, who by authority derived to them from the Supreme power, may have a just right to make laws, and consequently to bind the conscience to obedience. We do not say that God has committed to the Magistrate a power to oblige the consciences of his people by laws, but rather (to speak with more care and propriety) that God has given to the magistrate a jurisdiction to make laws, which by virtue alone of the Divine authority, do oblige the consciences of the subject; for properly speaking, the Magistrate does not oblige the conscience to obey the law, but God obliges the conscience to obey the magistrate.”—M.]

[v. 17. Wordsworth: This conclusion of St. James is added as the summing up of the argument, in the same manner as the aphorism with which St. Paul closes his reasonings concerning a doubting conscience, where he says, “Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin,” that is, whenever a man does anything without being persuaded in his mind that he may lawfully do it, he is guilty of sin. Rom. xiv. 23.

St. James appears to have his eye here on this statement of St. Paul.

St. James adds to it another maxim of general import, viz., that whosoever a man omits to do anything which he is persuaded in his own mind that he ought to do, he is guilty of sin.

Thus these two Apostolic verdicts, delivered in a similar manner, constitute two fundamental rules of human action, as to what men are bound to forbear doing, and as to what they are bound to do.

Those persons whom St. Paul addressed, were tempted to do many things, which they did not, in their consciences, approve; and the Apostle warns them, that if they do any thing against their conscience, they commit sin.

They to whom St. James wrote, were vain-glorious of their religious knowledge; but they were not careful to show forth their religious knowledge by religious practice; and the Apostle teaches them that their knowledge will only increase their guilt, unless they do what they know to be right.

Hence, while it is sin to shun knowledge, and there is some sin of ignorance (cf. Augustine 6, 661), and it is a sin to shut the ears to instruction; and it is a duty to get knowledge, to increase in knowledge, to abound in knowledge, we must beware not to rest in knowledge. We must add to our knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, charity. Without these knowledge is unprofitable; nay, will only increase our condemnation. See Sanderson 3, p. 282-284. Cf. Luke xii. 47; Jno. ix. 41; xv. 22; and see the woes pronounced on Chorazin and Capernaum, Matth. xi. 21.—M.]

HEDINGER:—The will of God is the sole rule of Christians in all matters relating to the body or the soul, as in the case of Christ and Paul, Jno. iv. 84; 1 Cor. iv. 19; Acts xxi. 13, 14.—The will of God permits also evil but turns it to the welfare of His children, Gen. 1. 20.—An evil cause and a stubborn mind full of self-glorying go generally together, ch. iii. 14; Rom. i. 30.

LANGH OP.:—Ignorance is no excuse in cases where knowledge might have been had; but if a man knows better and yet is unfaithful and disobedient, he only aggravates his guilt accordingly, Luke xii. 47, 48.

(v. 11) STARK:—I must judge in my heart in order to preserve myself from evil and to retain only what is good; I owe it in love to my brother to censure and exhort him in order to make him better and to prosper his soul. But this is altogether different from haughty, angry rebuking and scolding when I converse with some one about his sin; but the worst of all, and that which uniformly begets still greater discord, is the, alas, nowhere uncommon although thoroughly concealed vice of backbiting, which Luther in his Catechism has wisely ranged under the eighth commandment. People discourse without vocation or duty, from sheer wantonness with a hateful temper of one's supposed sin to another; speak evil of their brother behind his back, as a false brother, instead of saying it sincerely to his face. Thus acted the heathen in the Apostolic age towards the Christians, wantonly refused to see their good works and preferred to backbite them as evil-doers (1 Pet. ii. 12). Thus still act nowadays baptized heathen towards the godly, saying of them and burdening them with all manner of evil falsely. If this is done also among those who pretend to be brethren, verily the Holy Spirit strongly testifies against it and rather teaches Christians for their part not to deal thus with the children of the world. Where such backbiting takes place there is never a good conscience or a courageous answer to the questions: would I say this of him, if he were present? why do I not first tell him? why and for what purpose do I now speak of it?—There is neither obedience of duty nor intent of love; here speaks and judges one's own presumptuous, haughty mind, hence it runs so soon into judging falsely or even, if the matter were really so, into condemning, into damning judgment, which is at any rate absolutely forbidden.

(v. 17). We are unprofitable servants before the Most Highest; that is certain, for all profitableness comes only from Him; but it is just because He makes us profitable that we are bound to do whatever is commanded us, to be diligent in doing good, as we know it, according to the will of God. James puts this lastly in the place of every self-willed doing of this or that. If we suffer ourselves to be found in good works aspiring for eternal life, then our earthly life verily has become more than a vapor, which vanishes away, then it is the seed-time of the great harvest of true gain.

JAKOBI (v. 15):—"If the Lord will and I live." There are indeed not a few Christians who take the precept of our text literally and think that they are sinning if in speaking of the future, they do not every time employ such a pious addition. But if faith here borders almost on superstition and if we actually find the traces of such superstition even in many otherwise enlightened Christians, is it not true that this momentous saying "If the Lord will and I live" sinks down into a mere conventionalism, if we carry it on our lips on every trifling occasion? and is it not to be feared that that which we should always utter only with a profound and most living sense of our impotence and the omnipotence of God, degenerates into a mere, blind habit? Let us apply also in this respect the mighty saying of St. Paul: "The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power," 1 Cor. iv. 20.—

NEANDER:—"If the Lord will and we live." It is evident that James in saying this did not insist upon it, that we should always express such a condition in words. Such expressions might easily degenerate into mere forms and those Churches, in virtue of their whole tendency, were apt to turn every thing into a mere form. James, as we have already seen, is fond of naming the specific instead of the general thought, and instead of expressing the general thought of the uncertainty and dependence of our whole earthly life, makes use of language calculated to indicate the general thought by its application to a specific case.

HEUBNER (v. 15):—James will appear to some as a pietist, but just from what he says we may know what genuine, sincere piety is. He is truly pious, whose piety interpenetrates also his whole heart, his whole life and his whole doing. To carry on even his earthly affairs with God characterizes the Christian: "with God" is his motto in every thing, Col. iii. 17.—The spirit of enterprise without religion is always pride.—

LISCO (vv. 7-10):—All our doing is at the same time the work of God.—(vv. 11-17) The danger of pride: 1, It misleads us to judge others uncharitably (vv. 11, 12); 2, it seduces us to trust over much in our own strength (vv. 13-17).—The unchristian element in the conduct of temporal affairs.—

PORUBSZKY (vv. 4-6):—Worldly and spiritual.—(vv. 6, 7) Be subject to God.—(vv. 7, 8) The greatest task of human willing.—(vv. 8-10) Three steps to genuine repentance: 1, grief; 2, faith; 3, work.—(vv. 11, 12). Our judgment of others condemns ourselves.—(vv. 13-17). Of assurance in our worldly affairs.—

WEINCK (vv. 13-15):—In what Christian families may find comfort in the retrospect of a departing year.—

WOLF (vv. 13-16):—Man may become the destroyer but not the architect of his happiness.

[WHITBY: v. 11:—The great exception which both the unbelieving Jews and the Judaizing Christians among them had against the believing Gentiles was this "they observed not their feasts or Sabbaths and that they were not circumcised," whence they concluded they differed little from the heathens. This was the thing for which the Christian fathers did contend against them; viz. that the ancient patriarchs of old were acceptable to God, and consequently the Christians, and especially the converted Gentiles, might be acceptable to God without the observation of these feasts and Sabbaths or of circumcision.

v. 15. It was a rule of Ben Syra (Buxt. Flor. p. 4) "Let no man say he will do any thing, unless he first say, If the Lord will," who also adds, that "one died before night, for refusing to add this." And when Alcibiades had said to Socrates, "I will do so if you will," Socrates (Plat. Alcib. 1, in fine) tells him he ought to have said, ἐάν ὁ θεὸς ἐθέλῃ, "if God will." Not that we are obliged always to say thus (Rom. xv. 28), but only still to own our dependence upon Divine Providence.—M.]

[v. 17. Εἰδότε ὅτι. Menander says: "It is manifest folly to know what we ought to do and not do it.—M.]

[MACKNIGHT:—v. 8. This and other exhortations of the like kind found in Scripture imply, that in matters of religion and virtue men must coöperate with the grace of God by their own earnest endeavours.—M.]

[PYLE: v. 11. As to you, dear brethren, who are already converted to Christianity, be sure to avoid that pernicious custom of slander and rash censure. Remember, that whoever hastily and unjustly condemns another man, reflects upon religion itself, sets up for a judge and makes himself wiser than the Divine Law. And such an one must not pretend to be a true disciple of that law, while he sets himself above it.—M. J.]

[v. 17. Now this, or any other crime, must be greater in a Christian than in any other man; because he, by the clear revelation of the Gospel, has or ought to have better notions of his duty, and a stronger sense of his religious obligations.—M. J.]

[BURKITT: v. 17. Let us learn hence, that to sin against light and knowledge, is a very heinous aggravation of sin, because the knowledge of our duty lays us under the greatest obligation to do it; and that the greater advantages and opportunities any man has of knowing his duty, and the more knowledge he sins against in not doing it, the greater is his sin, and the more grievous will be his condemnation.—M. J.]

[v. 4. There is a sense in which a man may be a friend of the world and yet remain the friend of God, and this seeming paradox is the duty of every Christian and more especially of the minister of Christ. He must be the world's true friend by telling the world its faults, exposing its corrupt maxims in a spirit of tender love and solicitude by preaching the truth of the everlasting Gospel and endeavouring to gain the world to Jesus Christ.]

v. 8. The Father, in the parable, running to meet the returning prodigal, a Divine illustration of the words "Draw nigh to God and He will draw nigh to you."—Outward lustrations are not sufficient, the heart must be purified as well. dyviate kapdias, literally "make chaste your hearts" alludes to their spiritual adultery (v. 4), and the whole clause may be applied to baptized Christians whose hearts are in the world.

v. 18. DEBARIM RABBA, § 9. p. 261. I we read as follows: "Our rabbis tell us a story, which happened in the days of Rabbi Simeon the son of Chelpatha. He was present at the circumcision of a child and stayed with his father to the entertainment. The father brought out wine for his guests, that was seven years old, saying, With this wine will I continue for a long time to celebrate the birth of my new-born son. They continued supper till midnight. At that time, Rabbi Simeon arose and went out, that he might return to the city in which he dwelt. On the way he saw the angel of death walking up and down. He said to him, Who art thou? He answered, I am the messenger of God. The rabbi said, Why wanderest thou about thus? He answered, I slay those persons who say, We will do this or that and think not how soon death may overpower them; that man with whom thou hast supped, and who said to his guests, With this wine will I continue for a long time to celebrate the birth of my new-born son, behold the end of his days is at hand, for he shall die within thirty days."

v. 16. Clarke cites from an old English work "The godly man's picture drawn by a Scripture pencil" the words: "Some of those who despise religion say, Thank God we are not of this holy number! They who thank God for their unholiness, had best go ring the bells for joy that they shall never see God."

v. 18. The same author cites the following from Saady's Gulistan: "I knew a merchant who used to travel with a hundred camels laden with merchandise and who had forty slaves in his employ. This person took me one day to his warehouse and entertained me a long time with conversation good for nothing. 'I have,' said he, 'such a partner in Turquestan, such and such property in India, a bond for so much cash in such a province, a security for such another sum.' Then, changing the subject, he said, 'I purpose to settle in Alexandria, because the air of that city is salubrious.' Correcting himself, he said, 'No, I will not go to Alexandria; the African Sea (the Mediterranean) is too dangerous. But I will make another voyage and after that I will retire into some quiet corner of the world, and give up mercantile life.' I asked him, what voyage he intended to make? He answered, 'I intend to take brimstone to Persia and China, where I am informed it brings a good price; from China I shall take porcelain to Greece; from Greece I shall take gold tissue to India; from India I shall carry steel to Haleb (Aleppo); from Haleb I shall carry glass to Yemen (Arabia Felix); and from Yemen I shall carry printed goods to Persia. This accomplished, I shall bid farewell to mercantile life, which requires so many troublesome journeys and spend the rest of my life in a store.' He said so much on this subject, till at last he wearied himself with talking: then turning to me, he said, 'I entreat thee Saady, to relate to me something of what thou hast seen and heard in thy travels.' I answered 'Hast thou never heard what a traveller said, who fell from his camel in the desert of Yoor? Two things only can fill the eye of a covetous man—contentment or the earth that is cast on him when laid in his grave.'"—M. ## CHAPTER V. 1-6.

1 Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you.<sup>1</sup>
2 Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and silver is 3 cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh;<sup>2</sup> 4 as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days. Behold, the hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud,<sup>3</sup> crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord 5 of Sabaoth. Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have 6 nourished your hearts, as<sup>4</sup> in a day of slaughter.<sup>5</sup> Ye have condemned and killed the just; and he doth not resist you.

- Verse 1. <sup>1</sup> Cod. Sin. inserts ὁ μὲν after ἐπερχόμεναί [so Vulg. Syr. Copt. Æth. Arm.—M.]
Lange: Well then, ye rich, weep unto howling over your calamities which are drawing near on you.
[Go to now, ye rich, weep howling over your miseries which are coming upon you.] your flesh [σάρκα, your carnalities] as fire. Ye have heaped up treasure in the last [these last] days.

[Your gold and your silver are eaten up with rust and their rust shall be for a testimony to you.... Ye the ears of the Lord of hosts.

[... have entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts.—M.]
Verse 5. <sup>4</sup> Cod. Sin. A. B. omit ὡς before ἐν; so Vulg. and other versions; found in Rec., G. K. and is probably an exegetical addition.

Verse 6. Lange: Ye have condemned, ye have killed the Just. He doth not resist you [any longer opposing and saving].
[Ye condemned, ye killed the Just One. He doth not resist you.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Analysis: The Judaists exhorted to repentance or to realize a presentiment of the judgment, v. 1.—Their condition: spiritual self-delusion, the corruptness and self-consumption of their supposed riches, vv. 2, 3.—Their positive sins resulting from such spiritual self-delusion. Their sins against the reapers of the harvest in Israel.—Their unsuspecting assurance of their life of indulgence in the very day of their judgment. The crime of the murder of the Just One, vv. 4-6.

The Judaists exhorted to repentance or to realize a presentiment of the judgment.

VER. 1. Well then, ye rich.—Concerning the rich see Introduction, ch. i. 10 and ii. 6, 7. That the reference is not to the outwardly rich but to the rich in the sense of Old Testament (Ps. lxxiii.; Is. v.), Gospel (Matth. xix. 24; Rev. iii. 17) and symbolical usage may be expected from an Apostolical man, to say nothing of an Apostle. The ordinary construction put on this term would lead us to expect either that the Epistle ought to have driven the outwardly rich from the Church or that they would have excluded the Epistle from the Canon. But just as the Jewish Christians themselves have ceased to be known so also the Gentile Christian Church has suffered the majestic prophetic penitential discourse of the faithful Christian Apostle to the Jews to be reduced to the conception of a severe moral lecture. The repetition of ἀγε νῦν does not prove that the reference here is to the same persons who are addressed in ch. iv. 18 (as Huther supposes). Nor is the reference at all to individuals as such; the persons addressed there are Judaists in a most perilous condition, while those addressed here are those who according to the last warning harden themselves by the self-delusion of their being theocratically rich. The entire prophetic lamentation must be judged according to its analogies in the Old Testament (Is. ii. 22; Ch. iii. 9, 19 etc.) the words of Christ (Matth. xxiii.) and the Apocalypse (ch. xviii.).

Weep unto howling.—De Wette and al. take this as an exhortation to shed the tears of repentance; Huther agrees with Calvin who denies that there is any reference to repentance and considers the passage to be "simplex denun- ciatio judicii dei, qua eos terrere voluit ab spe venis."

Wiesinger takes a middle position: that the design of James, as in the case of the prophets of the Old Testament, is nevertheless none other than that of moving them, if possible, to turn from their perverse course. Huther, who objects that James nowhere intimates such design, overlooks 1, that also the strongest menaces of judgment in the Old Testament are at any rate hypothetical (see the Book of Jonah, Jer. xviii. 7 etc.), 2, that the most assured foreseeing of the inevitability of the judgment as a whole still involves the possibility of individuals being awakened and saved in virtue of such menace, 3, that the Divine fore-announcement of such a judgment is at the same time made as a testimony of the truth for the future and designed to serve other generations as a warning and to conduce to their salvation. The strict construction of Huther is still more striking because he disputes Semler's exposition of the Imperative, viz. "stilo prophético imperat, ut rem certissimam demonstrat," and maintains that the proper force of the Imperative ought to be retained. This would therefore be a command to weep without any hope of salvation. The Participle ὀλοῦντες (ὀλοῦσθαι used often to describe howling with reference to the near approach of the judgment, Is. xiii. 6; xiv. 31 etc.) denotes weeping accompanied by constant howling, i. e. increasing unto howling.

Over your miseries.—The impending judgments, not specified by the Apostle, but further alluded to only with respect to their premonitory symptoms.

Which are drawing near on you.—There is hardly room to doubt that James refers primarily to the Jewish war and the destruction of Jerusalem; so Thomas Aquinas, Grotius, Michaelis and al. understand it. Huther cannot substantiate by any proof the remark that "they (Thomas Aquinas, etc.) are not wrong in this respect, because in the Apostle's mind the destruction of Jerusalem and the last judgment had not yet been distinguished." The καταστροφαι are rather said to be ἐπερχόμεναι, already approaching; whereas a very patient waiting is necessary with respect to the coming of the Lord, v. 7, etc., although in the light of Christian hope (not of chiliastic calculation) it is near at hand. On you, by which Luther and others further define the approaching judgments, follows not from the literal expression but from the connection; ἐπί also contains an allusion, favouring the construction. [See Appar. Crit. Note 1.—M.]

Their condition: spiritual self-delusion, the corruption and self-consumption of their supposed riches. vv. 2, 3.

VER. 2. Your riches are corrupted:—The verb σῆτω (ἀπαξ λεγ. in N. T.), to make rotten or putrid, destroy by rottenness, signifies in 2 Perf. Pass. (as here) to rot, moulder, to be rotten or also to be in a state of rotting fermentation. But it has also the more general sense, to corrupt, to consume oneself (Sir. xiv. 19). [σῆτρω is Perf. Middle.—M.] The verb therefore does not necessitate us to understand with Gebser and al. πλοῦτος=frumenta. The main question here is to determine whether this and the next expression denote the natural immanent judgment of sin as portents of the positive judgments, or the latter (Grotius, Bengel), so that future events are prophetically described as having already taken place (de Wette, Wiesinger, Huther and al.). But the reference is evidently to the former; the corrupting of riches and the moth-eaten garments denote immanent, natural corruptions. But here, as in the prophets (Is. xxviii. 1, 2; ch. xxxiii. 11, 12; Jer. vii. etc.) and in our Lord's eschatological discourse (Matth. xxiv. 28) these natural corruptions, as the judgment of the self-dissolution (—consumption) of sin, are in their products the tokens of positive judgment. But the riches must be taken figuratively, not literally as is generally done. The prophetic idea of the rich corresponds to the prophetic idea of the rich. It denotes therefore externalized Judaistic righteousness with all its national prerogatives, of course connected with that outward worldly prosperity and ease which are the outward complements of such self-righteousness. It is matter of historical record that at the time when James wrote this Epistle, Jewish affairs had the appearance of spiritual prosperity (in point of orthodoxy and world-holiness), as well as of worldly flourishing in the reign (in part at least) of Herod Agrippa II. (See my Apost. Age. I. pp. 807, 812, 824).

Are become moth-eaten, σπιδρωσας, Job xiii. 28: not found in Classic Greek and not elsewhere in the New Testament.

VER. 3. Your gold and your silver are eaten up with rust.—κατῶ is ἀπαξ λεγ. in the New Testament. Gold and silver do not contract rust, hence Hornejus observes that it is populariter dictum, which is approved by Huther. Pott interprets the striking expression of the dimness of their burnish, others otherwise. According to Huther James did not anxiously calculate the difference of metals in his vivid concrete depiction; but this would be an intensely popular mode of expression. The words Is. i. 22, "Thy silver is become dross" are not a merely popular expression; on the contrary they are designed to bring out the unnatural fact that the princes of Israel are become rebellious and companions of thieves. It is then an unnatural phenomenon to which James adverts, of course in figurative language. It is as unnatural for gold and silver to be eaten up with rust as for the glory of Israel to be as corrupted as the glory of other nations corrupts, which may be compared to base metals.

And their rust shall be a testimony against you.—Wiesinger, with whom Huther agrees, proposes the following interpretation: in the consuming of their treasures, to be brought about by an outward judgment, they see depicted their own. But the loss of outward wealth under the influence of outward corruption is by no means evidence of the inward corruption of the losers. Oecumenius supposes that the rust on their gold and silver shall testify against the hardness of their heart, because they did not use them in doing good. This is correct as far as the reference is doubtless to a corruption inherent in their circumstances, but it lacks the due appreciation of the figurative sense: the rusting of your gold and silver, of your glory, represented by your leading men (see Is. i. 22, 23), shall be a token that the nation is corrupted in its rich men in general. And this was actually the case. The leading men who in the spiritual life ought to have shone like burnished silver and gold were rusted in legalism and dragged the majority of the self-righteous people into their own corruption.

And shall consume your flesh.—The Plural σάρκες is differently explained. The word stands simply for ψυαίς (Baumgarten), it denotes their well-fed bodies (Augusti), the fleshy parts of the body as contrasted with the bones (Huther who refers to 2 Kings ix. 36; and particularly to Mich. iii. 2, 8). But these passages contain no allusion to a consuming fire; fire consumes bones as well as flesh. We therefore assume that the term flesh is here used in a bad sense as in Gen. vi. 3; Jer. xvii. 5 and Jno. iii. 6, and that the Plural describes the life of the rich as exhibited in the carnalities or externals of religious, civil or individual life, in which they take delight. That consuming rust of the decayed, defunct and deadly legalism beginning at the gold and silver with which they decorate themselves, eats through the flesh of their customs, ceremonies and earthly possessions to the very destruction of their life. It is a rust which has the consuming energy of fire (Ps. xxi. 22; Is. x. 16, 17). The rotten fertility, described as rust, in its last stage transforms itself into the fire of a revolutionary movement, into a fanatical, consuming conflagration of rebellion (see Rev. xix. 20), or in brief: absolutism becomes revolution. It is the consummated national self-dissolution, as it fully developed itself in the Jewish war and in Jerusalem besieged. The reference therefore on the one hand, is neither to consuming grief and want (Erasmus and al.), nor, on the other, already to the real, positive judgments (Calvin, Grotius, Wiesinger, Huther and al.). With respect to ὡς πῦρ, Wiesinger, who adopts the punctuation of Cod. A and Oecumenius, and follows Grotius and Knapp, connects it with ἐθναυπίαρε: "tantum ignem opes ietas congestissimas, et quidem ipsis extremis temporibus." Wiesinger cites as an analogy ἐθναυπίζεις σκαυρὸν ἑρῆν, Rom. ii. 5, to which Huther rightly objects that in the words ἐθναυπίαρε ἐν τοῦτοις ἡμέραις the principal stress rests on τοῦτοις ἡμέραις. This is sufficient; his further remark that the fire denotes already positive judgment we consider, for the reason already given, to be incorrect, but this fire points to positive judgment. ὡς also is against Wiesinger's construction, and so does the over bold metaphor: ye have as it were gathered fire in gathering your wealth.

Ye have heaped up treasure.—The verb requires no definite specification of the object and the supply of ὀργήν (according to Rom. ii. 5. Calvin and al.) is superfluous and arbitrary. Moreover, the treasure, as Huther remarks, has been specified before.

In the last days.—Not perchance the last days, and the last days are neither the last days of life, nor the last days before the advent of Christ (Huther). James refers to the last days before the final national judgment, alluded to in v. 1, but not yet described. The gathering of treasure is done in the anticipation of a long happy future; this reprehensible heaping up treasure in the last days of their existence, immediately before the judgment involving not only the ruin of their treasure but also of their very existence, characterizes moreover their fearful want of apprehension (freedom from all misgiving and fear, assurance) and mad-like self-delusion. All their spiritual and worldly treasures are useless obstacles in the impending judgment, destined to vanish as the means of their self-delusion in order to make room for a fearful undeceiving. Thus the indication of positive judgment draws nearer, but the Apostle first refers to their decisive sins.

Their positive sins resulting from such spiritual self-delusion. Their sins against the reapers of the harvest in Israel. The unsuspecting assurance of their life of indulgence in the very day of their judgment. The crime of the murder of the Just One. Vv. 4-8.

Vv. 4. Behold the hire of the labourers.

—First decisive sin. Huther: "Injustice towards those who work for them;" Wiesinger: One case instead of many, a case moreover which clearly exposes the crying injustice of those rich men as the transgression of the express prohibition, Deut. xxiv. 14, 15; Lev. xix. 13; Mal. iii. 5.—And this is to be the whole meaning of this passage! But in the first place it is inconceivable that those wandering trafficking Jews of the dispersion (ch. iv. 13) should all of a sudden be transformed into large landed proprietors, and in the second equally inconceivable that James should have occasion to reproach all the rich landlords of the dispersion with literally holding back the hire of their labourers. Here also we must again insist upon the symbolical sense of the passage. The first question is to determine the sense in which the term "the harvest of Israel" is used by the prophets (Is. ix. 3; Joel iii. 18), by John the Baptist (Matth. iii. 12), and by our Lord (Jno. iv. 35; Matth. ix. 38; cf. Rev. xiv. 15, 16).—It denotes the time when the theocratic seed of God in Israel has become ripe unto harvest; on the one hand unto the harvest of judgment, on the other unto the harvest of salvation. The latter idea predominates here. The harvest of Israel was the ripened spirit-produce of the Old Testament, as manifested in the work of Christ; in the reapers we may aptly see the Apostles (according to Jno. iv. 35), and the first Christians in general. From them the rich in Israel kept back the hire in that they rejected their testimony in unbelief. And thus the voices of those reapers cried into the ears of the Lord of hosts, i. e., abandoning the figure: their sin against them cried out to God, even to God, the Lord of those hosts which were already on the point of approaching in order to execute the judgment of God on Israel.—The labourers, ἐργάται, see 1 Tim. v. 18. ἀμῶν is ἀναξ λεγ. in N. T. The expression imports moreover that Israel's whole harvest of blessing has been brought home by these labourers into the Christian Church and that there is no other harvest besides it.

Which hath been kept back.—We construe with Huther "the hire which hath been kept back, crieth out from you," ἀπ' ὑμῶν, as we read in Gen. iv. 10. "the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground," because thus the injustice crying out for vengeance is laid to the charge of the evil-doers not to that of the labourers; the common construction "which hath been kept back by you" seems to be less opposed by taking ἀπὸ in the sense of ὑπὸ, than by the consideration that κράζει denotes a crying out for vengeance. Hence the connection is not: "the hire of the mowers crieth out and this crying has come to the ears of God" (Theile), but the crying out of the hire that has been kept back (Gen. xviii. 20; xix. 18) on the one hand, is completed on the other by the βοαί of the reapers or the gatherers of the harvest, first as cries of complaint and cries for help (see Heb. v. 7; Acts iv. 24 etc.; ch. xii. 5), and lastly also as cries for righteous recompense (Rev. vi. 10, 11). And these, even more than the former crying have entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts; which would yield this sense: not only the unbelief of the unbelieving Jews but also the distress of the believing Christians induce the Lord of hosts to send forth His hosts unto judgment; as indeed the destruction of Jerusalem was not only a visitation of judgment on Judaism but also a visitation of salvation on the Christian Church. The crying out of Christian blood for mercy to enemies reaches also its limit in the induration of unbelievers; moreover we should distinguish the reapers themselves from their βοαί, here made objective. The term "Lord of hosts" hardly renders prominent the power of God, as that of Lord of the heavenly hosts only (Wiesinger, Huther); He is also Lord of the earthly hosts according to the prophets (Is. vi. 8; xviii. 7; xxiv. 21; Amos ix. 4, 5), and also according to Christ (Matth. xxii. 7). [Bede suggests the following reason "Dominum exercituum appellat, ad terrorem eorum, qui pauperes putant nullum habere tutorem." This is the only passage in the New Testament where the term "Lord of hosts" is used in direct discourse. Rom. ix. 29 is a quotation.—M.]

Second sin. v. 5. Ye have lived high on earth.—τρυφῶν is ἀναγ λεν in the N. T. It comprehends the ideas: to live softly, voluptuously, gloriously and also extravagantly. In LXX. (Neh. ix. 25 and Is. lxvi. 11) the fundamental idea is "to take delight in something to revel." σπαταλῶν denotes living lewdly, luxuriously, especially in eating and drinking; but in LXX. (Ezek. xvi. 49 and Amos vi. 4) the idea of idle indulgence is decidedly predominant, probably also in 1 Tim. v. 6. Hence the two words would express not the definite antithesis deliciae et exquisita voluptas and luxuria atque prodigalitas (Hottinger), but that of positive sumptuousness in pleasure and sensuality and of negative sumptuousness in effeminate, careless indolence. We might therefore translate "Ye have had your delight and have settled down on earth," or "ye have become worldly and effeminate," or "ye have bragged and made a show." The opposite order occurs in Luke xvi. 19: the daily wearing of holiday-apparel denotes the idler, the sumptuous living, revelry. Huther strikingly points out the contrast of this sumptuous mode of life and the toilsome life of the labourers, also the contrast of such revelling on earth and the complaint which is made to the Lord in heaven. But we must not overlook in this revelling on earth the thought, that the earth, the earthly, figuratively taken, was the foundation in which their revelling struck root, and that the day of slaughter is the principal antithesis of revelling.

And fattened your hearts.—τρυφῶν in the opinion of several commentators denotes fattening, for the evident design of this clause is to show that the rich regarded and nourished their heart as an animal existence. Hence Huther is wrong in his correction of Luther, "to pasture your hearts," better: "to satiate." Luther's rendering is excellent and we should have retained it but for the necessity of holding fast to the other meaning that fattening the heart is at the same time indurating the heart (καρδία πενυπνεύνη). The heart, however, is not a paraphrastic description of the body or individuality but denotes inward life, the kernel of spiritual life (Acts xiv. 17). Wiesinger asserts that καρδία involves per se the idea of passionate fondness of enjoyment, but Luke xxi. 34 is the last passage which makes good his assertion.

In the day of slaughter.—On the omission of ὡς see Appar. Crit. Nor must ἐν be changed into εἰς. The rendering "as on a day of slaughter" (Luther, Wolf, Augusti) is consequently a double weakening of the thought. The comment of Calvin, Grotius, Bengel etc., that the day of slaughter is the day of sacrifice, when the slaughter of the victims is followed by banqueting, is altogether outside of the connection with the judgment. Calvin: "Quia solebant in sacrificiis solemnibus liberalius vesci, quam pro quotidiano more. Dicit ergo divites tota vita continuare festum." Huther rightly observes that the term in question is never used in this sense. De Wette sees in it a comparison to beasts, which on the very day of slaughter eat in unconcern. Huther thinks this comparison inappropriate, since beasts do not eat more greedily on the day of slaughter than at any other time. But this refutation rests on a misunderstanding. Beasts* always eat greedily; their eating on the day of slaughter may therefore be used as a figure of the inordinate feasting of the obdurate on the very day of judgment. The analogy of 2 Pet. ii. 12 only tends to strengthen the appropriateness of this construction. The thought is further intensified by the consideration that while beasts are led to pasture and fattened for the day of slaughter, these men laid themselves voluntarily out for feasting in the very day of slaughter. But we may suppose that this point of comparison must not be dissociated from the general and more lofty meaning of ἡμέρα σφαγῆς, viz. that of a day of judgment (Jer. xii. 8; xxv. 34). In the last passage also the ideas "day of judgment" and "day of slaughter" are taken together in a literal sense, so also in Is. liii. 7; Rev. xix. 17, 18. But the day on which began Israel's day of judgment which is developing itself into a day of slaughter, was the day of Christ's crucifixion which connected with the day of the destruction of Jerusalem becomes in a symbolical sense one day of visitation. The Aorists here, therefore, are not used to indicate that the conduct of the rich is to be viewed from the future day of judgment at the second coming of Christ (Huther), but because their carnal arrogance and unconcern in the devilish revelling of their hearts culminated just on the judgment-day of Israel. Since then their day of slaughter is in process of development. Just as they had therefore collected together the treasures of legal righteousness in the last days, while the old time was on the wane, so they had reached the climax of their self-indulgent worldliness on the last day, the day of judgment.—This leads to their third and greatest sin.

VII. 6. Ye have condemned, ye have killed the Just.—The fact of modern commentators disputing the exposition of Oecumenius, Bede and Grotius that the Just signifies Christ, proves how far they have wandered from the text in the treatment of this Epistle. Only think of James, the witness of Christ, at the end of his course calling out to the obdurate of all the people of Israel: Ye have condemned and killed the Just and they not to have understood him to refer to the rejection and crucifixion of Christ! But to what or to whom else did they think he was alluding? Gebser and Huther [also Alford—M.] take δικαίων collectively for τοῖς δικαίοις; i. e. oppressed, suffering Christians, and Huther says: "The ground of the persecution is implied in the word δικαίων itself; the Singular should be taken collectively, the idea absolutely" (similarly Theile). But then surely Christ ought to be considered as standing at the head of these slain ones. Wiesinger (and de Wette) refers the term to continued persecution ad mortem usque and adds that all reference to Christ is so manifestly against the whole context of the passage, that refutation is altogether unnecessary. On the contrary, proof is almost unnecessary. Wiesinger objects first, that the Epistle is addressed to the dispersion. But at the Passover, when Christ was crucified, the dispersion also was represented at Jerusalem, and symbolically all Israel was already dispersed. The most important objection is the Present οὐκ ἀντιτάσσεται ἑμὶν. This Present is certainly difficult. But is it more convenient to affirm concerning the collectively just man, that he had been killed by those rich and that he was still living than to affirm as much concerning Christ? The Vulgate probably alludes to Christ in rendering "non resistit;" so Luther, "he hath not resisted you." But the Present forbids such a rendering. But also the common explanation: "Ye have killed the Just, he does not resist you" gives a thought which is not clear, at least not very distinct. It would perhaps be easier to suppose that the readers of the Epistle understood James to say: "Christ does not resist you in His members, He still endures willingly all persecutions in His sufferings." But would this thought be a fitting conclusion of the great denunciation of those obdurate people? Nor is it the idea "the just do not resist you." We understand therefore Bentley's conjecture of reading ὁ κρις instead of οὐκ (see Ch. iv. 6; 1 Pet. v. 6; Prov. iii. 34); still more the explanation of Benson to take the clause interrogatively. Giving to ἀντιτάσσεται the fullest Middle sense, the question would read thus: "Does He not bring up against you His army (as the executor of the punitive justice of the Lord of hosts)?" or "does He not rise against you in combat?" At least it is easy to understand that with a predominantly ascetic turn of mind such a question might have been asked. But considering the importance of the matter, the interrogative form ought to be more distinctly marked: does he not already march against you, march against you in the tempest of war? Besides such an explanation might easily obscure the thought of the continuous suffering which Christ endures in His people. Hence one might light on the idea of rebellion, as we have it in Rom. xiii. 2. He does not rebel against you, i. e. you are the rebels. But this again is not sufficiently clear. We read therefore: He stands no longer in your way, He does not stop you (in the way of death); He suffers you to fill up your measure. See Matth. xxiii. 32-38. And this dark, pregnant sentence is the concentration of the announcement that the judgment impending on them, is inevitable. [The clause "οὐκ ἀντιτάσσεται ἑμὶν" seems to be ironical: He lets you alone (Hos. iv. 17).—James was called by his contemporaries "the Just" and this reference to Jesus as "the Just One" is a touching illustration of his character, for a delineation of which the reader is referred to the Introduction.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Both the Gospel and James are altogether free from any and every Ebionite one-sidedness that wealth, as such, is sinful and poverty, as such, meritorious. James allows the possession and use of earthly riches, but—in majorem Dei gloriam. While the rich are thus more privileged than others, they are also under doubly great obligations; but if they persistently acquire themselves of their discharge and use their riches only for the attainment of selfish ends which conflict with the law of love, then they are in all justice and reason liable to a vs vobis divitiibus cf. Luke vi. 24; Matth. vi. 19-21.—

2. Earthly wealth is not an absolute but a relative obstacle to entering the kingdom of God; cf. Mark x. 23-25.—The history of many rich men, e. g. Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea shows that this obstacle may be overcome. But this is impossible where covetousness reigns supreme and adopts every means of preserving or increasing earthly possessions. Here applies the Apostolic warning, 1 Tim. vi. 17-19,—compare also Plutarch, de cupiditate divitiarum, and the saying of Seneca, de benef. II. c. 27, "concitator est avaritia in magnarum opum congestus," also Sallust, in Catil. c. x. 4.—A life of luxurious indulgence as the concomitant of wealth and dependence on that wealth coupled with unfeeling contempt of one's brother, according to the teaching of Christ Himself, deserves the judgment Luke xvi. 25. And the history of the destruction of Jerusalem as well as innumerable incidents taken from the history of the kingdom of God confirm the fact that such rich men are

3. The rejection of the Messiah, to which James clearly alludes (v. 6), as the work of the prominent Jews, as the murder of the Innocent and the Just was not only a heinous crime per se (cf. Acts iii. 13-15), but also the first of a series of crimes enacted on the members of the Body, after they had first laid hands on the Head, which terminated at last in the horrors of the Jewish civil war and were punished with the fall of the city and the destruction of the temple.

4. Christianity imposes upon all men, blessed with earthly goods, the duty to ascertain and, if practicable, to satisfy the wants of their subordinates and servants and to consider themselves not as the lords but as the stewards of the capital confided to them, Luke xvi. 2; cf. Col. iv. 1.—Those who neglect this duty and oppress the poor have even pursuant to the tenor of the Old Testament to bear the dreadful punishment of God. See e. g. Ps. xxxvii.; Prov. xiv. 31; Eccl. v.—vii.

5. "Indulgence as it were fattens men for the punishment of hell—a figure taken from the sacrificial victims—i. e. ripens them so much the more for torments." Heubner on v. 5.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Wealth not an absolute superiority, poverty not an absolute evil.—Those who have most possessions on earth, have also to lose most in times of common suffering and tribulation.—Earthly riches from the nature of the case, are as transitory as their owners.—The true Christian an omnia sua secum portans.—The history of the rich fool is that of many (Luke xii. 16-20).—The degree to which the rich may be poor and the poor rich.—God's rich harvest-blessing changed into a curse through man's selfishness.—It is possible to do evil, but not to do it unpunished.—God is higher than the highest that oppress the poor, Eccl. v. 8.—The worldling's short joy followed by long pain.—The murder of the Just One the most horrid manifestation of outward selfishness.—The fact that evil is suffered here on earth no guarantee that it will not be punished (vv. 4-6).—Threefold sin of the rich; 1, oppression of the poor (v. 4), 2, selfish indulgence (v. 5), 3, murder of the Just One (v. 6).—How the crime of the rejection of Christ is still continued in various ways by many among the rich of this world.—The Christian has great cause to offer the prayer of Agur, Prov. xxx. 7-9.—The love of money the root of all evil (1 Tim. vi. 10) and of idolatry, Col. iii. 5.—

STARKE: CRAMER:—If you get riches, set not your heart on them, Ps. lxxii. 11.—A man may be very rich and yet be very wicked, Ps. lxxiii. 12.

AUGUSTINE:—Magna pietas! thesaurizat pater filius; immo magna vanitas! thesaurizat moriturus moriturus.—Many who do not leave even children and know not whose shall be their riches (Luke xii. 20) are so possessed of avarice, that they loathe parting even with a penny. O, unhappy rich!

QUESNEL:—Thus the rich ground their hope on things which decay and perish. Foolish building! Matth. vii. 26, 27.

LANGHE OP.:—If there were many pious rich men, who did husband their wealth as the stewards of God, the need of the poor would be greatly lessened, Luke viii. 2, 3; xii. 35.

HENDINGER:—There are many who gather along with their gold a treasure of the wrath and vengeance of God, Rom. ii. 5.—To defraud labourers of their hire they have earned is a sin that crieth out to heaven and is sure to be followed by the curse and most fearful vengeance of God, 1 Thess. iv. 6.—The name of God "the Lord of hosts" is as terrible to the ungodly as it is consoling to the godly, Ps. xlii. 11, 12.—Robbing the poor of their well-earned wages is murder, Ex. i. 13, 14.

STIER: (v. 6):—James refers primarily to the Lord, the Just One (Acts vii. 52) and he himself bore the honourable epithet "the Just," he here (implicite) humbly declines that epithet. Yet again—(here the inspiration of the Spirit affects the author of the Epistle so perceptibly and becomes here so remarkably prophetic that again)—he is unconsciously prophesying of himself. An author, who lived soon after the Apostles (Hegesippus), gives us a full account, which is doubtless correct in its main features, of the martyrdom of James the Just, the Lord's brother, shortly before the siege of Jerusalem. See Introd. p. 9 etc.; [also Excursus p. 18, etc.—M.].—(v. 4). Surely the words of James apply to many of our contemporaries, and many a proud palace ought to have the appropriate inscription.—"Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness and his chambers by wrong."—The treatment which poor labourers experience at the hands of our money-aristocrats and merchant princes, who in their avarice are just what those names import and nothing more, who refuse to know the Lord God and our Saviour, cries everywhere loud enough in our ears, and is it likely that this crying has not also entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts? Of Him, who commanded even Moses to say in the law: "Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant, that is poor and needy—lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee." Deut. xxiv. 14, 15.—

JAKOBI:—It is not the measure of wealth, but the measure of sin, which tells; everything depends upon the manner how earthly riches, be they great or small, have been acquired and are enjoyed; and hence those whom we can by no means call wealthy, may be just as ungodly and unrighteous, just as indulgent and voluptuous as those who are really rich. Our text is therefore addressed to all that are earthly-minded, to all worldly people that do not order their lives according to the rule "to have, as though they had, and to buy, as though they possessed not." 1 Cor. vii. 29 etc.

NEANDER:—James describes wealth in three different respects, viz. in garnered fruits of the field, in apparel, in gold and silver. All these, he says, the rich heap up without profit. Their treasures in gold and silver, for want of use, are eaten up with rust and will testify against them in judgment, finding them guilty because they suffered to perish for want of use that which they ought to have employed for the benefit of others. The rust consumes their own flesh, reminding them of their own perishableness and of the punishment that awaits them in the judgment, because instead of gathering durable riches, they have heaped up the fire of Divine punishment in treasures destined to be eaten up with rust.

VIRDEBANDT:—A Christian, as has been strikingly said, may own worldly possessions like Abraham, David and many more, for a beggar's staff will no more take us to heaven than a golden chain or velvet fur will take us to hell. Christ says not; "Ye cannot have God and mammon," but "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Riches, says Augustine, are gifts of God and therefore good in themselves. Lest men decry them as evil, they are also accorded to the good, lest they be valued as the best goods, they are also given to the evil; Holy Scripture therefore only forbids men to be proud of and to ground their hopes on uncertain riches. But although riches and righteousness are compatible with one other, yet those who are distinguished by their worldly possessions, should cherish in their souls a sacred fear of them.—Riches are snares [German rhyme "Schätze sind Netze."—M.].—A man lights hell-fire with his own hands if he suffers the fire of lusts to burn in his heart.—Dr. Sauvergne, a physician, narrates the case of a miser, who had his money brought to his dying bed and expired with the words "more gold, more gold!"

LISCO:—The dangers of wealth.—Of twofold riches (earthly and heavenly).—

PORUBSZKY:—The woe uttered over the rich. 1, what it means; 2, its application to our time, 3, when it will cease.

[WORDSWORTH: v. 2.—Although they may still glitter brightly in your eyes, and may dazzle men by their brilliance when ye walk the streets, or sit in the high places of this world; yet they are in fact already cankered. They are leathsome in God's sight. The Divine anger has breathed on them and blighted them; they are already withered and blasted, as being doomed to speedy destruction; for ye lived delicately on the earth (v. 5), and have not laid up treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt (Matth. vi. 20).

Even while shining in your coffers, they are, in God's eye, sullied and corroded, and they will not profit you in the day of trial, but be consumed by His indignation: and the rust they have contracted by lying idle as κρηματα, and not being used as χρηματα, will be a witness against you at the Great Day; and will pass from them by a plague-like contagion and devour your flesh as fire.

v. 5.—A striking contrast. Ye feasted jovially in a day of sacrifice, when abundance of flesh of the sacrificed animals is on the table at the sacrificial banquet. Ye ought to have ruled the people gently and mildly; but ye "have fed yourselves and not the flock," ye nourished your own hearts and not those of your people; ye have sacrificed and devoured them like sheep or calves of the stall fattened for the pampering of your own appetites. Cf. Ezek. xxxiv. 1-10. Cyril in Caten. p. 88.

Ye did this at the very time when ye yourselves were like victims appointed to be sacrificed in the day of the Lord's vengeance, which is often compared by Hebrew prophets to a sacrifice, see below, Rev. xix. 17. Cf. Oecumenius and Theophylact here.

This was signally verified by the event. The Jews from all parts of the world came together to the sacrifice of the Passover A. D. 70, and they themselves were then slain as victims to God's offended justice, especially in the Temple; particularly was this true of the rich, as recorded by Josephus, B. J. vi. passim.—Their wealth excited the cupidity and provoked the fury of the factious zealots against them, and they fell victims in a day of slaughter to their own love of mammon; what was left of their substance was consumed by the flames, which burnt the city.—Joseph. B. J. VII. 29, 82, 87.—M.]

X. FINAL THEME AND CONCLUSION.

FURTHER ADDRESS TO THE BRETHREN. FINAL THEME: EXHORTATION TO ENDURANCE IN LONG-SUFFERING PATIENCE UNTO THE COMING OF THE LORD.—ENCOURAGEMENT THERETO. CONDITION THEREOF. FINAL PROMISE.

CHAPTER V. 7-20.

7 Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it,
8 until he receive the early<sup>1</sup> and latter rain. Be ye also patient;<sup>2</sup> establish your hearts:
9 for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Grudge not one against another, brethren,<sup>3</sup>
11 suffering affliction,<sup>9</sup> and of patience. Behold, we count them happy which endure.<sup>10</sup>
Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen<sup>11</sup> the end of the Lord; that the 12 Lord<sup>12</sup> is very pitiful, and of tender mercy. But above all things,<sup>13</sup> my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but 13 let<sup>14</sup> your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation.<sup>15</sup> Is any

- 14 among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms. Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord:<sup>18</sup> And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. Confess<sup>17</sup> your faults<sup>18</sup> one to another, and pray<sup>19</sup> one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain: and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain,<sup>20</sup> and the Lord brought forth her fruit. Brethren,<sup>21</sup> if any of you do err from the truth,<sup>22</sup> and one convert him; Let him know<sup>23</sup> that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul<sup>24</sup> from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins.<sup>25</sup>

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Analysis.—Further address to the brethren. Final theme, viz: exhortation to endurance in long-suffering patience unto the coming of the Lord, vv. 7-9. Encouragement thereto: Examples of patient suffering, vv. 10, 11.—Conditions thereof: Shunning of seditious movements. A hallowed disposition. The healing of their sicknesses. Liberation of the conscience by means of confession of sins. Exhortation to intercession. The example of Elias, vv. 12-18.—Conclusion replete with promise, vv. 19, 20.

Further address to the brethren. Final theme: viz. exhortation to endurance in long-suffering patience unto the coming of the Lord, vv. 7, 8.

VER. 7. Be patient therefore, brethren.—ἀδελφοί is the turning-point in the Apostle's address. He now turns primarily to the Christian section of his readers without excluding however the further design of the address for all Jews capable of conversion in contrast to the aforementioned incorrigible πρόσωποι. μακροθυμεῖν literally to have great courage, to be magnanimous, branches out into the ideas to be long-suffering or forbearing towards the erring, applicable both to Divine and human long-suffering, and to be patient in the endurance of suffering, but also with the lateral idea of patiently hoping for endurance under apparent danger, here under the experience of worldly and human wrong, Heb. vi. 12. Hence μακροθυμία is distinguished from ὑπομονή in Col. i. 11. And here also the term is obviously chosen instead of ὑπομένειν ch. i. 12, because the Apostle desires to lay stress on the endurance of the Jewish-Christian under the wrongs of the old situation of the world, by which the Judaists suffered themselves to be drifted into revolution.

Unto the coming of the Lord.—The Lord is Christ, as in ch. ii. 1, and the παρουσία denotes His eschatological advent according to the entire evangelical and apostolical system of doctrine (consequently not the coming of God unto judgment distinct and separate from the advent of Christ, as held by Augusti, Theile, de Wette). But this involves no reason for identifying this παρουσία with the judgments announced in v. 1. nor must we, on the other hand, limit the coming of Christ to the last and concluding event of His epiphany. The coming of Christ is the epiphany (manifestation) of Christ with all its antecedent interpositions, be they universal or individual, the greatest of which is the destruction of Jerusalem, as the type of all subsequent comings.

Behold the husbandman waiteth.—Cf. ch. iii. 18; Sir. vi. 16; 2 Tim. ii. 6.

For the precious fruit of the earth.—Which is well worth waiting for. In this the husbandman is a symbol for believers, as also in that he confides the seed to the earth, to invisibleness, to seeming death and the grave. Jno. xii. 24.—

Being patient over it.—μακροθυμεῖν probably denotes here his persevering hope of the seemingly buried seed. It is the preciousness of the fruit (which, although invisible, he sees in expectation), that gives him long-enduring, faithful courage. He calculates on it. [ἐν is very graphic; it depicts him, as it were, sitting over it in the confident expectation of its appearing.—M.]

Until it shall have received.—That is, the fruit in its seed, not the husbandman (Morus).

The early and the latter rain.—That is with reference to the climate of Palestine: the autumnal rain before sowing, the spring rain before harvest, Deut. xi. 14, 2; Jer. v. 24, etc. See Winer, R. W. B. Article "Witterung." [The early rain πρώτος ὥρη began to fall about the middle of October, became more continuous in November and December and turned into snow in January and February. The latter rain ὀψίμος, ὥρη fell in March and lasted to about the middle of April. Thunder-gusts were not uncommon from January to March.—The singular exposition of the early and the latter rain given by Oecumenius may prove suggestive: πρώτος ὥρης, ἡ ἐν νεότητι μετὰ δακρύων μετάνοια. ὀψίμος, ἡ ἐν τῇ γήρᾳ.—M.]

VER. 8. Be ye also patient.—As is the husbandman. It is assumed that the seed has been sown among them. Their patience, indeed, is sorely tried, hence:

Establish your hearts.—1 Thess. iii. 13; 1 Pet. v. 10. It is here understood that this must be done by seeking refuge in prayer to the Lord, who giveth strength, as has been repeatedly pointed out, ch. i. 5, 6 etc.

Because the coming of the Lord is nigh.—Literally: it has already drawn nigh in its coming nigh. It is not a fixed nearness but a constant drawing nearer and that, not in the sense of a chronological definition, but in the sense of a religious expectation and assurance, which does not calculate the time and the hour, or rather looks at time in the spirit of the Lord before whom a thousand years are as one day (2 Pet. iii. 8). In the Apostle's sense of the expression, it could be said and may be said at all times: the coming of the Lord is nigh.

VER. 9. Murmur not, brethren, against one another.—There is no reason why this should be limited to the mutual forbearance among "Christians" (Huther). Here again all the dissensions among the Jews must be taken into consideration. As James had already denounced their quarrels, so he now feels anxious to stop the very sources of these quarrels. Huther admits that James refers to a "gemitus accusatorius" (Estius, Calvin), but denies that it amounts to a "provocatio ultionis" (Theile and al.). But the second cannot be separated from the first; the legalism of the Old Testament, moreover, as contrasted with the thorough fidelity of the N. T. intercession, exerted as yet a powerful influence over the minds of the Jewish-Christians and might easily bias them in that direction. The believing Jews were peculiarly exposed to that temptation by the oppressive and irritating treatment they received at the hands of the rich. Huther rightly remarks that impatience in affliction has the tendency of making men irritable. [It is of course difficult to determine whether the reference is to Christians only or to those who were open to conviction, or to all whom it might concern. As the exhortation states a general moral duty, it is perhaps best to give it the widest possible application. In this sense the note of Hornejus (in Huther) will be found useful: "Quos ad manifestas et gravissimas improborum injurias fortiter ferendas incitarat, eos nunc hortatur, ut etiam in minoribus illis offensis quæ inter pios ipsos sæpe subnascentur, vel condonandis vel dissimulandis prompti sint. Contingit enim ut qui hostium et improborum maximas sæpe contumelias et injurias æquo animo tolerant, fratrum tamen offensas multo leniores non facile ferant."—M.]

That ye be not judged.—According to Matth. vii. 1, because murmuring against one another is also judging. [The reference is to final condemnation.—M.]

Behold, the Judge standeth before the doors.—(Matth. xxiv. 33). Before the door. The Judge i. e. Christ. Theile sees here a reference to the disposition of the Judge to punish the oppressors and to avenge the oppressed; Huther, on the other hand, says it is intended to caution the suffering against the suspension of love and to hold out to them the promise of speedy deliverance. But it is pretty certain that the love of justice, purified from every unholy admixture, may also expect the just recompense of evil, and that the two ideas, therefore, go together. Wiesinger's remark is excellent: "Ye may with perfect calmness leave the judgment to Him and therefore ye ought not to expose yourselves to the danger of the judgment." Cf. Phil. iv. 5. [Seeing Christ will speedily execute judgment, do not murmur against one another; murmuring against one another is a species of judging and condemning, ye are brethren, not accusers and judges of one another; invading the prerogative of the Judge renders you liable to judgment and condemnation. Love, requite evil with good and leave the judgment in the hands of Christ.—The reader is referred to the Introduction for the remarkable incident recorded by Hegesippus that the religious sects at Jerusalem were wont to ask St. James "which is the Door of Jesus?" Wordsworth says: "The words of St. James 'Behold the Judge standeth at the doors' perhaps became current among them. Perhaps those words may also have excited the question put in a tone of derision, 'which is the Door of Jesus?' at what Door is He standing? By what Door will He come? Show Him to us and we will go out to meet Him.—This supposition is confirmed by the reply of St. James, 'why do ye ask me concerning the Son of Man? He sitteth in heaven, and will come in the clouds of heaven.'—For other interpretations of that saying "Which is the Door of Jesus?" see Bp. Pearson on St. Ignatius, ad Philadelph. 9, αὐτὸς ὡς θύρα τοῦ πατρὸς, with reference to Jno. x. 7-9; Valesius and al. on Euseb. II. 23; Lardner, Hist. of Apostles, ch. 16; Credner, Einleit. 2, p. 580; Gieseler, Church Hist. § 81; and Delitzsch on Ep. to the Hebrews, p. 673.—M.]

Encouragement thereto. Examples of patient suffering. vv. 10, 11.

VER. 10. Take, my brethren, as an example.—ὑπόδειγμα, example or pattern—παράδειγμα, representation, related to ὑπογραμμής, writing-copy (copy-head) perhaps also attesta-tion, and τύπος, the original pattern or beginning of a thing.

Of affliction and patience.—κακοπάθεια, ἀπάξ λεγ. in N. T. although not exactly—to suffer wrong (Hottinger), or—to suffer absolutely, denotes suffering evil or affliction, which easily suggests suffering wrong. [But, as Alford remarks, the word is strictly objective and is found parallel with ξυμφορά and the like. Cf. v. 13, Mal. i. 12; 2 Macc. ii. 26, 27; and Thucyd. vii. 77, ἐλπίδα χρόνῳ ἔχειν, μὴδὲ καταμέμψασθαι ἰσῆς ἀγαν αὐτοῖς, μήτε ταῖς ξυμφοραῖς, μήτε ταῖς παρὰ τὴν ἀξίαν νῦν κακοπαθείαις (spoken by Nicias to the suffering Athenian army in Sicily): so Isocr. p. 127. c. μηδὲ μικρὰν οἰεσθαι δεῖν ὑπενεγκεῖν κακοπαθείαν.—M.]

The prophets, who spoke in the name of the Lord.—Cf. Matth. v. 12. The addition characterizes them as servants of the Lord, who endured wrong for His sake.—Who spoke.—In a pregnant sense as frequently in the prophets.

In the name of the Lord.—(Lange: "in virtue of the name of the Lord"). Huther makes τῷ=ἐν τῷ, claiming as much for Matth. vii. 22. But there the sense is modified and here also this peculiar expression has probably to be so explained that the name of the Lord, i. e. the fundamental thought of the revelation of the Old Testament, gave impulse to their speaking. [But this seems a forced construction and since B. and Cod. Sin. actually supply ἐν there is really no reason why τῷ should not be taken= ἐν τῷ.—M.]

VER. 11. Behold, we count happy.—(Matth. v. 10, 11). This saying is not only a subjective judgment of James but a reference to the fixed judgment recognized in the theocratic congregation and more particularly in the Christian Church. On this account also the reading τοῖς ὑπομειναντας is preferable to ὑπομένοντας. This embraces of course also the prophets just referred to (Grotius etc.), yet not them only but besides them also the most honoured sufferers. Hence we have "ye have heard of the patience of Job," Ez. xiv. 14, 20; Tob. ii. 12-15.—Although his patience was at first shaken by the great temptation, it gradually became established even unto conquering the temptation. The Jewish Christians had heard of him not only by means of the lessons which were read in the synagogue, but the name of Job was popularly honoured among them.

The end of the Lord.—We have here once more James' uniformly significant τέλος, the import of which is wholly misunderstood if the passage is made to denote with Huther, Wiesinger and many others: "the termination which the Lord gave" (of the Lord, Genitive of the causal subject). We therefore return confidently to the exposition of Augustine, Bede, Wetstein and al. "the end of the Lord is the completing of Christ." It is objected that the context does not warrant such a construction. But the context speaks in the Plural, not in the Singular of those who did suffer. The final clause of the verse "for very compassionate is the Lord and merciful," it is supposed, ought to be restricted to the mercy of God, which gave so happy a termination to the sufferings of Job. But was Job's restitution, according to the idea of the book, merely an act of mercy? On the other hand the supposition that Christ the Lord, pursuant to His compassion, entered upon His passion and thus showed the endurance of patience, conforms exactly to the biblical idea (1 Pet. ii. 21; iv. 1; Heb. ii. 10), and this idea is actually prefigured in the book of Daniel (ch. iii. 25). Huther, moreover, thinks it improbable, that James should have connected the example of Christ immediately with that of Job. But he did thus connect the example of Abraham with that of Rahab. There the antithesis was: Abraham, the father of believing Jews, Rahab a degraded Gentile woman; the antithesis here is: the great sufferer of the Old Testament, the Great Sufferer of the New. This abandonment of the ancient interpretation of our passage we cannot regard otherwise than as a consequence of the disparaging views held with respect to this Epistle. Besides James could hardly extol to the Jewish Christians the glorious gain of patience in suffering without adverting also to the example of Christ (cf. 1 Pet. ii. 21 etc.). This might have struck some of his readers as almost amounting to a denial. And why does he employ the term τέλος, by which he understands principal completion, and generally that of the New Testament? Why does the verb ἠκούσατε not suffice him and why does he in contrast with it, use the Imperative ἴδετε "look at the completion of the Lord?" But the Lord, like Job, went through suffering to glory, and that in the highest sense; and He was moved thereto by His infinite compassion, His love, which is also designed to coöperate with the patience of Christians. And this ἴδετε seems to be the culminating point of the Apostle's missionary saying addressed to those Jews who were as yet unbelieving: "the end of the Lord, look at it;" while the common exposition: "The end, which the Lord gave, see (i. e. know, learn from it) that the Lord is πολύσπλαγχνος etc." (Huther), is not only very flat, but also forced.—For very pitiful is the Lord. Rendering ὅτι for, appears to Huther unsubstantiated by what goes before, but nothing can be more simple than the thought: "look at the end of the sufferings of Christ, for that He suffered need not excite astonishment, it is a consequence of His pity. πολύσπλαγχνος occurs here only; it is formed after חַסְדִּים רַבִּים (Wiesinger), the LXX use instead πολύελεος, Paul and Peter ἐνσπλαγχνος (Eph. iv. 32; 1 Pet. iii. 8).

Conditions of this patience. Shunning of seditious movements. A hallowed disposition. The healing of their sicknesses. Liberation of the conscience by means of confession of sins. Exhortation to intercession. The example of Elias. vv. 12-18.

VER. 12. But before all things, my brethren, do not swear (conspire).—We cannot admit the view of Kern and Wiesinger that the connection of the Epistle breaks off at this point or that the dehortation contained in this verse has no other connection with what goes before than that which arises from the conduct of the readers.* The fundamental idea which connects this verse with v. 11 and v. 18 etc., is the allaying of the fanatical excitement which was constantly growing among the Jews and was threatening through the influence of the Judaists to deprive the Jewish Christian Churches of their Christian composure. The history of the banding together of more than forty men against the life of St. Paul (Acts xxiii. 12-21) proves the bias of judaistic zealots to enter into conspiracies; subsequently towards the outbreak of the Jewish war they were doubtless of more frequent occurrence. We have employed in our translation an ambiguous word [Verschwörung, of which we have no current equivalent in English, i. e. an ambiguous equivalent; the German word denotes 1, to bind oneself by an oath; 2, to enter into a conspiracy. Conjuration is the nearest English representative of Verschwörung, but the sense of conspiracy attached to it, although current in the days of Sir Thomas Elyot (†1546), is now obsolete.—M], in order to intimate this meaning. To be sure we take it textually in the sense that all swearing accompanied by hypothetical imprecations or the giving of a pledge is conspiracy. See Comm. on St. Matth. v. 34 etc. Hence James, like Christ (Matth. v. 34), defines this swearing as swearing by heaven, by the earth, or by any other oath (ὅρκος) connected with a hypothetical curse. The Greek construction ὁμνῶντες with the Accusative brings out the unseemly character of such swearing by or appeal to a created object as a witness or avenger, with greater distinctness than the Hebrew construction of the same verb with עַל. Oecumenius, de Wette, Neander, and al. understand the prohibition to apply to swearing in general, as in Matth. v. 33 with reference to or for the ideal condition of the Church. On the other hand Calvin, Wiesinger and many others refer the prohibition to light and trifling oaths in common life. With this must be connected the remark of Huther that swearing by the name of God is not mentioned; had he intended this swearing, he ought to have mentioned it in express terms because it is not only commanded in the law in contradistinction to other oaths (Deut. vi. 13; x. 20; Ps. lxxiii. 12), but also foretold in the prophets as a token of men's future conversion to God (Is. lxxv. 16; Jer. xii. 16; xxiii. 7, 8). But it follows also from this contradistinction that the oath in virtue of its N. T. completion was designed to be stripped of the formulæ of cursing and imprecation which always involve the pledging of things over which man has no control. To be sure, the stress lies here not only on this idealizing of the oath but also on the total setting aside of the abuse of oaths in the reality of social life. This attitude of James respecting arbitrary oaths and his recommendation of the anointing with oil mentioned in the sequel, show that he was free from all Essene prejudice, for the Essenes were wont to administer to novices the vow of their order with a strong oath, although they rejected all other swearing, and so in like manner the anointing with oil.

But let your yea be yea.—[Winer: Grammar, p. 92, the Imperative ἦτω for ἐστω (which in the N. T. is also the usual form) 1 Cor. xvi. 22; Jas. v. 12; (Ps. civ. 81; 1 Macc. x. 81, cf. Clem. Alex. Strom. 6, 275; Acta Thom. 8, 71, Buttman I. 529; only once in Plato, Rep. 2, 361,

d. See Schneidel p. 1. According to Heraclides (in Eustath. p. 1411, 22), the flexion is Doric. The other imper. form λοθι occurs in Matth. ii. 18; v. 26; Mark v. 84; Luke xix. 17; 1 Tim. iv. 15 (Buttmann I. 257).—M.J. The exhortation corresponding to the prohibition. Here we find two opposing interpretations; 1. Let your yea and nay agree with your consciousness of positive or negative facts, i. e. let it be according to truth (Theophylact, Calvin and al.); 2. Let your yea be a simple yea, your nay a simple nay (Estius, Neander, Huther). We think that the two ought to be connected together from the nature of the case (see Comm. on Matth. v. 84 etc.), but that the choice of the expression in Matthew along with actual truthfulness gives prominence to the assurance, while here James rather intones the perfect composure whereby the soul contents itself with the simple declaration.

That ye fall not under judgment.—On the reading εις ὑπόκρισιν see Appar. Crit.; on the expression see 2 Sam. xxii. 39; Ps. xviii. 39. The context requires a judgment of condemnation and this is to be dreaded not only on account of the formal, wicked carelessness with which such oaths are uttered (which carelessness moreover leads to hypocrisy) but also on account of the mutinous and perilous acts or steps by which they are frequently sealed.

Vers. 13. Is any among you in affliction?—In opposition to the reprehensible sealing of excited frames of mind by such imprecatory swearing, the Apostle exhorts them to calmness of disposition and points out the means of accomplishing it. Its way was under all circumstances by a religious elevation of the mind. In the case of affliction (for the rendering: "does any among you suffer?" strikes us as too weak) the depression of the mind is to be raised by prayer; in the case of prosperity the mind is to be guarded against wantonness by the sacrifice of prosperity, by thanksgiving, by the singing of psalms or songs of praise (ψάλλειν 1 Cor. xiv. 15). Cf. ch. i. 9, 10. Huther thinks that the connection of this exhortation with the one preceding it cannot be substantiated. The connection is manifestly the Christian regulation of different mental conditions.

Vers. 14. Is any sick among you?—Here is the culminating point of the question whether the language of James is to be uniformly taken in a literal sense, or whether it uniformly bears a figurative character. The literal construction involves these surprising moments: 1. The calling for the presbyters of the congregation in the Plural; 2. the general direction concerning their prayer accompanying unction with oil; 3. and especially the confident promise that the prayer of faith shall restore the sick apart from his restoration being connected with the forgiveness of his sins. Was the Apostle warranted to promise bodily recovery in every case in which a sick individual complied with his directions? This misgiving urges us to adopt the symbolical construction of the passage, which would be as follows: if any man as a Christian has been hurt or become sick in his Christianity, let him seek healing from the presbyters, the kernel of the congregation. Let these pray with and for him and anoint him with the oil of the Spirit; such a course wherever taken, will surely restore him and his transgressions will be forgiven him. This symbol, explained in the Epistles of Ignatius as containing the direction that the bishop, the centre of the congregation should be called in, may be founded on a wide-spread Jewish Christian custom of healing the wounds of the sick by prayer accompanying the application with oil. Most remote from the mind of the Apostle is the Roman Catholic tradition of extreme unction; for the reference here is to the healing of the wounds of the sick conducing to their recovery, but not to a ritual preparation of him for death; not any more here than in Mark vi. 18. Cf. Huther's note, p. 196.

Let him call to himself (summon, call for).—In the case of bodily sickness it is self-evident that this must be done by others than the sick man. [προσκαλεσάσθω does not necessarily mean that the sick man is to call in person on the elders of the Church, it leaves the manner of his appeal undefined, he might call on them in person or summon them to his side by the intervention of others. To summon in the sense of sending for seems to be the most approved meaning. Cf. the Lexica.—M.J.]

The elders of the Church.—We must neither reduce the Plural to the Singular in the sense: "let him summon one of the presbyters" (Estius, Wolf), nor assert confidently that ἐκκλησία denotes here the particular congregation to which the sick man belongs, although the latter is probable. The main point is that ἡ ἐκκλησία, as a local congregation did represent from the beginning the whole Church and that consequently the presbyters could be sent for primarily from the most specific ecclesiastical district but also from a more distant sphere. (If I understand Lange's allusion, I doubt whether his inference is sustained by the facts of the case. Interloping was not sanctioned in the primitive Church. The Apostles uniformly insist upon order and decency in the conduct of Church government. A sick man, connected with a particular ecclesiastical organization would send, of course, for the presbyters connected with it; where no such organization existed, he would send for those presbyters to whom access might most easily be had.—M.J.]

And let them pray over him; i. e. not only for him, nor only literally as standing over his bed, but with reference to effecting his salvation (Acts xix. 18). [Bengel: "Qui dum orant, non multo minus est quam si tota oraret ecclesia."—M.J.]

Anointing him with oil.—Many commentators assume, with reference to the Jewish custom, that the oil was here intended to coöperate as a medium of cure, cf. Jer. 8, 22; xli. 11; Luke x. 34. The disciples also used to connect this medium with their miraculous cures, Mark vi. 13. See this Comment. in loco. Now in so far as the reference here implied lies to an apostolical method of effecting cures, we must doubtless think also of the organic connection of intercession with oil, i. e. of the spiritual effect accompanying that produced on the medium of the body. Huther (in opposition to Meyer) dissolves this connection without sufficient reason, by observing that the oil as such was only refreshing to the body. What such a refreshing amounts to, is not very clear; the chief point is that the two were to be united in one act, which was performed in the name of the Lord (Christ). But Huther rightly remarks that James did not prescribe anointing, but assumed the observance of the usage. He prescribes prayer in connection with that usage and the anointing as an anointing in the name of the Lord, which latter particular must not be referred to prayer only (Gebser), nor to both acts (de Wette), but solely to the act of anointing (Huther). In the literal acceptance of the precept, prayer would be the medium of the miraculous cure, which was then to be performed in the name of the Lord (i. e. not pursuant to His command, but in the power and limitation of His name). Schneckenburger adds that the presbyters had the χάρισμα ἰατρῶν (1 Cor. xii. 9). Huther calls this an arbitrary assumption and says that moreover nothing is said here of the χάρισμα. But the χάρισμα has at all times been the conditio sine qua non of ministerial efficiency and in the Apostolical church the office of presbyter did not involve the charisma, but rather those who had the respective charisma were generally ordained as presbyters (see 1 Cor. xii. 9, 30). Huther also sets aside without sufficient reason the connection between miraculous gifts and gifts of natural experience to which Pott, after his manner, calls attention: "quia uti omnino prudentissimi eligebantur, sic forte etiam artis medicæ peritissimi erant."

Vrs. 16. And the prayer of faith.—Not faith in general, but miraculous faith as a special charisma of the Christian spirit (see 1 Cor. xii. 9, 10). Prayer characterized by such faith, not in general: the prayer which faith offers. Grotius and al. rightly assume that this faith implies identity of purpose on the part of the presbyters who intercede, and on that of the sick for whom intercession is made, for it is in this faith that the sick summons the presbyters (of the Gospels); Wiesinger and Huther arbitrarily limit this prayer to the act of the presbyters only.

Shall help (heal) the sick.—Shall savingly restore him to health. Lyra, Schneckenburger and al. understand corporeal and spiritual healing, de Wette, Wiesinger and al. corporeal only, because the forgiveness of sins is separately stated afterwards [Alford—M.]. Nevertheless we feel that we cannot give up the oneness of the two moments, seeing that the sequel doubtless adverts to the possibility of particular sins and that, as already stated, the concrete apostolical spiritual-corporeal cure seems to be here uniformly the symbol of a spiritual-social cure of the wounds and infection of the judaistic confusion.

And the Lord shall raise him up.—The Lord i. e. Christ. As is His wont to raise men spiritually-bodily, not only from the bed of sickness but also from the sickness. This ἐγείρειν however is not only the causality of the preceding σώζειν, but also holds out the prospect of the positive exaltation of life which has been effected by the σώζειν as the deliverance from peril of death.

And though he have committed sins.—This denotes an enhanced state of distress. Supposing that he even (καὶ) have committed sins, as πεντηκός, as one who is as yet burdened with the guilt of those sins (Plural). The presumption is not so much that these sins were the cause of the respective sickness (Huther), but they made the sickness a severe one and one difficult to cure; this would again import a spiritual meaning.

It shall be forgiven him; that is, his having committed sins. "Even in case that." (Huther.) Forgiven not only in the social sense (i. e. by the presbyters (Hammond), not only in respect of his spiritual life, but the continuation, the curse of his guilt shall also be removed in respect of his life-situation. Huther wants to connect καὶ with the preceding clause: "The Lord shall raise him up, even if he have committed sins—(for) it shall be forgiven him." In point of language καὶ is to favour his construction (but see on the other hand 1 Jno. ii. 1); but in point of matter such a construction would greatly weaken the passage. The general and unconditional character of the assurance of renewed health, which is here expressed, has created much surprise. Hottinger expresses it more forcibly than any other commentator: "si certus et constans talium precum fuisset eventus, nemo unquam mortuus esset." Grotius supplies the condition: "nisi nempe aliter ei suppeditat ad salutem eternam." But Huther maintains against Wiesinger that there is no need of any restrictions and believes that the difficulty is removed by the consideration that James conceived the coming of Christ to be immediately impending; that consequently he did not consider the death of believers to be necessary, but viewed it only in the light of an evil which might be averted by believing intercession. Thus a second gross error would have paralyzed or covered the first. We rather opine that this very difficulty, as well as the whole character of the Epistle constrains us to adopt the symbolical interpretation. James assumes the existence of the custom of anointing the sick accompanied with prayer as a method of cure very generally prevalent in Jewish Christian Churches. This custom, traces of which are also found in ancient Judaism (see Wiesinger, p. 204*), he now turns into a symbol of a spiritual cure, which he recommends to those who were infected with the spirit of Judaism and revolutionary Chiliasm, as a remedy for their spiritual healing. This construction is also favoured by the next verse. [As the reasoning of Lange may not appear conclusive but rather doubtful to many readers of this work, I subjoin an outline of the subject which may prove valuable for reference.—The opinion of Polycarp, Bp. of Smyrna, a disciple of John and a martyr, is very valuable and sheds light on the whole question. He says (ad Philipp. c. 5), "Let the * Oil in the East, where it is much better than with us, is a common and very useful remedy employed in many diseases by rubbing it into the affected parts and pouring it into wounds for the purpose of mollifying them. Cf. Is. l. 1 & Mark vi. 13; Luke x. 34; Joseph. de bello jud. i. 33, 5. The balm of Gilead in particular was highly esteemed as an external application. Jer. vii. 22; xvii. 11. Thus the Greek and Roman physicians also recommend poultices made of wine and oil, or vinegar and oil (Galen, de comp. medic. 2; Plin. H. N. 31, 47 etc.). Tertullian ad Scapulam informs us also that Proculus, a Christian, cured the Emperor Severus with oil. Cf. also Shevill 8: qui capite dolet, aut quem in variis scabies, unguat se oleo etc. Gebser, p. 403.

presbyters be tender-hearted, merciful to all, converting the erring (see James v. 19), visiting all who are sick (ἐπισκεπτόμενοι πάντας ασθενείς); not neglecting the widow or orphan or needy (see Jas. i. 27), and providing always what is good in the sight of God, abstaining from all respect of persons (see James ii. 1, 9), not sharp in judgment, knowing that we are all sinners" (see James iii. 2). The reference to James in brackets warrants the presumption that Polycarp was familiar with our Epistle, and the extract shows that at that early day the duty of visiting the sick had been devolved on the presbyters.—The direction that the sick should summon the presbyters (Plural) accords with the practice of our Lord who sent forth His Twelve Apostles and seventy disciples two and two (Mark vi. 7; Luke x. 1).—The direction would hardly have been given, if it could not be complied with. James, as bishop of Jerusalem, presided over elders there (Acts xxi. 18) and his language warrants the conclusion that presbyters had been ordained in the principal cities.—Without discussing the question who these presbyters were, the second order of the ministry or the first, the great fact remains that the visitation of the sick is an important part of ministerial activity, and that it is the duty of the sick (whether in body or in soul) to summon their spiritual advisers to their side. This is an important consideration, for in large parishes and especially in large cities weeks may sometimes elapse before the report of a parishioner's sickness reaches their ears; if the sick are not visited under those circumstances, they must not blame their minister for remissness if they have failed to inform him of their sickness and to summon him to their side.

Our passage establishes the fact that anointing the sick with prayer accompanying it was practised in the Apostolic Church. The Apostles in virtue of the extraordinary and miraculous powers delegated to them by Christ, healed many, after having anointed them with oil. Cf. Acts vi. 18 with Matth. x. 1-8 and Luke ix. 1-6. The miraculous gift of healing continued for some time in the Church. See 1 Cor. xii. 8, 9. James refers to this miraculous power of healing, which in its application however was not absolute, but dependent on the will of God; although applied in faith by the anointing presbyter and received in faith by the sick man, anointing did not heal him if he recovered his health, but prayer charged with faith, and this implies that the matter of the sick man's cure was referred to the will of God, who did what was best for the sick, (Wordsworth), whether that was restoration to health or a Christian death.

The practice of anointing with oil with a view to recovery from sickness was continued in the Eastern and Western Churches, even after the Church had lost the miraculous gift of healing. It is continued in the Eastern Church for this purpose to this day, but the Church of England and other Reformed communions have abandoned the practice, because they perceived that the effect mentioned by St. James, viz. his recovery did not ordinarily ensue from the anointing with oil, and that the miraculous gift of healing as well as other miraculous gifts granted to the Apostles, had been removed from the Church.

The Church of Rome however retains the practice of anointing the sick with oil but perverted the design for which it had been instituted (viz. recovery from sickness), into that of a sacrament conveying grace to the soul, the sacrament of extreme unction, which is certainly one of the most audacious perversions of Scripture on record. See Alford and Wordsworth. Wordsworth: "The Apostle St. James had enjoined the practice with a view to the recovery of the sick; as Cardinal Cajetan allows, in his note on the passage, where he says: "Hæc verba non loquuntur de Sacramentali unctione extreme unctionis," but the Church of Rome prescribes, in the Councils of Florence (A.D. 1438) and Trent (1551), that the anointing should not take place except where recovery is not to be looked for (Council of Trent, Sess. 14, "qui tam periculose decumbunt ut in exitu vite constituti videantur"), and therefore she calls this anointing "extreme unction," and "sacramentum exequium," and she regards it as a sacrament conveying grace to the soul. Thus, on the one hand, the Greek Church is a witness by her present practice, that the anointing was designed with a view to bodily recovery; and the Roman Church, on the other hand, is a witness, that the miraculous effects on the body, which were wrought in primitive times through the instrumentality of those who anointed the sick, and which accompanied that unction, have ceased."—See this whole subject discussed in my article "An account of Extreme Unction," Princeton Review, Vol. XXXVII. No. 2, April, 1865.—M.]

V. 16. Confess therefore your sins (transgressions) to one another.—This injunction is general; it is the generalization of the preceding sentence. Cajetan rightly observes: "nec hic est sermo de confessione sacramentali," but the clause implies also the fact that James knew nothing of such a confessio, or he would have said: "Confess your sins to the presbyters," of whom he had just been speaking. As to the sins here referred to, Luther understands sins in general as violation of the Divine law, in opposition to Wolf, who explains them as offences against one another, Matth. xviii. 15. Bengel: "Ægrotus et quisquis offendit, jubetur confiteri offensam, orare." But the particular sins which are meant here, at least primarily, may be gathered from the whole Epistle; the reference is to the whole Judaistic movement which in so many respects had made them sick and feeble. But the thought has also the more general import that the confession of certain known transgressions is at once an unburdening of the conscience and a furtherance of prayer in the case of those who are thus drawn into the Christian fellow-feeling of guilt and thus also the preliminary condition both of forgiveness and of spiritual (and often even of bodily) healing. How many a germinating madness and suicide, how many a heart-languor and disorder which vexes the members and weighs down the body was to be obviated by this mutual effect of confession and intercession! But James had more particularly in view the hurts which were then troubling Israel. Both the confession and the intercession were to be mutual.

That ye may be healed.—This healing is understood spiritually by Grotius and al., spiritually and corporeally by Schneckenburger and al., corporeally only by de Wette, Huther and al. As nothing is said here of the forgiveness of sins, the promise of healing implies evidently also spiritual healing: but the idea "that ye may be healed theocratically" is probably predominant. "It is to be remembered that the prayer of the presbyters does not exclude the common intercession of Christians and that the efficacy attributed to the latter is not less than that attributed to the former." Huther. [This is one of the passages adduced by the Latin Church for the necessity of confessing sins to a priest. Alford cites Corn.-a-Lapide's exegesis as a specimen of the way in which the Romish doctrine is deduced. "Alterutrum, id est, homo homini, similis simili, frater fratri confitemini, puta sacerdoti, qui licet officio sit superior, natura tamen est par, infirmitate similis, obligatione confitendi equalis."—M.]

The prayer . . . availeth much.—A saying of the power of genuine prayer designed to encourage them to adopt the recommendations previously set forth, i. e. both mutual confession of sins and mutual intercession. The great efficacy of such intercession is still further brought about by the position of πολύ etc. and by the gnomic and asyndetical structure of the sentence. Of a righteous man, of a πῦρις in the theocratic sense, i. e. not one "in a state of righteousness" as Hofmann expresses it, for "the state of righteousness" denotes an ontological, passive condition, while in the case of the theocratically righteous every thing turns on actuality, on the living faith, on the living God and His word of life. The species of these righteous men is the same in the Old Testament and in the New; they are men of living, energetic faith (Rom. iv), although the righteous man of the New Testament has the advantage of an objective as well as of a subjective τελειωσις. Hence Elias may here be held up to the Christians as the pattern of a real man of prayer.

Inwardly effectual (working).—ἐνεργουμένη causes not little difficulty and has given rise to a great variety of opinions among commentators. A main point to be determined is whether ἐνεργουμένη ought to be taken as an epithet to δέσους, as the majority of commentators take it, or as a pure participial definition of the verb ισχυει (so Pott, de Wette, Huther, who are however at variance with respect to the sense). Pott: "Prayer is able to work much" or "prayer is able to work much and worketh much." de Wette: "if it becomes energetic." Huther: "In its energy" or "in its working." But all this is rather tautological unless it be made to denote a theurgic operation, which is inadmissible. The adjectival construction may be taken passively or actively, or in the most literal sense as a middle, as a kind of Hithpael. Prayer may be considered passively as coöminated by the prayer of him for whom it is offered (Oecumenius), as moved by the Holy Spirit, inspired (Michaelis), as penetrated by faith (Carpsov), as animated and attended by impulse to work [Werktrieb, so Calvin and Gebser]. Taken actively the idea of ἐνεργουμένη coincides more or less with ἐνεργῆς or ἐνεργός (see Luke xxii. 44 ἐκτενῆς). So Luther: "if it is earnest;" Vulgate: "assidua," and similarly many others. On the other hand, Huther contends that this construction is contrary to N. T. usage, while Wiesinger maintains that this usage may be substantiated and refers to the proofs supplied by Wahl. We believe that the N. T. middle ἐνεργέομαι (Rom. vii. 5; 2 Cor. i. 6; iv. 12; Gal. v. 6; Eph. iii. 20; Col. i. 29; 1 Thess. ii. 18; 2 Thess. ii. 7) denotes according to the Hebrew and Christian conception a passivo-active working, i. e. a working set in motion by a previously experienced impulse. This in malam partem applies to the lusts in the members (Rom. vii. 5), to the mystery of iniquity (2 Thess. ii. 7), in bonam partem to the subjective σωτηρία (2 Cor. i. 6), to the subjective πίστις (Gal. v. 6), to the vital energy in believers (Eph. iii. 20), to the energy of Christ in believers (Col. i. 29), to the word of God appropriated by men (1 Thess. ii. 18); in both respects, to death and life (2 Cor. iv. 12). The Active however is used with reference to God Eph. i. 11; Phil. ii. 13; Gal. ii. 8; 1 Cor. xii. 6; of His Spirit 1 Cor. xii. 11; also of Satan Eph. ii. 2. It follows from this clearly marked usage of the word that we must also take δέσους with the predication ἐνεργουμένην as indicating an efficiency effected or an impulse impelled. The idea doubtless imports the full tension of the praying spirit under its absolute obedience (yielding to) to the Divine impulse. And in this respect there is here an allusion to the idea of the miraculously potent prayer which works the ἐνέργηματα. [The Apostle's idea expressed in plain words, seems to be that prayer in order to lead to outward effects, must work inwardly in grateful adoration of and fervent love and humble resignation to God; otherwise prayer is only a hollow, unmeaning and inefficacious uttering of words. Luther in his terse language hits the point, when he says in some place that "he who prays must feel that he is a beggar." Absolute submission to the will of God is of course the very soul of prayer, and the true Christian never engages in prayer without the pious sentiment: "Not my will, but Thine be done." Wordsworth remarks: "The martyrdom of St. James himself affords a beautiful comment on these words, especially where it is related that after he had been cast down by his enemies from the pediment of the Temple and they were stoning him, he fell on his knees and prayed for them, and some, who stood by, said, adopting the very words of this Epistle—"Hold, what do ye? ἐβήκατε ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ὁ δίκαιος," "the just man is praying for you." See Introduction.—M.]

VER. 17. Elias was a man of like passions.—ὁμοπαθής does not exactly signify that Elias had the capacity of suffering, or his real sufferings (Laurentius, Schneckenburger), but "of like condition and nature" (Wiesinger and Huther), is hardly adequate in point of sense. In Acts xiv. 15 there is certainly an implied emphasis on the dependence and restraints of human nature as contrasted with the Being of God. Moreover in Wisd. vii. 8 the reference to the earth imports not so much equality of kind as equality of condition. In the case of Elias the term "like passions" or liability to being affected, points at least to his capacity of suffering and temptability.

And he prayed a prayer [with prayer].—Analogous to the Hebrew idiom of producing intensification by placing the Infinitive of the verb in juxtaposition with the Indicative, or by connecting the latter with the noun Gen. ii. 17 מִתְפַּלֵּל. Considering that Huther himself observes that this form serves to bring out the verbal idea, it is difficult to account for his opposition to the exposition of Wiesinger and al., that the prayer of Elias was an earnest prayer. [Huther, I presume, objects to the introduction of a new word. The prayer of Elias was genuine prayer, prayer charged with ἐνέργεια.—M.]

That it might not rain.—βέηεν is impersonal. [The gen. of the intent. See Winer, p. 343.—M.]

And it did not rain in the land [on the earth].—Considering the O. T. colouring of the whole Epistle we may be allowed to translate ἐν τῇ γῇ with Grotius and al. "in the land," but Huther retains Luther's rendering "on earth." Schneckenburger compares this weighty saying with Gen. i. 3: "fact lux et facta est lux." But there remains the important difference that here the reference is not to an authoritative command (Machtspruch).

[Three years and six months.]—Wordsworth: equal to 42 months or 1260 days, a chronological period of suffering. See Rev. xi. 3.—M.]

Vxx. 18. And the heaven gave rain.—A personifying, vivid mode of expression, reminding us of the prophetic style, Hos. ii. 21, 22.

And the earth brought forth her fruit.—This was really the immediate purpose of the prayer. βλαστάνω [properly an intransitive verb, but used transitively.—M.], a transitive verb: it let spring up, i. e. it put, brought forth. An application of what is related 1 Kings xvii. 1; xviii. 1, 42 etc. The positive announcement of the drought may have led James to draw the reasonable inference that Elias had prayed for it, although we have no record to that effect, and tradition had probably anticipated his inference. Such a completion is however very different from a discrepancy (Huther). The second apparent difference is as follows: in 1 Kings xviii. 1, Elijah is said to have foretold and to have been instrumental in bringing about the return of rain in the third year, while our passage affirms that it did not rain on the earth for three years and six months. Seeing that Luke iv. 25 and the tract Jalcut Simeoni give the same duration, it would seem that that space of time was the uniform Jewish tradition. The explanation lies manifestly in the fact that 1 Kings xviii. specifies the real famine according to its duration. But it stands to reason that the famine did not begin until one year after the announcement of the drought, viz. after the failure of the early and the latter rain. During the first year the people were still living on the harvest of the preceding year. Jewish tradition consequently added one year to the period of time mentioned in a general way in 1 Kings in order to mark the whole period between the two announcements of Elijah. Benson's solution of the difference is somewhat different but not very clear. He says: "accuratior senioris traditionis computatio, ducitur a tem- pore non pluvie primum cessantis, sed ultimum ante siccitatem cadentis, quam dimidio fere anno distare in promptu est." That is, the first year of the drought is not added to the famine of about two and a half years' duration, but the half year from the first failure of rain to the last fall of rain immediately preceding. Wiesinger is satisfied with Benson's calculation, but Huther insists upon the discrepancy, because according to the statement of James, the drought began immediately after Elijah's praying. But the narrative itself contains intimations that the drought did not at once produce famine, 1 Kings xvii. 7; ch. xviii. 5. [Benson observes, however, that the words "in the third year" of 1 Kings xviii. 1 do not necessarily refer to the duration of the famine, but most naturally date back to the removal of Elijah to Zarephath, ch. xvii. 8 etc; cf. the same "many days" in ch. xvii. 15, where indeed a variation is "for a full year." Alford.—M.] But far more important is the question why James selects just this example of an answer to prayer from the history of Israel. The greatest stress seems to lie on his intercession of pity, which was the more edifying as an example because the readers of the Epistle were wont to consider Elijah as a censurer. A drought had for a long time come also upon the spiritual life of Israel; the readers were therefore encouraged to pray with the faith of an Elijah for a rain of grace to fall on their people. The prophet's first prayer is mentioned first, in order to furnish them with a forcible illustration that prayer is heard and answered, and perhaps also to show them how the real men of prayer in Israel were independent of and superior to the evil frame of mind which kept the populace in a ferment. Moreover the general tendency of Elijah's prayers was hostile to the apostasy of Israel, and the zeal of their believing men of prayer was now to be directed against the new apostasy which consisted in an obdurate opposition to the Gospel (see ch. iv. 4; Rom. xi. 1-5).

Vxx. 19. My brethren, if any among you should have strayed from the truth.—"This imports not a single practical aberration, but an alienation from the Christian principle of life, an inward apostasy from the λόγος ἀληθείας, of which the Christian is begotten (ch. i. 18), disclosing itself in a single course of life. Cf. Luke i. 16, 17, v. 20." Huther. But the tenor of the whole Epistle constrains us to define this aberration still further as an aberration into Judaistic and chiliastic doings and fanatico-seditious lusts. [πλανηθῇ is passive and Alford rightly remarks "that there is no reason why the passive signification should not be kept, especially when we remember our Lord's warning, βλέπετε μή τις ὑμᾶς πλανήσῃ."—M.]

And one should convert him, to the truth, from which he has strayed in peril of apostasy.

Vxx. 20. Let him know [know ye.—M.]—He that converts is to know the importance of his action and what a blessing rests upon it. The word, as to its form, is a hypothetical announcement or promise to him who is found thus doing, but as to its contents it is a general sentence or a sententious encouragement to all conjoined with the promise of a prize to those who act upon it. On this account ἐπιστρέψας is repeated after δὲ.

That he who converteth a sinner.—The person who has strayed through delusion from the truth, considered from a practical point of view. Let the readers know that all those who have strayed in part or entirely from the truth are sinners according to the emphatic theocratic idea: doomed to the death-ban. This weighty part of the word is weakened by Huther's remark, "that the reference is no longer to the person who has gone astray but to the whole genus to which the Christian who has strayed from the truth belongs as species." The two ideas: delusion and dogmatical apostasy and practical ruin must not be separated on the theocratical ground, nor must the former kind be subordinated to the latter as species, although the practical and the theocratic form of ruin may alternately predominate.

Shall save a soul from death.—From death, as in ch. i. 15 and throughout the New Testament, from subjective damnation as it is inherent in the personality itself, defined moreover negatively with respect to the subject as the loss of the true life, of the true destination and sphere of life; a moral dissolution of the ontological life eternally self-generating itself, as on the other hand the true life generates life. A soul. The naked, inward existence of the personality itself, man in all his capacity of suffering and salvation and need of help. He shall save the soul. The conversion of the apostate is the conversion of a sinner; this has as its consequence his deliverance from death, because he is in the way of death and is overtaken before he finally falls into the snares of death. We need not stop to show that this presupposes Divine redemption as the salvation to which he is converted and the Divine coöperation of the Word and of the Holy Spirit as the means of salvation whereby he is converted. In the battle of faith between the believing readers of the Epistle and their half-believing and unbelieving brethren the point at issue turns therefore not upon dogmatical disputes of the synagogue, but solely and purely on the salvation of poor souls from eternal death, and not only on this but along with the salvation of many individuals, on the removal of a universal curse.

And shall cover a multitude of sins.—That is, the averting of a general ruin is brought about by the faithful salvation of many individuals. This covering of sins (cf. I Pet. iv. 8; Prov. x. 12) καλύπτειν contains doubtless reference in an enlarged sense, to the Hebrew כָּסַף, to cover, cover over sins, i. e. to forgive, Ps. xxii. 1 and elsewhere. But considering that such absolute covering of sin is the prerogative of God, it is probably better to think here of instrumental covering כָּסַף which is also used more especially of different means and mediators of atonement; not only of the cover of the ark, of sacrifice, of the high-priest, but also of the very sins to be atoned for (Ex. xxx. 16; Is. xlvii. 11), and also especially of the person interceding, Ex. xxxii. 30. The last passage strikes us as peculiarly important. Moses effected the reconciliation of his people not as a sacrifice, not as high-priest, but by intercession, i. e. by the subjective mediation of the objective atonement. This objective atonement therefore is here assumed, just as the former expression, he shall save, presupposes objective salvation. The believing Jews are to become intercessors for their poor people, become instrumental to bring about its real atonement. Believers participate in the atoning work of Christ as in His sufferings and intercession not as causa mediatoria but as causa organica. But the commentators are at variance whether the reference here is to the sins of the converters or to those of the converted. Erasmus and al. take it thus: by his good work he shall obtain remission of his sins with God. The Jews held (Joma fol. 87): "quicumque multos ad justitiam adducit, per ejus manus non perpetratur peccatum." Augusti: He will obtain forgiveness on the part of men; his own offences will not be remembered. With more reason the majority of commentators refer the words to the sins of the converted. But the reference is not solely to the particular sins of the persons to be converted, and not even to their personal offences. πλήθος denotes fulness, an entire mass taken as a unit, and the ἀμαρτίαι are the offences requiring to be atoned for. The reference is consequently to the total national guilt of Israel. To be sure, it is not referred to with greater distinctness or more clearly defined than by τὸ πλήθος, because James, according to ch. v. 1, could no longer hope for the immediate salvation of all Israel, but foresaw, like Paul, a great judgment on their obduracy. But it was still his duty pitifully to wrestle with the judgment and to save a fulness (multitude) of souls and to atone for their sins. But whereas a common, national guilt is ever growing, and whereas this working of the curse can be broken only by means of the atonement, the observation of Huther is groundless "that this does not describe the sins which the ἀμαρτωλός would still commit and which are now prevented by means of his conversion (Pott: "multa futura impedit"), but the whole multitude of sins which he had committed before his conversion." This restriction misapprehends the progressive nature of guilt, not to say anything of the circumstance, that the reference is no longer exclusively to the sins of converted individuals. The conclusion of the Epistle shows in general, as we have seen repeatedly before, that the usual exposition does by no means come up to the lofty stand-point and point of view of James. De Wette takes objection to the strong idea πλήθος, saying that the reference is only to aberration and not to viciousness of life and seeks to arrange his assertion by inferences; Stolz asserts that the sinner's amendment of life has the effect of consigning to oblivion his former transgressions; even Wiesinger and Huther restrict the import of the passage in two ways: "the reference is only to the multifarious sin of the aforesaid converted individual and only to the circumstance that the converter becomes by his conversion the occasion of God forgiving his sins. "But our passage reminds us of the relation of Paul to his people, Rom. ix. 3; xi. 14. And as James, according to Acts, exhibited a peculiar fidelity in working for the salvation of his people, and, according to tradition, interceded for them with God, so at the conclusion of the Epistle he here invites the whole believing part of his people to engage in intercession and in the work of salvation, that many individuals might be saved from death, and a multitude of sins might be atoned for. The whole Epistle shows that he confines himself solely to human saving and atoning as a medium of bringing back the people to the true Redeemer and Reconciler, but he deems it of peculiar importance that the brethren must not fail to do their part in the work. Of course his words, in their sententious form, are also here so construed, that they possess a general and eternally valid apostolical significance; but as it was the duty of the expositor throughout the course of his exposition to give prominence to the noble historical import of this Epistle, which has been only too much missed and neglected, so he does at its conclusion.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The long-suffering patience required of the followers of Jesus is a duty of so wide a range, that the discharge of it, at least under many circumstances, would be too much for human strength, if the strength of their faith and hope were not animated by the thought of the nearness of the Lord's coming. Therefore the words "the coming of the Lord is nigh" ought to be constantly before our eyes. While the Christians of the Apostolic Age were perhaps too much inclined to consider the coming of Christ to be near at hand in a literal sense, the Christian sense of our own age suffers this great final event to stand too much in the background and substitutes for it in most instances a mere individual hope of salvation immediately after death. The more we learn again that we belong "to men also that love His appearing" (2 Tim. iv. 8) in the Apostolic acceptance of the term, the easier we shall find the practice of Christian patience and endurance in view of this the only satisfactory final development of the drama of history.

2. James as well as our Lord Himself (Matth. xiii. and elsewhere), saw the kingdom of grace reflected and portrayed in the kingdom of nature. The disciple of Jesus may learn much from the diligent and patient waiting of the husbandman.

3. The heroes of faith of the Old Testament are regarded by James also in the light of patterns to the Christian in his course, just as in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. xi. xii.). The rule that the way through suffering leads to glory, is in reality as valid under the Old Testament as under the New. Cf. Luke xxiv. 26; Acts xiv. 22.

4. James begins (ch. i. 12) and ends (ch. v. 11) his Epistle with a beatitude, just as our Lord began (Matth. v. 3) and ended (Jno. xx. 29). His instructions with similar beatitudes. The introduction of the example of Job is the more remarkable because this is the only place in the New Testament where his history is referred to.

5. The dehortation from frivolous swearing is intimately and naturally connected with the notice of endurance and patience, which precedes it. Those who are impatient and discontented will readily curse and swear in their violence, while those who possess their souls in patience will also in this respect guard their mouth and keep their lips. The context shows abundantly that James does not absolutely prohibit all swearing, but only those oaths which men take when they are not as patient as Job (Job ii. 10), but as impatient as Job (ch. iii. 1), when they curse their day. Like Christ, (Matth. xxiii. 16-22) the Apostle condemns light and trifling swearing and specifies several examples thereof. Had he intended to forbid swearing by the name of God, he would doubtless have mentioned this first and most weighty oath before all others. But considering that the law expressly enjoined swearing by the name of the Lord (Numb. vi. 18, 6; x. 20) and that the prophets referred to this swearing as the characteristic of the servants of the Lord (Is. lxx. 16; Jer. xii. 16; xvi. 14, 15), it is a priori highly improbable that James, who was penetrated through and through by the spirit of the Old Testament, should have intended to forbid also this oath. Swearing by the name of God is not only permitted but often becomes necessary in an imperfect state of society because of the sins of men, although it belongs surely to the ideal of the kingdom of God that no oath will be required in it and that yea and nay are as reliable as an oath. In this respect we may say, that the Christian, if the civil authority requires him to take an oath, is necessitated to do so only in consequence of his sojourn in the midst of this sinful and wicked world. In a certain sense we may say of oaths what Paul said of the law that τὸν παραβάσαντα χάρις προσηύθη Gal. iii. 19. Cf. Lange on Matth. v. 33-37, and on the Hebrew formulae of oaths in general Rüetschi in Herzog's R. E. III. p. 713 sqq.

6. Genuine Christian faith is distinguished by becoming equanimity in good and evil days, as prescribed by James (ch. v. 13) and illustrated inter alia by Paul (Phil. iv. 10-20). Without Christ man is very apt to despond under suffering and equally prone to become elated with prosperity. The true Christian will in suffering seek consolation in prayer and so enjoy his prosperity that God is glorified thereby.

7. The visitation and comforting of the sick is one of the most natural and important parts of the cura pastoralis. For special directions consult the works on pastoral and practical theology of Hüffell, Harms, Nitzsch, Palmer and al. [Also Burnet, on the Pastoral Care, Wilson's Parochialia, Visitatio Infirmorum and Vinet.—M.]. On the true Christian frame of mind on the sick-bed compare an essay by N. Beets, translated from the Dutch in the Jahrbuch des rheinisch-westphälischen Schriftvereins, 1862, p. 1 etc. [Also an excellent work, published anonymously, entitled "Sickness, its trials and blessings," New York: 1857.—M.].

8. Only by confining oneself to the sound of the words (vv. 14-16), it is possible to find here the precepts of extreme unction and auricular confession in the sense of the Roman Catholic Church. See under Exegetical and Critical. James refers plainly to miraculous recovery and to the mutual confession of offences among bre-

threaten in the event of one having failed in his duty towards another. On the other hand there exists also an Ultra-Protestantism and Anti-Romanism, which deems the use of both these means of grace altogether superfluous and almost prohibits them, which is likewise without blessing. The decrease of the gift of miracles is surely no proof of the increase of faith, and the entire discontinuance of mutual confession of sins is a sad token of the want of humility and brotherly love. Cf. Herzog's R. E. Article Oelung.

9. It may be very superstitious and uncharitable to assume a direct connection of a certain sin and a certain disease; cf. Jno. ix. 3. But it is also very superficial to deny all connection between sin and disease. If there were no sins in the world, there would certainly be no plagues. The sick man consequently does well, if he recalls on the sick-bed first of all his own sins and seeks to obtain their forgiveness. Forgiveness of sins and recovery from sickness are in many respects more closely connected than most people think and therefore both are promised to the citizen of the celestial commonwealth, Is. xxxiii. 24.

10. The duty of brotherly exhortation addressed to blacksliding brethren (vv. 19, 20), so warmly recommended by the Apostle, has also been enjoined by our Lord and the Apostles elsewhere (cf. Matth. xviii. 15-18; 1 Thess. v. 14; 2 Thess. iii. 13-16; Heb. x. 24). The writings of pagan moralists contain also excellent directions concerning the manner how such friendly reproof should be administered. See e. g. Plutarch, de discrim. amici et adulatoris pp. 244-276, edit. Reisk.; Cicero, de amicitia cap. 24, 25. A striking proof of the blessing which may attend such a work of love towards the salvation of an almost lost soul, and of the manner how this duty should be discharged, is found in the well-known legend "John and the robber-chief," told by Clem. Alex., quis dives saluus, cap. 42. But James shows himself throughout this Epistle as an exemplar of ardent Christian zeal for converting sinners from the error of their way and for saving souls from death. His words open a wide field and a glorious prospect to Christian philanthropy and the specific cure of souls. Hence Zwingle and Herder are not wrong in their criticisms on the conclusion of this Epistle; the former saying: "Insigni doctrina veluti colophone epistolam absolvit," and the latter: "The conclusion, the strongest assurance, is like a seal affixed to the testament."

[On the connection of vv. 12, 13 with v. 11. Bp. Sanderson, (Lectures on Oaths, vii. 11): "Set the examples of ancient prophets and holy men before your eyes. If ye suffer adversity, imitate their patience. If in all things, you cannot attain to that perfection, yet thus far at least, except ye be very negligent, you may go with ease; above all things, take heed lest too impatient of your grief, or too much transported with your joy, ye break forth into rash oaths, to the dishonour of God and shame of Christian conversation. But rather contain yourselves, whether troubled or rejoicing, within the bounds of Modesty; mingle not Heaven and earth, let not all things be filled with your oaths and clamours; if you affirm a thing, let it be with calmness, and a mere affirmation or negation. But if either of these passions be more impetuous, and strive to overflow the narrow channels of your bosoms, it will be your wisdom to let it forth unto the glory of God. Do you demand by what means? I will tell you: Is any among you afflicted? Let not his impatience break forth into Oaths and Blasphemies, the Flood-gates of wrath; but rather let him pray, and humbly implore God that He would vouchsafe him Patience, till His heavy hand be removed. Is any merry? Let him not bellow it forth in Oaths, like a Bacchanalian, but rather sing it in Hymns and Psalms unto the praise of God: Who hath made his cup to overflow, and crowned him with happy days."

BARROW: (Serm. XV. vol. I. p. 329). "In these words St. James doth not mean universally to interdict the use of oaths: for that in some cases is not only lawful, but very expedient, yea needful, and required from us as a duty; but that swearing which our Lord had expressly prohibited to His disciples, and which thence, questionless, the brethren to whom St. James did write, did well understand themselves to forbear, having learnt so in the first Catechisms of Christian institution; that is, needless and heedless swearing in ordinary conversation, a practice then frequent in the world, both among Jews and Gentiles; the invoking of God's name, appealing to His testimony, and provoking His judgment, upon any slight occasion, in common talk, with vain incogitancy, or profane boldness. From such practice the holy Apostle dehortheth in terms importing his great concernedness, and implying the matter to be of the highest importance: for, Before all things, my brethren, do not swear; as if he did apprehend this sin of all other to be one of the most heinous and pernicious. Could he have said more? would he have said so much, if he had not conceived the matter to be of exceeding weight and consequence?"

V. 14. HOOKER: Eccles. Polit. v. 25. 3. "The authority of the Priest's calling is a furtherance, because if God had so far received him into favour as to impose upon him by the hands of man that office of blessing the people in His name, and making intercession to Him in theirs, which office he hath sanctified with His own most gracious promise, and ratified that promise by manifest actual performance thereof, when others before in like place have done the same; is not his very ordination a seal, as it were, to us, that the self-same Divine Love that hath chosen the Instrument to work with, will by that Instrument effect the thing whereto He ordained it, in blessing His people, and accepting the prayers, which His servant offered up unto God for them?"

V. 16. HOOKER: vi. 47. "But the greatest thing which made men forward and willing upon their knees to confess whatsoever they had committed against God, and in no wise to be withheld from the same with any fear of disgrace, contempt or obloquy, which might ensue, was their fervent desire to be helped and assisted with the prayers of God's saints. Wherein as St. James doth exhort unto mutual confession, alleging this only for a reason, that just men's devout prayers are of great avail with God; so it hath been heretofore the use of penitents for that intent to unburthen their minds, even to private persons, and to crave their prayers." He quotes the following beautiful passages from Ambrose de Poenit. II. 10, and Tertullian, de Poenit. c. 10.

AMBROSE: "Let thy mother the Church weep for thee, let her wash and bathe thy faults with her tears: our Lord doth love that many should become supplicants for one." The reference is to voluntary penitents, who openly repented and confessed.

TERTULLIAN: "Some few assembled make a Church, and the Church is as Christ Himself; when thou dost therefore put forth thy hands to the knees of thy brethren, thou touchest Christ, it is Christ unto whom thou art a suppliant; so when they pour out their tears over them, it is even Christ that taketh compassion; Christ which prayeth when they pray: neither can they be easily denied, for which the Son Himself is contented to become the suitor." The reference is still to voluntary penitents.

On private confession, Hooker asserts and afterwards proves his assertion that the practice was unknown in the earliest and purest ages of the Church. "I dare boldly affirm, that for many hundred years after Christ the Fathers held no such opinion; they did not gather by our Saviour's words any such necessity of seeking the priest's absolution from sin, by secret and (as they now term it) sacramental confession: public confession, they thought necessary by way of discipline, not private confession, as in the nature of a sacrament, necessary." Eccles. Pol. VI. 4, 6. —M.J.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vv. 7-12. Christian long-suffering immeasurably different from stoical insensibility.—The Lord's coming a consolation to the godly, a terror to the ungodly.—What the Christian, and especially the minister of the Gospel, may learn from the husbandman.—"Behold, the husbandman" etc. an excellent text for missionary discourses; waiting for the Lord should be 1, desired, 2, patient, 3, active, and 4, hopeful.—Rainy seasons must precede the day of harvest both in the kingdom of nature and in that of grace.—Christians, if opposed, should not groan against one another, but pray so much the more to God the Lord.—The witnesses of the truth at once the patterns of its professors.—The blessedness of the suffering; 1, the worth it possesses; 2, the price at which it is acquired.—The end of God's ways a blessing to His people.—Lawful and unlawful use of oaths.—Christian love of the truth in relation to an unholy world.

STARKE:—A Christian patiently waits for the harvest of the promised riches of eternity, while meanwhile the early rain and the latter rain of the grace of Jesus Christ moistens and refreshes his often weary heart.

HEDINGER:—Hope sows the seed and calmly sleeps on the pillow of Divine Providence until the time of harvest, i. e. of a gracious answer, v. 7. Ps. xxviii. 7.

QUESNEL:—O sinner, how many iniquities dost thou commit behind the door, in secret. But behold, the Judge standeth at the door, Is. xxix. 15.

CRAMER:—We are not better than our fathers

(1 Kings xix. 4); therefore the prophets and patriarchs, Christ and His Apostles teach us not only by words but by their deeds to be patient, Lam. iii. 26.

LANGH OP.:—Suffering and patience are well conjoined, for the sufferings which we endure for God and for conscience' sake, differ most from other sufferings in patience, 1 Cor. iv. 12.

OSIANDER:—The virtues of the saints are shown us in Holy Scripture, not that we may only marvel at them, but that we may imitate them, Heb. xiii. 7.—God had also besides the Jewish people those who were His, who served Him in spirit and in truth. The Church of God is therefore not tied to a particular people or sect, Job. i. 1.—God will not remember the sins of believers (Is. xlii. 25), but always the good which they have done (Matth. xxv. 35).—Oaths should not be lightly used nor become habitual to us; yet nothing is less thought of in the world than this most important matter.

STRICK:—The whole period of the world's duration with its thousands of years of mankind upon earth is a mighty sowing for the final harvest in which the earth, having received its seed from heaven, is to give its fruit to heaven. At the harvest we shall understand the ways of God. If many things are dark and confused to us now, let us wait only for the time of the ripening! This applies to every individual in respect of this life's day of grace, it applies in its highest and best sense to the true Christian who really lives for eternity. There passes throughout all Christendom, there lives in the hearts of all saints a constant presentation [i. e. making present—M.] of the end, and this is right; for the coolness with which we now reflect and consider and remove the last day to an indefinite distance, is rather a consequence of lukewarm faith, of love grown cool.—

V. 10. We learn from this word, as we do here from James, that Job did really live like Noah, Daniel and all the prophets, and that the history of his sufferings is not a didactic poem, but genuine history. At that time indeed most people had only heard of him, for reading was then the prerogative of the learned, and even these had only in rare instances all the books of Holy Writ. Have we indeed read the book of Job aright? "A word, a man"—this [German] proverb alas has almost ceased to be true, and keeping one's word has fearfully decreased among men, because lightness has increased. Would that it could be said everywhere at least "A Christian, a word" [i. e. a Christian, who pledges his word, should attach to it the sanctity of an oath.—M.J.]

JAKOBI:—Swearing is also still common amongst us and in order to guard against its abuse, Christian authorities have taken the oath under their supervision and, as it were, under their protection. But that oaths are so often required by the authorities, that most people, if required, take them lightly and thoughtlessly, that they are eager to take an oath in order to gain perchance some little advantage, that so many oaths and oathlike phrases are heard in common life, that the simple yea and nay without the confirmation of an oath have in many things and with many men almost lost their power and value, all these are so many sad and suspicious symptoms of wide-spread untruthfulness and unreliability.

VIEDEBANDT:—Patience in view of the blessed future in store for them, strengthening the heart against the temptation to impatience and murmuring, and particularly to a vengeful groaning against the oppressor, this is the task of the followers of Christ and of the saints of God whose life bears testimony to God, who never leaves His own, in patience and hope that is not deceived.

NEANDER:—Every word should be to the Christian what an oath is to others; there is no need of oaths, therefore, among true Christians, because each holds his word sacred and all reciprocate among themselves the assurance that the word of each is tantamount to an oath. Thus it ought to be in a truly Christian congregation, wherein all mutually know one another as genuine Christians.

HEUBNER (on vv. 7, 8):—A passage for the ecclesia pressa, militans.—

(V. 10). Examples are peculiarly effective to strengthen us in suffering. They show us 1, the possibility of endurance, of victory by means of the strength of God; 2, the glory, the reward of those who have ended their warfare.

LISCO (on vv. 7, 11):—What exhorts us Christians to be patient in tribulation?

V. 12. Swear not lightly!—

PORUBSKY (on vv. 7-9). The coming of the Lord in the light of our time. (on vv. 10, 11). Our gain from the sufferings of Christ (!!)—(on v. 12). Veracity the result of the fear of God.

Vv. 7, 8. Text for the harvest feast [Thanksgiving Day in U. S.—M.]. WOLF: Every earthly harvest-feast should renew our sense of the value of the hope of heaven.

(vv. 7-11. Epistle for the 24th Sunday after Trinity in the Grand Duchy of Hesse and elsewhere).

GEOK:—Three approved domestic remedies in adversity.

BÖCKEL:—Encouragement to the dignified endurance of undeserved sufferings.—The power of a good example.—

(On vv. 13-20). Joy and grief must be sanctified by religion.—The power of prayer under suffering.—Christian rejoicing in God.—The Christian on the sick-bed.—The sick should send for the presbyter and not always expect him to come uncalled.—On the gift of miracles in the primitive Church.—The cause of its disappearance.—Duty and blessing of mutual confession of sins.—The confessio auricularis a caricature of the brotherly confession in the time of James.—The forgiveness of sins a chief requisite for the sick.—Intercession a duty of Christian love. 1. How much belongs to it. 2. How much is wanting in it!—Elias a teacher of prayer. We see in him a righteous man who 1, prays; 2, prays earnestly; 3, whose earnest prayer availeth much.—He that is saved himself should seek to gain others also.—The true Christian 1, is able; 2, is bound to; 3, and will save souls from death.—Saving brotherly love: 1, how much it costs; 2, how richly it recompenses.

STARKE: QUESNEL:—The use of spiritual songs is greater than is thought. Ps. lxxix. 81, 82.

CRAMER:—It should be our first business in sickness to turn to God and have prayers offered for us, then send for the physician.

STARKE:—Maladies are the fruits of sins. Poor man, if thou hast spent the days of thy health in the service of sins, be not surprised if thy Creator takes hold of the rod of sickness in order to lead thee to better thoughts, Lev. xxvi. 15 etc.—If you have offended or vexed others, be not ashamed to confess it.

HEDINGER:—The prayer of the righteous availeth much, yet not everything. For God often sees that the granting of our prayers would be contrary to His will, nor salutary to ourselves, and it is often a great blessing, although not generally recognized, that God refuses to grant our requests. 2 Cor. xii. 8, 9.

STARKE:—God is so good that He does not always keep His power to Himself, but often equips also His children with it, Phil. iv. 13.

QUESNEL:—God gives us fruitful seasons and they are kept up by prayer, Acts. xiv. 17.

STARKE:—As the salvation of the soul is infinitely more precious than that of the body, so much the more is God pleased if we do more for our neighbour in the concerns of his soul than in those of his body, Heb. iii. 13.

HEDINGER:—Be not more merciful to thy neighbour's ox and house than to his precious soul. That thou pullest out of a well, this, if on fire, thou puttest it out, but thou dost not counsel his soul in brotherly reproof though it fall into hell and burn in the most dreadful flames of sin. Those who love God promote also their neighbour's salvation and lead the blind on an even path, 1 Thess. v. 14.

LANGH OP.:—Teachers are bound first and mostly to observe that which is the duty of all Christians, to wit, the real instruction of their hearers, 2 Tim. ii. 24.—Hearers are greatly honoured if God counts them worthy to become also the spiritual fathers of spiritual children, 1 Thess. v. 11. If a woe is uttered on those who ruin others (Matth. xviii. 7), what will be the reward of grace to those who have been the instruments of God in the conversion of others! Dan. xii. 3.—Blessed is the man who is ready to be admonished and to be speedily turned from his error. He who thinks that in this respect others have no right to speak to him, robs himself of the blessing which he might obtain through others.

STIER:—Human song is of itself good and noble. The same God, who gave to the fowls of the air the voice with which they unconsciously praise Him, gave song to man. We remember how e. g. Luther rightly extols the science and gift of song. Who has received it, let him rejoice, who lacks it, let him seek, if possible, to waken it, for it is a good gift of the Creator which generally belongs to human nature.—Would that our present presbyteries did consist of men who understood something more than to keep accounts! [Stier is a Presbyterian—M.]—Every Christian should be to his brother Christian a priest who receives the confession and dispenses the absolution.—(vv. 19, 20). The greatest want and the greatest work of faith.—The Lord alone can help, deliver, and save the souls. But He does it and uses for that purpose instruments of His power, vessels of His grace. Hence the Scripture hesitates not to attribute to us miserable sinners the salvation of our fellow sinners. The Apostle labours to save some among His people, Rom. xi. 14. To Timothy, the bishop, he promises: "In doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee." 1 Tim. iv. 16. In like manner he refers to a wife that may save her husband, and to a husband that may save his wife, 1 Cor. vii. 16. Yes, brethren, we may save one another, help one another from death to life: this is truly a great, the greatest and most precious promise of the rich grace of God to our poor soul.

JAKOBI:—Among our Christian brethren of another communion, from whom separated three hundred years ago for liberty's and conscience' sake, the use of anointing with oil, recommended in our text, has been retained, and a devout sick man among them cannot rest until he has received this extreme unction at the priest's hands. Now although we cannot help seeing in this practice a complete misapprehension of these words of Holy Writ and a lamentable superstition, have we not, we ask, gone similarly astray, while there continues among us the sad evil habit of celebrating the Lord's Supper in so unconscious a state and of considering the taking of it immediately before death to be necessary, after the Holy Table had often before been unfrequented for years?

NEANDER:—To excite more than one to repentance of a single sin, and thus to pave his way towards obtaining the forgiveness of one sin, is to draw him away from the whole sinful bias of his life and to restore in him the state of a new, Divine life. Thereby many sins, which plunged him into his former course, are covered.

VIEDEBANDT:—Pray for one another. Such a precept is not found in the catechism of worldly friendship. Alas, how much ungodly friendship. It is like thorn-hedges which have grown the one into the other, united as it were in order to pierce and to tear. Noxious bind-weed!—while the soul is tied, prayer is tied also. Patience in suffering flows from hope for joys.

VON GERLACH: (v. 13).—Sadness and gladness are alike dangerous to the Christian; the devil takes advantage of every strong emotion to draw him away from God. Prayer and praise act like weapons against him.—

HEUBNER († 13).—The value of spiritual songs as compared with worldly songs (v. 15). Faith is the soul of prayer: without that it is faint and dead.—Prayer is one of the most glorious expression of free-will.—We also, like Elias, may pray for temporal things—(vv. 19, 20). The infinite value of a human soul.—

LISCO: (vv. 13–18).—Of the abuse and the right use of the name of God.—Several Christian rules of life.—Prayer 1, in all the situations of life, 2, especially with the sick, 3, availeth much.—(vv. 19, 20). Loving care for the conversion of sinners.—The blessed occupation of saving souls: 1, the motives that should prompt us; 2, the manner how we should set to work; 3, the blessing that attends it.

PORUBSZKY:—True cheerfulness.—Faith gives health.—Of the fruit of prayer.—The conversion of sinners the most laudable work of faith.—

[V. 10. JORTIN:—History sacred and secular shows us men naturally as weak as we are, liable to the same temptations of vanity, conceit, pride, sensual affections, fear, wrath, envy and malice, yet conquering these foes to their salvation. They had as quick a sense of pleasure and pain, of love and aversion, of profit and loss, of plenty and poverty, of honour and dishonour, as we; and yet they overcame the world by their faith, and by the influence of true religion upon their minds. They had indeed the Divine assistance to strengthen their infirmity; and so may we, if we seek it as they did.

V. 11. BP. SANDERSON:—Job held out in his patience under his great trial unto the last: and God out of pity and in His tender mercy towards him, heaped comforts upon him at the last in great abundance. It would be well worthy of our most serious meditation, to consider both what by God's grace he did, and how by God's mercy he sped. His example in the one would be a good pattern to us of patience: and his reward in the other a good encouragement for consolation. This we may rest upon as a most perfect truth, that if we do our part, God will not fail on His.

V. 14. NEDARIM p. 40, l. "Rabba, as often as he fell sick, forbade his domestics to mention it for the first day: if he did not then begin to get well, he told his family to go and publish it in the highways, that they who hated him, might rejoice: and they that loved him, might intercede with God for him."

RABBI SIMEON in Sepher Ha Chayim said: "What should a man do, who goes to visit the sick? Ans. He who studies to restore the health of the body, should first lay the foundation in the health of the soul." The wise men have said, "No healing is equal to that which comes from the word of God and prayer." Rabbi Phineas, the son of Chamma, has said, "When sickness or disease enters into a man's family, let him apply to a wise man, who will implore mercy in his behalf."—M.]

FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE APOSTLE.

SIMON PETER, son of Jonas (Matt. xvi. 17; John i. 42, xxi. 16), and brother of Andrew (Matt. x. 2; John i. 41), was born at Bethsaida, a village on the coast of the sea of Galilee (John i. 44), where in those days many receptive minds were animated by a desire for the advent of the Messiah. He owned a house at Capernaum (Matt. viii. 14; Luke iv. 38), was married there, and followed the trade of a fisherman (Matt. iv. 18; Mark i. 16; Luke v. 2). Andrew, his brother, a disciple of John the Baptist, who had believed his teacher's word, "Behold the Lamb of God," and thereupon had become a disciple of Jesus, told him the glorious discovery he had made, and took him to Jesus. On his first acquaintance with the Searcher of hearts, he received the surname, Cephas, Peter, the man of rock (John i. 42). This circumstance partly denotes his natural disposition, and partly a prediction of what, on the foundation of that disposition, grace would make of him. His fiery temperament, his quick resoluteness, his fearless courage, and his unreserved candour, were to be purified, glorified and confirmed by his love of Jesus, and by the power of the Holy Ghost. Thus only could he become a rocky foundation of the church of Christ (Matt. xvi. 18). After sundry meetings and preparations, the Lord attached him to the number of his permanent disciples. The miraculous blessing which is recorded in Luke v. 1, etc., and made Peter deeply conscious of his own unworthiness and of our Lord's exaltation and holiness, was the turning point in his career. His call to the Apostolate is narrated in Matt. iv. 18-20, and Luke v. 10, 11. In the four catalogues enumerating the twelve apostles, he is invariably named first, Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 16; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13. His full resignation to the Lord, and his deeper insight of his Divine Sonship, made him not only share with John and James their Master's more intimate friendship (Mark v. 37; Matt. xxvi. 37), but also enjoy a special preference over the rest of the apostles (Matt. xvi. 18, 19). Every where he appears as first among the apostles, but only as first among equals, placed not above, but on a level with them. (cf. Matt. xviii. 18; John xx. 21; Luke viii. 45; ix. 32; John i. 42; xxi. 15; Acts i. 15; ii. 14; viii. 14; x. 5; xv. 7.) Among the other disciples he was clothed with the dignity of being their spokesman, (Matt. xvi. 16; xxvi. 33; xvii. 24,) without thereby having a claim to outward superiority, for all believers were to regard each other as brethren and members under their one head, Christ (Matt. xxiii. 8; John xiii. 14). Besides the important and characteristic epochs of his life already mentioned, we have the following: his walking on the sea, which was designed to make him clearly conscious of the value of his own strength, in which he had so much confided (Matt. xiv. 29, etc.); his offence at the Passion of Jesus, when he undertook to censure and reprove his Master, while the word of the keys of the kingdom was still ringing in his ears (Matt. xvi. 22. 19).—Again, his wish to build tabernacles on the mount of transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 4); his believing obedience to a direction which ran wholly counter to reason, occasioned by a question concerning the temple-tribute (Matt. xvii. 27); his inquiry as to the reward flowing from his following Christ (Matt. xix. 27); his refusal to allow Jesus to wash his feet, hastily followed by the opposite extreme, "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head" (John xiii. 8, etc.); his promise to go with the loved Master into prison and death; his asseveration rather to die than deny his Lord [Matt. xxvi. 35], arising from reliance on his own strength and disregard of the words of Jesus, followed by the deep fall of his threefold denial (Matt. xxvi. 31–35. 58. 69, etc.). The wilful defence of his Master with the sword (John xviii. 10. 11); his tearful repentance after meeting the look of Jesus (Matt. xxvi. 75; Mark xiv. 72); his hurrying forth to the tomb of the risen Saviour, who had appeared to him before the other disciples (Luke xxiv. 34; 1 Cor. xv. 5); the loving zeal with which he anticipated the others in greeting the Master on the shore of the lake (John xxi. 7), where Jesus foretold him his destiny (John xxi. 18, etc.); his reply to the Redeemer's question, "Lovest thou me?" and his restoration to the pastoral office by the charge, "Feed my lambs, feed my sheep." (John xxi. 15, etc.)

In the first twelve chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, Peter appears as the chief organ of the Church at Jerusalem. (Acts i. 15; ii. 14). He is the spokesman of the other Apostles on the day of Pentecost, and preaches a mighty sermon on repentance, which pierces the hearts of three thousand hearers like a fiery arrow. He multiplies the number of believers both by the working of miracles, and the victorious power of the Gospel. (Chap. iii. 4; v. 15; ix. 34. 40). He deems it joy to endure the ignominy of Christ; and suffers neither threatenings nor ill treatment to make him falter in confessing the name of Jesus. (Ch. iv. 8; v. 29). He joins John in carrying the Gospel to Samaria (ch. viii. 14), and the coast regions of the Mediterranean. (Ch. x. 23). He is the first Apostle, who, in consequence of a vision with which he was honoured, received Gentiles into communion of the Christian Church. (Ch. x. 34). He defends this measure against the reproaches of the Jewish Christians, and protects the Gentile Christians from the heavy yoke of the Mosaic Law. (Ch. xi. 1, etc.; xv. 7, etc.). If, under the impulse of the moment, he was carried away into a course of action which contradicted those principles (Gal. ii. 12), he suffered himself by the correction of Paul the Apostle, to abandon the transient wavering of the new position he had taken. After the beheading of James the Apostle, Herod Agrippa cast Peter into prison, whence he was miraculously delivered by an angel. (ch. xii. 1.). After a brief absence, (ch. xii. 17), subsequent to the death of his enemy, he reappears at Jerusalem (ch. xv. 7) and declares, with a view to settling the dispute between the Jewish and Gentile Christians, that circumcision and the observance of the ceremonial law ought not to be exacted as necessary to the justification and salvation of believers. This event falls into the year 50 A. D. Since, in the subsequent account of the transactions at Jerusalem, recorded in the book of Acts, Peter ceases to be mentioned, we may conclude that his subsequent sphere of labour had called him away from there. His abode at Antioch, and the incident already mentioned above, belongs to the time from A. D. 52 to 54 (Gal. ii. 11–14.). It is clear, from 1 Cor. ix. 5, that Peter undertook various journeys for the spread of the kingdom of God. According to an ancient tradition in Origen, which originated probably in the title of his first Epistle, Peter is said to have preached the Gospel to the Jews scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia Minor, and Bithynia. He appears for some time to have had his sphere of labour in the Parthian empire, since he sends salutations from his co-elected at Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13), which is probably not to be understood of Rome, but of Babylon, in Chaldaea. Many Jews were dispersed there, and Christianity was early diffused in those regions. According to Dionysius of Corinth, who wrote in the second half of the second century, and according to Irenæus and Eusebius, Peter and Paul are said to have been together at Rome, and to have conjointly founded the Church at that place; Eusebius narrates that the two Apostles had shared a common martyrdom there; Peter was crucified with his head downwards. The fourteenth year of the reign of Nero, from the middle of October, A. D. 67, to the middle of A. D. 68, is mentioned as the year of the Apostle's death. Tertullian and Lactantius also report the common execution of the two Apostles, whose tombs were shown at Rome as early as the end of the second century. See Winer s. v. Petrus. The most ancient witness for the Apostle's stay at Rome, is Papias, who refers to John (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 39; ii. 15). With these early testimonies to support us, we refuse being misled by the critics (Spanheim, Baur, Schwegler, and others), who dispute Peter's stay at Rome. With reference to the Apostle's sphere of labour, we have still to mention the circumstance that, (as we learn from Gal. ii. 9), Paul and the pillars among the first Apostles gave to each other the right hand of fellowship at the apostolic council of Jerusalem, in token that Paul would recognize as his peculiar vocation, and carry out the mission among the Gentiles, while they would act in like manner with regard to the mission among the Jews. Peter is particularly named, as having had confided to him the Gospel of the circumcision (Gal. ii. 7, 8), for which he would seem to have been peculiarly fitted, on account of the national peculiarities which were so strongly stamped upon his character. Of him, as the Apostle of the circumcision, it may consequently be presupposed that he would move much on the foundation of the Old Testament, that he would set his testimony of Christ and the salvation that is in Him in the light of the Old Testament, and that he would lay stress on the oneness of both Testaments; while, as the immediate disciple of our Lord, as the witness of His entire ministerial activity and history, and as His favourite Apostle, he would often refer to the words of that beloved Master to whom he was so ardently and devotedly attached. We shall see whether the event confirms these pre-suppositions.

"When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren," Luke xxii. 32. Acting on this, his Master's charge, Peter wrote to the strangers of the dispersion. He indicates the design of his writing himself, in chap. v. 12: "I have written briefly, exhorting and testifying that this is the true grace of God, wherein ye stand." They were already converted, believing Christians, who needed not so much a testimony that laid the foundation, as one that was edifying and confirmative (ἐπιμαρτυρεῖν), who required comfort in their tribulation and encouragements to a holy life. The sifting period of believers had partly come already, and was partly approaching; the roaring of the lion that threatened to devour the faithful, was already heard. On this account, the Apostle abounds in exhortations to vigilance and soberness, to right preparation and readiness, to fidelity in confession and life, and endeavours to cast the bright beams of hope of the approaching day of glory into the night of suffering they were about to encounter. He would have them triumph over the sufferings of this present time, with a steadfast look on Christ and their heavenly inheritance. The testimony of Christ is richly interwoven with such repeated encouragements. The sequel will show that Dogmatics and Ethics do not occur separately in this Epistle, but are often directly conjoined, and frequently present a quick, even a bold transition from the one to the other. (cf. ch. ii. 21, etc.; iii. 18, etc.; iv. 1, etc.).

§ 3. CONTENTS AND ANALYSIS OF THE EPISTLE.

The Title and Salutation of consolation (ch. i. 1, 2), is followed by the exordium, as basis of the argument (ver. 3-12), gratitude for God's saving grace to Christians. The hope of the heavenly inheritance, prepared for them by Christ, should raise them above all temporal suffering. They might measure the greatness of their salvation by the fact that it had been the object of the anxious longing, and diligent search of the prophets, and that even the blessed angels of heaven were looking with profound admiration on this mystery. The entire subsequent contents of the Epistle rest and move on the basis of their possession of salvation and hope. With reference to the state of regeneration, which is presupposed in believers, exhortation and consolation [παράκλησις and παράκλησις.—M.], appear as leading tendencies from ch. i. 18, onwards. The first part of the Epistle comprises ch. i. 13 to ii. 10. The general exhortation to become ever more firmly grounded in hope, and on that account, also, in a holy conversation, ch. i. 14-16, to walk in the fear of God, ver. 17-21, to persevere in brotherly love, ver. 22-25, which is again founded on regeneration, ver. 23. The same idea governs the exhortation to grow in the new life, wherein they stand, and to remove whatever hinders or destroys that growth, and more particularly the love of the brethren, ch. ii. 1-3. Whereas that growth is designed to be not only individual, but contemplates the founding of a holy people of God, it is followed by a description of the glory of the Divine edifice, into which they were to suffer themselves to be builded more and more. (Ch. ii. 4-10). At ch. ii. 11, the apostle passes to the second part, which continues to ch. iv. 6. It contains particular exhortations to Christians, adapted to the circumstances in which they were then placed. As strangers, they should be so much the more dutiful to authority. (Ch. ii. 13-17). Servants were, with constant regard to the example of Christ, to exhibit self-denying obedience to their masters. (Ver. 18-25). Wives should be subject to their husbands in simplicity, quietness, and meekness (ch. iii. 1-6); while husbands were to treat their wives with consideration and affection. (Ch. iii. 7). Then follows an exhortation addressed to all to the practice of mutual affection and brotherly kindness, and of patience and gentleness toward unbelievers. (Ch. iii. 8 to iv. 6). The exhortation is enforced by the consideration of the example of Christ, His sufferings and death, His descent into the nether world, His resurrection and ascension. (Ch. iii. 17-22). From Christ's suffering for us is derived the double duty of patient endurance and of being dead unto sin. They were not to endeavour to avoid suffering, by joining in the vicious practices of the Gentiles, else they would, with them, be exposed to the judgment of God. (Ch. iv. 1-6). The third part (ch. iv. 7-v. 11), treats first of the inward union of Christians in the world, without regard to their relations to unbelievers. In view of the end of all things, the Apostle exhorts Christians to prayer, to brotherly love and its exhibitions, to an obliging disposition, and to conscientiousness in the administration of offices of trust. In the second section of this part of the Epistle, we have a new exhortation to readiness of enduring afflictions, which treats the matter from a point of view different from ch. ii. 21, etc.; iii. 14, etc., and affords proof that this was the main object contemplated in this Epistle. They were to regard suffering as necessary to the imitation of Christ, as a refining process, and as a judgment by which the Church of Christ must be sifted according to indispensable laws of the kingdom of heaven. (Ch. iv. 12-19). In the third section, the Apostle addresses the elders in particular, exhorting them rightly to feed the flock of Christ, and to be ensamples to the flock (ch. v. 1-4); then the younger to submit themselves to the elder (ver. 5), and lastly, he entreats all to cleave to humility, meekly to bow under the hand of God, to remain in the faith, to be vigilant, and firmly to resist the devil (ver. 5-9). The conclusion contains a promise full of strong consolation, a remark on the design of his writing, with salutations and the benediction.

§ 4. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE EPISTLE.

Luther justly designates the Epistle of St. Peter as one of the most noble of the New Testament. It exhibits a wealth of thought, a dignity, a fervour, a humility and love, a believing hope, a readiness for the advent of Christ, in exact harmony with the individuality of the Apostle. His conception of Christianity as the fulfilment of the prophecies of the Old Testament (ch. i. 10-12), in perfect agreement with his speeches in the book of Acts (ch. iii. 18-25), his treatment of Christians as those in whom is realized the idea of the theocratic nation (1 Pet. ii. 9; v. 4, 5), and his uniform plan of tracing back his doctrine of the Person and work of Christ to the Old Testament, show him as the Apostle of the circumcision, whose sphere of labour lay among the Jews, who viewed the Gospel chiefly from the side of its oneness with the Old Covenant. His numerous references to the sayings of our Lord, which will be authenticated below, prove him to have been the ear-witness of the words of Jesus, to whom his soul was attached with the fullest devotion and resignation. The description of Paul, as the Apostle of faith, of John as the Apostle of love, and of Peter as the Apostle of hope, may easily be misunderstood, but it is well-founded, if regarded as indicative of the predominant aim of their respective writings. Weiss has well shown that with Peter hope occupies a central position, that it governs the range of his thoughts, and gives it a peculiar, distinctive impress. Compare particularly ch. i. 3. 7. 9. 13; iii. 9-15; iv. 13; v. 4. It is seen throughout the Epistle that his eye is firmly fixed upon the coming of Christ and the glory in store for believers. This agrees perfectly with the quick and fiery character of Peter, and has been interestingly developed by Weiss. "His natural tendency to look forward to the end of perfection, and to anticipate it at least ideally, was, in the Apostle, glorified and refined into Christian hope by the influence of the Holy Ghost." With respect to manner of statement, it is, its great simplicity notwithstanding, very pregnant, forcible and lively; sentences and thoughts are manifoldly intertwined and connected by participial constructions, while sudden and abrupt transitions, which are of frequent occurrence, reflect the Apostle's mind. His mode of doctrinal statements concerning Christ and sin, is not as fully developed as in Paul, and lacks the fundamental views which are peculiar to the latter (e.g. concerning the believer's communion of life with Christ, concerning the sinner's justification by faith in the merits of Jesus), but their germs and beginnings are unmistakable in the Epistle. (Cf. Schmid, Bibl. Theology and Weiss). The latter, after a careful examination of the degree of affinity between the Epistles of Peter and Paul, arrives at the conclusion that Peter's language and mode of instruction are wholly independent of Paul, and rich in exclusive peculiarities, that they contain not less than sixty ἀπαξ λεγόμενα. Of the parallel passages in the Epistle to the Romans, and the First Epistle of Peter, he says that they can by no means be considered accidental; that while it must be assumed that the one had read and freely used the other's Epistle, it seems more probable that Paul had read the First Epistle of Peter, when he wrote the Romans, than the reverse. The most important passages to be considered in this respect are:—Rom. xii. 3-8, 1 Pet. iv. 10; Rom. xii. 9-13, 1 Pet. i. 22; Rom. xii. 10, 1 Pet. ii. 17; Rom. xii. 14, etc., 1 Pet. iii. 8, 9-12; Rom. xiii. 1-6, 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14, 17; Rom. xiii. 11, 12, 1 Pet. iv. 7, ii. 9; that the originality belongs to Peter. The same remarks apply to the correspondencies between Ephesians and 1 Peter. Compare 1 Pet. i. 3, Eph. i. 3; 1 Pet. ii. 18-20, Eph. vi. 5-9; 1 Pet. iii. 1-7, Eph. v. 22-33; 1 Pet. i. 1, Eph. i. 4; 1 Pet. v. 3, Eph. i. 11; 1 Pet. i. 1, Eph. i. 18; 1 Pet. iii. 5, Eph. i. 12; 1 Pet. i. 5, Eph. i. 19; 1 Pet. iii. 22, Eph. i. 20, 21; 1 Pet. i. 14, 15, Eph. ii. 3; 1 Pet. i. 18, Eph. ii. 12; 1 Pet. iii. 18, Eph. ii. 18; 1 Pet. ii. 5, 6, Eph. ii. 20-22; 1 Pet. ii. 2, Eph. ii. 21; 1 Pet. i. 12, Eph. iii. 5, 10; 1 Pet. i. 15, Eph. iv. 1; 1 Pet. iv. 10, Eph. iv. 7, 11, 12; 1 Pet. iii. 19, iv. 6, Eph. iv. 8-10; 1 Pet. i. 14-19, Eph. iv. 17-24; 1 Pet. ii. 12, iii. 16, iv. 14, Eph. iv. 25-32; 1 Pet. iv. 3, Eph. v. 5; 1 Pet. v. 5, Eph. v. 21; 1 Pet. ii. 18, Eph. vi. 5-9; 1 Pet. v. 8, 9, Eph. vi. 10-20. "In all those passages," says Weiss, "which render a critical opinion possible, all goes in favour of the dependence of the Epistle to the Ephesians." A writer in the German Magazine for Christian Science and Christian Life, objects to the foregoing conclusion, particularly in regard of the Epistle to the Romans, and remarks on Rom. xii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 5, that the Pauline figure is more lucid and simple, and on that account more original; that the same is true of Rom. xii. 3-8; cf. 1 Pet. iv. 10. Also Rom. xii. 14-19; cf. 1 Pet. iii. 8-12; and Rom. xiii. 1-6; cf. 1 Pet. ii. 13, favour the originality of Paul. Rom. ix. 33 also seems to be original, cf. 1 Pet. ii. 6. The problem must be regarded as unsolved. There are only a few passages in the Epistle of James resembling those in St. Peter, e.g. Jas. i. 2; 1 Pet. i. 6; Jas. i. 10; iv. 6, 7, 10; 1 Pet. i. 24; v. 5. Some of them contain quotations from the Old Testament; there is only one passage (Jas. iv. 7, 10) which renders a relationship to 1 Pet. v. 8, etc., probable. Peter may have read and made free use of the Epistle of James.

§ 5. READERS OF THE EPISTLE.

The believers, to whom the Epistle is addressed (ch. i. 1), were scattered over almost the entire peninsula of Asia Minor. The ancient fathers, with the exception of Augustine and Cassiodorus, thought that the ἐκλεκτοίς related to Jewish Christians. This opinion was prevalent until modern times: several commentators added only the modification that those Churches contained also Gentile Christians, who were, however, in the minority. On the other hand, Steiger, followed by Wiesinger, tried to prove, in his commentary, that the majority in those churches were, at all events, Gentiles. Weiss produces, however, convincing arguments that the Epistle was intended for Jewish Christians; he justly affirms:

a. That διασπορά (ch. i. 1) is a terminus technicus, and denotes the totality of Jews outside of Palestine, scattered through heathen countries (Jas. i. 1; 2 Macc. i. 27; Judith v. 19), and cannot be taken metaphorically.

b. That the Epistle is entirely permeated by views taken from the Old Testament; it contains numerous Old Testament figures and termini technici, allusions to the religious institutions and the history of the Old Covenant. Compare ch. i. 10-12; iii. 5, 6; iii. 20. Peter frequently intertwines quotations from the Old Testament into his language, without designating them as such, and mostly in connections where it is of essential importance that they should be recognized as Scripture (ch. i. 24; ii. 7. 9. 10, and other passages). No portion of the New Testament is so thoroughly interwoven with quotations from and allusions to the Old Testament. (It contains, in 105 verses, twenty-three quotations, while the Epistle to the Ephesians has only seven, and that to the Galatians, only thirteen).

c. That this peculiarity agrees entirely with the fact that it was Peter's vocation to be the Apostle of the circumcision. The mode of speech which he took from the Old Testament, must have particularly recommended him to Jewish Christians. The passages quoted in favour of Gentile Christians, prove just the opposite, e. g. ch. iii. 6; i. 14. 18; ii. 9. 10. See the Commentary on these passages. The same holds good of ch. iv. 3. It would be curious, indeed, that Peter should reproach former Gentiles with having done the will of the Gentiles. The expression ἀδελφοί, εὐδολοῦσθε τοὺς ἔθνη only seems to relate to Gentiles; but this presents no obstacle on the supposition that those Churches contained individual Gentile Christians. The Jewish Christians formed, doubtless, the substance and main stem of those Churches (cf. Acts ii. 9; xi. 19), until after the third missionary journey of the Apostle, the element of Gentile Christians became more important in those parts of Asia Minor. (Weiss, p. 115, 116).

§ 6. GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLE.

1 Pet. iv. 17 ought to convince the most undecided that the Epistle was written, at all events, before the destruction of Jerusalem. This is equally evident from the entire presupposed historical situation of the Epistle. Peter describes himself as the author at ch. i. 1; and as witness of the sufferings of Christ, ch. v. 1; this is confirmed by the affinity which exists between the Epistle and Peter's speeches in the book of Acts (cf. Acts ii. 32; iii. 18; 1 Pet. i. 10, etc.; Acts iv. 11; 1 Pet. ii. 4), and by the testimony of 2 Pet. iii. 1, even if the second Epistle were not genuine. The author's apostolic consciousness is involuntarily expressed in passages like ch. i. 8, in the historical testimony of Jesus, and its application as an exemplar (ch. ii. 21, etc.; iii. 18, etc.). We have seen above that the contents and mode of statement agree with the Apostle's portrait. Guericke calls particular attention to the harmony between the tone of the Epistle and the sensuousness which is characteristic in Peter: "Peter knew, indeed, from his own experience, better than any other, the weakness of the heart of man; for this reason his exhortations are both humane and evangelical, both forcible and gentle; for the same reason he recommends, with so much earnestness, the practice of constancy of faith, in humility and patience, with constant reference to the pattern and glory of Christ; this accounts also for his earnest exhortation to diligent vigilance, in precise proportion to the exalted condition of believers, and especially for his touching and repeated recommendation of humility." The same author notices the only slight intimation of Peter's acknowledging Paul as a true Apostle (ch. v. 12), the suppression of all personality and marked designedness with respect to his agreement with the Apostle of the Gentiles, and, lastly, the clearness, precision, and emphasis of Peter's language. The most weighty external reasons support the genuineness of this Epistle. Eusebius testifies that the Epistle was used by Papias and Polycarp. Several passages in Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians confirm the testimony of Eusebius. Theodotus, the Valentinian, after the middle of the second century, cites passages from the Epistle (Clem. Alex. ἐκ τῶν Θεοδώρου ἐπιτομῶν). Express testimony in favour of its genuineness, is found in Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. The Epistle stood already in the Old Syriac Peshito, and Eusebius mentions it among the Homologoumena. The new school of Tübingen, which rejects this Epistle on internal grounds, because it does not correspond with its premises, is, therefore, guilty of the most arbitrary hypercriticism. "Among all the writers of Christian Antiquity, there is not one who doubted the genuineness of the Epistle, or had even heard of any doubts concerning it." (Olshausen).

§ 7. DATE OF THE COMPOSITION OF THE EPISTLE.

Many circumstances in the Epistle refer its composition to an early date—e. g., the newness of the afflictions which the Churches had to endure, consisting less in persecution than in reproaches (ch. iii. 16; iv. 12. 14); the astonishment of the Gentiles at the Christians abandoning their sinful practices (ch. iv. 4); the expectation that the Gentiles, on becoming better acquainted with the good conversation of Christians, would relinquish their enmity, which was founded on ignorance (ch. ii. 15; ii. 12; iii. 16). To this must be added the as yet undeveloped state of the constitution of the Church, in which the office of presbyter did apparently coincide with the free office of the elders of the Jewish congregation, which may be gleaned from the circumstances that the πρεσβυτεροι of ch. v. 1, are contrasted with the υελεροι of ver. 5, while there is made no mention of any other ecclesiastical office; and again the predominance of the Jewish Christians in these Churches (see above), and especially the absence of an antithesis between legalism and true Christianity, beyond the slight allusion at ch. v. 2, must not be overlooked. Weiss, moreover, adduces, in this respect, the whole Petrine form of doctrine, which he regards as preliminary to the Pauline, as well as the peculiar freshness and energy of hope of the impending parousia of Christ. With regard to the latter, we must, in addition to the other reasons for the early composition of this Epistle, lay special emphasis on the circumstance, that it contains no allusion to a twofold parousia, such as we find in the synoptical Gospels and the Revelation of St. John (v. pp. 97 and 53). On the supposition that Paul made use of the Epistle of Peter, and not the reverse (that Peter had seen the Epistle of Paul), and considering that Sylvanus was in 53 A. D., still with Paul (Acts xviii. 5; 2 Cor. i. 19; 1 Thes. i. 1; 2 Thes. i. 1), Weiss argues that the Epistle could hardly have been written before A. D. 54. Since Paul made his third missionary journey between 54 and 57 A. D., when he passed through Galatia and Phrygia, and remained two years at Ephesus, where he wrote the Epistle to the Galatians, the date of the composition of this Epistle would fall into 54 or 55 A. D. Assuming, on the other hand, with the majority of commentators, that Peter had seen and made use of the Epistles of Paul, its date would belong to a much later period. Since, according to Hug and de Wette, 63–65 A. D. is the date of the Epistle to the Ephesians; the period 65–67, the year of Peter's death, would be the date of the present Epistle. Thiersch gives the date 63 or 64 A. D., soon after the Epistle to the Hebrews had been forwarded. If it be objected to the date assigned by Weiss, as has been done by Wiesinger: Where did the Jewish Christian Churches, in Pontus, etc., come from as early as 54 or 55 A. D.? the answer should refer not only to Acts ii. 9, but also to ch. xi. 19, where mention is made of the wide dispersion of those who fled "in the persecution that arose about Stephen." Paul had, as early as 45 and 51 A. D., visited those districts during his first and second missionary journeys. The First Epistle of Peter has no record of Churches already organized, but makes mention of elect strangers of the dispersion.

EXGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VERSE 1.—On the meaning of Peter, see notes on Matt. xvi. 18.

Apostle, a messenger of Jesus Christ, speaking and acting in his Master's name. The qualifications necessary to the apostolic vocation may be learned from the speech of Peter at the election of an apostle. Acts i. 21, 22. They had to be the constant attendants of Christ during the whole of His ministerial career, as He said to the twelve: "Ye have been with me from the beginning," Jno. xv. 27; cf. Lke. xxiv. 18, in particular, witnesses of His resurrection and ascension, Acts ii. 33; iii. 15; v. 32; x. 41. They had to testify of the great facts of salvation and to found Churches, to teach and to preach, to exhort and warn, to threaten and rebuke, to intercede and to oversee, and to carry the message of the cross to Jews and Gentiles, Acts x. 39; iv. 19; 2 Cor. v. 20; Phil. i. 7. 17; Col. ii. 8. To this end they had been especially called and chosen, separated and sent forth by the Lord Himself and endowed with extraordinary gifts by the Spirit, Acts xiii. 10. 11; v. 5. 11; ii. 4; Mk. xvi. 17. 18; 1 Cor. v. 5; Jno. xx. 22.

Elect, in Peter's sense of the word, are such as are incorporated in the chosen generation (ch. ii. 9) and belong to the purified people of God, to the children of Abraham who have become believers in Jesus. The final cause of this election is free grace, its end salvation, and its condition penitent faith. Acts iii. 19; ii. 38. 21; 1 Pet. i. 4; v. 10. The word is used in a different sense in Matt. xxii. 14; Eph. i. 4; Acts ix. 15.

Strangers, παροικητοὶ denotes persons, residing with others for a short time in a strange place, not citizens, but denizens, cf. Gen. xlvii. 9; Lev. xxv. 28; Heb. xi. 18. Weiss would take it figuratively of the pilgrim-state of Christians on account of the next word, cf. i. 17; ii. 11; but the explanation "to the elect denizens of the dispersion" is more simple. Such a compression of literal and figurative definitions so nearly related in sound, would hardly be intelligible without some further definition. Judith v. 20; 2 Mac. i. 27.

Dispersion (διασπορά) was the current phrase used to designate Jews living in Gentile lands, i. e. residing out of Palestine, cf. Jno. vii. 35; Jas. i. 1. This shows plainly who were the readers of the epistle: they were believing Jews, here and there joined by a few Gentile converts. This was the field confided to the care of Peter, Gal. ii. 7, while the sphere of Paul's labours lay among the Gentiles. Origen, Jerome and Epiphanius, testify that Peter was mainly engaged in preaching the Gospel to the Jews in the countries here specified. Such is the opinion of many among the more ancient commentators. e. g. Rusebius, Didymus, Œcumenius, who are followed by Grotius, Calvin and others: (vide Introduction).

Pontus, the extreme north-eastern province of Asia Minor, so called from the Black Sea, on which it borders towards the North; it was there that Aquila, a companion of Paul probably founded a Christian Church. Acts xviii. 2.

Galatia, westward of Pontus, derives its name from the Gauls, a Celtic tribe, which had left its seat on the left bank of the Rhine for Thrace and Greece and had afterwards gone as far as Asia Minor. Paul planted Christianity there. Acts xvi. 6.

Cappadocia lies South of Pontus; Jews of Cappadocia were present at the first Christian Pentecost and heard the declaration of the great works of God.

Asia describes the province, which under the Romans comprised the maritime districts of Mysia, Lydia and Caria with the interior Phrygia.

Bythia is the extreme north-western district of Asia Minor.

V. 2.—According to the foreknowledge of God, should be connected with elect: it denotes not mere prescience and precognition, the object of which is indeed not mentioned, but both real distinction and foredecreeing. So ch. i. 20; Acts ii. 23. God knew such as are His from before the foundation of the world and ordained them unto salvation. cf. Jno. x. 14; Acts iv. 28; Rom. viii. 29; [“πρόγνωσις hic non præscientiam, sed antecedens decretum significat ut et Act. ii. 23: idem sensus qui, Eph. i. 4.”—Grotius.—M.]

In sanctification of the Spirit.—This relates, as well as the other parts of this verse, to election. The order, by which alone the Divine decree can effect its end in us, is this, that we are sanctified by the Spirit of God. So Paul in 2 Thess. ii. 13: “God hath chosen you to salvation through [ἐν ὁγιασμῷ πνεύματος.—M.] sanctification of the Spirit.” This expression comprises all the gracious influences of the Holy Ghost, from His first gentle knockings to the sealing of grace. The reference of the work of our salvation to the Holy Trinity, which is unmistakably implied in this verse, excludes the application of πνεῦμα to the spirit of man.

[In Sanctification—Jesus Christ.—“Il vous a séparés effectivement d’avec eux, non pas en vous sanctifiant comme il fit le peuple d’Israël au désert, d’une sanctification externe et corporelle seulement, lorsqu’il le fit arroser du sang de la victime, qui ratifia par sa mort l’alliance de la loi; mais en vous consacrant d’une sanctification intérieure et spirituelle lorsque par la vertu de sa vocation il vous a amenés à l’obéissance de son Evangile et a recevoir l’aspersion du sang de Jesus Christ épanché pour l’établissement de l’alliance de grace en rémission des péchés.”—Amyraut.—M.]

Obedience, in the sense of Peter, includes the two ideas, to believe revealed truth and to perform the duties which it imposes on us. Obedience of the Divine commandments presupposes faith in their obligatoriness and the justice of God; faith claims obedience as its fruit, just as itself (i. e. faith), according to its inmost nature, is an act of obedience. Peter, according to his Old Testament stand-point, views both conjointly. cf. ch. ii. 7. 8; i. 14. 22; iii. 1; iv. 17; Acts iii.

22. 23; v. 32; with Paul the fundamental claims of faith and obedience become separate, Rom. x. 5–9, without any misconception of the ethical element of faith, ch. x. 16. 21; xi. 30; i. 5; ii. 8 2 Thess. i. 8; 2 Cor. x. 5.

Unto sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ,—παράσπασιν corresponding to the Hebrew verbs זָרַק and זָחַק occurs only twice in the N T., here and Heb. xii. 24. The altar of burnt offering, the altar of incense, the veil of the Most Holy place and the ark of the covenant (Lev. i. 5; v. 9; iv. 6. 7. 17. 18; xvi. 14–19) were sprinkled with blood in token that the holy vessels, which became, as it were, also infected with the poison of sin—(by the uncleanness of those who surrounded them)—stood in need of purification. At the sacrifice of the covenant a two-fold sprinkling took place, viz.: that of the altar with one-half of the blood and that of the people with the other. Ex. xxiv. 6–8, cf. Heb. ix. 18–20. This implied not only that both needed purifying, but also that the altar and the people belonged together, and that the remission of sins might fall to the latter. But the sprinkling of the people did not take place until they had declared themselves ready to comply with all the demands of the Divine Law without any exception whatsoever. Ex. xxiv. 8. 7; nor must the circumstance be overlooked that the sanctification of the unclean people unto communion with the Holy God must have gone before, Ex. xix. 10. As in the Old Testament the sprinkling of blood followed upon the sanctified people engaging themselves to implicit obedience, so this passage maintains that the members of the covenant-people of the New Testament are elect unto obedience and unto sprinkling of the blood of Jesus. It is only by the obedience of faith and our firm purpose to subject ourselves to the claims of the Divine Law, that we are made partakers of the atoning virtue of the blood of Jesus. If we stand in God’s covenant of grace with the honest endeavour of doing His will, God is pleased to make us ever anew partakers of the virtue of the blood of Jesus, and to cover therewith all the failings and infirmities which still cleave to our obedience as well as to forgive us the sins which are still mingled with it, provided we repent of them and seek for peace. We do not attempt to determine whether the words of our Lord at the institution of the Holy Supper had an essentially determining influence on the view of Peter, (as Weiss, p. 273, assumes as certain) but its reference to the conclusion of the covenant in the Old Testament is undeniable. [The three persons of the Holy Trinity coöperate, according to the Apostle, in the work of our salvation.—M.]

Grace is here not a Divine attribute, but a gift, as is apparent from its connection with peace, cf. ch. iv. 10; v. 10; iii. 7; i. 10. 13. It is the gift of justification and sanctification, from which flows peace in, and with God and forthwith also peace among men, cf. Rom. i. 7; 2 Jno. 8; Jude 2. In the last passage as at 2 Pet. i. 2, occurs also ἀγαπῶντες. The epistle of Nebuchadnezzar written after his deliverance, Dan. iii. 31, has in the Greek translation of the LXX. an almost identical introduction. The multiplying relates both to its virtue and to the feeling and taste thereof, cf. Rom. v. 5.

[Wordsworth remarks: "This salutation of the Apostle from Babylon recalls to the mind the greeting sent forth from the same city to all its provinces, by the two Kings of two successive dynasties,—the Assyrian and the Medo-Persian—under the influence of the prophet Daniel, and other faithful men of the first dispersion. They proclaimed in their royal Epistles the supremacy of the One True God, the God of Israel. 'Nebuchadnezzar, the King, to all the people, to you peace be multiplied.' (εἰρήνη ὑμῖν πληθυνθῆναι, Dan. iv. 1). Darius the King wrote to all people, 'To you peace be multiplied.' (Dan. vi. 25).

Daniel and the three children turned the hearts of Nebuchadnezzar and Darius, and moved them to declare the glory of the true God in letters written 'to all people.' The apostle St. Peter now carries on the work of the ancient prophets, and writes an epistle from Babylon, by which he builds up the Christian Sion in all ages of the world (cf. 2 Peter i. 1. 2. and 1 Peter i. 18), and proclaims to all, 'Peace be multiplied unto you.'—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Peter refers to his apostleship, not with a view to making it a ground of superiority to other teachers, but in order to remind his readers of the great responsibility attaching to, and consequent upon, the disregard of his exhortations and consolations. Because he is the ambassador of Christ, we should hear him as we would Christ Himself, cf. Lk. x. 16; 1 Thess. iv. 8. He calls himself an elder among elders, ch. v. 1.—Wherever no positive proof can be given of an immediate election and calling to and qualification for the apostolate as emanating from our Lord Himself, its claim is unwarranted and untenable.—This is also true where secular authority is allied to the spiritual office (cf. Matt. xx. 25-28) and where it is attempted to control the faith and conscience of men (cf. 2 Cor. i. 24; 1 Cor. iv. 1).—[The claims of Rome are illustrative of the second and third points, those of the Irvingites of the first.—M.]

2. The Apostles were not vicegerents and representatives of Christ, much less the Pope of Rome.

3. The glorious title and state of real Christians, to be called 'elect'. It is an unspeakable mercy to be selected from the mass of so many thousands of the lost, from the communion of their guilt and punishment, from the power of unbelief, sin and seduction. Distinguish between "elect" and "called." Calling reveals the decree of election. The end of election in the New Testament differs from that in the Old.

4. The Christian's real home is heaven; here below we are guests and strangers, as David confesses: "I am both, thy pilgrim, (here below) and thy citizen (above)," Ps. xxxix. 18. [This is Luther's version, but it is doubtful whether the antithesis of pilgrim and citizen is warranted by the original Hebrew, תושב is rather a denizen than a citizen; the Jews of the dispersion were denizens, not citizens.—M.]. The time of his sorrowful pilgrimage is brief, as contrasted with the eternal glory of his imperishable home. Ch. i. 4; v. 10; ii. 11. cf. Heb. xi. 13.

5. The call of Divine grace has its proper seasons and hours in nations as well as in individuals. According to Acts xvi. 8, 7, the Spirit forbade Paul and Timothy to preach in proconsular Asia and Bithynia, but soon after the hour of grace struck also for those provinces passed over at the first. On his return from Europe, Paul declared the word of the Lord Jesus to the Jews and Greeks in Asia by the space of two years, Acts xix. 10. He or other servants of Christ must have planted a Church in Bithynia.

6. The state of salvation of believers is not the result of some sudden manifestation of the loving will of God, sprung up in the course of time, but the effect of His eternal decree and fore-determination. It is a work participated in by the three persons of the Holy Trinity and redounding to their glory. God the Father elects unto salvation in Christ and prepares salvation; God the Son gives reality to election by His life, suffering and death; God the Holy Ghost appropriates and applies to the souls of penitent sinners the salvation procured by Jesus Christ.—He that places himself under the discipline of the Holy Ghost and suffers himself to form the resolution, "All that the Lord hath said will we do, and be obedient," as Israel said of old, Ex. xxiv. 7, is mysteriously sprinkled with the blood of Christ, his sins are covered, he is regarded as pure and holy in Christ, and enabled to render priestly service to God and to be found without spot before Him, 1 Jno. i. 7. In the New Testament, spirit and blood appear to be intimately related to each other, Jno. vi. 58, etc., Rom. iii. 24, 25; viii. 1; 1 Jno. v. 6.

7. Peace is a glorious fruit of grace where it is received into the heart, cf. Rom. i. 7. The salutation of peace contains the sum-total of the gospel. Luther says: "Peace is the favour of God which now begins in us but must work more and more and multiply unto death. If a man knows and believes in a gracious God, he has Him; his heart finds peace, and he fears neither the world nor the devil, for he knows that God, who controls all things, is his friend, and will deliver him from death, hell and all calamity; therefore his conscience is full of peace and joy. This is what Peter desires for believers; it is a right Christian salutation, with which all Christians should greet one another."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The servants of Christ find consolation and protection in the fact that they are sent of the Lord.—The motto of Israelites indeed: "I am a guest on earth."—The sublime consolation to belong to God's elect people;—[to be a member of the Church, ἐκκλησία.—M.]. The reason of our election resides not in man but in the free grace of God.—The unmistakable tokens of election.—Sprinkling with the blood of Christ, the precious treasure of the elect.—The work of grace carried on by the Holy Trinity in the saint's heart.—The blessed end for which we are called.

STARKER:—Peter was an Apostle of Jesus Christ, but not the visible vicegerent of Christ on earth.—A true pastor cannot forget those whom he has begotten in Jesus Christ; if he is unable to comfort them orally, he does it by letter.—He who is a stranger in a country needs not on that account be sad; it is enough that he has secured a fair heritage in Christ. The more he perceives this, the less will he be attached to the world and the more will he long for his heavenly fatherland.—In the election of grace the decree of God is not absolute, but it takes place because persevering faith in Jesus Christ is foreseen.—Grace and peace belong together, and must not be confounded. with nature and assurance; grace brings peace and peace testifies of grace. None can desire any thing more precious than grace and peace; he that hath them is happy for time and for eternity.

CHAPTER I. 3-12.

ANALYSIS:—God is praised for the grace of regeneration and for the hope of the heavenly inheritance, founded thereon. Sufferings should augment and intensify the Christian's joy, for they serve to prove his faith. The Spirit of Christ had directed the inquiries of the prophets to this end of hope, yea, even the angels were desirous of looking into this salvation.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath <sup>1</sup>begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of 4 Jesus Christ from the dead,<sup>2</sup> To an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and 5 that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you,<sup>3</sup> Who are kept <sup>4</sup>by the power
6 of God through faith <sup>5</sup>unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time. <sup>6</sup>Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through 7 manifold temptations: That the <sup>7</sup>trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be <sup>8</sup>tried with fire, might be found <sup>9</sup>unto praise 8 and honour and glory at the <sup>10</sup>appearing of Jesus Christ: Whom having not <sup>11</sup>seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy un-9 speakable and full of glory: <sup>12</sup>Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of 10 your souls. Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, 11 who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: Searching what, <sup>13</sup>or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified 12 beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us<sup>14</sup> they did minister the things, which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; which things the angels desire to look into.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 3. The praise of the Divine grace in the glorious hope of Christians flows like a deep and wide stream from the full heart of the Apostle v. 8-12. Paul praises in similar language with one long breath of joy the salvation given unto us, Eph. i. 3-14. We have first the source and cause of our hope, v. 3, then its end and glory, v. 4, then the way we must take which ought not to make us hesitate v. 5-8, and lastly the means designed to encourage and strengthen us, v. 8-12.

Blessed be the God—Christ.—God is here blessed, as is frequently the case in the Epistles of Paul, not only as the Father but also as the God of Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. i. 3; xi. 31; Rom. xv. 6; Eph. i. 8. 17; Col. i. 8; cf. John xx. 17. An important suggestion concerning the relation of the Logos to the Father. Only in Christ and through him do all find and possess God. The Paternity points to the eternal generation out of the Being of God, Ps. ii. 8; and to the intimate relation to the Incarnate Son. Weiss derives this doxological formula from, what may be called, the liturgical usage of the primitive Church, cf. Jas. i. 27; iii. 9. He thinks that said expression is insufficient as proof of the Essential Divinity and Preexistence of Christ. Cf. on the other hand, Matt. xvi. 16; John vi. 68.

Mercy, ἐλεος (ἔλεος) the compassionating love of God, which condescends to the low estate of the helpless, the weak, the impotent, the wretched and the sinful. It is a manifold mercy, a wonderful riches thereof (Rom. ii. 4) which appears from the multitude of its gifts of grace, from the depth of our misery, from the extent and diversity of its efforts of deliverance.

Begotten again, ἀναγεννησας etc. cf. John iii. 8; Tit. iii. 5; James. i. 18; Col. iii. 1; Eph. ii. 10. He has kindled in us a new spiritual life by Holy Baptism and the influences of the Holy Spirit connected therewith, cf. Eph. i. 19. 20. He has laid the foundation of recreating us into His image. "He has made us other men in a far more essential sense than it was once said to Saul: 'Thou shalt be turned into another man' 1 Sam. x. 6." What is the principal fruit and end of this new generation? A living hope. Its object is not only our future resurrection (Grotius, Bengel, de Wette), but the whole plenitude of the salvation still to be revealed by Jesus Christ, even until the new heavens and the new earth shall appear, 2 Peter iii. 13. 14; Rev. xxi. 1. Birth implies life; so it is with the hope of believers, which is the very opposite of the vain, lost and powerless hope of the worldly-minded. It is powerful, and quickens the heart by comforting, strengthening, and encouraging it, by making it joyous and cheerful in God. Its quickening influence enters even into our physical life. 'Hope is not only the fulfilment of the new life, created in regeneration, but also the innermost kernel of the same.' Weiss.

By the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.—δι' ἀναστάσεως, Calvin, Gerhard, Knapp, and Weiss join it to ἀναγενν.; it seems more natural to connect it with the immediately preceding ζώων; so Ecoumenius, Bengel, Steiger, Lachmann and de Wette. The life of this hope flows from the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. "If Christ had not risen from the dead, we should be without consolation and hope, and all the work and sufferings of Christ would be in vain." Luther. As surely as He has conquered death and entered upon a heavenly life of joy, so surely will those who are members of the Body, whereof He is Head, follow Him, even as we sing: Does the head forget its members. And not draw them after it?

VER. 4. To an inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away.—Believers are strangers here on earth, but citizens in heaven; they have therefore in heaven a possession and an inheritance which infinitely excels the inheritance of God's ancient people in the land of Canaan. The heavenly inheritance (cf. Matthew vi. 20; Luke xii. 88; x. 25; xviii. 18; Mark x. 17) is (a) incorruptible. It is free alike from the germs of corruption and death, like all things earthly, even those which are seemingly most firm and indestructible, e. g. the precious metals, ch. i. 18. 23; cf. 1 John ii. 17. "Rust does not corrupt it, decay does not consume it, death does not destroy it." Besser. It comprehends union to Him, who only has immortality and is called 'the Eternal' 1 Tim. i. 17. How could it then be destroyed by any external power? It is (b) undefiled or unblemishable. The earth and the land of Canaan in particular were polluted by fearful bloodshedding and many other horrors. Lev. xviii. 27. 28; Numb. xxxv. 38. 34; Ezek. xxxvi. 17; Jer. ii. 7. Injustice, selfishness, hatred, envy and cunning cleave to temporal possessions. If gathered by avarice, they are compared to loathsome and thick mire, Hab. ii. 6. Every human body and every human soul is stained with hateful desires and mostly, also, with outward sin. All earthly joy is mingled with displeasure and sorrow. But the possessions of the life above are pure, clean and unstained, and nothing impure can attach itself to them. (c) 'It fadeth not away.' Here the beauty of earthly nature is rapidly passing away, there reigns perpetual spring; here a hot wind may change the most blooming gardens into a wilderness, cf. ch. i. 24; Is. xl. 6; there no such alternation of blossoming and fading is found, but every thing remains in the beauty of imperishable bloom and verdure. Weiss sees in the three predicates a striking climax. He says that the first denotes the freedom of the heavenly possession from the germs of destructibility and transitoriness, which are inherent in all earthly things, that the second denies its ability to be polluted by outward sin, and the third even the alternation, which makes the beauty of earthly nature pass away at last temporarily. [Ἀθάρατος æternum durans;—Ἀμύραντος purum—cui nihil mali, nihil vitii est admixtum—ut purum gaudium—gaudium cui nihil tristitiæ admisceatur. Ἀμάραντος non marcescens. Morus.—M.]

Reserved in heaven, τετηρημένῃ. While here below in the strange country of our pilgrimage all possessions are insecure, the inheritance above is in the surest custody, for it is in the Almighty hand of God. As it has been designed and prepared for believers from everlasting, so it is perpetually kept; and believers, on the other hand, are kept for it, v. 5, so that they can in no wise lose it, cf. Col. i. 5; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Matt. xxv. 84; John x. 28. τετηρη. implies both the certainty and present concealment of the heavenly inheritance. The figure is taken from parents who securely guard something for their children, and then surprise them with it.

VER. 5. Who are kept by the power of God, φρουρεῖν, a military term used of a guard for the protection of a place, or of a strongly garrisoned fortress. Fear not the enemies of your salvation, for you are surrounded by a strong, protecting body-guard, by the power of God and His holy angels, cf. 2 Cor. xi. 82; Phil. iv. 7; Song of Sol. iii. 7. 8; Zech. ii. 5; 2 Kings vi. 16. 17. Nothing short of Divine power is needed to protect us from so many strong and subtle enemies, as Peter made experience in his own case. Weiss with Steiger and de Wette explain it of the Holy Ghost. δύναμις Θεοῦ is certainly used in that sense, Luke i. 85, but πνεῦμα ἅγιον goes before. The other passages adduced by them are inconclusive. It seems therefore arbitrary to abandon the relation of the expression to the Omnipotence of God. On what condition do we enjoy that guard? Faith, whose object is not mentioned here in particular, and should be supplied from v. 8. It is the same means by which salvation is first procured, then constantly kept up, viz.: acknowledging Jesus as the Messiah and confidently surrendering to Him, which is not identical with obedience, but the source of it, cf. Acts iii. 16; x. 48; Matt. ix. 22; Mark v. 84; Luke vii. 50.

Salvation ready, σωτηρία, שְׁמִינָה; negatively, deliverance from eternal destruction, and positively, introduction to the salvation prepared by Jesus, translation from the power of Satan, sin and death into the perfect life of liberty, righteousness and truth, Acts ii. 40; iv. 12; v. 81; xv. 11; 1 Peter i. 9; Matt. xvi. 26; Luke ix. 56. The former point is predominant as the latter lies rather in κληρονομία. With Peter σωτηρία appears in most intimate connection with the completion of salvation, chap. i. 9; iv. 17. 18; Acts ii. 21; 1 Peter ii. 2. How much he has it at heart is evident from his using the word three times in this section. He thinks of it not as far distant, but as close at hand, as he says in ch. iv. 5, "Who shall give account to Him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead," cf. ch. iv. 7. Sharing the opinion of the other apostles concerning the nearness of Christ's Advent to judgment, he describes σωτηρία as ready to be revealed (James v. 7. 8; Rev. i. 3; xxii. 10. 20; Heb. x. 25. 87; Jude 18; 1 John ii. 18; Rom. xiii. 11. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 51; 2 Cor. v. 2. 8; Phil. iv. 5; 1 Thess.

iv. 17). "The inheritance to which you are ordained, has been acquired long since and prepared from the beginning of the world, but lies as yet concealed, covered and sealed; but in a short time, it will be opened in a moment and disclosed, so that we may see it." Luther.

To be revealed, ἀποκαλυφθῆναι, denotes salvation fully disclosed, cf. ch. i. 7; iv. 18; v. 1. At ch. i. 18 it refers to the announcement of the first advent of Christ, cf. Rom. xvi. 26; and to inward revelation at 1 Cor. ii. 10; Gal. i. 16; iii. 28. In the last time, ἐν καιρῷ ἑσχατῷ, in the completing period of salvation beginning with the return of Christ, this is elsewhere called συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, Matt. xiii. 89. 40; xxiv. 8; xxviii. 20; or ἡ ἑσχατὴ ἡμέρα John xi. 24; xii. 24; xii. 48. In Hebrew אֶחָד הַיָּמִים Gen. xlix. 1; Num. xxiv. 14; Deut. iv. 89; Is. ii. 2; Mich. iv. 1; Ezek. xxxviii. 16; Dan. x. 14, where regard is had sometimes more to the beginning, sometimes more to the development of that period. The last times of the present system of the world, of the αἰὼν οὗτος are also called ἑσχαται ἡμέραι, 2 Tim. iii. 1; Jude 18; 1 Peter i. 20; 2 Peter iii. 8, or ἑσχατὴ ὥρα, 1 John ii. 18; they border upon those συντέλεια, but do not coincide with them. Somewhat different appears the usus loquendi of the Ep. to the Hebrews (ch. ix. 26). But ἐν συντέλειᾳ may be rendered, near to the period of completion, which the author thought immediately impending.

VER. 6. Wherein ye greatly rejoice.— Ἐν ᾧ connect not with καιρῷ, but with the whole preceding sentence, verses 4 and 5. The thought of the great possessions reserved for you, justly fills you with exceeding joy. In this do not let yourselves be disconcerted by quickly passing sufferings of probation, which for your proof are necessary to the happiness of all Christians.

If need be.—Εἰ δέον* supposes that the afflictions will not be of uninterrupted continuance and that their duration and measure have been decreed by the wisdom of God, and that they will not be continued one minute longer than is needful for us. Believers also need them in exact adjustment to the degree to which their nature remains as yet uncleansed of the poison of sin.

In heaviness through manifold temptations.—Sufferings cause to the outer man pain and grief, Heb. xii. 11, while the inner man can rejoice in them.

ποικίλους πειρασμούς; πειρασμ. relates to afflictions differing in kind, sent or permitted by God as trials or tests of the reality of the Christian's religious principles, as exercising his patience and developing his desire after heavenly things. Among the peculiar temptations to which believers who had left Judaism were exposed, we may mention the contempt and abuse they met at the hands of their former coreligionists, the temporal losses to which they had to submit and the efforts of false teachers to induce them to deny the truth and to effect a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. Cf. Heb. x. 82; Jas. i. 2; Acts vii. 1; xv. 1; xiv. 22; 1 Thess. iii. 2 etc.; 2 Cor. xi. 28.

VER. 7. That the trial of your faith.—Ἐν* of the temptations v. 7: The splendour and preciousness of faith is to shine with a brilliancy inversely proportioned to their darkness [i. e. of the temptations, M.] Faith must be tested by temptations which are consequently unable to mar the joy of our hope in Christ.

Τὸ δοκιμὸν τῆς πίστεως. δοκιμὸν signifies proof-stone, proof, tried integrity. Here it can only be taken in the last sense. The proof of faith=faitb abiding the proof or test, or faith verified by trial, cf. James i. 8. In the Old Testament, the proof or trial of faith is frequently compared to the trial of gold by the process of smelting or refining by fire, Job xxiii. 10; Ps. lxxvi. 10; Jer. ix. 7; Zech. xiii. 9; Mal. iii. 2. Gold is the most precious metal, but faith is even more precious; as gold is tried, proved and refined by fire, so faith must be proved and refined by the fire of temptations. As the heat of fire separates dross from gold, so all alloy must be separated from faith, all self-reliance on our own wisdom or strength, all dependence on the help of the creature.—ἀπολλυμ. Think of consumitur annulus usu. [Ignatius, a successor of Peter at Antioch, calls his chains "spiritual pearls." Cyprian, speaking of the dress of virgins, says, that when Christian women suffer martyrdom with faith and courage, then their sufferings are like pretiosas monilia, costly bracelets. See Wordsworth in loco, who notices the following passage from Hermas, Pastor i. 4, p. 440, ed. Dressel: "Aurea pars vos estis; sicut enim per ignem aurum probatur, et utile fit, sic et vos probamini; qui igitur permanserint et probati fuerint, ab eis purgabitur; et sicut aurum emendatur et remittit sordem suam, sic et vos abjicietis omnem tristitiam (δύσιν λυπηδέντες) et emendabimini instructuram turris.—M." ] εἰσεσθῆ already now, since often the enemies of truth are constrained to acknowledge such fidelity of faith, innocence and patience, but more in the last days and in the great day of Christ. Matt. xxv. 28; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Heb. xii. 11; James i. 12; Rev. ii. 8-10.

Unto praise and honour—Jesus Christ.—Εἰς ἔπαινον κ. τ. λ. The reward of grace which the elect shall receive at the return of Christ consists of (a) the praise of their fidelity of faith, cf. Matt. xxv. 21; 1 Cor. iv. 5; Rom. ii. 7. 10; 2 Thess. i. 5; (b) the honour which Christ promises to His faithful servants and shows to them, in fact, by the honourable position to which He promotes them, John xii. 26; cf. 1 Sam. ii. 80; Rev. xxii. 4; iii. 21; (c) of the glory, which the Father has given to Christ, ch. i. 11. 21; Acts iii. 13; and which He will communicate to all that are His, ch. iv. 13; v. 1; iv. 14. τῆς δόξης occur often conjointly in Paul's writings, 1 Tim. i. 17; Rom. ii. 7. 10; Heb. ii. 7. 9. The future glory affecting alike the soul and the body (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 48-49; Phil. iii. 21,) appears as the end of the whole work of redemption, (Rom. ix. 23; 2 Cor. iii. 18; 1 Cor. ii. 7), and therefore as the main object of Christian hope, Rom. v. 2; Col. i. 27. The effulgency of God will hereafter shine out of all believers, because they hold the most intimate communion with the glorified Jesus. The completion of the elect shall also redound to the praise, honour and glory of God Himself, cf. Rev. iv. 11; v. 12. 13. The object is probably not mentioned designedly.—Ev ἐκαστῷ vide v. 5.

Vers. 8. Whom having not seen—full of glory.—For the confirmation of their hope the Apostle after having mentioned the name of Jesus, continues in allusion to John xx. 29: whom although you have not known by face, yet you love. The relation you sustain to Him is that of the heart. The simplest construction of εἰς ὃν is to connect it with ἀγαλλ., in expectation of whom, and because of whom you greatly rejoice. The present and the future are intertwined. χαρὰ δεδοσμένην in contrast with the idle and vain joy of the world, denotes a joy from which are separated all impure and obscuring elements, which according to the explanation of Steinmeyer and Weiss, contains glory in the germ, by which the future glory irradiates already the earthly life of Christians, and which anticipates, as it were, the future glory. Roos: "Joy clothed in glory."

Vers. 9. Receiving the end of your faith, κομιζόμενοι. Living hope regards the future as the present. The word is used of competitors in the games, who, upon proving victorious, carry off presents or prizes.—τὸ τέλος, the end to which competitors in the Christian race aspire, cf. 1 Cor. ix. 24 etc.; 2 Tim. iv. 7. 8; Heb. xii. 1.—The salvation of the soul is the end of faith and the reward of grace, given to the Christian at the completion of the contest, cf. Acts xv. 11; 1 Peter i. 5.

Vers. 10. Of which Salvation—grace that should come unto you.—Connection: This salvation increases in importance and preciousness, if we consider that the prophets did with the utmost eagerness inquire into the means and time of salvation, and that even the happy angels desired to have an insight of this mystery. How happy are we to whom is revealed, what was concealed from them! ἐκζητεῖν, to make most diligent and zealous inquiry into a thing and to regard it from every point of view. ἐξερευνησ—for precious metals in the bowels of the earth. They have searched with a diligence like that displayed in the mining of gold and silver, cf. Job xxviii. 15-19; Prov. iii. 14-18. περὶ τῆς εἰς ὧρας χάριτος. They did prophesy of the saving grace, which by the life, the sufferings and the death of Christ has risen upon a sinful world (the whole world of sinners). This grace is no longer represented to you by various types, but has become real. Cf. John i. 17.

Vers. 11. What, or what manner of time—glory that should follow.—Εἰς τίνα ἢ πόσον καιρὸν. Their inquiries were not only of a general character, how many years would have to elapse to the advent of the Messiah, but had also particular reference to the peculiar condition and characteristics of that time and to the relations of the Jewish people to foreign powers. τὸ ἐν αἰσῶσι πν. Χριστοῦ. The explanation, 'the spirit testifying of Christ,' which is even found in Bengel, is inadmissible on grammatical grounds. Perhaps it may be conceived as follows: The same Spirit of God, the Messianic Spirit, who in the course of time operated in the person of Christ, revealed himself in the prophets; sic Schmid II., de Wette, Weiss. But more simple and natural appears the ancient interpretation, that it was the spirit belonging to the preëxisting Messiah from eternity, and which He was consequently able to impart to the prophets. Thus the preëxisting Messiah is mentioned at 1 Cor. x. 4. 9. Weiss quotes Barnabas (Ep. 5 Hefele patres apost. Opp. ed. 3, 1847), : prophetae ab ipso habentes donum prophetarunt, and Calvin: veteres prophetias a Christo ipso dictatas, cf. v. 20; John xii. 41; Col. i. 17.—τὰ εἰς Χριστὸν πάθη. Sufferings in store for, waiting for Christ.—τὰς μετὰ ταῦτα δόξας, sufferings and glory are thus connected, Luke xxiv. 26; cf. Matt. xvi. 21. It is a treasure of glories, of which Christ has taken possession and which will be fully revealed at the marriage of the Lamb, Rev. xix. 7.

VER. 12. Unto whom—look into. Ἀποκαλ. relates to the communication of things new, and previously unknown, cf. Matt. x. 26; Rom. i. 18; 1 Cor. iii. 18. ὅτι—αὐτὰ. σο. πάθη. κ. δόξ. should be treated as a parenthesis in answer to the question, Why were those things revealed to them, seeing they were not permitted to realize their fulfilment? It was not done for their sake, but for ours; they were thereby to minister unto us.—ἐὺ-εὐαγγελισμένῶν ὑμᾶς, who have evangelized you, brought you the glad tidings. From this it may be inferred that others besides Peter had first preached the Gospel to those Christians, at all events that he was not their only teacher.—ἀποσταλέντι ἀπ' οὐρανό. cf. Luke xxiv. 49; Acts ii. 2, etc.; Gal. iv. 6; John xv. 26. While in the Old Testament we frequently meet with the expression that the Spirit fell on the prophets, Ezek. viii. 1; xi. 5; denoting the suddenness, the passing and overpowering nature of His influence, He is in the New Testament said to be sent.—παρὰ-ἑαυτοῦ properly to stand by and stoop down, in order to examine something very closely, to look at something with the countenance bent down. The salvation, revealed by Jesus Christ, contains a wealth of thoughts and ideas that is unfathomable even to the angels, cf. James i. 25; Eph. iii. 10. Their looking into has already begun and is still continuing. This is indicated by the Aorist. [Wordsworth: This high and holy mystery which represents the angels themselves bending over the Word of God enshrined in the Ark of the Church, was symbolized by the figures of the Cherubim of Glory spreading their wings, and bending their faces, and shadowing the Mercy-seat, in the Holy of Holies, upon the Ark, in which were kept the Tables of the Law written by God (Ex. xxv. 18–22; Heb. ix. 4. 5); and by the side of which was the Pentateuch. Deut. xxxi. 24–26.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

(1). The circumstance that the first person in the Godhead is described as the God and Father of Jesus Christ, points indisputably to a certain dependence of the Being of Christ on the Father, not only with respect to the humanity of our Lord, but, also, with respect to His Divine nature. Thus Christ called the Father His God, even after His resurrection, Jno. x. 17; Rev. iii. 12; ii. 7. With this agree the expressions of the Apostles, Eph. i. 17; Rom. xv. 6; 2 Cor. xi. 81; Col. i. 8. Where the three supreme names are mentioned together, the Father only is called God by emphasis, 1 Pet. i. 1. 2; 2 Cor. xiii. 18; 1 Cor. xii.

4–6; iii. 28; xi. 3; Rev. i. 4–6. Nevertheless, the Scriptures teach us firmly to maintain the true Divinity of Christ, although, the quo modo of such simultaneous equality and dependence of Being transcends our powers of comprehension. The filial relation among men affords, however, an analogy. [Cf. the following section of the Athanasian Creed:—“Sed necessarium est ad eternam Salutem, ut Incarnationem quoque Domini nostri Jesu Christi fideliter credat. Est ergo Fides recta, ut credamus et confiteamur, quia Dominus noster Jesus Christus, Dei Filius, Deus pariter et Homo est. Deus est ex Substantia Patris ante secula genitus: Homo ex Substantia Matris in secula natus. Perfectus Deus, perfectus Homo ex anima rationali et humana carne subsistens. Equalis Patri secundum Divinitatem: Minor Patri secundum Humanitatem. Qui licet Deus sit et Homo, non duo tamen, sed unus est Christus. Unus autem, non conversione Divinitatis in Carnem, sed assumptione Humanitatis in Deum. Unus omnino, non confusione Substantiæ, sed unitate Personæ. Nam sicut Anima rationalis et Caro unus est Homo; ita Deus et Homo unus est Christus.” FIDES CATHOLICA vv. 27–35.—M.]

(2). As corporeal life presupposes birth, so does spiritual life, Jno. iii. 8, and just as man is unable to beget and bring forth himself into physical and earthly life, so his spiritual generation and new-birth are equally independent of himself.

(3). As there are two men in every true Christian, a new man and an old one, so heaviness in manifold temptation and rejoicing may readily co-exist, v. 6.

(4). Our Lord's return has been one of the fundamental articles of the faith of universal Christendom in every age of the Church's history. To hide this important doctrine under a bushel, is at once a defect of teaching and in opposition to the mind of Christ and His apostles, v. 7. It is to be noticed that the return of Christ shall be preceded, not only by several ages, but also, by several ends of ages, with typical final judgments, as St. Paul speaks of τέλη τῶν αἰώνων. The flood, the dispersion of the ten tribes, the judgment on Judah, but especially the destruction of Jerusalem and the conquest of Palestine, were in a certain sense such final judgments, cf. 1 Cor. x. 11.

(5). Verses 10–12, afford us an insight into the mode of prophetic inspiration, and into the relation of the Divine influence and the free mental activity of the prophets. They met, as it were, the Spirit of God with their earnest longings for salvation; the Spirit communicated to them the main burden of prophecy; while the time and details of the beginning of salvation were left to their researches and inquiries. They made a free appropriation of what the Spirit had disclosed to them, and sought to apply it to time and circumstances.

[The Scripture facts on the subject of inspiration are as follows: the subjects of inspiration were permitted to make diligent and faithful research (Luke i. 1–4), to clothe the same thought in different language (cf. Matt. xxvi. 26, 27; Luke xxii. 19. 20; 1 Cor. xi. 24. 25; also Matt. iii. 17; Mk. i. 11; Luke iii. 22), give distinctive colouring to their accounts; according to the circumstances that grouped round their individuality (compare the character and early associations of the four Evangelists, as well as the scope of each Gospel, compare, also, the style of Ezekiel and Isaiah, of John and Paul), to cite other inspired authorities (Ps. cviii. and Ps. lvii. 7-11; Lk. 5-12, etc.), to use uninspired documents (Josh. x. 13; Numb. xxi. 14; Jude ix. 14, 15), they sometimes were uncertain of the precise meaning and application of their message (1 Pet. i. 10-12; Dan. xii. 8, etc.) and their message was delivered in language approved by the Divine Spirit (1 Pet. i. 10. 11; Dan. xii. 8; 2 Tim. iii. 16; Heb. i. 1; 1 Cor. ii. 12. 13), see Angus's Bible Handbook, §§ 146-150, for a brief account of Inspiration. "Inspiration is such an immediate and complete discovery by the Holy Spirit, to the minds of the sacred writers, of those things which could not have otherwise been known, and such an effectual superintendence as to those matters which they might have been informed of by other means—as entirely preserved them from error in every particular, which could in the least affect any of the doctrines or precepts contained in their books." Scott's Essays.—M.]

(6). Since, according to v. 11, the Spirit of Christ wrought in the prophets, the prophetic writings must possess an authority not inferior to the testimony of Christ in the New Testament. Both Testaments contain one and the same principle of revelation, one kernel and centre; but while the Old Testament is only the threshold and fore-testimony of the New Testament, the New Testament is the end and fulfilment of the Old.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Christianity is essentially a life of hope—it is founded on living hope. The eye of faith looks out for the glorious revelation of Jesus Christ from heaven, for the first resurrection, for the heavenly city of peace (Jerusalem), for the precious inheritance, for the new heaven and the new earth.—He that has become conscious of his sinfulness and manifold bondage and has fixed his eye on the heavenly treasure, must needs celebrate the praises of God.—Without regeneration there is no partaking of the heavenly inheritance.—Nothing short of Divine power is sufficient to keep us unto salvation.—The hope of faith is the root out of which grows the fruit of a spiritual joy, serene and triumphant over pain.—When the Christian contemplates the glorious fruit and its consequences, he can rejoice at what most deeply pains the children of this world.

The mystery of afflictions and temptations in believers.—The solution of the riddle lies in their scope—proof, separation from dross, exercise and purification.—The world's joy never comes up to the terms in which its praises are published in speech or in song, while the opposite holds good of Christian joy.—What must be the character of such as desire to be partakers of the kingdom of Christ?—Disparity and similarity in the disposition and situation of believers of the Old and New Testaments.—The sweet harmony of the prophets in their predictions of Christ.—The Holy Ghost the best Teacher.

The words of Jesus and the Apostles a precious key to the right understanding of prophecy.—If the angels greatly desire to look into the mysteries of the plan of salvation, who are represented by the Cherubim on the mercy-seat, how much more highly ought we to prize the knowledge of salvation in Christ!

STARKE:—Would you give the consolation of v. 3-9 for an empire? If the hope be living, the inheritance is sure, viz., the crown that never fades, the treasure that none can steal. Abide the heat. How short is suffering—how long the glittering eternity! Heavenly life God will give above, evermore my heart shall praise Him.

HEDINGER:—Regeneration is solely the work of God all-merciful, who helps the wretched from a spiritual death to spiritual life.—Children and friends inherit our goods; those therefore who desire to receive the heavenly inheritance must be the children and friends of God, Rom viii. 16. 17.—If you find this present time sorrowful and anxious, have patience; in the world you shall have tribulation: look joyfully forward to the last time that shall put an end to all grief, and bring you eternal glory.—God knows best what medicine He has to use for and what burdens He has to lay on each, in order to kill the old Adam.—As gold is the most precious metal, so faith is the most noble of the manifold gifts in the kingdom of grace, and as much passes for faith without being it, so the cross decides its genuineness.—The sum-total of the doctrine of Christ treats of His humiliation and exaltation. For Christ had to drink of the brook and therefore shall He lift up His head, Ps. cx. 7; suffer and enter into glory.—If any be bowed down with grief, let him take comfort from the example of Christ and the words of the Apostle: suffering first, glory after. The reverse takes place among the children of this world, with them joy comes first, and then grief, 2 Tim. ii. 12; Lk. vi. 25.—

KAPFF:—What is genuine faith? 1. A birth out of (emanating from) God; 2. an assurance of what is unseen; 3. an inheritance of eternal life.—LISCO:—Christian hope; (a) its foundation; (b) its object; (c) its power; (d) its glorious reward.—Eternal salvation: (a) it was the object of the longing of the holy prophets; (b) it is made to depend on a certain order; (c) it is announced to all as existing.—The blessedness of Christian hope; (a) it flows from mercy; (b) it is the most precious of all possessions; (c) nothing can pluck it from us. What is the glorious goal which the children of the kingdom go forth to meet? (a) This goal is the heavenly inheritance; (b) it is founded on the mercy of God; (c) the way to it, persevering faith, is not without manifold tribulation; (d) it was the object of the longing of all the saints of old.—The living hope to which we Christians are born again, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; 1. its preciousness in respect of its cause, object and influence; 2. its certainty; (a) the love and faith of the members of Christ; (b) from the declarations of the prophets and evangelists. The Christian's gladness in sadness; 1. because of the life of regeneration; 2. because of his inheritance; 3. because of Divine protection; 4. because of suffering; 5. because of future joy.—STAUDT.

[Vv. 8. 4. 1. The Christian's title to the heavenly inheritance—begotten again; 2. his assurance of it—a lively hope; 3. the immediate cause of both—Jesus Christ. 4. The source—the abundant mercy of God.—A living hope; the world's highest motto is 'dum Spiro Spero,' the Christian may add 'dum ex Spiro Spero!'—Abundant mercy. Great sins and great miseries need great mercy, and many sins and many miseries need many mercies. (Bernard).—Love will stammer rather than be dumb.—v. 5. "Salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks;" what more safe than to be walled with salvation itself? cf. Prov. xviii. 10.—v. 6. The battle tries the soldier, the storm the pilot.—Christian militant—dignum Deo spectaculum.—v. 7. An unskillful beholder may think it strange to see gold thrown into the fire and left there for a time; but he that puts it there, would be loath to lose it; his purpose is to make some costly piece of work of it; every believer gives himself to Christ, and He undertakes to present him blameless unto the Father; not one of them shall be lost, nor one drachm of faith; they shall be found, and their faith shall be found, when He appears. That faith that is here in the furnace, shall be then made up into a crown of pure gold, it shall be found unto praise and honour and glory.—v. 8. The sun seems less than the wheel of a chariot; but reason teaches the philosopher that it is much larger than the whole earth; and the cause why it seems so little is its great distance. The naturally wise man is as far deceived by this carnal reason in his estimate of Jesus Christ, the Sun of righteousness, and the cause is the same, his great distance from Him, cf. Ps. x. 5.—"If I have any possessions, health, credit, learning, this is all the contentment I have of them, that I have somewhat I may despise for Christ, who is totus desiderabilis et totum desiderabile." Greg Nazian. Orat. 1.—There is an inseparable intermixture of love with belief. If you ask, how shall I do to love, I answer, believe. If you ask, how shall I believe? I answer, love.—Joy unspeakable.—It were a poor thing if he that hath it, could tell it all out. (Pauperis est numerare pecus). And when the soul has most of it, then it remains most within itself, and is so inwardly taken up with it that it can then least of all express it. It is with joys, as they say of cares and griefs, loves loquuntur, ingenies stupent. The deepest waters run stillest. True joy is a solid, grave thing (Res severa est verum gaudium. Sen.), dwells more in the heart than in the face; whereas base and false joys are but superficial, skin-deep (as we say); they are all in the face.—Lauda mellis dulcedinem quantum potes, qui non gustaverit, non intelliget.—Aug.—v. 12. The true preachers of the gospel, though their ministerial gifts are for the use of others, yet that salvation they preach, they lay hold on and partake of themselves, as your boxes wherein perfumes are kept for garments and other uses, are themselves perfumed by keeping them! From LEXINGTON by M.]

CHAPTER I. 13-21.

ANALYSIS:—Exhortations to firmness and sobriety, to holiness in mind and conversation, to filial reverence of God,—all founded on love and gratitude for the precious redemption by the blood of Christ.

- 13           <sup>1</sup>Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end 14 for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ; <sup>2</sup>As 15 obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your 16, 17 ignorance: <sup>3</sup>But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner
16, 17 of conversation; <sup>4</sup>Because it is written, Be ye holy; for I am holy. <sup>5</sup>And if ye 18 call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every 18 man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear: <sup>6</sup>Forasmuch as ye know
19 that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain
19 conversation received by tradition from your fathers<sup>7</sup>; But with the precious blood
20 of Christ, as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot: <sup>8</sup>Who verily was fore-20 ordained before the foundation of the world, <sup>9</sup>but was manifest in these last times for 21 you, Who by him do believe in God,<sup>10</sup> that raised him up from the dead, and gave 21 him glory; <sup>11</sup>that your faith and hope might be in God.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 13. Wherefore, Διό refers to all the preceding account of the possession (by grace) of the elect. The New Testament state of grace is mainly designed to beget a perfect hope in the future consummation and perfecting of salvation. This hope essentially facilitates the full use of salvation with a view to holiness, to which exhortation is made in v. 14, etc. In v. 18, hope should be regarded as the central and leading idea, the other exhortations being added as participles. The object of that hope is the grace, which manifests itself in σωτηρία, in perfect salvation. The preposition ἐν does not indicate the ground and strength of hope as Steiger and Weiss maintain, for it is not contrary to the New Testament usus loquendi to connect ἐν with the object, cf. 1 Tim. v. 6; Acts ix. 42; xi. 17; xxii. 19; Winer, 5th edition, p. 241; 1 Jno. iii. 8; 2 Cor. i. 10; Acts xxiv. 15.—Join τελείως not with νήφοντες but with ἐλπίζοντες. The hope existing in its first beginnings shall become so firm, that no suffering shall be able to shake it, and that it shall embrace whatever it contains in itself, and that it shall ever continue to the end. [ita, ut nihil disideretur.—Wahl.—M.]

For the grace—brought to you.—Ἐν τῇν φερόμενῃ ὑμῖν χάριτι. The proper meaning of this expression depends on the interpretation of ἐν ἀποκαλύψει. The verb ἀποκαλύπτειν occurs indeed in a wider sense, to denote the revelation of the truth to the mind, or that of Jesus Christ, Matt. xi. 25; xvi. 17; Lk. x. 21; Gal. i. 16; iii. 28; 1 Cor. ii. 10. Hence ἀποκαλύψας μυστηρίου Rom. xvi. 25; and several times ἀποκαλύψας Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. It is applied to inward revelation as contrasted with human instruction, Gal. i. 12; Rev. i. 1; cf. Eph. i. 17; iii. 8; 2 Cor. xii. 1. But ἡ ἀποκαλύψας Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ without the article, and without further specification, is the constant expression denoting the visible return of Christ. It is never used of His first advent in the flesh, cf. ch. i. 7, iv. 18; v. 1; 2 Thess. i. 7; Rom. viii. 18, 19; 1 Cor. i. 7. Particularly decisive are v. 5 and v. 7, where the reference is evidently to the second advent of Christ in the flesh. So Euseb. Theophylact, Grotius, Carpov, Starke and others. It is difficult to combine both ideas, viz.: an inward and an outward revelation (Calvin, Beza, Bengel), and a clear sense possible only on the consideration that the revelation or advent of Christ to judgment is necessarily both inward and outward. The Apostle sees the advent of Christ as nearly impending, indeed as already present, ch. iv. 7; i. 20, and consequently speaks of grace, not as to be brought unto them hereafter, but as already brought to them [even now bearing down upon them.—M.]. In this sense φέρειν is used in the LXX at Gen. xxxiii. 11. Hence it is unnecessary to assume a confusion of the present and future tenses.—χάρις in the usual sense, not χάρισμα, as Grotius maintains. The objection of Weiss that the general biblical representation makes the second advent of Christ not a second revelation of grace, but a revelation of righteous judgment, ch. iv. 6; Rom. ii. 5, is met by clear passages, e. g. Lk. xxi. 28. To the ungodly it will be a day of terror, but to believers a day of honour and glory. Then, at the appearing of Christ, it will become manifest, what is meant by being in favour (by standing in grace) with God, Mal. iv. 2. It has already been announced to you by the prophets (verse 12) but by Christ it is laid at your door, yea, laid in your bosom.

Gird up—sober.—Ἀναζώσαμενοι—νήφοντες. The perfect hoping is more clearly defined and confirmed by two participial additions. The first exhorts to girding up the loins. Peter thinks doubtless of the words of Jesus, "Let your loins be girded about," Luke. xii. 25 and with a view to avoiding all misunderstanding, adds, "the loins of your mind." Perhaps he alludes also to the significant commandment, "With your loins girded" Ex. xii. 11; and in that case the explanation of the addition is more simple and evident, cf. Jer. i. 17; Eph. vi. 14.—The loins were girded by gathering the long folds of the wide undergarment in a girdle in order to supply the body with a firm stay and to remove all hinderances, when the object was to work, to set out on a journey, to run, to carry a burden, to wrestle or to go to war. So the Christian should gird the διάνοια, gather up all distractedness and fickleness, and be astir and ready, that is, his thoughts and his will should be alive and concentrated when there is a call for work, for fight and for suffering. Beware of distractedness and idleness, but also of irritation, morbid excitement and exaggeration and eccentricity. Sobriety is to be the preventive of the latter. Both the girding and the sobriety are to be taken figuratively, although sobriety of the body is taken for granted. Compare the exhortation at Luke xxi. 34, and Rom. xiii. 14. Elsewhere sobriety is joined with vigilance that shall ward off all sleepiness and indolence, 1 Thess. v. 6; 1 Pet. v. 8; sometimes it occurs, as here, alone, 1 Thess. v. 8; 2 Tim. iv. 5; 1 Pet. iv. 7. [Mentis sobrietas et vigilantia requiritur, sique metaphora in lumborum cinctura prius reposita ἐξηγητικῶς explicatur. Gerhard. 'Non temperantiam solum in cibo et potu commendat, sed spirituales potius sobrietatem, quum sensus omnes nostros continemus, ne se hujus mundi illecebris inebrient.'—Calvin.—M.] The hope of Christians might become mixed up with foolish and fanatical fancies of the glories of a temporal Messianic kingdom and premature expectations of the same as in the case of the Thessalonians (cf. 1 Thess. v. 6, 8; 2 Thess. ii. 2, etc.) against which the Apostle wishes to warn them. The present tense denotes necessary endurance in sobriety, while the Aorists ἐλπίσατε and ἀναζώσαμενοι concentrate the lasting action, as it were into one moment and denote them to depend upon one principal act.

VER. 14. As children of obedience.—Who sets his hopes in grace alone acquires the impulse and ability to fulfil the commandment of holiness. The exhortation proper is contained in v. 15. The contrary of children of obedience, are children of disobedience, in whom the devil is working, Eph. ii. 2; v. 6; Col. iii. 6; who are consequently called children of wrath, Eph. ii. 3; 2 Pet. ii. 14. Obedience comprises here, as in ch. i. 2, both the willing reception of the word of God and subjection to its precepts. Children of light, Eph. v. 8, are such as are born out of light and into light, with the property and calling to shine as lights; so children of faith are such as are born out of faith and into the life of faith and obedience. Our heavenly Father is their beggetter, ch. i. 8. 17, and assurance of faith coupled with obedience their mother, while on the other hand the devil is the father of unbelievers Jno. viii. 44; and evil concupiscence their mother. ὧς denotes the reason, because you are children of obedience, cf. v. 19; ch. ii. 13; iv. 16. [τέκνα ὑπακοῆς. "This phraseology," says Winer, Gram., 6th ed. p. 252, "is to be attributed to the vivid imagination of Orientals, which represents mental and moral derivation or dependence under the form of son or child. Sir. iv. 11. Children of disobedience are those who are related to ἀπειθεῖα as a child to a mother, those in whom disobedience has become predominant and a second nature."—M.]

Not fashioning—ignorance.—The exhortation to holiness is now more clearly defined by reference to their ante-Christian state. As Christians, you dare not pursue a course that is in unison with your former walk in sinful lusts. σχηματίζεσθαι (from σῆμα, the form of a thing, the fashion and mode of life, the manner in which one appears) to form or fashion one's self after something, to conform to it, Rom. xii. 12; to make oneself liketo, cf. ch. viii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 22. Lusts are not sensual impulses and wants only, but desires of what is different from what God allows, desires of evil comprehensively described by John (1 John ii. 16) as the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye and the pride of life; cf. Gal. v. 19 etc. They include, also, the proud aims of ambition, of the lust of power and of the desire of knowledge. The lusts are more clearly defined by 'in your ignorance.' Sin darkens the understanding by the cloud of prejudices and false notions, cf. Rom. i. 21; Eph. iv. 18; and ignorance on the other hand, is the mother of many sins. A hint might be found in the circumstance that the Epistle is addressed to former heathens, who were devoid of all clear moral consciousness, of all definite discrimination between good and evil, between right and wrong; but the Jews also are charged with ignorance as the reason of their rejecting Christ, Acts. iii. 17, etc., and the degree to which their moral consciousness had been confused and clouded by the tenets of the Sanhedrim, is well known. This passage therefore is not decisive. In the case of believers, lusts belong to the past, inasmuch as their power is virtually broken and the spirit has the supremacy, although it must ever contend with the law in their members.

VER. 15. But according to the pattern of that Holy One who hath called you.—What is in the heart must appear in the life. Conform not to your former lusts but aspire after conformity to the Holy God; σχηματίζεσθαι may be understood; so Ecumenius and Theophylact. Calling is closely connected with election, being the realization and assurance of it. It takes place sometimes mediately sometimes immediately; its end is the light and salvation of God out from the darkness, ch. ii. 21. If God calls, it is man's duty to hear and to follow, cf. 1 Sam. iii. 10. Thus he becomes, by constant yielding, a child of obedience. Weiss sees in the reference to the Holy God a hint of the Old Testament character of the Epistle, but this is not conclusive per se. The Aorist Imperative denotes an action that is to take place immediately, cf. Winer, Gram. 6th ed. p. 329.

All manner of conversation, in all your behaviour toward God and your neighbour. [Nulla sit pars vitæ quæ, non hunc bonum sanctitatis odorem redoleat. Calv.—M.]

VER. 16. Because it is written.—ὅτι gives the reason why holiness is necessary. For ἡρώδης, Lachmann and Tischendorf read εὐαγγέλιον. The end and aim of believers is the same in the New Testament and in the Old Testament, although the ways are different. Man's holiness is effected by his participating in the holiness of God in Christ, Heb. xii. 10; Lev. xx. 8.

And if ye call upon as Father Him. If does not denote doubt, but the necessary consequence of the one from the other. [Si non dubitatis est, sed supponentis rem notam. Est enim omnium reatorum communis oratio, Pater noster qui es in cælis. Estius.—M.] You ought not to regard God as your Father nor call upon Him as such in the Lord's Prayer, if you will not walk before Him in holy fear. The exhortation to a holy conversation is parallel to a conversation in the fear of God; both are founded on the filial relation. ἐνκαλιεῖσθε may mean simply to call or to call upon or pray to. Gerhard recognized already a reference to the Lord's Prayer. If you confess before the world in your prayer that God is at once your Father and Judge, then . . . ; cf. ch. i. 14; ii. 2; Matt. v. 45. 48; Luke vi. 35. In the Old Testament God is called the Father of Israel on account of the peculiar covenant-relation, into which He had entered with Israel, Mal. ii. 10; 1. 6; Deut. xxxii. 6; cf. 2 Sam. vii. 14. The Apostle doubtless thinks here of Mal. i. 6 etc. where a similar condition is found, where God's relation of Father and Master is made the reason of an exhortation to reverence, where at v. 8 and 9 the question is twice asked, "Will He regard your persons?" and where ch. ii. 2, the judicial revelation of God is mentioned, cf. ii. 9; x. 12; iii. 5. 18; [S. Barnabas, Ep. 4; "Meditemur timorem Dei, Dominus non accepta personâ judicat mundum; unusquisque secundum quod facit accipiet."—M.]

πρόσωπον λαμβάνειν—פְּנִיָּם לֹא שׂוֹא, Luke xx. 21 is to regard the person, to take cognizance of outward relations, to make injurious distinction between rich and poor, the talented and the untalented, high and low, citizens and strangers, James ii. 4. God judges very differently; He looks at the heart and the character of men and at their exhibition in deeds. Justification at the last judgment depends upon the inward state and the outward works of believers and unbelievers. So taught our Lord Himself, Matt. xvi. 27; vii. 19; xxv. 81 etc.; and with this agree John, Rev. xxii. 12; 7.: iii. 11; John ch. viii. 51; cf. ch. xiii. 15; James, ch. ii. 13 etc.; Peter, 1 Peter ii. 12 and Paul, Rom. ii. 6 etc.; viii. 13; 2 Cor. v. 10; Eph. vi. 8; Col. iii. 24. 25; Gal. vi. 7-9. The Scriptures uniformly teach that forgiving grace is not conditioned by any work; it is absolutely free and unmerited and presupposes nothing beyond a penitent mind and an appropriating of the righteousness of Christ; but it insists upon a life corresponding with the will of God, and even supplies the needed strength to lead it. Faith must work by love, Gal. v. 6. It is the living root of all good works, while unbelief is the father of every sin. God looks upon the life of a man as one connected work. Hence we have here the singular ἔργον as at Matt. xvi. 27 πράξις; for God looks at the one source of all our work, on our relation to the truth revealed in our conscience and in His word. But since all rational creatures ought to know the perfect justice of His decision, He judges them according to their works and here all mankind fall into only two classes. There is no inconsistency between this passage and John v. 22, where it is said that the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son [for, as Didymus says, the Father is the fons iudicii, iudicante filio Pater est qui iudicat.—M.], just as the creation of the world is ascribed to the Father, although mediated by the Son, John i. 1 etc.; cf. 1 Peter iii. 12, 22; iv. 5; v. 4; 2 Peter ii. 9. [John v. 22 clearly implies that He who has delegated the judgment to the Son is the Judge.—M.]

In fear.—This does by no means militate, as Weiss maintains, against the Petrine and Johannine fundamental conceptions of the Christian life, as expressed Rom. viii. 15; 2 Tim. i. 7; 1 John iv. 18. These passages speak of a slavish fear which in believers makes room to filial love; filial fear and dread remains also in the children of God, while they continue in a state of imperfection; it flows from the contrast between themselves and God, from their dependence on Him and their remembrance of His holiness and justice, from the possibility of a relapse, cf. Phil. ii. 12, and mostly exhibits itself as a holy fear to grieve His love, to displease Him and to provoke His disfavour. Calvin: "Fear is here opposed to security," cf. Rom. xi. 20; 2 Cor. vii. 1; 2 Peter iii. 17; Ps. xxxiv. 10; xix. 10.—A reason of fear is also contained in the additional clause: "the time of your sojourning," while you tarry here below among strangers. You are not yet at home, but only on the way; like seafaring men you may possibly be cast on a strange coast. At all events you must fight your way through the world's hatred. John xv. 19.

[Wordsworth: Here is a connected series of arguments and motives to holiness, derived from a consideration,

1. Of the holy nature of Him whom we invoke as Father, whose children we are, whom therefore we are bound to imitate and to obey.

2. Of His office as Judge, rewarding every man according to his work, whom therefore we ought to fear.

3. Of Christ's office as Redeemer, and of His nature as an all-holy Redeemer, paying the costly price of His own blood to ransom us from a state of unholiness, and purchasing us to Himself, with His blood. Therefore we are not our own, but His; and being His, bought by His blood, we owe Him, who is the Holy One, the service of love and holiness. Cf. 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20; Eph. i. 7, 14; and Clem. Rom. i. 7. ἀντιδωμεν εἰς τὸ αἷμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, καὶ ἴδωμεν ὡς ἐσσι. τίμιον τῷ Θεῷ κατὰ αὐτοῦ εἶναι διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν σωτηρίαν ἐκχρῆν. cf. 8. Aug. Serm. 86.

4. Of our transitory condition in this life. On the special allusion in παροιμία, sojourning see ch. ii. 11.

5. Of the gift of the spirit of holiness.

6. Of our new birth by the living Word of God.—M.]

VER. 18. FORASMUCH AS YE KNOW.—The consideration of the inestimable benefit of salvation supplies a new argument for aspiration to holiness of mind and conversation, v. v. 18, 19. Bede gives the right connection. "In proportion to the price at which you have been redeemed from the corruption of carnal life should be your fear not to grieve your Saviour's heart by a relapse, for the punishments will correspond to the worth of the ransom." This knowledge is the knowledge of faith, flowing from the fundamental consciousness of Christians, cf. ch. iii. 9; v. 9; James i. 8.

Redeemed.—λυτρωὶν denotes not any release or deliverance, but to release by payment of a corresponding ransom. It corresponds to the

2; lxxvii. 16; cvi. 10; Deut. vii. 8; ix. 26; Jer. xv. 21; xxxi. 11. So Christ says that He was giving His life as a ransom for many, Matt xx. 28; cf. Mark x. 45; 1 Tim. ii. 6; Titus ii. 14. The comparison of the blood of Christ with gold and silver proves that the word must be taken in its original sense. ἐξαγοράζειν is used in the same sense at Gal. iii. 18; 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23; Rev. v. 9. The manner in which the redemption has been effected, is therefore the production and payment of an equivalent, viz.: the satisfaction, the substitution, cf. Eph. v. 2; i. 7; Rom. iii. 24; Heb. ix. 15.—Who received the ransom? Not the devil as maintained by some, but the Supreme Lawgiver and Judge. The justice of God, outraged by sin, was satisfied—the satisfaction itself, however, being appointed by the love of God Himself; allusions to which are even found in the sacrifices of the Old Testament, Lev. xvii. 11. Because this last passage states that the soul of the flesh is in the blood and that it is the blood which maketh atonement by the soul, cf. v. 14; blood is designated as the means of atonement both here and Rom. iii. 24, 25; v. 8, 9; while elsewhere the soul, the life of Christ is said to have been given. Blood has atoning virtue, for "without shedding of blood is no remission," Heb. ix. 22. Redemption relates therefore primarily to the curse and guilt of sin and secondarily to its enslaving power. The two ideas are not very sharply separated in Holy Writ, cf. ch. ii. 24; Is. liii. 7. It is most dear, most precious blood because it is undefiled by sin and passion and because it is the blood of the God-man and more valuable by far than the blood of many thousand valiant warriors. The addition v. 19, ὡς ἂν νοῦν ἀνθρώπου καὶ ἀσπίδου, etc., confirms our explanation. ὡς indicates a well-known reason and refers to Is. liii. While in Isaiah the figure of the Lamb denotes immediately only the patient, silent suffering of the Messiah in His atoning death, the predicates used by the Apostle, clearly relate to sacrificial lambs, and particularly to the Paschal Lamb, cf. John i. 29, 36. Every sacrificial lamb had to be without blemish, Lev. iv. 32; iii. 6; xii. 20 etc.;

i. 10; xii. 6; xiv. 10; Numb. xxviii. 3. 11; Ex. xii. 5. Christ as the Spiritual Sacrificial Lamb (1 Cor. v. 7; John xix. 36) was perfectly pure within and unstained by sin without, as Bengel rightly explains. "In se non habet labem, neque extrinsecus maculam contraxit." Cf. 1 John iii. 5; 2 Cor. v. 21; Heb. vii. 26; Eph. v. 27. From what are the children of God redeemed?

From your vain conversation, inherited from your fathers. [So the German.—M.] This describes the being of this world as untrue, as having its root in appearances, and as devoid of all foundation, strength and vitality, cf. Rom. i. 21; Eph. iv. 17; 1 Cor. iii. 20; 2 Peter ii. 18; Rom. viii. 20. Its main stay and support lies in the force of habits, ideas, views, principles and maxims transmitted from father to child through successive generations. Men justify their ways, saying, 'Such was the practice of our fathers and our forefathers,' and continue in the bonds of error and sinful lusts. Calov. explains παροπαράδοτον of original sin and of imitating paternal examples. The deep-rootedness of this vain conversation notwithstanding, deliverance and redemption from it is found in the death and blood of Jesus Christ. The Apostle does not specify how the atonement of Christ effects redemption from the power of sin; we may doubtless supply this solution (cf. 1 Peter ii. 24) thus: having been redeemed from the curse of the law by the blood of Jesus, we are enabled to be cleansed from sin, to be united to God and to approach Him with joy and courage. The Holy Spirit's power is present to deliver us from the dominion of sin.—Χριστοῦ, an explanatory addition serving as a transition to what follows.

V. 20. The personality and work of Christ were neither the natural result of the world's development nor the suddenly formed decree of God in time [as distinguished from eternity, M.], as if after the lapse of four thousand years He had suddenly thought of contriving this way of salvation, but Christ was destined and ordained from before the foundation of the world to redeem us by His blood; hence the prophets did foretell His life and sufferings, His death and glorious exaltation, vv. 11. 12. The antithesis φανερωθέντος does not warrant the positive conclusion that the Apostle thinks of the real (opposed to ideal) preexistence of Christ. The sense might be as follows: The Messiah having ideally existed in the Spirit of God, in the fullness of time became also really manifest. But reverting to v. 11, where mention is made of the Spirit of Christ in the prophets, and considering that correctly speaking the φανερῶν, is the manifestation of a previously hidden existence, and that while believers are said to have been fore-ordained it is never affirmed that they were manifested, we feel inclined to agree with Lutz and Schumann that the real preexistence of Christ is probably presupposed here; φανερῶν, however, relates also to the continuing manifestation of Christ by the preaching of the Gospel.

Before the foundation of the World.—καταβολή, the act of καταβάλλεσθαι denotes laying something down, laying the foundation; applied to the foundations of the earth (Job xxxviii. 6; Prov. viii. 29)=founding, creation, cf. John xvii. 24; Eph. i. 4; 1 Cor. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 9; Tit. i. 2. 3; Col. i. 26. The remark of Oettinger that the creation of the world is called καταβολή because the Visible originated from the Invisible by a fall, is ingenious, but far-fetched and untenable. He maintains that the word signifies casting off. 'Εν ἐσχάτων τῶν χρόνων; Tischendorf and Lachmann read ἐσχάτων. Χρόνοι periods of time shorter than aeons. The καίροι are definite portions of those periods. They are called, Acts ii. 17; 2 Tim. iii. 1, the last days. They form, since they have a similar character, a unit, and are called on that account the last hour, 1 John ii. 18, or the last time, Jude 18. It would seem to signify therefore the period from the glorification of Christ to His first visible advent [vulgo, his second advent, M.] cf. v. 5; but ἐν may also mean, "near at hand," a sense in which it may be shown to be used at least with local reference.—Ἐσχάτων to be taken as neuter on account of the succeeding Article.

For you who.—Believers are the end and aim in the manifestation of the Redeemer: you may therefore view it, as if Christ had come for you only, cf. 1 Cor. ii. 7. The design of His manifestation was to make you also believers. You owe it to Him that you are able to believe (δι' αὐτοῦ). Weiss gives the following connection: The manifestation of Christ effected by means of the preaching of the Gospel (ch. i. 12) and culminating in His resurrection and exaltation to glory, begets believing trust in God, who did work this miracle of miracles. He that has done such great things is also able (humanly speaking) to accomplish the greatest and highest expectations we can cherish. Thus faith becomes hope in God, who has done this miracle. Hope appears here as a new feature superadded to faith, cf. Rom. v. 2; Eph. i. 18. [Your faith rests on Christ's resurrection—it was God who raised him; your hope on Christ's glorification; it is God who has given him that glory. Alford.—M.] Εἰς Θεόν signifies resting in, entering into God. Petr. Lomb. Credendo in Deum ire.—ἵνα denotes sequence not purpose. The exhortation here reverts once more to v. 12, with this difference, that what there is urged, is here supposed to exist.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The disciple of Jesus must intimately combine with confident repose in the grace of atonement, the desire after the pattern of God to become holy and to walk in holiness before Him, v. 13-15.

2. The state of Christians is marked by the singular characteristic that they must become what they are: born into lively hope, they have to learn daily to hope anew. They stand in faith and love, v. 5. 8, yet must ever suffer themselves to be anew excited thereto, v. 13. They are dead with Christ, Col. iii. 3, yet must daily mortify anew their sinful members, Col. iii. 5, etc. The riddle is solved by distinguishing between what we are in the eternal view of God and what in empirical reality, or between what we are in the new principle of life and what in its gradual development. That which is implanted in the idea and in the germ must be followed by a voluntary and all-sided development. [This sentence may have a misty air to some, but I found it difficult to give the sense of the original without a long circumlocution. Light is shed upon it by the consideration that idea is not used in the popular, but in the philosophical sense. It appears to come nearer to ideal than to idea proper.—M.] By the side of the new man there continues, until we die, the old man who must be crucified day by day.

3. All exhortation to holiness of mind and conversation will prove ineffectual and unsuccessful, unless the firm foundation of it lies in confidence in the grace of God that meets us half-way in Christ, v. 13. The hope to which that confidence gives rise, namely, the hope of the glorious possession of heaven, supplies the power of victory in view of the temptations and enjoyments of this earthly world.

4. The agreement of the Old and New Testaments is evident from the circumstance that holiness after the pattern of God is in both the chief requirement and end of our vocation. Compare the Sermon on the Mount. The only difference being that the idea of holiness in the New Testament is more profound and spiritual than in the Old.

5. Justification at the last judgment will depend on our works; our works, whether flowing from faith or unbelief, will determine our respective destiny, v. 17; cf. Rom. ii. 13. 6. 7; Matt. xxv. 34; Rev. xx. 12; 2 Cor. ix. 6.

6. The blood of Jesus Christ is not the same as His death. Elsewhere also it is specially emphasised as the means of redemption, the ransom, Rom. iii. 25; v. 9; 1 John v. 6; Heb. x. 29; ix. 22; xiii. 20; Acts xx. 28; Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 20; 1 John i. 7; Rev. i. 5; v. 9; vii. 14; xii. 11. God's law for the government of the world having been broken by sin, the blood of the holy God-Man is needed as an atonement, v. 19.

7. The resurrection of Jesus Christ is the seal set to the atoning virtue of His blood and at the same time the pledge of the perfecting of those, who as members of His body are united to Him, the head.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The tightened girdle of faith is a main essential to the pilgrim passing through the world to heaven.—The loins serve the purposes of walking, warring and carrying; the powers of the soul corresponding to these purposes have need to be strengthened.—“The Christian in the heavenly race, Must firmly set and keep his face, Fixed on Jerusalem.”—TERSTEEGEN. The blissful end of Christian hope, v. 18.—The grace offered by Christ is the solid foundation for the soul's anchor to rest upon.—True faith is not an idle dream nor hollow talk.—The features of the regenerate exhibit the impress of their heavenly Father's image.—Spiritual blindness both the consequence and cause of the dominion of sinful lusts, v. 14.—Fear of self-deception, relapse and new offences against God is the sure guardian of our hope.—How do we recognize the time of our visitation?—What glorious hopes flow from the glory which Christ has obtained from His Father? STARK. Would you be God's child, you must imitate Him, Eph. v. 1.—v. 17. What a great alliance! a bought slave, preferred to the distingtion of an adopted child, it is to be hoped, will not complain of having to render to his Redeemer a reasonable and joyful service, after his former experience of the rudder and the whip.—If you meet with some adversity, think yourself for a night in uncomfortable quarters, you will have better accommodation when you get home.—You are greatly in error, and abuse the Gospel, if you consider all manner of vain conversation to belong to Christian liberty. In the work of salvation, redemption as the cause of salvation cannot be dissociated from the condition annexed to it, which is the renunciation of every evil work—the two, redemption and renunciation should go hand-in-hand, Luke i. 74. 75.—We are bound to honour, love and obey our parents and ancestors, but not to follow them in the vanity of conversation and sinful habits, Eph. vi. 1. 2; Matt. x. 37. Beware to form too low an opinion of any man, and still more to injure his soul's welfare, for every one has been redeemed by the inestimable price of the blood of Jesus.—If the atoning blood of Jesus is to benefit us, we must also carry the innocence, gentleness and patience of the Lamb of God, Col. i. 22.—Who, after the Apostle's doctrine preaches another Gospel is not of God, but of the devil, and he is by no means to be heard, Gal i. 8.

LISCO:—Motives to zeal for holiness: (a) the grace offered to Christians; (b) the blessedness of their filial relation to God; (c) the redemption effected by Jesus Christ.—The real character of Christ's redeemed people: (a) they are full of faith in God and Jesus Christ; (b) earnestly struggling with sin they strive after holiness; (c) they walk in righteousness and obedience to the commandments of God; (d) they abound in zeal to do good and are rich in faithful love of the brethren.—How the preciousness and assurance of our hope founded on the resurrection of Christ should influence our whole behaviour. The value of the blood of Christ: (1) what makes it invaluable: (a) the holiness of Him who shed it; (b) the glory of the work accomplished by it; (2) what is the evidence of our appreciation of the value of it.

BESSEB, in illustration of v. 19, supplies the following narrative: A wealthy and kind Englishman once bought in the slave-market a poor negro for twenty pieces of gold. His benefactor presented him moreover with a certain sum of money, that he might buy therewith a piece of land and furnish himself with a home. Am I really free? May I go whither I will? cried the negro in the joy of his heart; well, let me be your slave, Massa: you have redeemed me, and I owe all to you. This touched the gentleman to the quick: he took the negro into his service, and he never had a more faithful servant. But, said that Englishman, I ought to learn a lesson from my grateful servant, which until then, alas, had little engaged my attention, namely, what is meant by the words: “Ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold—but with the precious blood of Christ.”

[VER. 13. Grace is bearing down upon, coming to meet the Christian who with girded loins sets out on his pilgrimage. The prodigal son was met by his Father.—M.] Faith establishes the heart on Jesus Christ, and hope lifts it up, being on that rock, over the head of all intervening dangers, crosses and temptations, and sees the glory and happiness that follow after them.—Gather up your affections, that they hang not down to hinder you in your race and so in your hopes of obtaining; and do not only gather them up, but tie them up, that they fall not down again, or if they do, be sure to gird them straiter than before.—We walk through a world where there is much mire of sinful pollutions and therefore cannot but defile them; and the crowd we are among will be ready to tread on them, yea our own feet may be entangled in them and so make us stumble and possibly fall.

LEIGHTON:—VER. 14. The soul of man unconverted is no other but a den of impure lusts, wherein dwell pride, uncleanness, avarice, malice, etc. Just as Babylon is described Rev. xviii. 2; or as Is. xiii. 21. Were a man's eyes opened he would as much abhor to remain with himself in that condition, "as to dwell in a house full of snakes and serpents," as St. Austin says. As the offices of certain persons are known by the garb or livery they wear, so transgressors: where we see the world's livery we see the world's servants; they fashion or habit themselves according to their lusts; and we may guess that they have a worldly mind by their conformity to worldly fashions.

CLARKE:—Obedience to God is as much the mark of right knowledge, as a sinful life is the sure sign of ignorance of God.

VER. 15. Summa religionis est imitari quem colis (In LEIGHTON).—CLARKE:—Heathenism scarcely produced a god whose example was not the most abominable; their greatest gods, especially, were paragons of impurity; none of their philosophers could propose the objects of their adoration, as objects of imitation.

LEIGHTON:—VER. 17. This fear is not cowardice, it doth not debase, but elevate the mind, for it drowns all lower fears, and begets true fortitude and courage to encounter all danger for the sake of a good conscience and the obeying of God. The righteous is as bold as a lion, Prov. xxviii. 1. He dares do any thing but offend God: and to dare to do that is the greatest folly, and weakness, and baseness in the world. From this fear have sprung all the generous resolutions and patient sufferings of the saints and martyrs of God; because they durst not sin against Him, therefore they durst be imprisoned, and impoverished and tortured, and die for Him. Thus the prophet sets carnal and godly fear as opposite, and the one as expelling the other, Is. viii. 12. 18. And our Saviour, Lk. xii. 4, "Fear not them which kill the body, but fear him which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you fear Him." Fear not, but fear, and therefore fear, that you may not fear.—He made all the persons and he makes all those differences Himself, as it pleaseth Him; therefore He doth not admire them as we do; no, nor at all regard them: we find very great odds betwixt stately palaces and poor cottages, betwixt a prince's robes and a beggar's cloak; but to God they are all one, all these petty grievances vanish in comparison of His own greatness; men are great and small compared one with another; but they all amount to just nothing in respect of Him; we find high mountains and low valleys on this earth, but compared with the vast compass of the heavens, it is all but as a point, and hath no sensible greatness at all.

[Our sojourn on earth is a state of probation, from which the fear of God is inseparable.—M.]

VER. 18. The doctors of the synagogue had delivered traditions to the Jews which made the worship of God vain, Matt. xv. 9; and the Gentiles sought to justify their vain idolatry on the plea of tradition, saying (on the authority of Plato, Tim. p. 1053 E. and Cicero, de Nat. Deor. 3, n. 3. 6.) That they "were not to be moved, by any persuasions, from the religion which they had received from their forefathers."—M.]

VER. 19. "All glory be to Thee, almighty God, our heavenly Father, for that Thou, of Thy tender mercy, didst give Thine only Son Jesus Christ to suffer death upon the cross for our redemption; who made there (by His one oblation of Himself once offered) a full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world." Book of Common Prayer, Communion Office.—M.]

VER. 20. The Jews say, that "When God created the world, He held forth His hand under the throne of glory, and created the soul of the Messiah and His company, and said to Him, Wilt thou heal and redeem my sons, after six thousand years? He answered, Yes. God said to Him, If so, wilt thou bear chastisements, to expiate their iniquity, according to what is written, (Is. liii. 4) 'Surely, He bore our griefs?' He answered, I will endure them with joy." And to this representation of this covenant made with the Messiah "before the creation of the world" it may be the Apostle here refers. In the style of Philo, he is ἁίδιος λόγος, "the Eternal Word, the first born and the most ancient Son of the Father, by whom all the species were framed." This therefore is according to the received opinion of the Jews. Whitby citing Cartw. Mellif. l. p. 2974, 75, and De Plaut. Noe, p. 169, D.—M.]

LEIGHTON:—VER. 21. When you look through a red glass, the whole heavens seem bloody; but through pure unclouded glass, you receive the clear light, that is so refreshing and comfortable to behold. When sin unpardoned is betwixt, and we look on God through that, we can perceive nothing but anger and enmity, in His countenance; but make Christ once the medium, our pure Redeemer, and through Him, as clear transparent glass, the beams of God's favourable countenance shine in upon the soul; the Father cannot look upon his well beloved Son, but graciously and pleasingly.

CHAPTER I. 22-25.

ANALYSIS:—Exhortation to pure and fervent brotherly love, as characteristic of those who have been born to love by the life-seed of the eternal word.

- 22 Seeing ye have purified<sup>1</sup> your souls in obeying<sup>2</sup> the truth through the Spirit<sup>3</sup> unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with<sup>4</sup> a pure heart fervently:<sup>5</sup>
 23 Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, 24 which liveth and abideth for ever.<sup>6</sup> For all flesh<sup>7</sup> is as grass, and all the glory of man<sup>8</sup> as the flower of grass.<sup>9</sup> The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth
 25 away: But the word of the Lord endureth forever. And this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you.

Verse 22. [ἡγνίζετε, having purified; castificantes, Vulg., making chaste, Wiclif.—M.]

[ἐπακοῇ—in obedience of, Germ.—M.]

[ἐκ πνεύματος omitted in A B C. Cod. Sin., inserted in Rec. K. L.—M.]

[ἐκ—by, nor through, see v. 35.—M.]

[ἐκ καθαρῶς. ἐκ, out of, from, Germ.; omitted in A B, inserted in Rec. C. K. L.—M.]

Verse 23. [ἐκτενέως—intense.—M.]

[ζῶντος Θεοῦ καὶ μένοντος—by the word of God living and enduring.—M.]

[Cod. Sin. omittit eis τὸν αἰῶνα.—M.]

Verse 24. [ἐκ—because.—M.]

[ἐκ θρόνου in Rec. for ἀβύσσου. If the latter reading is preferred, we must render "and all the glory of it," i.e. of flesh. So Wiclif and Reims.—M.]

[ἐξ ἡρώδου, ἐξ ἡρώδου, aorists, statement as in a narrative; viz.: the grass hath withered and the flower thereof is fallen away; Wiclif and Reims: Exaruit fenum et flos ejus decidit. Vulgate. German.—M.]

[Cod. Sin. ὁσι. (*improb.)—ἐξ ἡρώδου.—ἐξ ἡρώδου.—ἐξ ἡρώδου.—Without αὐτοῦ.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 22. Connection. The exhortation (v. 18) "Hope perfectly for the grace," fully corresponds to the second leading exhortation, "Love one another fervently." The former was founded (in a participial sentence) on the concentration of thoughts and constant sobriety; the latter is founded (also in a participial sentence) on purifying the soul in obedience of the truth. Brotherly love must be the exponent of the nature, strength and fruit of regeneration.

Purified.—Ἀγνίζεν denotes the laying aside of evil, the putting off lust, hatred, envy and hypocrisy; ἀγιάζειν, on the other hand, the positive putting on the opposite good and growing therein, cf. ch. ii. 1. The Perfect shows that the purifying does not belong exclusively to the past but is affected by the imperative form ἀγαπάτε. [The German reads so (instead of ἀγαπάτε) on the authority of the Codex Colbertinus Cent. XI.—M.], and indicates that such pure love cannot exist without the antecedent purifying of the soul. The Apostle means a constantly needed purifying, not one merely begun in regeneration. Augustine: "Chastity of the soul consists in sincerity of faith and purifying the heart from unchaste flames."

In obedience of the truth.—By absolute subjection to the truth given in the word of God, by keeping it and causing it to work in the heart. Obedience to the faith and moral obedience are again comprised in one. Truth has a purifying and separating power, removing all obstacles to the exercise of brotherly love, such as selfishness, obstinacy, self-sufficiency, men-pleasing, ambition, flattery, in fact, all manifestations of egotism. Because true believers are the children of God, ch. i. 8. 14. 17, they should act as brethren one to another. This is one of the principal commandments of Christ Himself, and consequently one of the main ends of holiness, Matt. xxii. 40; Mk. xii. 31; Luke x. 28; Jno. xiii. 34. 35; cf. 1 Pet. ii. 17; v. 9. But because selfishness, deceit, hypocrisy and flattery are frequently hidden under the cloak of love, the word ἀνυπόκριτος is added.

By the spirit, is wanting in several MSS. If, as is probable, authentic, it should be joined to ἡγνίζετε not to ἐπακοῇ. It denotes the Holy Spirit, by whom alone the soul can be purified, Acts xv. 8. 9; Rom. viii. 13; 1 Cor. xii. 8; Eph. v. 9. πνεύματος is also without the article in ch. i. 2.

Unfeigned love of the brethren.—Brotherly love being thus rendered possible, its free and actual exhibition ought to follow. There being two kinds of love, pure and impure, heavenly and earthly, the Apostle expressly adds, "out of a pure heart." Lachman strikes καθαρῶς out of the text. Purity of heart is equally demanded in other passages, Matt. v. 8; 1 Tim. i. 6; 2 Tim. ii. 22. Bengel nicely remarks that purifying qualities, as antecedents to brotherly love, are also insisted upon at 2 Peter i. 5. 6.

ἐκτενέως is a very pregnant addition. It denotes stretching out, straining, putting forth strenuous effort, hence (a) by straining and extending every energy, by untiring elasticity, (b) by sustained perseverance, (c) by extending it to such brethren as appear less worthy of love. Weiss: "With lasting, persevering energy, that cannot be tired out by the cumulating guilt of our neighbour," ch. iv. 8. The possibility of such a mode of conduct belongs to the state of regeneration, v. 23; cf. Matt. xviii. 21. 22; see above on v. 8. Steiger. "As natural relationship produces natural affection, so spiritual relationship produces spiritual affection." It is lasting, because emanating from an eternal source of life.

VER. 28. Of (out of) incorruptible sowing. σπορά denotes begetting, sowing, not seed, as many translate, cf. John i. 13. Regeneration is not the effect of a transient act of begetting, but of the power of the Holy Ghost. The means He uses is the word of God, Jas. i. 18; 1 Cor. iv. 15. Paul laying claim in the latter passage to the new birth or new-begetting of the Corinthians means nothing beyond his having been an instrument of the Holy Ghost. [The full idea is brought out by noticing the force of the prepositions ἐξ and διὰ. The Apostle says, "Being born again, not of"—ἐξ, that is, out of—"corruptible seed" (like semen humanum), but out of "incorruptible begetting"—διὰ—"by means of the word of God." "The ἐξ of origination rests in God himself, the Father, who begat us, of His own will: the διὰ of instrumentality moves on and abides forever." Alford.—M.]

By means of the word of God living and abiding forever.—ζῶντος καὶ μένοντος belong to λόγῳ, as is evident from the sequel, v. 25. The Apostle does not speak of the Being of God, but of the nature of the word of God. It is living, cf. Heb. iv. 12, because it has life in itself, is indued with eternal, with divine power and therefore begets life in its turn, cf. Acts vii. 38. Luther: "If I put the cup, containing the wine, to my lips, I drink the wine without swallowing the cup. Such also is the word, which brings the voice; it sinks into the heart and becomes alive, while the voice remains without and passes away. It is therefore a Divine power, yea, it is God himself, cf. Ex. iv. 11." It is able to kill, Rom. vii. 10, and to make alive.—Μένοντος ἐπὶ τὸν αἰῶνα. (The last three words are wanting in important MSS. and therefore omitted by Griesbach and others). It remains forever in its nature, power and effects. [Dean Jackson on the Creed, book 7, ch. 28, vol. 7, p. 270: "If Christ's flesh and blood be the seed of Immortality, how are we said to be born again by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever? Is this Word, by which we are born, the same with that immortal seed, of which we are born? It is the same, not in nature, but in person. May we not, in that speech of St. Peter, by the Word, understand the word preached unto us by the Ministers who are God's seedsmen? In a secondary sense we may, for we are begotten and born again by preaching, as by the instrument or means. Yet born again we are by the Eternal Word (that is, by Christ Himself), as by the proper and efficient cause of our new birth. . . And Christ Himself, who was put to death for our sins, and raised again for our justification, is the Word which we all do or ought to preach. The Son of God manifested in the flesh, was that Word which, in St. Peter's language, is preached by the Gospel, and if we do not preach this Word unto our hearers, if all our sermons do not tend to one of these two ends, either to instruct our auditors in the articles of their creed concerning Christ, or to prepare their ears and hearts that they may be fit auditors of such instructions, we do not preach the Gospel unto them, we take upon us the name of God's ambassadors, or of the ministers of the Gospel, in vain."—M.]

[A Lapid: "This sense is a genuine and sublime one, because in our Regeneration, Christ Himself is personally communicated to us, so that the Deity thenceforth dwells in us as in a Temple, and we are made partakers of the Divine Nature, 2 Pet. i. 4." See James i. 18-21.—M.]

VER. 24. διότι introduces the proof of the difference between corruptible begetting and incorruptible. The begetting is like the instrument of begetting. The words quoted by Peter are found Is. xl. 7, etc.; his citation is free, not literal. Flesh signifies here the whole living world, inasmuch as it is under the power of transitoriness and surrounded by weakness. Bengel: "The old man, man of the old birth, especially self-righteousness, on which man is wont to found his confidence." Calvin: "Whatever is highly esteemed in things human, beauty, bodily strength, learning, riches, posts of honour." It includes also the life of the natural mind, as long as it remains unoccupied and without the animation of the Spirit of God. Hence the Scripture speaks of fleshly-mindedness, Rom. viii. 5-7, and reckons also hatred, anger and pride among the works of the flesh, 1 Cor. iii. 8; Gal. v. 19; Eph. ii. 3; Col. ii. 18. The flesh as well as the spirit, has its glory and flower. It appears robed in the forms of beauty, wisdom, nobleness, patriotism and even of holiness. It develops itself in forms of government, in art and science, in philosophical systems and theories of religion, so far as they are not penetrated by the Spirit of God. Hence they vanish as fast as they grow, yea faster—like the flower of grass (Griesbach and others read αὐτῆς after δόξα. See Appar. Crit. above), whose leaves fall asunder, cf. Pa. ciii. 15; xxxvii. 2; James i. 10; Is. xl. 6. 7. Peter refers to the last passage as given by the LXX., where the past tense is used, which describes with graphic effect the rapidity of the change.

VER. 25. But the word of the Lord endureth forever, ever green and in vigour of life; it is continually valid and efficient, enduring to eternity, and so is whatever emanates from or originates in it, cf. Ps. cxix. 89; Luke xxi. 33. Luther: "You need not open your eyes wide how you may get to the word of God; it is before your eyes, it is the word which we preach." Deut. xxx. 11; Rom. x. 6, etc. The word of the Gospel preached to Christians is essentially one with the kernel of the word of the Old Testament, cf. Rom. xvi. 26; Eph. ii. 20; iii. 5.—ἐπὶ ἡμῶς, it has been brought unto you and implanted in you. The circumstance of Peter taking for granted that his readers are familiar with the word of the Old Testament, furnishes a hint that he writes to Jewish Christians. [Wordsworth: The transition from the Incarnate Word to the spoken and written word, and vice versa, is, as might be anticipated, of not unfrequent occurrence in Holy Writ: see Heb. iv. 12; James i. 18-23.—Observe, also, that St. Peter here returns to the principal person, Christ, and speaks of Him, who is the Living Word, as being also the Living Stone, ii 4.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1 The necessity of purifying the soul was recognized even in the systems of the philosophers, e. g., in the Platonic and Neoplatonic schools; but the only means of accomplishing it was unknown to them: subjection to revealed truth, appropriating and practising it.

2. Purification must begin and without interruption continue in the soul, the stronghold and seat of sin.

3. Essential unity of the message of salvation in the Old and New Testaments, v. 25.

4. Regeneration or new-birth, the first implanting into the new, spiritual life, must be distinguished from quickening and conversion. The Scripture clearly teaches that regeneration takes place through Baptism by means of the word and through the Spirit who animates it, John iii. 5; Tit. iii. 5; Rom. vi. 8; Gal. iii. 26. 27; Eph. v. 25-27; 1 Peter iii. 21. Compare the lucid exposition of Kurz in Christ. Religion (Christliche Religionslehre) p. 196. 197, 5th ed.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Incorruptible sowing or generation yields incorruptible fruit, a new man. As is the origin of life, so are the effects that flow from it.—While the non-christian loves in Adam, the believer loves in Christ. The former passes off carnal inclination for true love.—Regeneration is not the completion but the beginning of Christianity. The word of God, which is intrinsically spirit and life must also become alive in us. It is a fire, but it cannot prove its power, as long as it touches us only superficially.

STARKER:—Hearty brotherly love comprises also brotherly correction, which should take place in a loving and gentle spirit, Gal. vi. 1.—The analogy between the word of God and seed in the field exhibits the following particulars: 1. The seed has in itself the power of growth, and does not receive it from the field. The word of God has power within itself and manifests itself as a spiritual growth. 2. The seed requires a well-prepared field; the word of God a soul ready to be qualified for receiving it and bearing fruit. 3. The seed needs a sower to scatter it in due season and in the right manner; the word of God needs the office of teachers, or spiritual husbandmen. 4. The scattered seed must be harrowed in, in order to be thoroughly mixed up with the soil and in order to grow above to strike root below; so the word of God, which is therefore called the implanted word, James i. 21. 5. The seed bears no fruit unless it be quickened by warm sunshine and fertile showers from above: so also the word of God, which although it has living power in itself, requires the supply of grace by the Holy Ghost. 6. The seed of one kind, scattered on differing soil, good, bad and indifferent, owing to the inequality of the soil, does not yield the same fruit: so it is with the word of God.—Christianity insists not so much on a mere externally blameless conversation as on regeneration, Gal. vi. 15; Phil. ii. 6.—We know no other word of God than that which was preached by Christ and the Apostles throughout the whole world, is put on imperishable record and still continues before our eyes.

LISCO:—Of what passes away and of what remains.

[VER. 22. The properties of brotherly love. 1. It is unfeigned, more of the heart and the hand than of the lip. 2. It is pure, beginning and ending in God. 3. It is fervent with all the energies of the soul on the stretch. The sympathy of the whole body with any injured or diseased member a Scriptural illustration.—M.]

[LEIGHTON:—The true reason why there is so little truth of this Christian mutual love amongst those that are called Christians, is, because there is so little of this purifying obedience to the truth, whence it flows; faith unfeigned would beget this love unfeigned: men may exhort to them both, but they require the hand of God to work them in the heart.

VER. 24. The philosopher said of his countrymen . . . "that they eat as if they meant to die to-morrow and yet build as if they were never to die."—Archimedes was killed in the midst of his demonstration. Cf. Ps. cxlvi. 4.—We in our thoughts shut up death into a very narrow compass, namely, in the moment of our expiring; but the truth is, as the moralist observes, it goes through all our life; for we are still losing and spending it as we enjoy it, yea, our very enjoying it, is the spending it; yesterday's life is dead to-day and so shall this day's life be to-morrow.—M.]

[MACKNIGHT:—VER. 25. This is a quotation from Is. xl. 6-8, where the preaching of the gospel is foretold and recommended from the consideration that every thing which is merely human, and among the rest, the noblest races of mankind, with all their glory and grandeur, their honour, riches, beauty, strength and eloquence; as also the arts which men have invented and the works they have executed, shall decay as the flowers of the field. But the gospel, called by the prophet the word of the Lord, shall be preached while the world standeth.—M.]

[LEIGHTON:—As the word of God itself cannot be abolished, but surpasses the endurance of heaven and earth, as our Saviour teaches, and all attempts of men against the Divine truth of that word to undo it, are as vain as if they should consent to pluck the sun out of the firmament, so likewise is the heart of a Christian, it is immortal and incorruptible.—M.]

CHAPTER II. 1-10.

ANALYSIS:—Exhortation of the regenerate to nourish themselves with the word of God, and to grow in Christ, to build themselves up on Him and to approve themselves a spiritual priesthood.

- 1 Wherefore laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and 2 all evil speakings, As newborn babes, desire<sup>3</sup> the sincere milk of the word<sup>4</sup>, that ye
 3,4 grow thereby; If so be<sup>4</sup> ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious<sup>4</sup>. To whom coming<sup>4</sup>, as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God<sup>7</sup>, and precious, 5 Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up 6 spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by<sup>10</sup> Jesus Christ. Wherefore also it is contained in the Scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone, elect, precious:
 7 and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded.<sup>13</sup> Unto you therefore which believe he is precious: but unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders 9 disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, And a stone of stumbling, and rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient<sup>14</sup>: where-9 unto also they were appointed. But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people<sup>15</sup>; that ye should shew forth<sup>16</sup> the praises<sup>17</sup> of him who 10 hath called you out of darkness into<sup>18</sup> his marvellous<sup>19</sup> light: Which in time past were not a people<sup>20</sup>, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy<sup>21</sup>, but now have obtained mercy<sup>22</sup>.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. Wherefore, laying aside.—The section v. 1.—v. 10. is connected, as are the exhortations in ch. i. 22, with the idea of regeneration and the love out of a pure heart flowing from it. To brotherly love out of a pure heart are opposed guile, deception, hypocrisy, envy and slander; if that is to spring up, these vices must die. On this account Peter exhorts Christians to lay them aside, to put them off. If a new life is implanted, it must grow, and therefore have corresponding, wholesome nourishment; on this account Peter entreats them to long for that nourishment that thus they might be able to grow and to overcome temptations.—The construction is here as in ch. i. 22. The Imperative reacts on the Participle. Laying aside is a figure taken from clothing and of frequent occurrence, Col. iii. 8; Eph. iv. 22; Jas. i. 21. The old man is a garment, wholly surrounding, closely-fitting and forming a whole with us. "Take away the filthy garments from him—set a fair mitre upon his head," was the direction concerning Joshua the high priest, Zech. iii. 8. The angel adding, "Behold I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment." The figures of laying aside and putting on clothes was peculiarly apposite because the early Christians were wont to lay aside their old garments and to exchange them for white and clean apparel when they were baptized and regenerated. It is necessary to observe that the exhortation to laying aside is only addressed to those who had the new man, while the unbelieving and unregenerate had first to receive another mind [μετάνοια, after-thought, after-wisdom, a change of disposition must precede baptism and new-birth.—M.]. The vices to be laid aside bear upon the relation to our neighbour and exert a deadly influence on brotherly love. κακία [nocendi cupiditas] denotes here, in particular, malicious disposition toward others, aiming at their hurt, injury and pain, and assuming various manifestations, cf. 1 Cor. xiii. 5. The accomplishment of such evil intent necessitates lying, cunning and other artifices; its concealment requires hypocrisy and dissembling. The sense of dependence on those before whom dissimulation is practised, the sight of their happiness, the shame felt in the conscience in the presence of the virtuous—excite envy, and envy engenders all manner of evil, detracting and injurious speaking. [Makitia malo delectatur alieno; invidia bono cruciatur alieno; dolus duplicat cor; adulatio duplicat linguam; detractio vulnerat famam.—Augustine.—M.]. "Thus," observed Flacius, 'one vice ever genders another.' Huss says of κακαλαλία that it takes place in various ways, either by denying or darkening a neighbour's virtues, and either by attributing to him evil or imputing to him evil designs in doing good.

VER. 2. As newborn babes.—This goes back to ch. i. 23. The connection is similar to ch. i. 14. They had been addressed as children of obedience, now their young and tender state is mentioned as a reason why they should seek strength in the word of God. 'Newborn babes' was a current expression among the Jews for proselytes and neophytes. As the desire and need of nourishment predominate in the former, so they ought to predominate in babes in Christ. The expression so far from being derogatory, sets forth the tenderness of their relation to God, and implies the idea of guilelessness, cf. Is. xl. 11; Lk. xviii. 15, etc.

Long for—word.—ἐπιποθεῖν denotes intense and ever recurring desire. While the regenerate experience a longing after the word of God, by which they had been begotten, similar to the desire of newborn babes for their mother's milk, Ps. cxix. 31. 72; xix. 11, still the hereditary sin which yet cleaves to them renders it necessary that they should be constantly urged to the diligent use of the divine word in order to partake of it.—Milk, in opposition to solid food, 1 Cor. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12; vi. 1, signifies the rudiments of Christian doctrine, not only its simple representation adapted to the capacity of the weak but also the more easily intelligible articles of Christianity. In this place, however, where no such antithesis exists, the figure comprises the sum-total of Christianity, the whole Gospel. Milk is the first, most simple, most refreshing, most wholesome food, especially for children; so is the word of God, cf. Is. lv. 1. The most advanced Christians ought to consider themselves children, in respect of what they are to be hereafter. "Christ, the crucified, is milk for babes, food for the advanced." Augustine. Clement of Alexandria suggests the partaking of the incarnate Logos.—λογικόν is best explained by the Apostle's peculiarity to elucidate his figures by additional illustrations, cf. ch. i. 13. 28. It is milk contained in and flowing from the word, spiritual milk, which, as Luther explains, is drawn 'with the soul'. Therendering 'reasonable' is against the usus loquendi of the New Testament, and equally inadmissible in Rom. xii. 1. [Alford renders 'spiritual' after Allioli and Kistemaker.—M.] The nature of this milk is further defined by ἄδολον, which means unadulterated, pure, cf. 2 Cor. iv. 2; ii. 17. [ἄδολον seems rather to be in contrast with δόλον in v. 1.—M.] It is consequently doctrine that is not compounded with human wisdom and thus rendered inefficacious. For the word of God has the property that it exerts purifying, liberating, illuminating and consoling influences only in its purity and entireness. Irenæus says of the heretics: "They mix gypsum with the milk, they taint the heavenly doctrine with the poison of their errors."

ἐν αὐτῷ, receiving it into your innermost soul, making it your full property. Growth in holiness depends on the constant assimilation of the word. "The mother who gave them birth, nourishes them also."—Harless.

VER. 3. If, otherwise ye have tasted.—A conditional statement is often by emphasis accepted as real. Grotius renders the sense well; "I know that you will this, as surely as you—cf. Rom. viii. 9; 2 Thes. i. 6." This form of speech contains also an invitation to self-examination. Calov perceives a connection with ver. 1. "The more you eradicate the bitter root of malice, the more also do you taste the sweetness of the goodness of the Lord." Cf. Song of Sol. ii. 8; v. 13; Sir. xxiii. 27. The expression, to taste with reference to the figure of milk, and with full allusion to Ps. xxxiv. 9, denotes experience of the essential virtue of a thing as perceived by the sense of taste. It is transferred very properly to the experiences of the soul which enters into and unites with the object in order to know it in all its bearings. Cf. Heb. vi. 5; ii. 9. [Alford says, "The infant once put to the breast desires it again."—M.]

[Wordsworth quotes the words of Augustine (Serm. 353), addressed to the newly baptized: "These words are specially applicable to you, who are yet fresh in the infancy of spiritual regeneration. For to you mainly the Divine Oracles speak, by the Apostle St. Peter, Having laid aside all malice, and all guile, as newborn infants desire ye the 'rationabile et innocens lac, ut in illo crescatis ad salutem,' if ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious (dulcis). And we are witnesses that ye have tasted it . . . Cherish, therefore, this spiritual infancy. The infancy of the strong is humility. The manhood of the weak is pride."—M.]

That the deed is good.—[Friendly, Germ.] χρηστός applied to tender, pleasant-tasting solids and liquids, to the sweet flavour of old wine, Luke v. 39; then to persons, kindly, friendly, condescending, Eph. iv. 32; Luke vi. 35. Ὁ κύριος is the Lord Jesus, ver. 4, who invites us to Him—self and commends to us the ease of His yoke, Matt. xi. 29. He is here represented as the spiritual means of nourishment, the partaking whereof promotes the new life of Christians, and draws them to the word, which is His revelation, and in a certain sense identical with Him. "This is tasting indeed," says Luther, "to believe from the heart that Christ has given Himself to me and has become my own, that my misery is His, and His life mine. Feeling this from the heart, is tasting Christ." [The Lord, "quod subjicitur; ad quem accedentes, non simpliciter ad Deum refertur, sed ipsum designat qualis patrefactus est in persona Christi."—Calvin.]

VER. 4. To whom approaching.—The Imperative construction is best adapted to what follows, as it supplies an appropriate progress in the development of the thought. We had before: "Take nourishment from the word of God, and from the communion of Christ; this is followed by an exhortation contemplating the gathering of a congregation of God, to wit: Build up yourselves, as living stones, into a temple of God. Ever-renewed approaching Christ is the means and condition of building. The Apostle thinks of passages like the following, Ps. cxviii. 22, 28; Is. viii. 14; xxviii. 16; Luke ii. 34; Matt. xxi. 42; cf. Matt. xi. 29; Jno. vi. 37. In the Old Testament, the priests are those who approach and draw near to God, Lev. xvi. 1; Ezek. xl. 46; Numb. ix. 13; in the New Testament access to God is opened to all through Christ, cf. Heb. ix. 1, etc.; vii. 25; x. 22; xi. 6; iv. 16. We draw near to Christ by prayer—(considering His person, His merit and His office)—by entering into His Word and drawing therefrom grace for grace by faith.

Unto a living stone.—The Apostle being about to speak of the sacred edifice of the New Testament, felt of course anxious to designate Christ as the corner-stone thereof. By the glory of the corner-stone, he desires to impress us with the glory of the edifice to be reared thereon. (Weiss). We do not decide upon the suggestion of Gerhard that Peter alludes to his own name. [Petrus a petra Christo sic denominatus metaphora, petre delectatur, ac suo exemplo docet omnes debere esse petros, h. e., vivos lapides supra Christum fide edificatos. Gerhard.—M.] Cf. Acts iv. 11; Rom. xi. 11; Eph. ii. 20; 1 Cor. x. 4; Zech. iii. 9. He is a stone or a rock, because after the manner of rocks, He remains ever the same, unchangeably powerful and invincible; because His word is firm and immovable, and because God has ordained and designed Him to be the foundation of His spiritual temple. But why a living stone? This predicate reminds us of the predicates Peter is wont to join to other images, vv. 2. 5; i. 13; it denotes not only a spiritual stone, but alludes to the circumstance that His rocky firmness is to His followers not hardness, but absolute reliability, truth and faithfulness, that in Him there is nothing of rigidity and death but absolute light and life. Calov.—"He is alive and makes alive." Jno. v. 28; vi. 48; xiv. 19, etc.; iv. 10; Acts ii. 28. He penetrates and fills with His life the whole organism of believers, and causes it to grow. "Peter here tenders us the most urgent invitation to draw near to Christ, for those to whom Christ is as yet a mummy, cannot feel themselves drawn to Him." Steiger.

Disallowed indeed of men, but - - precious.—ἀποδοκιμάζω—to reject on proof or trial, like useless coin, to reject for want of proper qualification. Heb. DND. He was rejected not only by the builders, but by men of every kind, of every occupation, of every age and generation, by Jews and Gentiles. Hence the expression is quite general, rejected of men, of the whole world of unbelievers. Opposed to this human judgment, proceeding from enmity to whatever is Divine and depending solely on externals, is the alone decisive judgment of God. Before God, in His eyes, and according to His decree He is chosen out and acknowledged precious and excellent before many millions, (antithesis between ἐκλεκτός and ἀποδοκιμαζόμενος) and had in great honour. Cf. 1 Tim. v. 21; Luke ix. 35; Rom. xvi. 13. Everything met in Him the exact fulfilment of what prophecy had foretold concerning Him, and God made even His resurrection the means of establishing His Messianic character. Peter alludes to Is. xxviii. 16, and laying stress on His preciousness with God, omits several of the predicates used in that passage. His rejection, therefore, so far from being matter of reproach, is one of the chief signs by which Jesus may be known as the true Messiah.

VER. 5. Be ye also built up, etc. οἰκοδομεῖσθε of Jude 20, to be taken as a Middle in a reflexive sense. Christ being so excellent a corner-stone, on which rests the entire spiritual temple of God, be ye also inserted therein. Such being built up is something very different from a few ephemeral or passing flights of emotion; it starts from a solid foundation, includes continued and systematic activity, and demands in particular that every one, even he who is firmly and closely inserted in Jesus, should suffer himself to be put in that place and there to be inserted as a member of the whole, which the will of the great Architect assigns to him. As living stones, forasmuch as you are living stones and in the regeneration, ch. i. 8; ii. 2; have put on spiritual life emanating from Christ, cf. Jno. v. 26; xi. 25; x. 28; xiv. 19. Calov specifies the following points of comparison: (a) the building upon the foundation-stone. "The stones of the building cannot stand without the foundation-stone. We do not carry Him, but He carries us. If we stand and rely upon Him, we must also abide where He is." Luther. (b) The hardness and firmness in order to resist all assaults of enemies and all storms. Bernard, Serm. 60, on the Song of Sol., says: "Raised on the Rock, I stand secure from the enemy and all calamities; the world shakes, the body oppresses me, the devil pursues me; but I do not fall, for I am founded on a firm rock." (c) The working, grinding, polishing and fitting of the stones. (d) The joining together with particular reference to the tie of love. (e) The mutual supporting. The lower stone supports the upper, this again the lower and the side stone, as Gregory says in Hom. on Ezek.: "In the Holy Church each supports the other, and each is supported by the other." Cf. the vision of the building of the Church triumphant in Herm. Pastor, vis. 3.

A spiritual house, not apposition, but effect and end of the building. Grotius rightly observes: In the spiritual building, individual believers are both living stones with reference to the whole temple of the Church, and a spiritual house or a temple of God, but this is inapplicable to this passage, which evidently treats of the founding of a people of God, (v. 9). As a house is a whole, consisting of different parts, so is the Church of God; as one master rules in a house, so the Triune Jehovah rules in His temple; cf. Eph. ii. 22; 1 Cor. iii. 16; 2 Cor. vi. 16. Among believers each is not to aim at separating himself into a house by himself; they should be united in the commonwealth of God, and together should constitute a spiritual temple. It is called spiritual in opposition to the material temple, made with hands, and also because it is wrought and occupied by the Spirit.

For a holy priesthood, (Lachmann after Codd. A. B. C. reads εἰς ἐπαύριμα,—the end of building,) a holy community of priests. "Under the Old Covenant, Jehovah had His house and His priests, who served Him in His house; the Church fulfils both purposes under the New, being both His house and His holy priesthood." Wiesinger. The expression alludes to Ex. xix. 6.—2 Chron. xxix. 11. "The Lord hath chosen you to stand before Him, to serve Him, and that ye should minister unto Him and burn incense." This applies to all Christians. All believers of the New Testament are anointed priests by the Holy Ghost. The priesthood is called ἁγίων, because they are consecrated to God, cleansed by the blood of Christ and studious of a holy conversation. Their activity consists in offering spiritual sacrifices.

To offer up spiritual sacrifices, etc., 'Ἀναφέρειν to carry up to the altar; cf. v. 24; Heb. vii. 27; xiii. 15; Jas. ii. 21, elsewhere προσφέρειν, to take to God, Heb. v. 7. These sacrifices are spiritual, in opposition to the animal sacrifices of the Old Testament, and correspond to the Being of God, who is a Spirit, and to the spiritual house in which they are offered; they are wrought by the Spirit of God, and must be spiritually offered. This spiritual sacrifice necessitates voluntary surrender to the service of God, and approaching Him spiritually; and consists above all things in that believers should, according to Rom. xii. 1, present to the service of their God and Saviour, their bodies with all its members and powers, eyes and ears, mouth and tongue, hands and feet, and themselves, with all they have and are, and that not only once at their first conversion, but daily, Luke ix. 28. Again, as the burning of incense was connected with the sacrifices of the Old Testament, so the incense of prayer, Rev. viii. 3, 4, and especially the lip-sacrifice of praise, Heb. xiii. 15; Ps. l. 14, are integral parts of the sacrifices of the New Testament. They moreover include the sacrifices of love and charity; if Christians gladly communicate their temporal possessions, seek their neighbours' good at the loss of personal advantage, and are prepared to give their life for the brethren, 1 Jno. iii. 16; Heb. xiii. 16; Phil. iv. 18. But since these sacrifices are always imperfect and affected by manifold infirmities, they cannot be acceptable to God unless offered through Him in whom God is perfectly pleased. Hence the annexed sentence, εὐπροσδέκτους, Θεῷ δὲ, which last word is not to be joined with ἀνεύγκα, but with εὐπροσδέκτους in the sense of taking through, through the mediation of Christ, that is, through His goodness, power, advocacy and merits, cf. Eph. i. 6. [But, on the other hand, joining δὲ κ.τ.λ. with ἀνεύγκα is supported by the analogy of Heb. xiii. 15; and preferred by Grotius, Aret., de Wette, Huther, Wiesinger and Alford, who consider the former construction inadequate to the weighty character of the words, and would seem to put them in the wrong place, seeing that not merely the acceptability, but the very existence and possibility of offering of those sacrifices, depends on the mediation of the great High Priest.—M.]

VER. 6. Because also it is contained in Scripture.—The Apostle again returns to the figure of the living stone, and supports it by a free and somewhat abbreviated quotation from Is. xxviii. 16.—περιέχει for περιέχεται as some verbs are used both in a reflexive and a passive sense. Winer, p. 267, 2d Eng. edition. Steiger adduces a passage from Josephus.

ἀκρογωνιαίος λίθον, a corner-stone of the foundation which unites two walls. Similarly Christ also is the connecting link of the Old and New Testaments, of Jews and Gentiles; ἐκλεκτόν see v. 4. In the prophetic passage, the primary reference appears to be to a king of the house of David, but the Spirit points to the Messiah, according to the all but unanimous opinion of ancient commentators; the New Testament also renders that opinion necessary. Is. viii. 14, describes Jehovah Himself as a stone of stumbling to those who do not let Him be their fear; and at Matt. xxi. 42, our Lord applies to Himself the words of Ps. cxviii. 22. ἐκλεκτόν, ἐντιμον is repeated by the Apostle in order to show how precious and valuable this corner-stone is to him.

ὁ πιστεύων; the idea of confiding predominates here; hence the preposition ἐπὶ instead of εἰς or ἐν. In Hebrew בְּנֵי to build on something, to stand fast. The passage Is. xxviii. 16, reads, "he that believeth shall not make haste," (i. e., fly like a coward who throws away his arms.) Peter expresses a more general sense, he shall not be ashamed; his hopes shall not make him ashamed. "The precious corner-stone assures an eternal state of grace and salvation." Roos. It was laid at the incarnation, and especially at the resurrection of Jesus.

VER. 7. To you then, who believe, is the honour, etc.—The sense of ἡ τιμή is determined by the antithesis to the preceding κατασχυνθῇ, and at the same time refers back to ἐντιμος, while the part of unbelievers is nothing but shame, faith is to you honour and glory, cf. ch. i. 7; ii. 9. This dignity is farther enlarged upon at v. 9; but the relation of unbelievers to Christ has first to be discussed.

ἀπειθεῖν relates as much to promises and facts as to precepts, cf. Heb. iii. 18. 19; iv. 2. 8. 6; Jno. iii. 36; Acts xiv. 2; xvii. 5; Rom. ii. 8; x. 21; xi. 30; the contrast in this place gives prominence to the former relation.

λίθον, literally taken from the LXX. version of Ps. cxviii. 22. Here also λίθος is in the Accusative.

tive. This case may have been retained with reference to τίθηναι in v. 6. (Lachmann reads λίθοις.) οἱ οἰκοδομοῦντες, the chiefs, the dignitaries of the Jewish state are the builders, who tear up the foundation. "Whenever we see the dignitaries rise against Christ, we will call to mind the prediction of David, that the stone is rejected by the builders." Calvin, cf. Rom. xi. 8; 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16; 1 Cor. i. 23.—οὗτος, emphatically just this one and no other.

εἰς expresses the destination and development towards the foundation-stone. Since His resurrection, He stands as the rock supporting His Church, but as a stone of stumbling and rock of offence to unbelievers, according to Is. viii. 14.

VER. 8. A stone of stumbling—who stumble.—πρόσκομμα, a collision producing hurt or injury, παῖς.

—σκάνδαλον, properly the catch in the trap, holding the bait, then the trap itself; figuratively, whatever causes to fall, seduces and involves men in sin and calamity. The running and stumbling against a thing is followed by falling. Ruin as the consequence of unbelief stands in contrast with the honour in store for believers, cf. Luke ii. 34; xx. 17; Matt. xxi. 42-44; Rom. ix. 32. The meaning is more than mere subjective taking offence and being vexed, as the sequel shows, not—ἀπειθεῖν.—οἱ προσκόπτουσιν, relates to ἀπειθεῖντες, who stumble while and because they do not believe the word.—προσκόπτουσιν must not be joined with λόγῳ, for it has already its object—εἰς, Christ. Grotius erroneously confines himself to the temporal punishment of the Jews, whereas the reference is plain to whatever misery and ruin follows the rejection of Christ.

Whereunto they were also appointed.—εἰς ὃ καὶ ἐρέθησαν relates to the foregoing principal verb, to προσκόπτειν. Grotius rightly: "Unbelievers are appointed for this very thing that they stumble, endure the most grievous punishment for their unbelief." τίθηναι applied to the temporal acts of God, not to His eternal decrees and ordinances, cf. Jno. xv. 16; Acts xx. 28; 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 6; Ps. lxxvi. 9 in LXX.; 1 Thess. v. 9. It denotes placing, setting in a definite situation, in certain circumstances, which often carry great dangers along with great disadvantages. Roos observes: "Had those unbelievers died in infancy, or had they been born deaf, or among ignorant heathen, they could not thus stumble. Had Caiaphas, Judas Iscariot and others been born several centuries sooner, they could not have so wofully sinned against the Son of God. Man is not wronged in being thus set among inestimable benefits and awful dangers; he is only to seize the benefits, to believe the word; if he is unwilling to do so, his condemnation is perfectly just." Having once voluntarily surrendered themselves to unbelief, their stumbling is neither accidental nor optional, but it contains besides the natural connection also a Divine and inevitable arrangement: "He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption," Gal. vi. 8. Yea, God punishes sin with sin, unbelief with unbelief, if men wantonly repel grace and love darkness more than light. With this explanation we reject the expositions of the Calvinists, e. g., that of Aretius; "Satan and their native evil have set them not to believe," and that of Beza: "That some are rejected not because of their foreseen sins, but because of the good pleasure of the Divine will." Cf. on the other hand, Rom. x. 11-18; xvi. 26; 1 Tim. ii. 4; Tit. ii. 11. The artificial exposition of Cornelius a Lapide is equally inadmissible, "They also were set (positi) to believe in Christ, but they refuse faith, just because they will not believe." The parallelism, already noticed by Gerhard, ought not to be passed over, that God sets (appoints) Christ as the foundation and corner-stone of the τιμή for believers; while unbelievers are set (appointed) to stumble at this corner-stone, which is to them a stone of stumbling, vide Weiss.

VER. 9. But ye are - a people for acquisition.—With reference to v. 5, the Apostle describes the glory of the Christian state as contrasted with the lot of unbelievers, both because of their guilt and in accordance with the Divine appointment. The first and last of the predicates used are taken from Is. xliii. 20, in LXX.; the others refer to Ex. xix. 6. γένος, denotes a whole united by natural relationship, community of origin among several parts of a people. Applied to the Christian Church, it signifies the totality of those begotten of the same incorruptible seed, and having one Spiritual Father, ch. i. 8, 23; 1 Jno. v. 1.

ἐκλεκτόν, similar to the Jewish Church of the posterity of Abraham and Jacob, the Christian Church is a company chosen out of the great mass of humanity, destined to salvation and glory and resting on a foundation stone which is also ἐκλεκτός, v. 4. They constitute a royal priesthood just because they belong to the one family of the children of the great God. The Hebrew has "a kingdom of priests," wherein God the King governs and animates all things. The priestly character is, however, the leading idea. You all may freely draw near to God, sacrificing, praying, and blessing, cf. Rev. i. 6; v. 10. But because you have community of life with Him, and should be the image of Him who rules at the right hand of the Majesty, ch. iii. 22, you enjoy in Him also the prerogatives of royalty and government. Even now you must no longer serve the world, with Christ you may overcome the flesh, the world and the devil; your position as rulers will hereafter become more manifest to yourselves and to the world. In you shall be completely fulfilled what in the faithful of Israel could be realized only in feeble beginnings. Cf. Is. lxi. 6; Ps. cxlviii. 14. Grotius quotes the saying of Cicero that it is a royal thing to be the servant of no passion.

ἔθνος ἁγίον. As Israel was, among the many nations of the world, separated and consecrated to God, Ex. xix. 6; Deut. vii. 6, so are you in a much higher sense a holy congregation in the midst of this sin-stained world, you are cleansed by the blood of Christ, sanctified by the Spirit of God, ch. i. 2, and bidden to strive indefatigably for holiness by renouncing the world and growing in brotherly love, ch. i. 22.

λαός εἰς περιποίησιν—עַם סִגְלָה, a people acquired for possession, is the last title of honour, Ex. xix. 6; Deut. vii. 6; Mal. iii. 17. Tit. ii. 14; Is. xliii. 21. ὧν may be understood. λαός as exposed to θῶρος may be designed to give prominence to the ideas of subordination to the King and of classification according to office and station, while θῶρος suggests the idea of external relations and national habits. Some take περιποίησις actively for acquiring, as in 1 Thess. v. 9; 2 Thess. ii. 14; Heb. x. 39, in the sense of the people destined, to acquire the glorious inheritance of God; but the reference to the Old Testament and the absence of an object in the passage under notice, which elsewhere uniformly accompanies it, forbids such an interpretation. As God had acquired the people of Israel by taking them from the Egyptian house of bondage, so He has acquired the Church of the New Testament by the blood of his Son.—Following Is. xliii. 20, the Apostle next specifies the end for which God did choose them as His own and accord to them such high immunities, not that they should seek therein their own glory, but that they should glorify God. Cf. Matt. v. 16. The construction is similar to that of ἀνεύρηται in v. 5.

That ye should publish, etc.—ἐξαγγέλλετε—to publish forth, to tell out, to give wide-spread publicity to what takes place within, cf. Tit. ii. 14; Eph. ii. 10. This must take place by word and deed, not only by called teachers but by the entire community of believers.

The virtues.—ἀρετή, although of frequent use in the writings of the Greek philosophers, occurs in the New Testament, besides this passage, only in Phil. iv. 8; 2 Pet. i. 3, 5. The word used in the parallel passage of the Old Testament is תְּהִלָּה, my praise, cf. Is. xlviii. 8. 12 in LXX.

The ἀρεταί of God are, as Gerhard rightly explains, those attributes of God which shine forth from the work of our free calling and the whole contrivance of our salvation. The connection suggests more particularly His Omnipotence which removes every obstacle, and His mercy which condescends to the most degraded slave of sin. The last attribute, in particular, was expressed in the appearing of Christ. Believing congregations should be both the trumpets and mirrors thereof.

καλεῖν, elsewhere applied to the call of the Apostolate, Matt. iv. 21; Mk. i. 19; Rom. i. 1; Gal. i. 15; 1 Cor. i. 1; then to invitations to enter into the kingdom of God, Lke. v. 32; 1 Cor. i. 9; Rev. xix. 9; Mtt. xxii. 14; ix. 13; Lke. xiv. 24; v. 32; Rom. viii. 30; ix. 12. 24; 1 Cor. i. 7; 1 Thess. iv. 7; v. 24; 2 Thess. ii. 14; that is, the kingdom of grace and glory. 1 Thess. ii. 12; 1 Tim. vi. 12; Heb. ix. 15; 1 Pet. v. 10. This invitation is mostly effected by the preaching of the Gospel, but sometimes also by God addressing men personally and calling them by their names, Gen. xii. 1; Ex. xxxi. 2; Is. xiii. 3; Acts ix. 4, and by the efficient working of His Spirit in their hearts. God the Father, the God of all grace is here, as elsewhere, He who calls, 1 Cor. i. 9; Gal. i. 15; 1 Pet. v. 10. He thus realizes in time (in this present life) the aetemporal (the eternal) act of election.

The darkness is, according to Flacius, the kingdom of darkness and that most sad condition which belongs to all men before they come to Christ. It comprises both ignorance of God and the greatest unrighteousness, the slavery of Satan, and lastly, all kinds of punishment, the curse and wrath of God, and, we may add, the anxious unrest and torment of conscience. This figure being applied to the Jews in the Old Testament, Ps. cvii. 10; Is. ix. 2, affords no clue, that Peter was addressing former pagans. Opposed to darkness is the wonderful light of God, who Himself is Light as to His Being. It translates believers into His holy and blessed communion of light; their understanding is therein enlightened, their will sanctified and their conscience filled with peace. It is a wonderful Light as to origin, nature and effect, since it makes of sinners the children of God. "It discovers wonderful things and cannot be seen by the worldly-minded." Roos. "It is wonderful, just as to one coming out of long darkness the light of day would be wonderful." de Wette.

VER. 10. Which in time past—but now compassionated.—The remembrance of what they had once been, must deepen the sense of gratitude on the part of the readers of the Epistle. Peter cites freely Hos. ii. 28, where, of the people in their then condition, it is said that they were not the people of God, but that in the days of Messiah, God would say unto them, "Thou art my people." The passage in Hosea manifestly refers to Israel. The prophecy met its fulfilment whenever a Jewish congregation joined Christianity. If the meaning were the substitution of a new Christian people, a people either composed of Jews and Gentiles, or mainly and by way of preference of Gentiles—for the people of Israel—those promises would either still remain unfulfilled, or be fulfilled in a way that needed, after the manner of Paul, to be more clearly defined and substantiated. Οὐ λαός not only no people of God but the very opposite. Ἐλεηθέντες. "The Aorist denotes the historical fact, the act of Divine compassion to have really taken place." Steiger.—οὐκ ἤλεημένοι, a long time before they had, under the Divine judgments, been given over to sin and its fruit of corruption.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It would be erroneous to represent the nature of regeneration as a state out of which whatever is good is spontaneously flowing, as water flows from a strong fountain; the new man needs constant growth in all his powers. The light of his knowledge must deepen and increase; his will must become more firm and decided; he must grow in love, hope, patience and all other virtues, Heb. vi. 1; Eph. iv. 15; 1 Thes. iv. 1, 10; Phil. iii. 12. This necessitates exhortation on the part of others, and the regenerate must (of course in the spirit of the Gospel, for the flesh is ever warring against the spirit) coerce himself to do good. "A Christian is in process of being, not already completed. Consequently, a Christian is not a Christian, that is, one who thinks that he is already a Christian, whereas he is to become one, is nothing. For we strive to get to heaven, but are not yet in heaven." Luther.

2. Christianity is not satisfied with partial and superficial improvements; it demands inflexible severity toward the old man, and insists upon it that impurity in every shape and form shall be exposed and struggled with, v. 1.—The progress of the Christian life corresponds every way to its beginning. He that in a first repentance has been awakened from spiritual sleep, must every day rise anew from sleep; he that has put on Christ in faith, must daily put Him on more thoroughly. This is necessary because the old man exists alongside the new, although the dominion of the former be broken.

3. The means whereby the new man is nourished and furthered is none other than that to which he owes his existence. He must grow out of (ἐκ) God, His spirit, and His word. It is a most dangerous opinion for any to hold that he has inwardly appropriated so much of the Divine word as to be able to dispense with the outward word. He that despises this may soon be punished by God, in that He will so effectually deprive him of His light and strength as to induce him to regard as Divine revelations his own vain imaginings and foolish dreams.—Wiesinger says: "The Christian may measure his love of God by his love of the word of God; it is his personal experience of the love of God that draws him to the word, and what he seeks is an ever-increasing, ever-deepening experience of the χρηστότης of the Lord. Inquiry led by such an impulse of personal communion with the Lord contains within itself its own rule and corrective, a power which gathers together into one centre of life all the varying phases of the Scriptures, and guards them from being shattered and alienated."

4. A spiritual house, a temple, must also have a priestly people, v. 4. The priestly consecration of the New Testament consists in that we seize by the self-surrender of true faith the true sin-offering and atonement made on Golgotha, and offered and presented to us in the means of grace. First comes the sin-offering, then the burnt-offering, then the thank-offering; hence none can live in the service and to the praise of God unless he first have seized, by the true burnt-offering of faith, the true sin-offering of Christ, and unless his whole life become (working outwardly from within) one whole thank-offering, one whole and undivided act of worship. The real burnt-offering is thenceforth repentance and faith, wherein man dies daily with the right sin-offering of Christ, and daily revives, and suffers himself and his whole life to be possessed of God, by being refined, purified and consumed in the fire of the Holy Ghost." Kliefoth. The general priesthood of Christians applies only to converted, believing and living Christians, and implies that there is no class or state of Christians privileged with exclusive mediation of salvation. Luther has powerfully brought out this doctrine in connection with justification, and Spener propounded it anew. But God has likewise instituted for the church an office for the administration of the means of grace, a clearly defined service to be committed to certain persons, which is evident from 2 Cor. iii. 11; Eph. iv. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Matt. xxviii. 19, 20; Jas. iii. 1; 1 Cor. xiv. 5.

5. The Divine pleasure rests on the spiritual sacrifices of the priests of the New Testament, only for the sake of Christ; where this truth is sincerely held, neither self-righteousness, nor despondency, its twin sister, can maintain their ground.

6. The nature of Christ reflects itself in believers. They are, v. 5, stones, temples, priests. Every stone is, as it were, a temple by itself; many houses of God constitute the One Church of Christ.

7. Holy Scripture is silent concerning the predestination of individuals to unbelief, sin and damnation, although it teaches that God has (temporarily) concluded all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all, Rom. xi. 32.

8. With the Reformers, we should draw the true idea of the Christian Church from v. 9, although it applies only to a small fraction of the degenerate Christendom of the present. The ungodly are only in appearance and name, not in truth and in deed, members of the Church.

9. We learn from v. 9 that there is no antithesis between the New Testament and the Old, provided the latter be treated according to its kernel and substance; Peter comprises both as a unit, but at the same time gives uniform prominence to the spirituality and intrinsicity of Christianity, and specifies a spiritual house, spiritual sacrifices and living stones; so that the Old Testament is represented by him as the Divinely appointed threshold and porch of the New. The province of bringing out the contrast between the Old Testament and the New was left to St. Paul.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

V. 1. Which are the things that kill brotherly love and ought therefore earnestly to be fought against and laid aside?—Growth in Christian perfection: (a) its soil; (b) its necessity; (c) its means.—Love of the Divinely given means of grace both the mark and task of the new man.—The foundation, on which all Christian exhortations are resting.—The true Church is the mother, nourishing her children with the pure milk of the Divine word.—Jesus, the sinner's cordial and delight in life, suffering and dying.—Christ, the living stone, ever living and animating His people.—Christians are living stones in the building of the kingdom of God: 1. What does it mean? 2. What is necessary to it? 3. What advantage does it bring?—The Christian state a holy priesthood: 1. Its dignity; 2. Its duties.—The two-fold destination of the Church's corner-stone.—Of the vessels of wrath set (prepared) for condemnation.—The chosen generation of the children of God: 1. Their election; 2. Their destination.—Only God's people is a people indeed.

STARKE:—The punishment of sin is affected by regeneration, for this must supply us with the ability to avoid evil.—He that betrays attachment to some one darling sin to which natural naughtiness, habit, or manner of life render him peculiarly liable, gives proof that he is not yet in earnest as to his sanctification.—Sin is an arch-deceiver; let every man take care not to be deceived, and not to regard evil and harmful as good and harmless.—The longer and the more we partake of the sweet milk of the Gospel, the more do we increase in the spirit.—Faith gives us some taste of the grace, mercy and loving-kindness of God, Ps. xxxiv. 9.—He that tastes the goodness of God must show it in loving converse with his neighbour.—Well built on Christ; who can destroy this temple? Matt. xvi. 18. In this temple offer diligently the incense of your prayer and sacrifice.—Good works are well pleasing to God, not because of their perfection, but because of Christ the Beloved, for they are wrought in God, Jno. iii. 21.—Consider the cause and the order of salvation; Christ is the cause, faith the order; both must go together or salvation is impossible, Jno. iii. 86.—Those who reject Christ lose their life, but do neither hurt Him nor His Gospel any more than a well-secured corner-stone can be hurt by those who stumble at it.—The great glory of believers:—they have consolation and joy in life and death.—The unconverted are abominable to God, the converted precious and acceptable.

LISCO:—Sincere repentance: (a) its nature; (b) its motive.—The blessed communion with Christ Jesus.—The exalted dignity of the Christian Church.—The Christian's life of faith.—The eternally immovable foundation of the kingdom of heaven.—Christ stands in a contrasted relation to man.—The Apostle's exhortation that we should build up ourselves.

LEIGHTON:—Vv. 21. 2. The apostle requires these two things: 1. The innocence of children; 2. The appetite of children.—EPICTETUS says: "Every thing hath two handles." The art of taking things by the better side, which charity always doth, would save much of those janglings and heart-burnings that so abound in the world.—There is none comes to the school of Christ, suiting the philosopher's word, ut fabula rasa, as blank paper to receive His doctrine, but, on the contrary, all scribbled and blurred with such base habits as these—malice, hypocrisy, envy, etc.—These two are necessary conditions of good nourishment: 1. That the food be good and wholesome; 2. That the inward constitution of them that use it be so, too.—Isdem alimur ex quibus constat.—Pure and unmixed, as milk drawn immediately from the breast; the pure word of God without the mixture, not only of error, but of all other composition of vain, unprofitable subjects or affected human eloquence, such as become not the majesty and gravity of God's word, 1 Pet. iv. 11.—"Desire the sincere milk": 1. It should be natural; 2. earnest; 3. constant.

VER. 3. The free grace of God was given to be tasted in the promises, before the coming of Christ in the flesh, but being accomplished in His coming, then was the sweetness of grace made more sensible; then was it more fully broached and let out to the elect world, when He was pierced on the cross and His blood poured forth for our redemption. Through those holes of his wounds may we draw and taste that the Lord is gracious, says St. Augustine.—"If ye have tasted." There must be, 1. a firm believing the truth of the promises wherein the free grace of God is expressed and exhibited to us; 2. a particular application or attraction of that grace to ourselves, which is as the drawing those breasts of consolation, Is. lxi. 11, namely, the promises contained in both Testaments; 3. there is a sense of the sweetness of that peace being applied or drawn into the soul, and that is properly this taste.

Vv. 4. 5. 1. The nature of the building: It is a spiritual building; having this privilege that it is tota in toto et tota in qualibet parte. The Hebrew for the word for palace and temple is one. 2. The materials of it. 3. The structure or way of building it.—First coming and then built up.—As these stones are built on Christ by faith, so they are cemented one to another by love.—"A holy priesthood": 1. The office; 2. The service of that office; 3. The success of that service.—[Apparent paradox: God claims the heart whole and yet broken.—M.]

VER. 6. In these words are five things: 1. This foundation stone; 2. The laying of it; 3. The building on it; 4. The firmness of this building; 5. The greatness and excellence of the whole work.—What SENKOA says of wisdom is true of faith: "Puto multos potuisse ad sapientiam pervenire, nisi putassent se jam pervenisse."

VER. 9. 1. The estate of Christians; 2. Its opposition to the state of unbelievers; 3. The end of it. 'Generation': They are of one nation, belonging to the same blessed land of promise, all citizens of the new Jerusalem, yea, all children of the same family, whereof Jesus Christ, the root of Jesse, is the stock, who is the great king and the great High-priest, and thus they are a royal priesthood.—They resemble in their spiritual state the Levitical priesthood: 1. In their consecration: (a) they were washed, cf. Rev. i. 5; (b) The washing was accompanied by sacrifice [Christ's blood was shed in sacrifice]; (c) They were anointed [Christians are anointed with the gifts of the Spirit]; (d) They were clothed in pure garments, Ps. cxxxii. 9; (e) They had offerings put into their hands. 2. In their services: (a) They had charge of the sanctuary [Christians have charge of their hearts]; (b) They were to bless the people [the prayers of Christians convey blessings to the world]. 8. In their course of life: [The life of Christians is regulated by a code of holy laws.—M.]

[BAXTER:—VER. 2. Alas what a multitude of dwarfs has Christ, that are but like infants, though they have numbered ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, or even sixty years of spiritual life.—M.]

[JOHN GLAS:—VER. 9. "There is now no more any place on earth where the whole Church assembles for worship; but they all assemble in the heavenly Jerusalem, where Jesus is, the antitype of that on earth, in which the Church of Israel assembled, and toward which they worshipped from all corners of the land. Here they on earth have their conversation, Phil. iii. 20; and unto that place the tribes of God go up now worshipping God, all serving in newness of the Spirit; and there are no worshippers now but spiritual worshippers. Thus there is an end put to all controversies about earthly holy places and temples of God made with hands."—M.]

[VER. 2. The early Christians administered milk and honey, which was the ordinary food of infants, to such as were newly received into the Church; showing them by this sign that by their baptism they were born again, and bound to manifest the simplicity and innocence of infants in their life and conversation.—M.]

[MOSHEIM:—VER. 8. "The stone of stumbling and rock of offence," as the prophet affirms, is the Lord of Hosts Himself; but this "stone of stumbling and rock of offence," as asserted by the Apostle, is no other than Christ, the same stone which the builders refused. Therefore Christ is the Lord of Hosts Himself. If the Scripture, thus compared with itself, be drawn up into an argument, the conclusion may indeed be denied, and so may the whole Bible, but it cannot be answered."—M.]

[JONES OF NAYLAND:—"Whereunto they were also appointed." Not appointed to be disobedient, but appointed, since they would be disobedient, to take their own course and the consequences of it; to stumble and fall at difficulties, of which they would easily have seen the proper solution, and so got over them unhurt, had they but modestly begged, and dutifully followed, the Divine illumination."—M.]

of the metaphor 'living stones', as applied to Christians?"—M.]

[CLARKE suggests a common Hebrew root בנה to build of בן a son, בת a daughter, בית a house and אבן a stone. A house (בית) is built of stones (אבנים), a house or family, also called בית consists of sons (בנים) and daughters (בנות). The house of God is the Church which rests on Christ, the Living Stone, and Christians are members of Christ, drawing their life from Him and resting on Him, and therefore living stones.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 11. I exhort you, etc.—This exhortation alludes to ch. i. 1, and enjoins the cleansing of the soul and a comely behaviour among the Gentiles, on the grounds of their condition of pilgrims.—παροίκους should be joined with ἐπι-χέσθαι. παροίκους—one who lives as a stranger or denizen in a country or community; παρεπιδήμιος—one who stays in a place for a short time, like travellers on a journey, ch. i. 1. 17. By their present state he reminds them of the general lot of men on earth. "We are in body and soul expatriated; nothing is permanent on earth." Calov. Lasting joys and riches are only in our true home. It is also befitting that as strangers you should not offend those among whom you live.—ἀπέχεσθαι even stronger than μή συγκατατίθεμενοι, ch. i. 14; it denotes inward and outward abstinence.—σάρκα καὶ ἐπιθυμίαι=ἐπιθυμίαι τῆς σαρκός, Eph. ii. 3; 2 Pet. ii. 18;=σάρκα καὶ ἐπιθυμίαι, Tit. ii. 12; cf. 1 Jno. ii. 16. In a narrower sense it denies all desires and impulses that seek pasture* in sensual thoughts and gratification—in eating and drinking, and obscenity and incontinence. The primary reference may be to these, but there is also an ulterior reference to those lusts whose seat is rather in the soul than in the body, e. g., hatred, idolatry, wrath, conceit of knowledge, avarice, cf. Gal. v. 19; 1 Cor. iii. 3; Rom. viii. 6; Eph. ii. 3; Col. ii. 18. Consequently all manifestations and motions of the selfishness of man in general. They are said to war against the soul; they go out against it, surround and assault it. Bengel calls this “a great saying”; cf. Jas. iv. 1; Rom. vii. 23. The design is not so much to describe the nature of the lusts as to enforce the exhortation.—κατὰ τῆς ψυχῆς. Neither the contrast between flesh and spirit, described by St. Paul, Rom. vii. 14, etc.; Gal. v. 17; nor as Calov and Steiger take it, “they war against the nature of the regenerate soul.” The proposition is general, and ψυχή denotes elsewhere the principle of personal life. Ch. i. 9, it is the soul that is to be saved, and ch. i. 22, it is the soul that is to be sanctified through faith. The life of the soul is hidden, hurt and killed by fleshly lusts, cf. Matt. x. 39; xvi. 25; Luke xvii. 38. [Alford remarks, “ψυχή, the man’s personal, immortal part, as opposed to his body, his μέλη in which the ἐπιθυμίαι σπαρασσονται is held in suspension between influences from above and influences from beneath—drawn up and saved, or drawn down and ruined,—and among its adversaries are those fleshly lusts, warring against it to its ruin.”—M.]

VER. 12. Having your conversation good among the Gentiles.—ἀναστροφή, ch. i. 14.—ἔχοντες. If we do not read ἀπέχεσθαι, the Accusative ought to follow; but sometimes Participles, removed from the verbs by which they are governed, stand in an abnormal case; the casus rectus gives greater prominence to an idea, v. Winer § 64. 2. Christians are opposed to an ungodly world, and are charged to be the salt and the light of the world, which closely watches them. (Matt. v. 16).—ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν is a hint that the Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians. The unbelieving Jews are probably reckoned among the ἔθνη; so Weiss.—καλῶν. The deeper view of Greek philosophy represented immorality and ugliness, and morality and beauty as convertible ideas.

In the matter in which they speak against you as evil doers.—ἐν ᾧ not: instead of, while, but in the same matter, in the same occasion in which, because of which, they speak against you as evil doers. [The sense is, “that that conduct, which was to them an occasion of speaking against you as evil doers, may by your good works become to them an occasion of glorifying God. Alford.—M.] Join ἐν ᾧ with δοξάσωσι, cf. ch. iii. 16. It was just the good conversation of Christians, their Christian works, judged superficially and referred to evil motives, that gave occasion to the heathen to slander and persecute them. ἐν ᾧ is defined by καλὰ ἔργα, compare in point of language, Rom. ii. 1.—καταλαλοῦσιν ὑμῶν ὡς κακοποιῶν.—Tertullian says: If the Tiber rises to the walls of the city, if the Nile does not irrigate the fields, if an earthquake takes place, if famine or the pestilence arise, they cry forthwith: Away with the Christians to the lions.

For your good works’ sake - - glorify.—ἐποπτεύσαντες refers to ἐν ᾧ, from which we must supply τοῦτο. It signifies: to look closely upon a thing in order to see through it. So it was applied to those mysteries which were difficult to explain, cf. ch. iii. 2; Eph. iii. 4. Superficial observers, as appears from the account given by Tacitus, regarded the brotherly love of the Christians as a secret covenant imperilling the state, their decision as obstinacy, their heavenly-mindedness as hatred of the human race. Their departure from the sinful customs of their fathers was treated as contempt for and rejection of all human ordinances, cf. ch. ii. 19, 20; iii. 10-12, 17; iv. 15; ii. 14. A definite date, e. g., the time of the persecutions under Nero, or even under Trajan, can hardly be substantiated. Join ἐκ τῶν καλῶν ἔργων to δοξάσωσιν, for the good works’ sake, proceeding out of them.

δοξάσωσιν.—Calvin rightly observes that our aim ought not to be to make unbelievers speak and think well of us, but rather to keep before our eyes the glory of God. More correct knowledge may constrain them to glorify God, to give honour to God, of whom believers are said to be the children. Peter evidently thinks of the words of Jesus at Matt. v. 16. Roos adds: In such a case we must not always look for a proper praise of God. Provided people praise the good works, they praise our heavenly Father, as the Author of them, just as he that praises the good manners of a child, virtually bestows praise on his instructor. Although people treat the faith of God’s children as superstition and folly, they may for all that praise their works, and thus give glory to God. Justin Martyr supplies an illustration of such δοξάζειν. He confesses that, when still a heathen, he deemed it impossible that the Christians could be addicted to the unnatural vices of which they were accused, because they were so ready to die for Christ.

In the day of visitation.—ἐπισκοπή, ἐπισκεπ-τέσθαι=ἡμέρα denotes both the merciful visitation of God, and His judicial and primitive inquisition; for the former sense cf. Gen. xxi. 1; 1. 24; Ex. iii. 16; iv. 81; 1 Sam. ii. 21; Job vii. 18; Lke. i. 68, 78; Acts xv. 14; for the latter, see Jer. ix. 24, 25; xlv. 13; xlv. 25; ix. 9; Ps. lix. 6; Ex. xx. 5. Commentators are divided, either sense finding many advocates. It is perhaps best to combine both views, as the Apostle himself does not define his meaning, and as both visitations of mercy and wrath, do often occur together. It is by no means an insoluble riddle that unbelievers are made to glorify God by sufferings, since experience shows that in seasons of heavy judgments, stony hearts are sometimes softened and melted. The word ἡμέρα relates, as is often the case, to longer periods of time than a day of twenty-four hours. The allusion here is neither to the day of judgment (as Bede maintains), nor to an investigation of the life of believers on the part of the world (as Roos suggests).

*The readers of this Commentary will pardon my attempt to give currency to a most striking Germanism; I do so on the supposition that every term of speech which sheds light on the workings of the mind and soul, is a most valuable accession to language.—M.

[The day of God's visitation in wars, earthquakes, plagues, etc., brought out the faith and love of the Christians, as contrasted with that of the Jews and Heathens. Wordsworth cites the history of the plague at Carthage, in Cyprian's Episcopate, as described by his deacon, Pontius, p. 6. "The majority of our brethren," says Pontius, "took care of every one but themselves; by nursing the sick, and watching over them in Christ, they caught the disorder which they healed in others, and breathed their last with joy; some bare in their arms and bosoms the bodies of dead saints, and having closed the eyes of the dying, and bathed their corpses, and performed the last obsequies, received the same treatment at the hands of their brethren. But the very reverse of this was done by the Gentiles; those who were sinking into sickness, they drove from them; they fled from their dearest friends; they threw them expiring into the streets, and turned from their unburied corpses with looks of execration." See also Cyprian's words in his treatise published on that occasion, De Mortalitate, sive Peste, capp. 9. 10: Mortalitas ista, ut Judeis et Gentilibus et Christi hostibus pestis est, ita Dei servis salutaris excessus est.—M.]

VER. 13. Be subjected, therefore, to every human institution, etc.—From the wholly general precept concerning the conversation of Christians among the heathen, the Apostle, moved by the very common slanders uttered against them, that they were dangerous to the State, and aiming at the overthrow of all the bands of law, takes occasion to descend to the most ordinary duties, to the exhortation of submitting to the secular authority, and of not abusing Christian liberty.

ὑποτάγτε.—The Aorist Pass. is sometimes used in a Middle sense, v. Winer.—οὖν primarily connects with v. 12, secondarily with v. 11.*—πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις κτίσται.—The word κτίσται, like κτίσεν, is generally applied to Divine creations and institutions, or used to denote a creature; but here the adjective ἀνθρώπων shows that it signifies any institution or appointment irrespective of origin. Limiting κτίσται to the idea of the Divine institution of the world is confusing. The Apostle intends by the use of the adjective ἀνθρώπων to meet the objection that Christians, in view of their Christian liberty, were bound to obey only authorities immediately appointed by God, because there was much sinfulness mixed up with such human institutions; he further desires to distinguish the Divine ordinance of the State from that of the Church, ch. ii. 5, without, however, denying the mediate Divine institution of the secular power, as Paul avers at Rom. xiii. 1. 2. 4. Flacius rightly remarks: "It is called a human ordinance because secular constitutions do not originate in an explicit and specific word of God, as true religion does; but they are rather ordained by man and his agency, at least as far as we are able to judge, that cannot see the hidden sway of God." If this Epistle belongs to the time of Nero, light is shed on the selection of this predicate. Peter may have recollected the words of his Master, Matt. xvii. 26. 27. Luther comments in this respect as follows: "Although you are free in all externals (for you are Christians) and ought not be forced by law to be subjected to secular rule (for there is no law for the just [i. e., to the justified—M.]), yet you ought spontaneously to yield a ready and uncoerced obedience, not because necessity compels you, but that you may please God, and benefit your neighbour. Thus did Christ act, as we read, Matt. xvii."—πᾶσιν—be it Heathen, Jewish, or Christian authority; be it this or that constitution.

[Wordsworth:—"Water may be made to assume different forms, in fountains and cascades, and be made to flow in different channels or aqueducts, by the hand of man; but the element itself, which flows in them, is from God. So again, marble may be hewn by man's hand into different shapes: under the sculptor's chisel it may become a statue, a frieze or sarcophagus, but the marble itself is from the quarry, it is from the creative hand of God.—So it is with the civil power. The form which power may assume, and the person who may be appointed to exercise it, may be κτίσεις ἀνθρώπων, ordinances of man; but the authority itself (ἐξουσία) is from God. Consequently, as St. Peter teaches, we are bound to submit to every ordinance of man, in all lawful things, "for the Lord's sake," whose ministers and viceregents our rulers are; and, as St. Paul declares, "he that resisteth the authority, resisteth the ordinances of God, and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." See Rom. xiii. 1-3.—M.]

For the Lord's sake.—Probably to be understood of God the Father, who had been mentioned in v. 12, although v. 8, and elsewhere in Peter, as in Paul, Christ is called Lord. [But is not the reference rather to Christ? For, 1. κύριος with Peter always describes Christ, except in quotations from the O. T. (Alford): 2. Christians derive their liberty from their union to Christ.—M.] The sense is: because God demands it, because He has founded this institution, Rom. xiii. 1. 5. This defines, also, the limits of Christian subjection: the duty of obedience ceases, where God from heaven decisively forbids it, Acts iv. 19; v. 29. The Apostle specifies two classes of political powers whom Christians are bound to obey: first, the king or emperor, second, his ambassadors or representatives. The Jews and the Greeks called the Roman Emperor, king.—ὡς ἐπὶ ἐρχοντι.—ὡς denotes a well known reason. ἐπὶ ἐρχοντι, wielding the highest sovereign power on earth. Otherwise, 1 Tim. ii. 1. Bengel rightly: supereminens.—αὐτοῦ connects, of course, with βασιλεῖ, not with κύριος. "In inferior powers, we must see and honour the king, in the king, God Himself." Gerhard. The ethical purpose of the power wielded by all authorities is to punish evil-doers, and to recognize the good with marks of praise and approbation, cf. Rom. xiii. 3. 4. Calov cites the language of

Plato, that rewards and punishments keep the state together, and quotes from Cicero the saying of Solon, that the state is best governed if the good are attracted by rewards and the evil kept in bounds by punishment.—ἐκδίκους, not execution of the laws, but punishment, vengeance.—κακοποιῶν, to be taken in a general, objectively ethical sense, and to be interpreted by ch. iv. 15, which treats of murderers and other malefactors. This passage contains not the faintest reference, altogether, to the character of Christians, as drawn by Suetonius and Tacitus, to wit, that they were political offenders. How could the Apostle have subscribed to such a delineation of their character! This passage, therefore, cannot be used to determine the date of the Epistle.—ἔπαινος, recognition by word and deed, praise, protection and promotion.

VER. 15. For so is the will of God - - men.—Gerhard:—Even though your innocence and obedience are insufficient to effect the conversion of others or their praising God, you will be able, according to the will of God, to silence blasphemers.—οὕτως ἐστὶ, after this manner, is the will of God. [Then follows what the will of God is in this direction, viz.: ἀγαθοποιούντας ἑμῶν κ. τ. λ.—M.]—ἑμῶν from ἑμός, a muzzle, to muzzle, to shut up the mouth, as with a muzzle, cf. Deut. xxv. 4; Sir. xx. 31.—This ignorance originated in the corruption of the heart, and in its turn enflamed it, (ch. ii. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 84; Jno. xvi. 8). It was marked by varying degrees of guilt. Paul contrasts the knowledge of the Divine will with this state of ignorance, Eph. v. 17. Because they are blind as to Divine things, they are unable to understand our manner of conversation.

[Wordsworth:—“Christ was crucified by the power of Rome, as He had foretold that He would be (Matt. xx. 19). St. Peter and St. Paul, as they also foreknew, were martyred by Rome; but yet they preached submission to Rome.”—M.]

VER. 16. As free - - God.—ὡς ἐλεύθεροι may best be construed as the antecedent of the next verse, but only of its first member, πάντας τιμῶσατε. To construe it with v. 15 would require ἐλευθέρους. [But even this limitation to the first member of v. 17 renders such a construction hardly tenable. The supposition of the contrary seems to establish its untenableness. Does my freedom absolve me from the obligation of honouring all men? Am I not bound, on the general ground of Christian duty and equity, to give to all their due? On the whole, I consider the explanation of Wiesinger, adopted by Alford, the best, viz.: to regard v. 16 as an epexegetis on v. 15, not carrying on the construction with an Accusative, but with a Nominative, as already in v. 12, and, indeed, even more naturally here, because not the act consequent on ἀγαθοποιεῖν, as there on ἀνέχεσθαι, is specified, but the antecedent state and Christian mode of ἀγαθοποιεῖν. For arguments see Wiesinger and Alford.—M.] It is different with v. 12. Such subjection and true Christian liberty are not irreconcilable antagonisms. For the latter, founded on the redemption through Christ, is spiritual in its nature; it delivers us from sin and error, from the world and the devil, and unites us to God and His word by the bands of love, cf. Jno. viii. 32; Rom. vi. 18, 22; Gal. v. 13; 2 Pet. ii. 19. In the sequel Peter cuts off all misunderstanding and abuse of liberty. The Gnostics abused Christian liberty by the commission of all kinds of infamous and criminal indulgences. The Jews, on the plea of being the people of God's inheritance, claimed to be free from the laws of the heathen. On this account we read: “and not as having [=not as those who have—M.] freedom for a cover of malignity.” It is uncertain whether (as Cornelius and others suppose), there is here an allusion to the white baptismal robe, which was also a symbol of the liberty obtained through Christ.—ἐπικάλυμμα = παρακάλυμμα, something spread in order to cover a thing, hence, a cloak, a cover, a veil. Luther says: “If Christian liberty is preached, godless men without faith immediately rush in, and claim to be good Christians because they do not keep the laws of the Pope.”—κακία should not be explained with Wiesinger in the restricted sense of disobedience to the magistrate, but in a wider sense, just as the antithesis ἀγαθοποιεῖν is a more general idea.—δοῦλοι Θεοῦ.—To serve God, says Augustine, is the highest liberty. What was expected of Israel as a nation (often called the servant of God, Is. xlii. 1, 21; xlviii. 20; Jerem. xxx. 10); what Jesus was in a peculiar sense (and Peter calls Him so by preference, Acts iii. 18, 26; iv. 27, 80), should be realized in every believer of the New Testament.

VER. 17. Honour all men.—The chief duties of a good conversation among the Gentiles are now briefly comprehended, according to the several relations in which they stand.—τιμῶσατε, Aorist Imper., used of actions that are either rapidly completed and transient, or viewed as occurring but once. Winer § 48, 3, a.

All men.—Not only the chief, but all men. In your intercourse with equals, show to each the respect you owe them, first, as God's creatures, Jas. iii. 9, and, secondly, as having been redeemed by Christ, cf. ch. v. 6, 8; iii. 8; Matt. xx. 26; xxiii. 12; Lke. xiv. 11; xviii. 14; xxii. 26, 27; Mk. x. 43, 44. The passage, Ps. xv. 4, rightly translated, is not in conflict with this exhortation. Paul, in a similar exhortation, takes cognizance of civil position and personal goodness, Rom. xiii. 7. To qualify this passage by limitation is arbitrary. τιμῶσατε, from τίω, to value, to define and pay the value of a thing or person.

ἀδελφότης, the brotherhood viewed as a whole, all who are, or are called your brothers, cf. ch. i. 22. Because such a disposition of esteem for and brotherly love of all can only flow from a true relation to God, the next exhortation is: “Fear God,” cf. ch. i. 17. Holy fear of the majesty of God is peculiarly in place, if you are tempted to abuse your Christian liberty. “He that fears God, loves his brethren, and embraces all mankind with becoming love, will not fail to render also to kings the honour that is due to them.” Calvin. Peter probably recollects Prov. xxiv. 21, which defines the same attitude of fearing God and honouring the king. Weiss calls attention to Matt. xxii. 21. [The variations of the Imperative form in this verse are noteworthy and suggestive. τιμῶσατε, the Aor. Imper., marks the general principle, the following three Present Imperatives define its application in particular relations.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Peter in the second part of the Epistle, ch. ii. 11, resumes the thought that believers are citizens of another fatherland, and only strangers here on earth, cf. ch. i. 1. 4; v. 10; i. 17. This fundamental view of the Apostle runs through the whole Epistle; on it are based the exhortations which follow ch. iv. 6. It must, consequently, be of the highest importance that we should constantly keep up a lively sense of our status as strangers. It belongs to the most noble and powerful incentives to sanctification, cf. 2 Cor. v. 8. 6; Phil. iii. 20.

2. Holy Scripture wisely prescribes no rules as to the best form of constitution: we learn from the Old Testament that the theocratic form of government is, properly speaking, the institution which corresponds to the will of God; this is also the end contemplated by Christianity. God is to be the all-animating principle in those who gladly obey Him, 1 Cor. xv. 28; Rev. xxi. 3; xxi. 3. But this end can be attained only after Satan has been bound, and after the great separation has been consummated, Mal. iv. 2; Matt. xiii. 40, etc. Many, impatiently anxious to anticipate the end towards which the development of the Christian Church is being led, rejected existing forms of government. Hence the Apostle exhorts, substantially, that it is the part of true Christians to be subjected to any human institution, whether monarchical, republican or aristocratic. The only limitation set to obedience to the government is its commanding any thing which militates against the clearly revealed will of God. It is not for us to ask how such and such a ruler did acquire his power, whether the constitution of a state be so framed as to contain the fundamental laws of God for the regulation of human relations, (as some try to press the word κρίσις), but we must obey for the Lord's sake, who says: "By me kings reign and princes decree justice. By me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth." Prov. viii. 15. 16. All rebellion against the ordained government is to be repudiated, as our evangelical Church has established it from the beginning, contrary to jesuitico-papistical teaching. [Frommüller refers to Germany. Those who wish to see the whole subject illustrated on sound Church principles are referred to the Homilies against Wilful Rebellion in the Book of Homilies, authoritatively set forth by the Church of England, and received by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States "as an explication of Christian doctrine and instructive in piety and morals."—M.] Rieger capably observes: In the words "human institution or ordinance," the Apostle does not deprive governments of the honour that they are the servants of God, Rom. xiii. 1, etc. The state and office of the government are God-derived; they have, indeed, in course of time, manifold human shapes, and in the hands of men have been variously instituted. But even this human element, so far from serving as a pretext for the withdrawal of submission, should rather be a root of patience, gladly to put up with human and inevitable infirmities, even in this respect."

3. The Christian must adapt himself to every form of government, and, as a pilgrim, finds it not difficult so to do.

4. Every government is bound, for its own interest, to punish the wicked, and to protect the good. An unchristian, unjust government is a sore punishment to a country; but there is no greater evil than anarchy, as Sophocles already perceived.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

What is necessary to walk as a pilgrim on earth? 1. Abstaining from fleshly lusts; 2. Obeying all human governments; 3. Patiently suffering wrong.—Which are the marks that a Christian is a stranger and pilgrim here? Consider, (a) his speech; (b) his carriage; (c) his manners; (d) his aims.—The Christian state a continuous warfare, Job vii. 1; Ps. xxiv. 8:—1. the enemies; 2. the weapons; 3. the victory.—Walk as lights in the heathenish-minded world!—The manifold days of visitation.—The Christian's demeanour towards the secular power.—How to shut up most effectually the mouth of the ignorant?—The Pharisaic hearts that make liberty the cloak of maliciousness.—True liberty a blessed bondage before God.—The four main points of a good conversation in this world.—Why and how we should, as Christians, give honour to all men?

KAPFF:—What makes up true liberty? 1. To be the servants of God and Jesus; 2. to be subject, for the Lord's sake, to all human authority; 3. to lead a good conversation, as strangers in the world.

STAUDT:—Maintaining the state of strangers: 1. In relation to the flesh; 2. In relation to the world.

STARK:—Pilgrim, how long dost thou stay at the inn? Yonder is thy fatherland. Away with the voluptuous joys of the village, through which thou art journeying!—He that would be free from the breaking out of the lusts of the flesh, must seize them by the root and choke them in the beginning.—Fleshly lusts, though they begin sweetly and are soothing to the heart, are the soul's inveterate enemies, and bring forth sin, Jas. i. 15; Sir. xxi. 3.—Fie! Christians like heathen. Beware and pray, "Gracious God, put an end to gross offences."—The more a man is surrounded by false, hostile, watching people, the more must he be on his guard, not only to avoid evil, but the appearance of it, 1 Thess. v. 22.—The pious have always to endure slander, yet their best defence is not in their mouth or pen, but in their works and deeds, v. 15.—A Christian's holy conversation must also aim at the conversion of others, which is realized in the case of some, ch. iii. 1.—The secular power is as much bound to reward virtue as to punish wickedness, Ps. lxxii. 3. 4; Prov. xx. 26.—Calumnies are best contradicted, if we prove by a holy conversation that they are untrue.—To requite evil with good has generally a good effect.—We are free, but not from the law of Christ and God, 1 Cor. ix. 21.—Christian courtesy tends to good reputation, to the favour and good-will of our neighbour, and to reciprocal good-will and confidence, Rom. xii. 10.—Mark that the fear of God is mentioned first, the honour of the magistrate afterwards, Acts v. 29.—There are two kingdoms, God's and the emperor's, each must remain within its bounds; God reserves to Himself the soul and conscience; the body, goods and possessions are under the emperor's rule, Matt. xxii. 21.

LUSCO:—Walk, as it pleases God.—Which is the deepest foundation of Christian morality?—How does a Christian's liberty exhibit itself?

BASLE COLLECTIONS:—Christian abstinence: 1. its nature; 2. its motives.

[LEIGHTON:—VER. 11. There is a faculty of reproving required in the Ministry, and sometimes a necessity of very sharp rebukes, cutting ones. They that have much of the spirit of meekness may have a rod by them, too, to use upon necessity; but sure the way of meekness is that they use most willingly.—It was a very wise abridgment that Epictetus made of philosophy, into those two words, bear and forbear.—It was the high speech of a heathen, That he was greater, and born to greater things, than to be a servant to his body; how much more ought he that is born again to say so, being born heir to “a crown that fadeth not away”! ch. v. 4.—Fleshly lusts.—They war against the soul; and their war is made up of stratagem and sleight, for they cannot hurt the soul but by itself. They promise it some contentment, and so gain its consent to serve them and undo itself; they embrace the soul that they may strangle it.—VER. 12. Mark three things, 1. one point of a Christian's ordinary entertainment in the world is, to be evil spoken of; 2. Their good use of that evil, to do the better for it; 3. The good end and certain effect of their so doing, the glory of God.—The goodness or beauty of a Christian's conversation consisting in symmetry and conformity to the word of God as its rule, he ought diligently to study that rule and to square his ways by it; not to walk at random, but to apply that rule to every step at home and abroad, and to be as careful to keep the beauty of his ways unspotted, as those women are of their faces and attire, that are most studious of comeliness.—What have we to do in the world as His creatures, once and again His creatures, His new creatures, created unto good works, Eph. ii. 10, but to exercise ourselves in those, and by those to advance His glory?—that all may return to Him, from whom all is, as the rivers run back to the sea, from whence they came.—VER. 15. Whereas those that have most real goodness, delight most to observe what is good and commendable in others, and to pass by their blemishes, it is the true character of vile, unworthy persons (as flies sit upon sores) to skip over all the good that is in men and fasten upon their infirmities.—And this is a wise Christian's way, instead of impatiently fretting at the mistakes or wilful miscensures of men, to keep still on in his calm temper of mind and upright course of life and silent innocence; this, as a rock, breaks the waves into foam that roar about it.—M.]

[WARBURTON:—VER. 13. 14. Reward cannot, properly, be the sanction of human laws.—M.]

[HARRINGTON:—To say, because civil magistracy is ordained of God, therefore it cannot be the ordinance of man, is as if you said: God ordained the temple, therefore, it was not built by masons; He ordained the snuffers, therefore, they were not made by a smith.—M.]

[WHATELY:—A timely, steady and mild resistance, on legal grounds, to every unlawful stretch of power (as in the well-known case of the ship-money) will prove the most effectual means, if uniformly resorted to, for preventing the occurrence of those desperate and extreme cases which call for violent and dangerous remedies.—M.]

[M.:—The principle on which we should resist ordinances in conflict with the will of God is fortiter in re sed leniter in modo.]

[LUTHER:—VER. 16. Christ's truth maketh us free, not civilly, nor carnally, but divinely. We are made free in such sort, that our conscience is free and quiet, not fearing the wrath of God to come. This is the true and inestimable liberty, to the excellency and majesty of which, if we compare the other, they are but as one drop of water in respect of the ocean. For who is able to express what a thing it is, when a man is assured in his heart that God neither is, nor ever will be angry with him, but will be forever a merciful and loving Father to him, for Christ's sake! This is, indeed, a marvellous and incomprehensible liberty, to have the Most High Sovereign Majesty so favourable to us that He doth not only defend, maintain and succour us in this life, but also, as touching our bodies, will so deliver us as that, though sown in corruption, dishonour and infirmity, they shall rise again in incorruption, and glory, and power. This is an inestimable liberty, that we are made free from the wrath of God forever, and is greatly more valuable than heaven and earth and the created universe. “Blessed is the man who is in such a case; yea, blessed is the man whose God is the Lord.”—M.]

[OLSHAUSEN:—Without law, or altogether above the law, man can never be, for the law is the expression of the Divine Essence itself.—M.]

[MILTON:—There are

“That bawl for freedom in their senseless mood,
And still revolt when truth would set them free;
License they mean when they cry liberty.”—M.]

[SANDBERSON:—Luther complains of “men who would be accounted good Christians merely because they rejected the authority of the Pope; who will do nothing that either the magistrate or God would have them to do; remaining in their old, disorderly nature, however much they may make their boast of the Gospel;” and who, as Calvin says, “reckoned it a great part of Christian liberty, that they might eat flesh on Fridays.”—Better is it by voluntary abstinence to part with some of our liberty as to God's creatures, than by voluntary transgression to become the devil's captives.—M.]

[HOOKER:—It was not the meaning of our Lord and Saviour, in saying “Father, keep them in Thy name,” that we should be careless in keeping ourselves. To our own safety our own sedulity is required.—M.]

[BARROW:—VER. 17. Human nature has become adorable as the true Shechinah, the everlasting palace of the Supreme Majesty, wherein the fullness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily; the most holy shrine of the Divinity, the orb of inaccessible light, as this, and more than all this, if more could be expressed, or, if we could explain that text, “The word was made flesh and dwelt among us.”—M.]

[SANDERSON:—When a piece of metal is coined with the king's stamp, and made current by his edict, no man may henceforth presume either to refuse it in payment, or to abate the value of it; so God, having stamped His own image upon every man, and, withal, signified His blessed pleasure, how precious He would have him to be in our eyes and esteem, by express edict proclaiming, "At the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man; I require every man to be his brother's keeper: for in the image of God made He man."—M.]

[The brotherhood.—Cf. Rom. xvi. 1; 8 Jno. 8. 9. When a Christian entered a foreign city, his first inquiry was for the Church (the brotherhood); and here he was received as a brother, and supplied with whatever could contribute to his spiritual or bodily refreshment. The Church letters, which were as tesserae hospitales, received the name of γράμματα τετυπωμένα, epistolae firmatae, because, to guard against counterfeits, they were drawn up after a certain form, τύπος; and also γράμματα κοινωνικά, epistolae communicatoriae, inasmuch as they indicated that the bearers were in the fellowship of the Church. Euseb. 4, 23; Cyprian, Ep. III.; Neander vol. I. § 2, p. 280.—Sic honorandus rex, ut ne contra Deum peccemus. CHRYSOSTOM.—M.]

CHAPTER II. 18-25.

ANALYSIS:—Exhortation of believing servants to self-denying obedience in doing and suffering after the example of Christ.

18 Servants,<sup>1</sup> be subject to your masters with<sup>2</sup> all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.<sup>3</sup> For this is thankworthy,<sup>4</sup> if a man for conscience<sup>5</sup> toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully. For what glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it,<sup>6</sup> ye take it patiently, this is acceptable<sup>7</sup> with God. For even hereunto were ye called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us<sup>8</sup> an example, that ye should follow his steps: Who did no<sup>9</sup> sin, neither was guile found in his mouth: Who, when he was reviled,<sup>10</sup> reviled not again; when he suffered,<sup>11</sup> he threatened not; but committed himself<sup>12</sup> to him that judgeth righteously: Who his own self<sup>13</sup> bare our sins in his own body on<sup>14</sup> the tree, that we,<sup>15</sup> being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes<sup>16</sup> ye were healed. For ye were as sheep going astray;<sup>17</sup> but are<sup>18</sup> now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls.

Verse 18. [δουλοῦντας ὑμῶν Cod. Sin.—M.]

[Domestics, family servants. εἰς φόβον; not so harsh as δεῦλος. 'In all fear be subject to your masters,' Cod. Sin.—M.]

[ἢ ἐν—In, not with.—M.]

[σκολιόις— Dcut. xxxii. 5, crooked, perverse. These σκολιοί are 'salvi et intractabiles, duris morosi,' so Gerhard.—M.]

[Cod. Sin. ἐν παντ. φόβ. ὑμ.—M.]

Verse 19. [For this is grace, so German for χάρις, but χάρις not—gratia divina but—laus. Cf. Calvin, "Idem valet nomen gratiae quod laudis. Inelligit enim nullam gratiam vel laudem conciliari nobis coram Deo, si penam sustinemus quam nostris delictis simus promeriti: sed qui patienter ferunt injurias, eos laude dignos esse, et opus facere Deo acceptum."—M.]

[Consciousness, not conscience. The man knows that God is cognizant of his suffering, and acts rather with respect to God than to man. German: Mitwissen, not Gewissen, the former denoting cognizance in the sense of joint knowing, the latter, conscience. Render the whole verse, "For this is grace, if, on account of God's cognizance, any one endures tribulations (λύσεις), suffering wrongfully.—M.]

Verse 20. [ποιόν—German 'was für ein,' or English, 'what kind of.'—M.]

[Cod. Sin. καταζόμενοι ὑπομένετε. German, "suffer patiently." The participial construction of the Greek is, on the whole, preferable to English version. "For what kind of glory (is it) if doing wrong (sinning), and being buffeted, ye endure it patiently? but if well doing, and suffering (for it), ye endure (it) patiently, this is grace."—M.]

[Χάρις, as above, "with God." The idea here, and in v. 19, seems to be that such conduct is the evidence of grace received, as none but a child of grace would thus act.—M.]

Verse 21. [Cod. Sin. reads ἀπέθανεν (died) for ἔπαθεν (suffered).—ἡμῶν ὑμῶν is the reading supported by the greatest number of MSS. Another reading, ἡμῶν ἡμῶν, according to Syr. Copt. Ephr. Aug. and still another, ὑμῶν ὑμῶν, Elzevir, Alford; on this last is based the German version, which renders "suffered for you, leaving you, etc."—M.]

[ὑπογραμμός—a copy-head,—a pattern, to write or paint by.—M.]

Verse 22. [ποιήσεν, the Aorist, as distinguished from the Imperfect, ποιεῖ, has the force of "never in a single instance." Alford.—M.]

[Cod. Sin. ὑπέθεν.—M.]

Verse 23. [The German retains the preferable participial form.—M.]

[<sup>10</sup> Render thus: "Who being reviled, reviled not again, suffering, threatened not."—M.]

[<sup>12</sup> παρῃδόν, either, "delivered (His enemies) up to (the Father)," so Alford, or, "delivered (His cause) up to (the Father)"; in either case, as Alford suggests, perhaps not without reference to "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."—M.]

[Cod. Sin. ἐλοιδόρετ.—M.]

Verse 24. [<sup>13</sup> "Who Himself bore our sins in His own body on the tree."—M.]

[14] The force of ἀνέχεσθαι is that "He took our sins to the tree, and offered them up on it." Alford. Cf. Vitrina in Huther: "Vix uno verbo ἡμεῖς vocis ἀναφέρειν exprimit potest. Nota VERBE d. OFFERRE. Primo dicere voluit Petrus, Christum portasse peccata nostra, in quantum illa ipsi erant imposita. Secundo, illa tulisse peccata nostra, ut ea secum obtulerit in altari. Respicit ad animantes, quibus peccata primo imponebantur, quique deinceps peccatis omni offerantur. Sed in quam aram? ἔλαον αὐτὸν αὐτὸν, lignum, ἡ. c. crucem.—M.]

[15] ἀπογενόμενοι—having died. The German renders, "that, having died to sins (i. e., our own), we should live to the righteousness of Him by whose stripes ye are healed"; but this construction is untenable on textual grounds.—M.]

[16] Stripes, singular, is the right rendering of μώλωπι. μώλωψ. "Paradoson apostolicum: videlicet sanati estis. Est autem μώλωψ videtur, frequens in corpore serviti, Sir. 12, 12." Bengel.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 18. Domesticity—but also to the crooked.—οἰκται less harsh and more comprehensive than δοῦλοι. Estius in Calov shrewdly suggests that the Apostle may have selected this designation because he was addressing Jewish Christians, to whom the term 'slave' was obnoxious, as incompatible with the people of God.

ὑποτασσόμενοι.—The most simple construction is to connect the Participle with the preceding Imperatives, especially with the ὅν θεὸν φοβέσθε, to which the following ἐν παντὶ φόβῳ seems also to refer. It is the Apostle's way to intertwine his sentences after this manner: the following exhortations begin with similar participial sentences, ch. iii. 1. 7. 8. 9. We learn from it, that he considers the duties to which he exhorts included in the principal duty, v. 12. He particularizes the exhortation, v. 18, as to the manner how the fear of God should be evidenced, v. 17.

In all fear.—Primarily, holy awe of God, after v. 17. Cf. Col. iii. 22; Eph. vi. 5; with full, entire fear; but it also involves the dread of an earthly master. There are, as Cornelius observes, different kinds of fear: α, fear of punishment; β, fear of the guilt of offending God; γ, fear of the offence of exciting masters to animosity against the faith.

ἀγαθός good in themselves and kind to others. —ἐπειθεῖς indicates a particular exhibition of ἀγαθός=indulgent, yielding, kind like the Syrian captain, 2 Kings v. 18. 14.—σκολιός=ἑρπύς, the contrary of the two other qualities, crooked in ways and therefore in heart, Ps. ci. 4; Prov. xi. 20; xvii. 20; iv. 24, similar to a piece of crooked wood that cannot be bent and is not fit for use, perverse, contentious, morose in disposition and behaviour. "Before such masters the false longings for liberty are most apt to break out: but here is just the point at which Christian views and principles appear in the strongest possible contrast with merely human and natural ones, and at which the peculiarity of the Christian calling, as a power of endurance, shows its marvellous glory." Wiesinger.

VER. 19. For this is grace.—The sense of these words is determined partly by the following χάρις παρὰ θεοῦ, partly by the antithesis ποῖον γὰρ ἄλλος. This question suggests that of our Lord, Lke. vi. 32. "For if you love them, which love you, what thanks have you?" ποῖα ὑμῖν χάρις ἐστὶ; in Matt. it reads τίνα μισθὸν ἔχετε. The ideas of thanks, reward and praise are here conjoined. Here as there the reference is to thanks, praise, or honour before God. You have no praise before God, you cannot glory in your tribulations (cf. Rom. v. 3), if you remain steadfast in troubles brought on by yourselves; but if, suffering wrongfully, you remain steadfast, you will have honour before God and secure His approval and good pleasure. Weiss compares the Hebrew חַן נָתַן, =ἐνδρίσκειν χάριν ἐναντιον θεοῦ, Gen. vi. 8; xviii. 16; xxx. 27; cf. Lke. i. 80; ii. 52; Acts ii. 47. As to the sense it is therefore=χαρίεν, cf. 1 Tim. ii. 8; v. 4. Col. iii. 20. The following explanation of Steiger is neither clear nor suited to the context. "It is grace indeed, even in the sight of God, to be able to suffer for God's sake." If he means: "Grace effects and shows its power in this, or the power and blessing of grace are exhibited in this," παρὰ θεῷ militates against his view.

For consciousness of God, etc.—διὰ συνειδήσιν θεοῦ.—συνείδησις, the sharing of some knowledge, from σύννοια, I am conscious. Many take θεοῦ as Genit. obj. on account of our knowledge of God, of His good will and pleasure; but it seems more natural to interpret: "because of the consciousness of God, because God knows all, because His eye sees all and because His arm punishes all evil," cf. Col. iii. 28. In this sense Joseph suffered innocently; he thought, "how then can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" Gen. xxxix. 9. He suffered διὰ συνειδήσιν θεοῦ.—To take συνείδησις here in the sense of conscience is forbidden by the addition of θεοῦ, although it often has that meaning, Jno. viii. 9; Acts xxiii. 1; xxiv. 16; Rom. ii. 15; ix. 1; xiii. 5; 1 Cor. viii. 7. 10; x. 25. 28; 2 Cor. i. 12; iv. 2; 1 Tim. i. 5. 19; iii. 9; 2 Tim. i. 8; Tit. i. 15; Heb. ix. 14; x. 22; 1 Pet. iii. 16.—Weiss explains: "The consciousness of God, as that of Him who has ordained this subjection, should ever accompany and prompt us to the discharge of this duty. The idea συνείδησις is here too much narrowed and taken subjectively instead of objectively."

ὑποφέρει equivalent to the following ὑπομένειν—to endure with constancy, 2 Tim. iii. 11; 1 Cor. x. 18, to bear up under afflictions and to carry them cheerfully on one's shoulders.—ἀντα, events causing multiform grief.

VER. 20. When ye be buffeted for your faults—suffer patiently.—ἀμαρτάνοντες καὶ κολαφιζόμενοι ὑπομενεῖτε.—The antithesis of ἀδικίας πάσχετε—κολαφιζόμενοι—to beat with the fist (vulgo "box the ear"), if as malefactors and punished, you suffer afflictions patiently. [κολαφιζόμενοι;

Bengel says: pœna servorum, eaque subita.—M.] The world may praise such conduct as courage and bravery, it will not give you glory before God.—Wrong: if the scourgings notwithstanding you persist in sinful courses; for the contrast is between merited suffering and martyr suffering. (Lachmann and Tischendorf read ποῖον γὰρ, but γὰρ is wanting in many MSS.)

VER. 21. For even hereunto were ye called,—namely, to do good and to endure with patience, ch. iii. 9, as we read, 1 Thess. iii. 8: "We are appointed, set thereunto," Acts xiv. 22. The first reason of the endurance of wrongful sufferings and perseverance in well-doing was the favour of God; the second is the calling of Christians as a further inducement to which is mentioned the example of Christ. The words are primarily addressed to slaves, as Bengel explains: this belongs to your Christian calling, which finds you in the condition of slaves; but they may be applied to all Christians, as is evident from the adduced motive.

Because also Christ suffered for you.—καὶ Χριστὸς, even Christ, the wholly Innocent One, has suffered. καὶ refers to ἀδίκως πάσχων [Alford makes καὶ apply to ἐπαθεν ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν on the ground that the last two words carry with them the ἀγαθοποιῶν, as explained below, v. 24.—M.].—ἐπαθεν. Huss: "Peter does not say what Christ did suffer, his object being to intimate that Christ endured for us every kind of suffering. Herein then we are to imitate Him, viz.: in patiently carrying whatever is laid upon us." As the disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord, he may not refuse to endure such sufferings.

ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν (Scholz and Tischendorf read ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν); ὑπὲρ may mean: in your stead, or for your benefit, or both. The last is probable, if reference be had not only to verses 22 and 28, but also to verse 24, cf. ch. iii. 18, where the vicarious character of the death of Jesus is unmistakably asserted. Winer remarks at p. 458 that ὑπὲρ sometimes touches closely upon ἀντί, because the agent, one acting for the benefit of another, in most instances becomes his substitute, cf. Gal. iii. 18; Rom. v. 7; xiv. 15; Matt. xx. 28; Jno. xv. 18; x. 15; vi. 51. The redemptive and typical nature of the sufferings of Christ are here intimately connected. Steiger justly asks: "What is it that makes the example of Christ obligatory to us, unless it be the fact that that typical suffering was at once and primarily a suffering for us, an offering of Christ and a benefit, engaging us to serve Him?"—This passage expresses in pregnant language the double idea: 1. You are obliged to obey Christ, because He suffered for you. 2. You are consequently called to innocent suffering, though you be guiltless, because also Christ, in suffering for you, suffered innocently and with the intent that in this respect you should imitate Him.

Leaving you—steps.—ὑπολαμβάνω another form of ὑπολείπω. Bengel remarks, "in abitu ad Patrum."—ὑπογραμμός, 2 Mac. ii. 29, a pattern to write or draw by, a copy-head such as a writing-master would give to his pupils. This requires a steady hand and daily practice. Hence, pattern, copy, example. It is characteristic of this epistle, that it lays great stress on the pattern

ἵνα ἐπακολούθησθε τοῖς ἰχθεσιν.—ἰχνη, a footprint, also the heels of shoes. The figure of a copyhead passes into that of a guide, whose footprints travellers along a steep, narrow and slippery path must follow up step by step. The footprints of His readiness to suffer, of His gentleness and humility are particularly alluded to. ἵνα dependent on ἐπαθεν, not on ἐκλήθητε. The imitation and following of Christ consists especially in the daily taking up of the cross, Lke. ix. 23. [This passage is also imitated by Polycarp, c. 8: Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς ἀνήγειρεν ἡμῶν τὰς ἀμαρτίας τῷ ἰδίῳ σώματι ἐπὶ τὸ ξύλον, ὃς ἀμαρτίαν οὐκ ἐποίησεν, οὐδὲ εὐρέθη ὁδὸς ἐν τῷ στήματι αὐτοῦ· μνηταὶ οὖν γενόμεθα τῆς ὑπομονῆς αὐτοῦ . . . τούτων ἡμῖν τὸν ὑπογραμμὸν ἔθηκε δὲ ἑαυτοῦ.

Tertullian de Patientia, c. 8. "He Who is God, stooped to be born in the womb of His Mother, and waited patiently and grew up; and when grown up, was not impatient to be recognized as God. He was baptized by His servant, and repelled the tempter only by words. When He became a Teacher, He did not strive nor cry, nor did any one hear His voice in the streets. He did not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax. He scorned no man's company; He shunned no man's table. He conversed with publicans and sinners. He poured out water and washed His disciples' feet. He would not injure the Samaritan village which did not receive Him, when His disciples called fire from heaven to consume it. He cured the unthankful; He withdrew from those who plotted against Him. He had the traitor constantly in His company and did not expose him. And when He is betrayed and is brought to execution, He is like a sheep which before his shears is dumb, and a lamb that doth not open its mouth. He who, Lord of angelic Legions, did not approve the sword of Peter drawn in His defence, He is spit upon, scourged, mocked. Such long-suffering as His, is an example to all men, but is found in God alone."—M.]

VER. 22. Who did no sin, etc.—This description of the innocent and patient suffering of Jesus is almost a literal quotation from the Septuagint version of Is. liii. 9, the word ἀμαρτίαν alone being substituted for ἀνομίαν. The passages Is. i. 6; liii. 7, are more freely treated in v. 28. The servant of God there designated is therefore none other than the Messiah. His perfect sinlessness is even more explicitly affirmed in Heb. vii. 26; 2 Cor. v. 21.

εὐπίστω not absolutely like εἶναι, but: no guile could be discovered in or proved from His words, all watching and sifting notwithstanding, and yet He was condemned. See Winer p. 701, cf. Jas. iii. 2. Bengel notices the fitness of this exhortation to slaves, who were greatly liable to the temptation of deceiving, slandering and menacing their fellow-slaves.

VER. 23. Who being reviled—threatened not.—He fulfilled Prov. xx. 22; xxiv. 29; He did what David had done, 2 Sam. xvi. 10, etc. The strong and bitter words, which Jesus had sometimes to use, Matt. vii. 6; xvi. 8; xxii. 18; xxiii. 18, 33; xii. 84, were not the utterings of personal hatred, nor retorts of insults heaped upon Him, but necessary evidences of the truth in order to cast a sting into the heart of His adversaries, and if possible to save them.

But delivered—righteously.—The second part of the sentence contains a climax. He even abstained from threatening, while He saw into the impending judgments. παράδιδω δὲ, He committed His cause to God, not however by invoking the vengeance of God on His enemies, but by praying for their conversion and pardon. If they persisted in repelling the overtures of grace, He left him to the justice of God. In this sense He said: "I seek not mine own glory: there is One that seeketh and judgeth." Jno. viii. 50.—Jeremiah spoke differently in the spirit of the Old Testament: "Let me see Thy vengeance upon them, for unto Thee have I revealed my cause." Jer. xi. 20.

To Him that judgeth righteously, otherwise than the anger of the injured part, and the violence of ungodly enemies would make it. It is both a great consolation and an invitation to leave vengeance to Him, cf. Rom. xii. 19; ii. 6-11; 1 Pet. iii. 9; 2 Thess. i. 6; Lke. xviii. 7, 8; ix. 55. Lechler remarks, that the Apostle's language was giving one the impression of coming in contact with an eye-witness of the arrest, of the trial, of the rough ill treatment and even of the crucifixion of the Lord. [Calvin has the following: "Qui sibi ad expetendam vindictam indulgent, non iudicis officium Deo concedunt, sed quodam modo facere volunt suum carnificem."—M.]

VER. 24. Who Himself bore our sins in His own body on the tree.—This verse is connected with ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν of v. 21, and defines it more particularly; it also brings the antithesis to v. 22 to a climax. Not only had He no sin, or did not sin Himself, but He bore our sins, etc.—ἀνέχεσθαι. The exegesis is determined by Is. liii. which evidently was before the Apostle's mind.

In that chapter occur the words נִשְׂאָתוֹ סָכַל, φέρειν. The LXX. render: τῷ μὲν ὅτι αὐτοῦ ἡμεῖς ἵδμεν; in v. 12, καὶ αὐτὸς ἁμαρτίας πολλὰν ἀνέχεσθαι; in v. 10, "When His soul shall make an offering for sin." All exegetical attempts to explain away the idea of substitution and the system of sacrifice closely connected with it, are altogether futile. As in the Old Testament, the expressions, "to carry one's sin," or, "to bear one's iniquity," are equivalent to "suffer the punishment and guilt of one's sin," Lev. xx. 17, 19; xxiv. 15; Ezek. xxiii. 35, so "to carry another's sin," denotes "to suffer the punishment and guilt of another," or "to suffer vicariously," Lev. iii. 19, 17; Numb. xiv. 33; Lam. v. 7; Ezek. xviii. 19, 20. Can this be done in any other way than by the imputation of the guilt and sin of others, as was the case in the sin and guilt-offerings? Weiss is quite arbitrary in persisting to exclude the idea of sacrifice from Is. liii., for v. 10 clearly refers to it. From a Jewish point of view such a separation of the doctrine of substitution from the idea of sacrifice is simply impossible, cf. Jno. i. 29; Lev. xvi. 21, 22.—The juxtaposition of ἡμῶν and αὐτοῦ both here and in Is. liii. is not insignificant, but gives prominence to the idea of substitution. Calvin says: "As under the law the sinner, in order to become free from sin, offered a sacrifice in his stead, so Christ took upon Himself the curse which we have merited by our sins in order to expiate it before God." Calov. "The cross of Christ was the lofty altar to which, when He was about to offer Himself, He ascended laden with our sins."

ἀναστρεφὲν ἐπὶ τὸ ξύλον—to carry up to the tree of the cross and thus to carry away and blot out, cf. Jas. ii. 21; Heb. ix. 28. The expression "tree" for "cross" is by no means undesigned, but selected as in Acts v. 30; x. 39, with reference to Deut. xxi. 23, cf. Gal. iii. 13, where it is said of him that is hanged on a tree, "he is accursed of God."

τὰς ἁμαρτίας not sin-offerings or offerings for our sins, a rendering which is inadmissible on grammatical grounds, but the guilt and punishment of our sins;—these He took upon Himself and expiated them, cf. Col. ii. 14; Gal. iii. 13; 2 Cor. v. 21.

In His own body, cf. Eph. ii. 15. This expression is far from singular in connection with the fact that Christ bore the punishment of sin also in His holy soul, provided we start from the idea of sacrifice and assume that Peter was comparing the body of Christ with the body of the slain victim. Gerhard says: "The body is mentioned in particular, because it was visibly suspended from the cross, and because His bodily sufferings were more immediately perceptible by the senses." Weiss tries to find a reference to the words of the institution of the Lord's Supper—but this seems to be rather far-fetched. How this carrying of the punishment of man's sin—which goes far beyond a compassionating entering into the feelings of our sinful misery—was possible must ever remain a wonderful mystery, on which the Petrine and Johannine doctrine of Christ as the real and original Head of mankind, sheds only a feeble light.

That having died to sins, we should live to the righteousness of Him.—Calov. "Peter combines the two benefits of the death of Christ, 1st, by it our sins are expiated, and 2d, in virtue of it sin is killed in us. We add, that the combination gives prominence to holiness as the end and aim of the atonement."

ἀπογίνομαι—ἀποθνήσκειν, cf. Rom. vi. 2. Bengel remarks: "γενέσθαι τινός means to become somebody's slave, ἀπό denotes removal. The body of Christ was removed, taken away from that tree, up to which He had carried our sins; thus we should remove ourselves from sin, become free from it." This explanation is more acute than satisfactory. The negative, dying unto sin, must go hand in hand with the positive. The connection of holiness and renovation with the death of Jesus is not indicated here, but may be supplied by recollecting that the gift of the Holy Ghost and the power of faith were acquired by the death of Jesus. Thereby the vital strength of sin is broken and the desire of righteousness planted in the soul.—ἐν τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ—to live in the service of righteousness, in keeping the commandments of God and Christ instead of the former service of sin. Bengel: "The whole of righteousness is one, sin manifold."

By whose stripes ye were healed.—Μάστιγι, a wound like that inflicted on slaves by scourging, a stripe or rather the weal left by a stripe. The Singular is used here as in Is. liii.; the sacred body of Jesus was so tortured that it was, as it were, only one wound or stripe.—οὐ τῷ μύλωνι αἰνοῦν. (Lachmann and Griesbach omit αἰνοῦν; Tischendorf retains it as the more difficult reading in his last edition). More emphatic than the relative by itself; supply τοῦτον before it.—Ἰάθητε. The apostle passes from the first person to the second, resuming his direct address to Christian slaves. So also at v. 25; the whole section from v. 18-25 is addressed to them. μύλωνι and ἰάσθαι suggest the secondary thought: You have to endure no kind of sufferings and wounds, but Christ, your Lord, endured them also; your Master exacts not more from you than He has borne Himself; He bears all in your stead in order to save you; how much more ought you, who are sinful, quietly and patiently to endure suffering?—But how shall we solve the prophetic and apostolic paradox, that Christ's stripe is our healing? Healing is here primarily not to be understood as a sinner's entire restoration to the image of God, else the preceding exhortation would not have been necessary, but as designating the healing of the stings of conscience, caused by sin; but this involves of course the principle that entire healing is rendered possible. "Sins, committed against our conscience, hurt the soul and leave scars which ever and anon open afresh, sting the conscience and hurt the soul." Steinhöfer.—These wounds of your soul were healed when by faith in the atoning death of Jesus you received forgiveness. He suffered the smiters to draw long furrows on His back, Ps. cxxix. 8, to wound His head and face, His hands and feet, and to pierce His heart that in our stead, as the Head for the members, He might make atonement."—

"Thou didst suffer stripe and weal, Treatment full of shame and pain,
That my plague thou mightest heal,
And my peace forever gain."

[German Hymn,—

Du hast lassen Wunden schlagen,
Dich erbarmlich richten zu,
Um zu heilen meine Plagen,
Um zu setzen mich in Ruh!—M.]

Tauler:—"He had to die that we might live: He was afflicted that we might rejoice; He was wounded that we might be healed: He shed His blood that we might be cleansed: the blood of the Physician was shed and made the patient's remedy."

VER. 25. For ye were straying like sheep.—The Apostle adds how and from what state they came to this healing. For ye were straying like sheep. A sheep is a stupid animal: so is the sinner, repelling salvation and straying in the ways of corruption. Sheep, as Aristotle observes, are subject to as many diseases as man. Stray sheep, separated from the shepherd and the flock, lack food and care, are exposed to many dangers, may become a prey to the wolf or fall into some abyss. The expression is taken from Is. liii., and the figure is of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament, Numb. xxvii. 17; 1 Kings xxii. 17; Ps. cxix. 176; Ezek. xxxiv. 5, 11, and in the New, Luke xv. 4, etc.; Jno. x. 15 etc.; Matt. ix. 36. It may have been particularly appropriate to the case of slaves of the dispersion who often changed masters and their place of domicile. Straying and sickness are often conjoined. "The figure of stray sheep alludes to original union with God and represents straying as alienation from God in consequence of sin." Jno. x. 12. Wiesinger.

But ye are now brought back (from the wilderness of sin, error and death) to the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls.—ἐπιστρέψατε, ye have been converted and have suffered yourselves to be converted. By faith you have laid hold of the atonement made for all and have returned from your wanderings. Christ is the arch-Shepherd, the true, the good Shepherd, promised already in the Old Testament, Is. xl. 11; Ezek. xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 24; Ps. xxiii. 1; cf. Jno. x. 11; Heb. xiii. 20; 1 Pet. v. 4. He even gives His life for the sheep, Jno. x. 12. The Apostle turns to that side of the pastoral relation of Christ which exhibits Him as the Bishop and Guardian of souls.—ἐπισκοπος is used of God in the LXX. version of Job xx. 29; the phrase is however more probably taken from Ezek. xxxiv. 11, 12, where we read: "For thus saith the Lord God, Behold I, even I, will both search my sheep and seek them out (ἐπισκέψομαι). As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered, so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day." He is ever careful of the salvation of His sheep and seeks to protect them from destruction. He is the Shepherd and Guardian of souls.—ψυχῶν not without special significance as it relates to slaves, and servants who are so often treated, as if they had no immortal soul, and who may therefore so much the more readily forget that they have a soul which they may lose, and that with the soul lost, all else is lost.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Divine origin of Christianity may also be demonstrated by the fact that it enters into and hallows every relation of life and descends to the most degraded of men and to the lowest conditions of society.

2. The glory of the Christian vocation is peculiarly manifested by endurance of wrong and indefatigable well-doing under it.

3. Plato anticipated the ideal of such a righteous man in the following passage of his second book on the State: "Without doing any wrong, he must have the greatest appearance of unrighteousness in order to be thoroughly approved in righteousness, since even slander and its consequences cannot move him, and although all his life-long considered unrighteous, he is yet righteous. The righteous, thus minded will be bound, scourged, tortured, blinded in both eyes and finally, having endured every possible evil, he will be hung." Plato's ideal and conception find their strongest fulfilment and reality in Christianity.

4. The exhortation that we should copy in ourselves, the pattern which Christ has left us in His life and death is enclosed forwards and backwards, ver. 21 and v. 24, by the recollection that He was crucified for us. This is the impelling motive which at once enables us to imitate Christ and to do it cheerfully.

5. The vicarious sacrificial death of Jesus, based on Is. liii., is here affirmed with so much clearness that even rationalistic adversaries are unable to resist it, cf. Wegschneider, Instit. p. 407, 6th ed. How we are healed by the wounds of Jesus, is a mystery which reason cannot fully solve, and to which we have to submit by faith in the clear testimony of Holy Writ. "Jesus, who by His blood has effected our reconciliation, is Himself the Physician who heals our souls." Even Dr. Baur is constrained to admit that the idea of substitution cannot be denied in such passages of the New Testament as Rom. iv. 25; Gal. i. 4; Rom. viii. 3; 1 Cor. xv. 8; 2 Cor. v. 19, that the preposition imép denotes both the idea of substitution and what takes place for the benefit of man; that these two points are passing the one into the other, so as to interpenetrate each other, but that the latter is decidedly predominant; that according to the Apostle's doctrine the justice of God had to be satisfied by an actual atonement for the punishment of sin; that viewing the death of Jesus from the stand-point of Divine justice, is only the outer side of the event and its merely judicial aspect, but that the inmost ground of the Divinely-made institution is the grace of God, Rom. iii. 24, 2 Cor. v. 19, and a point so much more extensive than the other as to constrain us to regard only as an emanation of Divine grace whatever Divine justice may claim of the death of Jesus; that it was grace that God would not allow men to be punished in their own persons, but in their substitute. See Baur, Lehrbegriff des Ap. Paulus p. 541. This is certainly a wonderful testimony from the lips of an unbeliever.

6. The medicine has been prepared by His wounds, the balsam has been cleared under the press of the cross.—"The blood of Jesus is the most precious balsam with which Jesus washes and heals our wounds, as the good Samaritan poured oil and wine in the wounds of the bleeding and half-dead man to lessen their smart and to heal them. There is vital strength in this crimson oil whereby we are fully healed." Steinhöfer, Evangel. Glaubensgrund, p. 434.

7. Observe the important distinction between the atonement as the objective act of God in Christ in virtue of which salvation has been acquired for and is offered to sinners, and the subjective appropriation of salvation by means of conversion. The words of Paul: "Ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God," 1 Cor. vi. 11, apply only to those who have sought Christ in penitence and faith and laid hold of His merits.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

How may the much-lamented difficulties relating to domesticity be remedied? 1. By the return of the fear of God into the houses and hearts of men; 2. By masters and servants entering upon the imitation of Christ.—The secret of partaking more and more of the grace of God.—The Christian call, 1. To a state of grace, in order to be and live in it; 2. To suffer innocently and patiently; 3. To persevere in well-doing.—The Christian's consolation in innocent suffering.—Righteousness of life must flow from righteousness by faith.—The sufferings of Christ for us and before us.—The power of Christ's example.—The great change in conversion.—Man a stray sheep, while excluded from the calling of God in Christ.

STARKE:—God ordains, that one should rule and another serve.—Bad masters are for the trial and perhaps also for the chastisement of servants.—Masters are often decried as whimsical for desiring propriety and right in things spiritual and temporal. Servants, be ashamed and do not slander your godly masters, but learn to be wise and to do all things right after the will of God and their mind.—Many masters may deal ill with their people, but if they endure wrong patiently, attend to their service in the fear of God, pray diligently for their masters, they are God's people and God will be their helper and reward, Gen. xxxi. 12.—As it is the shame of servants to be punished for ill-doing, so it is their veritable honour and glory before God and man if they endure wrong innocently and patiently, ch. iv. 15. 16.—Christians are not called to voluptuousness and good days but to the cross, ch. ii. 21.—We should often look at ourselves in the sufferings of Christ, as if they were a mirror, that we may be glorified into the same image, Heb. xii. 3.—Christ is our Gift and Pattern, our Mediator and Head, our Shepherd and Light. What is our duty? To believe and to obey (follow) Jno. viii. 12.—The words, the ways and the works of Christ are, as it were, living letters and footprints for us to copy and follow, Heb. xii. 6.—If you have a just cause and yet are oppressed, be still and persevere, God will maintain your cause, Ps. xciv. 15.—Away with foolish sacrifices for the living or the dead! The one sacrifice of our High-priest Jesus Christ on the cross is sufficient for the reconciliation of the whole world, Heb. ix. 12. 26; x. 11. 12.—The exaltation and glory of Christians blossom forth from the cross.—Sin was sacrificed and slain by Christ that it should also be dead in us. Where it lives, the virtue of the death of Christ is as yet unfelt, Rom. vi. 6.—Sin is like a maze: whose enters the same cannot easily find his way out.—Whoso remains in the wilderness out of Christ (extra) must at last fall into the abyss of hell and eternally despair, Acts iv. 12; Ps. cxix. 176.

AUGUSTINE:—"We must not cease to hope for the wicked, but rather pray for them the more diligently, that they may become good, because the number of saints has at all times been increased by the number of the ungodly. Those who are goats to-day, may be sheep to-morrow, those who are weeds to-day, to-morrow may be wheat."

KAPFF:—What is necessary in conversion? 1. That we should be healed by the wounds of Jesus. 2. That we should die to sin and live to righteousness.

[LEIGHTON:—Vmr. 18. It is a thing of much concernment, the right ordering of families; for all other societies, civil and religious are made up of these. Villages and cities and churches and commonwealths and kingdoms, are but a collection of families: and therefore such as these are, for the most part, such must the whole societies predominantly be. One particular house is but a very small part of a kingdom, yet the wickedness and lewdness of that house, be it but the meanest in it, as of servants one or more; and though it seem but a small thing, yet goes in to make up that heap of sin that provokes the wrath of God and draws on public calamity.—Servants. 1. Their duty (be subject); 2. Its extent (to the forward); 3. Its principle (for conscience toward God).—The eagle may fly high and yet have its eye down upon some carrion on earth; even so a man may be standing on the earth and on some low part of it, and yet have his eye upon heaven and be contemplating it. That which one man cannot at all see in another, is the very thing that is most considerable in their action, namely, the principle whence they flow and the end to which they tend. This is the form and life of actions, that by which they are earthly or heavenly. Whatsoever be the matter of them, the spiritual mind hath that alchymy indeed, of burning base metals unto gold, earthly employments into heavenly.—V. 21. The particular things that Christians are here said to be called to, are suffering, as their lot, and patience, as their duty, even under the most unjust and undeserved sufferings.—He that aims high, shoots the higher for it, though he shoot not so high as he aims. This is that which ennobles the spirit of a Christian, the propounding of this our high pattern, the example of Jesus Christ.—V. 24. The eye of a godly man is not fixed on the false sparkling of the world's pomp, honour and wealth. It is dead to them, being quite dazzled with a greater beauty. The grass looks fine in the morning, when it is set with those liquid pearls, the drops of dew that shine upon it; but if you can look but a little while on the body of the sun, and then look down again, the eye is as it were dead; it is not that faint shining on the earth that it thought so gay before: and as the eye is blinded and dies to it, so within a few hours that gayety quite vanishes and dies itself.—Faith looks so steadfastly on its suffering Saviour, that, as they say (Intellectus fit illud quod intelligit), it makes the soul like Him, assimilates and conforms it to His death, as the Apostle speaks. That which Papists fabulously say of some of their saints, that they received the impression of the wounds of Christ in their body, is true in a spiritual sense of the soul of every one that is indeed a saint and a believer; it takes the very print of His death by beholding Him and dies to sin, and then takes that of His rising again, and lives to righteousness; as it applies it to justify, so to mortify, drawing virtue from it. Thus said one, "Christ aimed at this in all those sufferings that with so much love He went through; and shall I disappoint Him and not serve His end?"—M.]

[JORTIN:—VER. 18. "The law of nature knows no such thing as slavery, for by nature all men are free and equal; but by the civil laws, and by the practice of nations, it was established, and still continues among those who know not the Gospel; and the more is the shame and the pity, it is to be found in some places where Christianity is professed. The religion of Christ, when it first made its progress in the world, left the civil laws of nations, in a great measure, as it found them, lest by altering or repealing them, it should bring confusion and disturbance into human society; but, as by its own genius and tendency, it leads men gently back to the precepts of nature and equity, to kindness and to mercy, it put an end by degrees, in most civilized nations, to that excessive distance and difference between masters and slaves, which owed its origin to outrage and war, to violence and calamity; so that in Christian countries the service which is performed is usually, as it ought to be, voluntary and by agreement. But what the writers of the New Testament have said concerning slaves, holds true concerning hired servants and all those who are employed in other denominations under a master, that they discharge their office modestly, diligently and willingly, and act with faithfulness and integrity in every thing that is committed to them."—M.]

[MACKNIGHT:—"In this verse the Apostle establishes one of the most noble and important principles of morality, namely, that our obligation to relative duties does not depend, either on the character of the persons to whom they are to be performed, or on their performance of the duties which they owe to us, but on the unalterable relations of things established by God."—M.]

[BP. HORNE:—VER. 21. "Our Lord was 'both a sacrifice for sin, and also an example of godly life.' (Collect for second Sunday after Easter.) By His sacrifice He procured us grace to follow His example, which otherwise would have been proposed to us in vain; by His example He showed us how to make a right use of that grace, which, unless we do, it is given in vain. So that if he who regards Him as an example, and not as a Redeemer, will be lost, because he cannot follow Him; he who takes Him for a Redeemer, and not for an example, will be lost, because he does not follow Him, since redemption was in order to holiness; and although it be most certain that without Christ no man can attain unto holiness, yet it is no less certain that 'without holiness no man shall see the Lord.' He only is fully and effectually redeemed, and has evidence to assure him of it, who bears stamped on his soul the image and superscription of his Saviour."—M.]

[DEAN STANHOPE:—VV. 24. 25. "A consideration of the purpose for which our Saviour suffered should be a matter of great consolation to us, when we meditate upon His sufferings, and cause us to mingle tears of joy with those of grief. The latter we should be insensible not to pay to the excruciating agonies of our beloved Master; the former we should be unthankful and cruel to ourselves not to give to the happy effects of the misery which He so graciously condescended to undergo for us. But, to make both effectual, let us, inflamed with zeal and gratitude and love unfeigned, endeavour for our own particular, and most devoutly beg for the rest, as the best of Churches teaches us, that the innumerable benefits of this precious blood-shedding may have their full extent and free course; that 'we and the whole Church of Christ may receive remission of sins' and all the other blessed effects of His passion; that He, who 'hath made a full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world,' would cause His way to be known, and show His saving health to the yet dark and unbelieving nations; and that all, who do already know it, may walk worthy of their knowledge and of the high vocation wherewith they are called. And O! that the death tasted by our Redeemer for every man may be effectual to the saving of every man! Even so, blessed Jesus, "by thine agony and bloody sweat, by thy cross and passion, good Lord, deliver us."—M.]

Verse 7. [This verse needs entire recasting; the E. V. is involved. We translate, closely following the original: "Ye husbands, in like manner, (refers to ἀντας τιμήσατε, ch. ii. 17) dwelling, according to knowledge with the feminine, as with the weaker vessel, giving honour as to those who are also fellow-heirs of the grace of life, in order that your prayers be not hindered. So Alford. The Cod. Sin. reads συννομιλῶντες, "companying with," for συννοικοῦντες, and supplies ποικίλεις, manifold before χάριτος.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. Likewise, wives, be in subjection to your own husbands.—The Apostle now passes on to conjugal duty, intending to make ἡμεῖς convey the idea that the obedience of wives to their husbands is as sacred an obligation as that of servants to their masters. What may be the reason of his not noticing the duties of believing masters to their servants, to which Paul, in Eph. vi. 9; Col. iii. 25, has special reference? It is probably to be found in the circumstance that in the Churches to which he wrote this Epistle were only few believing masters, or none that had slaves. Estius sees in this circumstance an additional reason that this Epistle was addressed to the Jews of the dispersion, among whom were many slaves, but few masters.—αἱ γυναῖκες, address as in ch. ii. 18; iii. 7; Eph. v. 22. 25.—ἰσθῆναι, Participle, as ch. ii. 18, governed by the principle, ch. ii. 17, "Fear God," etc., cf. Col. iii. 18; Gen. iii. 16.

To your own husbands.—Cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 35; vii. 2; Eph. v. 21. 25. 28. 33. ἰδιος is not without emphasis; it adverts to an antithesis; it is to remind the wives, as Calvin rightly observes, of the duty of chastity, and warn them of all suspicious obedience to strange men. Believing wives married to unbelieving or pagan husbands might, even apart from the then prevalent demoralization of the conjugal estate, be tempted to seek close intercourse with enlightened men, strong in faith, and to be led by them; such a course might easily shake the confidence of the conjugal relation; hence the Apostle's delicate caution. The Apostle takes it for granted that the greater number of husbands of believing wives are also believers in the publicly preached word; but even if (καὶ εἰ) this should not be the case, the wives must persevere in self-sacrificing, self-denying obedience, and thus seek to win their husbands, not by talking and arguing, but by the powerful preaching of a quiet conversation.—ἀνευ λόγου, without open preaching and peculiar arts of speech on the part of the wives.—διὰ τῆς ἀναστροφῆς, by means of their behaviour and obedience; this is their principal task.—κερδήσανται, cf. 1 Cor. ix. 19–22; vii. 17. To gain for Christ, for the Gospel, for the kingdom of heaven, for themselves—σώζειν. Calov remarks that the expression alludes to the great value of the soul, and to the holy joy in their conversion. The greatest gain is that of the converted themselves, Phil. iii. 8. [Leighton observes: "A soul converted is gained to itself, gained to the pastor, or friend, or wife, or husband who sought it, and gained to Jesus Christ: added to His treasury, who thought not His own precious blood too dear to lay out for this gain."—M.]—Grotius cites the language of the heathen orator Libanius, which shows how primitive Christian wives followed these exhortations. He exclaims: "What wives have these Christians!"

VER. 2. When they behold your conversation, chaste in fear.—ἐποπτεύσαντες, cf. ch. ii. 12, an insight flowing from close observation.—τὴν ἐν φόβῳ ἀγνήν. The allusion is probably (with reference to ch. ii. 17) to the fear of God, not to the fear of the husband, as in Eph. v. 33.—ἀγνήν not=chaste in its restricted sense, but because of its close connection with φόβῳ and with the sequel, denotes chaste in a wider sense, =pure, holy, cf. Jas. iii. 17.—So Calov, not only with reference to conjugal fidelity and cleanness of the body.

VER. 3. Your adornment let it not be the outward (adornment) of braiding the hair, and putting round golden ornaments, or of putting on of dresses.—This verse is closely connected with the foregoing. This holy conversation in the fear of God is described first negatively: "In contrast with the means used by worldly-minded women to attract their husbands, the Apostle specifies the means whereby a Christian wife may hope to win even a resisting husband."—ὡς ἔσω sc. ὁ κόσμος, cf. 1 Tim. ii. 9.—The Genitives are those of nearer definition, and describe the act of adorning, not the objects of adornment.—ἐμπλοκή, the artificial braiding of hair; female vanity is inexhaustible in the invention of new styles and fashions. Calov cites a passage from Jerome's Epistle to Demetrius, in which he adverts to this subject, and quotes Cyprian's sharp censure of women on this score. The views, which even the more serious heathen held concerning such trifles, have been collected by Steiger from Plato, Sophocles and Plutarch.—ἡ ἐνδύσεως ἡμετέρας.—Peter, of course, adverts simply to the costliness of dresses. [But does not ἐνδύσεως allude rather to putting them on in an unbecoming and indecent manner? Alford says that 'within the limits of propriety and decorum, the common usage is the rule.' True, but where are those limits? Are they observed in the 'full dress' of the best society of either hemisphere? Is 'full dress' not a misnomer, and ought not our Christian matrons to use their influence in having full dress made more dress?—M.] Calov:—"Peter forbids not any and every adornment, but a modest and seemly adorning of the body, conformably to their several stations, is allowed," cf. 1 Cor. xii. 23.

VER. 4. But let it be the hidden man of the heart—price.—κρυπτός ἄνθρωπος=ἐσω ἄνθρωπος, Rom. vii. 22; 2 Cor. iv. 16; Eph. iii. 16. This hidden man is not, as Steiger holds, =καρδία, but that which the Spirit of God forms and develops in the secret workshop of the heart, namely, the new way of thinking, feeling and willing, the new spiritual life, the new nature, the inmost kernel of man's religion, in as far as he has within him something flowing from the life of Jesus. [In other words the inner man is the Christian, the regenerated, daily-renewed man, adorned with the beauty of holiness with his (heart) affections centred in God.—M.]—ἐν τῷ ἀθάρτω. Contrasted with those perishable, worthless trifles, v. 3. A neuter adjective is used for an abstract noun (v. Winer, p. 266). Beza: =sinceritas, incorruptio.

πραῖς=ἡ mild, gentle, meek, Matt. xxi. 5; 1 Cor. xiii. 4, etc.; Eph. iv. 2; Col. iii. 12; Mt. xii. 29; Jas. i. 20; iii. 13; 1 Cor. iv. 21; Gal. vi. 1; 2 Tim. ii. 24. The contrary of self-will, pride, presumption, obstinacy, hardness, anger and envy.—ἡσυχίῳ, calm, tranquil, without passionate excitement. Bengel:—mansuetus, qui non turbat, tranquillus, qui turbas aliorum placide fert.—πνεύματος relates not to the Holy Spirit, but to the spiritual life, infused into believers by the Holy Ghost.—δ ἵστω may be connected either with πνεύματος or with ἀθάρτω. Bengel connects it with the latter, as being the principal subject. [but "the meek and quiet spirit" seems to be the main thing desired.—M.]—πολυτελής=καλίστημος ch. i. 19.—[cf. Mk. xiv. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 9; Pro. i. 18.—M.]—ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, "coram Deo, qui interna, non externa, spectat, cui placere curant pi." Bengel.

VER. 5. For after this manner formerly also the holy women, who hoped in God, adorned themselves, etc.—οὕτω refers to what immediately precedes. The proof of it [the meek and quiet spirit.—M.] is their obedience.—ἡγιασμέναι, Luke i. 70; Acts iii. 21; Eph. iii. 6; 2 Pet. i. 21; those women of blessed memory and singled out in the history of salvation; their personality is defined by their hope in God. If God is all in all in a man's heart, it has renounced the idol 'vanity' and expelled passionate excitement, cf. 1 Tim. v. 5. Tertullian:—"Be clothed with the silk of honesty, the byssus of holiness and the purple of chastity: thus adorned, God will be your friend." Bengel:—"vera sanctitas, spes in Deum: est hoc epitheton pars subiecti."

VER. 6. As Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord.—This obedience is illustrated by the example of Sarah, whom the Rabbis also were wont to set up as a pattern. She showed her obedience first in leaving with her husband the land of her nativity in reliance upon the promises of God, secondly in regarding Abraham as her Lord and calling him so, Gen. xviii. 12, notwithstanding they were both descended from a common earthly parent, Gen. xx. 12.—ὑπήκουεν denotes the continuance of her obedience, which was rewarded by Abraham in his turn obeying her, Gen. xvi. 2; xxi. 12.—Grotius remarks that when the corruption of morals had become general at Rome, wives were called mistresses [of course in a good sense.—M.]

Of whom ye have become children.—ἧς ἐγενήθητε τέκνα. This is one of the Apostle's frequent allusions to Isaiah; cf. ch. li. 1. 2. "Look upon the rock whence ye are hewn (Abraham) and to the hole of the pit (or well) whence ye are digged (Sarah)." Sarah is here mentioned as the first mother of the people of Israel.—It is not ἰστέ but ἐγενήθητε, because the expression 'children of Sarah' has not only a carnal but also a spiritual import. Steiger argues from this passage that the Apostle was addressing Gentile Christians as he would hardly have said to Jewesses, "ye have become Sarah's children" without adding some such explanation as this; "You have now become Sarah's children indeed or after a spiritual manner;" but the opposite conclusion seems more in place. Did our Lord make such a qualification when He said to Zaccheus, the Jewish publican-in-chief, "He also is a son of Abraham"? Luke xix. 9. Did He do it in the case of the infirm woman of whom He said that she was a daughter of Abraham? Lke. xiii. 16; Jno. viii. 39. Even John the Baptist destroyed the delusion that those are Abraham's children who are descended from him after the flesh, Matt. iii. 9. Believing Jewesses would have no difficulty in understanding what was meant, while to Christian Gentile women it would hardly have been equally intelligible and applicable. Weiss remarks, "To be called the daughters of Sarah was no particular distinction conferred upon Gentile women, but to be designated as the children of their venerated ancestress and that in the highest sense (i. e., of similarity of disposition), was the loftiest praise bestowed upon Jewesses." This conclusion is corroborated by the quotation from Is. li.

If ye do good and are not afraid of any sudden fear.—ἀγαθοποιούσαι, not in that - - - or because - - -, or if - - -, but: as those who - - - [so German.—M.]. You evidence your relationship to Sarah by doing good. Grotius recalls the amiable reception which Sarah accorded to the stranger guests and the readiness with which she obeyed Abraham on that occasion, Gen. xviii. 6; and in connection with the sequel refers to Gen. xx. But the sense is probably more general and the reference is rather to zeal in well-doing, as in ch. ii. 15. 20.—μὴ φοβούμεναι may be a quotation from Prov. iii. 25: "ὅς μὴ φοβήσῃ πτόησιν ἐπελθούσαν οὐδέ ὁρμῆς ἀσέβων ἐπερχομένων.

—πτόησις, terror caused by something external. As those who are so full of trust in God, that they are not tenderly moved by any evil or by menaces similar to those Sarah had to pass through at the court of Pharaoh and Abimelech, cf. Heb. xi. 11. The sentence contains also an exhortation to strive more and more for the courage and manly fortitude of their ancestress, cf. ch. iii. 14. [Estius says on πτόησιν: quod dum facitis, non est quod metuatis quidquam mali: velut, ne maritis vestris displiceatis, si minus corruptæ inceditis: aut ne serviliter vos tractent, si faciles ad obsequium vos præbeatis, ut solet sexus muliebris vanis pavoribus esse obnoxius. Sed et si forte nacti estis maritos iniquiores, silentio potius ac patientia, quam multis verbis studeat eorum animos lenire." cf. Lke. xxi. 9; xxiv. 37.—M.]

VER. 7. Ye husbands, in like manner, dwelling according to knowledge with the feminine, as with the weaker vessel.

—Ὁμοίως refers back to ch. ii. 17 as in v. 1. Weiss wrongly maintains that the exhortation to Christian husbands is out of place in this connection because it does not coincide with the point of view indicated at ch. ii. 11. 12. But why should it not coincide, if the Apostle addresses in turn the different conditions and classes of Christians, and shows to each how they should walk worthily among the Gentiles, honour all men and fear God? It would rather have been a grave omission, had he not reminded husbands of their duties; the exhortation was indeed peculiarly needed in order to avoid all misunderstanding and abuse of the obedience of women.—His first precept to husbands relates to συννοεῖν = to dwell together, to have intercourse in general and then, as some of the ancients understand the word, with particular reference to conjugal intercourse. It should take place κατὰ γνώσιν, according to knowledge—derived from reason and from the Gospel in respect of their peculiar relations and wants.—ὡς ἀσθενεστέρω σκεῖται should be joined to συννοεῖν; otherwise συννοεῖν would have no object, ἀπονεύοντες would have two ὡς.—σκεῖται is widely used of vessels, clothes and things in general, Deut. xxii. 5; Lke. xvii. 31; then of men with reference to their dependence and frailty and their destination for some particular purpose. We are like vessels in the potter's hand, Jer. xviii. 6; Is. xxxix. 16; xlv. 9; xlv. 8. He can break or preserve, reject or prefer them to honour, Jer. xix. 11; xxii. 28; xlviii. 88; Hos. viii. 6; Ps. ii. 9; Rev. ii. 27; Rom. ix. 21. 22; 2 Tim. ii. 20. In particular, the body is called the vessel containing the soul, 1 Thess. iv. 4. 5. Here σκεῖται applies equally to husband and wife as is evident from the comparative ἀσθενεστέρω; it designates both as the handiwork of God, organized and designed for each other. The husband should be particularly moved to a considerate, loving and careful treatment of his wife by the thought:—"God himself has thus appointed and made the nature of woman."—ἀσθενεστέρω. Calov:—"Women are weak in point of sex, the constitution of their body, mind and judgment, art, aptitude and wisdom in the conduct of affairs." [Rather a sweeping judgment of woman, and as ungenerous as untrue. Woman is physically man's inferior, but it is doubtful whether she is so mentally. This is not in the writer's opinion a question of superiority or inferiority, but one of diversity. There are mental qualities in which woman excels man and others in which he excels her. They seem to be well balanced under equal advantages afforded to each. His experience in schools constrains him to admit that up to the age of sixteen, girls are decidedly brighter and better students than boys. If they do not progress after that period in an equal ratio, the fault belongs to vicious social habits and to the superficial and fanciful ideas as to the maximum attainments of females, but not to the natural endowment of their mind. It came forth from the Creator's hand perfect after its kind, every way adapted to man's mind and the two equally and healthily developed, working together in one direction, supply each other's defects and strengthen each other's powers. United, this natural diversity blends in harmony. An excellent discussion of this subject may be found in Adolphe Monod's "La Femme," Paris. 1860.—M.] Luther:—"Woman is weaker in body, more timid and less courageous than man, hence your treatment of her should be accordingly." But as woman's weakness is relative, man also being a weak, frail vessel, he, mindful of his own weakness, ought the more readily to sympathize with the weaker, τῷ γυναικίῳ σκεῖται.

Giving honour as to those who are also fellow-inheritors of the grace of life, in order that your prayers be not hindered.—The second precept is: ἀπανέμωτες τιμὴν: to accord τὸ νόμιμον, what is due; τιμὴν with reference to ch. ii. 17. The honour due to them, honourable treatment which implies also care for their bodily wants.—The reason of this esteem: they also are fellow-heirs of the grace of life; this is a higher reason than the former, flowing from the natural relation of the sexes. Woman becomes man's equal in virtue of the gift of the grace of life accorded to and hoped for by both.

—συγκληρονόμοις. Griesbach and others read συγκληρονόμοι, masculine; this reading gives the same sense, but the former is preferable, for they are destined with other believers to inherit the kingdom of heaven. καὶ denotes the participation, cf. ch. i. 4. 10. 18; Rom. viii. 17; Eph. iii. 6; Heb. xi. 9. The hypothesis is that both husband and wife are believers, or if either part be as yet unbelieving, it may become believing.—χάριτος ζωῆς; χάρις=χάρισμα, the gracious gift of life, of eternal life beginning here and consummated above, cf. Gal. iii. 28. Others explain: grace communicating life, or life given out of grace, i. e., flowing from it.—εἰς τὸ μὴ ἐκκόπτεσθαι. (Griesbach and others read ἐγκόπτεσθαι = ῥῥ to be interrupted, lamed). This expression is used of the pruning, cutting down and tearing up of trees, hence to cut off [to cut off occasion.—M.], to hinder, render ineffectual. Common and private prayer, its power and effect are hindered, where such esteem is wanting, for prayer, in order to be effectual, exacts a reconciled mind, Matt. v. 23; vi. 14; 1 Tim. ii. 8; 1 Jno. iii. 21. ["Cum vir et uxor non sunt bene concordēs, minus possunt oratione vacare et eorum orationes sunt minus exaudibiles," Lyra.—M.]. Roos: "There is no room for prayer that may be answered where the husband despises and tyrannizes his wife and where a marriage is marred by discord." Grotius: "Harsh treatment leads to insult and strife, which hinder the power and efficacy of prayer." Mtt. xviii. 19; Sir. xxv. 1. Wiesinger: "The consciousness of having sinned against the hope of salvation forces itself as an obstruction between God and him who prays, and thus bars the way of prayer."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The conjugal state is not a human-Divine κρίσις, like the secular rule, ch. ii. 13, but instituted by God Himself, Gen. ii. 18. 24; Matt. xix. 5; it is a relation of life adapted even to the royal priesthood, to the holy people of God's possession, in which they are to show forth the praises (virtues) of Him who has called us out of darkness into His marvellous light, ch. ii. 9. On the other hand, we ought not to deny the existence of a pure celibacy; so Thiersch.

2. Although the necessity of the wife obeying the husband is recognized outside of Christianity, the equality of husband and wife, in virtue of Divine appointment and grace, were altogether unknown; hence there is every where (i. e., outside of Christendom) a great degradation of the female sex. "Christianity," observes Steiger, "is equi-distant from the moral degradation of the female sex, which the Mohammedans and Rabbis would almost deprive of immortality, and from the secular exaltation and deification, which, especially since the middle ages, has been defended as Christian by those who confounded Germanism with Christianity, while it secured to woman anything but happiness."

3. Peter, defining prayer as the centre and support of conjugal life, takes as lofty a conception of the matrimonial covenant as Paul, although the Pauline idea that the marriage of Christians is a figure of the relation of Christ to His Church does not occur in Peter (cf. Eph. 5).

4. True love in the conjugal state depends upon and is rooted in mutual esteem; where this is wanting, the conjugal state is shaken at its very foundation; but it is not only esteem of the personal qualities and excellencies of either part, but also, and chiefly, the appreciation flowing from the thought: Thy partner, like thyself, is a child of God, purchased with the same precious blood of Christ, and called, like thyself, to be an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

There must be some special reason why wives are reminded of their duties before the husbands, and charged with obedience as their principal and foremost task.—Christian wives need not ask, which husbands must we obey? The direction is unmistakable: your own husbands; consequently, also unbelieving, harsh, and wayward husbands.—Noble art!—to be silent with the mouth, and to speak in the life. Augustine tells of Monica, his mother, that she spoke of Christ to her husband by her feminine virtues, and that, after having borne his violence without a murmur or complaint, she gained him at the close of his life to Christ, without deploring in the believer what she had suffered at his hands as an unbeliever.—VER. 2. There is often a veil before the eyes of a hard husband; doubt not that it can be removed, so that he may admiringly look upon the mystery of a profoundly-Christian mind, and with melted heart fall down at the feet of Jesus.—Fondness of rule and dress is a bad propensity, which is sometimes found even in Christian wives.—The proud daughters of Eve may see themselves reflected, as in a mirror, in Isaiah iii.—What is the heavenly bridal array of the believing daughters of Sarah?—Where hope in God is firmly established, no evil can terrify us.—It is the greatest calamity of wedded life to see prayer hindered and room given to Asmodeus [the devil matrimonial or disturber of married life.—M.].—How do husband and wife walk in the light of Divine truth?—It is the greatest folly if husbands act the part of tyrants to their wives.

STARKE:—Although wives should mainly fear God that they may shun evil and do good, yet ought they to fear their husbands also, that is, not only to give them no cause for suspicion and jealousy by unseemly speech, behaviour or works, Prov. vii. 10, but they should also make it their study to please them.—Holy women, influenced by the Holy Spirit, will observe the proper medium in dress, cf. Est. ii. 16; Gen. xxiv. 22; Rom. xii. 2.—Are you astonished to see persons covered with gold and pearls, with jewels and similar vanities? Rest assured that a believing soul, resplendent in virtues, is far more glorious and pleasant to God and His angels, Ps. xiv. 14. 15.—The most respectable dress! Is it to be this? You say, it does not suit me, it is old, and makes no show. Well, that depends upon whom you want to please: God?—if so, it should be glorious, but inward; or the devil, the prince of this world?—then you need not care for Peter or Christ, dress after your own fashion, Prov. vii. 10.—As the Old and the New Testaments have only one Messiah, one faith, one hope and one charity, so they have only one inward soul-ornament, Acts xv. 11; Is. lxi. 10.—Wives may lessen or increase the cares of their husbands, Prov. xxxi. 12.—If a husband and wife do not live after God's ordinance, their prayers and worship are utter vanity and loss, 1 Tim. ii. 8.

[LEIGHTON:—VER. 1. “The common spring of all mutual duties on both sides is supposed to be love: that peculiar conjugal love that makes them one, will infuse such sweetness into the authority of the husband and obedience of the wife, as will make their lives harmonious, like the sound of a well-tuned instrument; whereas without that, having such an universal interest in all their affairs, they cannot escape frequent contests and discords, which is a sound more unpleasant than the jarring of untuned strings to an exact ear.”—M.].

[JAY:—VER. 2. Chaste conversation implies “diffidence, the blushings of reserve, the tremulous retiring of modesty, the sensation that comes from the union of innocence and danger, the prudence which keeps far from the limits of permission, the instinctive vigilance which discerns danger afar off, the caution which never allows the enemy to approach near enough even to reconnoitre.”—M.]

[LEIGHTON:—With fear.—“Fearing the least stain of chastity, or the very least appearance of any thing not suiting with it. It is delicate, timorous grace, afraid of the least air, or shadow of any thing that hath but a resemblance of wronging it, in carriage, or speech, or apparel, as follows in the 8d and 4th verses.”—M.]

[PLUTARCH:—VER. 3. Conjug. Præcep. c. 26. “An ornament, as Crates said, is that which adorns. The proper ornament of a woman is that which becomes her best. This is neither gold, nor pearls, nor scarlet, but those things which are an evident proof of gravity, regularity and modesty.” The wife of Phocion, a celebrated Athenian general, receiving a visit from a lady who was elegantly adorned with gold and jewels, and her hair with pearls, took occasion to call the attention of her guest to the elegance and costliness of her dress; “My ornament,” said the wife of Phocion, “is my husband, now for the twentieth year general of the Athenians.” PLUTARCH in Vit. Phoc.—PLATO De Repub.:—“Behaviour and not gold is the ornament of a woman. To courtesans, these things, jewels and ornaments, are advantageous to their catching more admirers; but for a woman who wishes to enjoy the favour of one man, good behaviour is the proper ornament, and not dresses. And you should have the blush upon your countenance, which is the sign of modesty, instead of paint; and worth and sobriety, instead of gold and emeralds.”

The sense of antiquity on this subject was very strong. CLEMENS ALEX. Pædag. Lib. 3, cap. 4, says: “The women that wear gold, plait their hair, paint their faces, have not the image of God in the inward man, but in lieu of it, a fornicating and adulterous soul.” The Apostolical Constitutions, Lib. 1, cap. 8, forbid women to wear exquisite garments fitted to deceive, or gold rings upon their fingers, because all these things are signs of whoredom. JAMBLLICHUS in Vita Pythag., Lib. 1, cap. 81, p. 165, maintains “that no free women wore gold, but whores only.”—An inquiry into the sources from which false hair, now so generally worn by women, is procured, might possibly abolish this vicious and unchristian fashion.—M.]

[LEIGHTON:—V. 8. 4. “The soul fallen from God hath lost its true worth and beauty, and therefore it basely descends to these mean things, to serve and dress the body, and take share with it of its unworthy borrowed ornaments, while it has lost and forgotten God, and seeks not after Him, knows not that He alone is the beauty and ornament of the soul, Jer. ii. 32, and His Spirit and the grace of it, its rich attire, here particularly specified in one excellent grace; and it holds true in the rest.”—M.]

[PHILIP HENRY:—“Besides this” (secret prayer) “he and his wife constantly prayed together morning and evening, and never, if they were together at home or abroad, was it intermitted; and, from his own experience of the benefit of this practice, he would take all opportunities to recommend it to those in that relation, as conducing very much to the comfort of it, and their furtherance in that which he would often say is the great duty of yoke-fellows, and that is 'to do all they can to help one another to heaven.' He would say that this duty of husbands and wives praying together is intimated in that of the Apostle, 1 Pet. iii. 7, where they are exhorted to live as heirs of the grace of life, that their prayers (especially their prayers together) be not hindered; that nothing may be done to hinder them from praying together, nor to hinder them in it, nor to spoil the success of their prayers. This sanctifies the relation, and fetches in a blessing on it, makes the comforts of it more sweet, and the cares and crosses of it more easy, and is an excellent means of preserving and increasing love in the relation. Many to whom he had recommended the practice of this duty have blessed God for him, and for his advice concerning it."—An Account of the Life and Death of Mr. Philip Henry, by his Son, p. 58, Lond., 1712, quoted by BROWN.—M.]

[GATAKER (quoted by BROWN):—"Let such married persons as God hath blessed in this kind" (by their being equally yoked in the best sense) "learn what cause they have to be thankful to God, either for other. Let the jars and discord that they see between other men and women mismatched, and the cross and cursed carriage of them, either toward other, together with the manifold annoyances and grievous mischiefs and inconveniences that ensue ordinarily thereupon, be a means to put them in mind of God's great mercy and goodness toward them, and to make them more thankful to Him for the same. And since they have received either other from God, let them therein show their thankfulness to God by endeavouring to bring either other nearer unto God, by helping either other forward in the good ways of God. Do either with other as Anna did with her son Samuel: as she had him of God, so she bestowed him on God again: return each other again to God, and labour to return them better than they received them. The better they shall make each other, and the nearer they shall bring each other to God, the more good, through God's goodness, shall they have either of other. The more man and wife profit in the fear of God, the more comfortably and contentedly shall they live together, the better shall it be for them both." From "A Good Wife Indeed." The same author has also sermons entitled, "A Good Wife, God's Gift," "Marriage Prayer," and "Marriage Duties," which are well worth consulting.—FORDYCE'S Sermons to Young Women, in 2 vols., London, 1794 (rare) are also very valuable.—M.]

[BP. JEREMY TAYLOR:—(Marriage Ring): "Marriage was ordained by God, instituted in paradise; the relief of a natural necessity, and the first blessing from the Lord. Marriage is a school and exercise of virtue. Here is the proper scene of piety and patience, of the duty of parents and the charity of relatives; here kindness is spread abroad, and love is united and made firm, as a centre. Marriage is the nursery of heaven, fills up the numbers of the elect, and hath in it the labours of love and the delicacies of friendship, the blessing of society and the union of hands and hearts. Marriage is the mother of the world, and preserves kingdoms, and fills cities, and churches, and heaven itself. Like the useful bee, marriage builds a house, and gathers sweetness from every flower, and labours, and unites into societies and republics, and sends out colonies, and feeds the world with delicacies, and obeys their king, and keeps order, and exercises many virtues, and promotes the interest of mankind, and is that state of good things to which God hath designed the present constitution of the world."—M.]

CHAPTER III. 8-17.

ANALYSIS:—Exhortations of Christians in general, irrespective of their civil and domestic relations, to godly behaviour before an ungodly and hostile world.

- [<sup>10</sup> Blessing in general, not a specific one; omit, therefore, the indefinite article. "Qui caeleste regnum aliquando hereditare debent, illi sunt benedicti ac filii benedictionis, non solum passive sed etiam active, benedictionem spiritualem a Deo per fidem recipientes et vicissim aliis ex caritate benedicentes." Gerhard.—M.]
- Verse 10. [<sup>11</sup> Θεὸς=he who desires; will is ambiguous.—M.]

- Verse 12. [<sup>15</sup> εἰς=because.—M.]
- [<sup>16</sup> ἐπὶ=upon (directed upon); so German, Van Ees and Alford.—M.]
- [<sup>17</sup> προσευχή=prayer, singular.—M.]
- [<sup>18</sup> ἐν ᾧ=upon (in wrath).—M.]
- Verse 13. [<sup>19</sup> ἵνα τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ ζηλωταὶ γένησθε=if ye be emulous of (or zealous for) that which is good?—M.]

- [<sup>21</sup> μακάριοι, not happy, but blessed.—M.]
- [<sup>22</sup> φοβηθήτε. φόβος=be not terrified by or with their terror, viz.: the terror with which they would fall fill you. "Sicut numquam malorum, quæ læa minatur est cor pavidum, et formidine plenum, Lev. xxvi. 38; Deut. xxviii. 65, hæc maximum bonorum quæ Christus nobis promeruit inque Evangelio offert, est cor de gratia Dei certum, ac proinde in omnibus adversis et periculis tranquillum." Gerhard.—M.]
- [<sup>23</sup> Second μὴ=nor.—M.]
- Verse 15. [<sup>24</sup> δέ=may rather, cf. ch. ii. 23; Heb. ii. 6.—M.]

- [<sup>26</sup> ἵτοιμοι: αἱ εἰς πρός=ready always for.—M.]
- [<sup>27</sup> περὶ=concerning. Translate the whole verse: "Nay, rather sanctify Christ the Lord in your hearts, being ready always for an answer to every man that asketh of you a reason concerning the hope in you, but with meekness and fear."—M.]
- Verse 16. [<sup>28</sup> ἐν τῷ—in the matter in which, cf. ch. ii. 12.—M.]
- [<sup>29</sup> A. C. K., Sinait. and others read καταλαλοῦσιν; Tischendorf and Alford, with B. and other minor MSS. καταλαλεῖσθε with the omission of ἐμῶν ὡς κακοποιῶν.—M.]
- [<sup>30</sup> Adopting the former reading, translate the whole verse: "Having a good conscience, that in the matter in which they speak against you as evil doers, they who slander your good conversation in Christ may be ashamed."—M.]
- Verse 17. [<sup>31</sup> Translate, with greater conformity to the original, like the German: "For it is better to suffer for doing well, if the will of God should will it so, than for doing ill." A. B. C. K. L. and other Codd., with Tischendorf and Alford, read ἐλάοι for ἐλάε, in Rec. and others.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[ON THE WHOLE SECTION.]—The Apostle hastens to conclude the Epistle, but not without laying down precepts for the conduct of Christians in general—irrespective of their social position—in their dealings with an ungodly world; he substantiates these general exhortations by indicating the feelings they ought to cherish before-hand the one toward the other.

VER. 8. Finally, all being of one mind, sympathizing, loving the brethren, compassionate, courteous (kind).—τὸ δὲ τέλος, adverbial Accusative, introduces the third main division, and conclusion of the Epistle.—[Oecumenius supplies the following connection: τὴν χρὴ ἰδιολογεῖσθαι; ἀπλῶς πᾶσι φημί. τοῦτο γὰρ τέλος καὶ πρὸς τοῦτο πᾶσιν ὁ σκόπος ἀφορᾷ τῆς σωτηρίας, καὶ τοῦτο νόμος πᾶσιν ἀγάπης.—M.]—ὁμόφρον=ὁμόνοος from φρῆν, of one mind, agreeing in manner of thinking, so as to pursue one end, and to make choice of one way, cf. 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Phil. ii. 2.

[Robert Hall:—"Could we indulge the hope that such a state of things (i. e., oneness of mind) was likely soon to establish itself, we should hail the dawn of a brighter day, and consider it as a nearer approach to the ultimate triumph of the Church than the annals of time have yet recorded. In the accomplishment of our Lord's prayer, that all His people may be one, men would behold a demonstration of the Divinity of His mission, which the most impious could not resist, and behold in the Church a peaceful haven inviting them to retire from the tossings and perils of this unquiet ocean, to a sacred enclosure, a sequestered spot, which the storms and tempests of the world were not permitted to invade."—M.]

συμπαθεῖς, the disposition which enters into another's weal or woe, joys with the joying, and weeps with the weeping, Rom. xii. 15; 1 Cor. xii. 25; Heb. xiii. 8. Always to see in the sufferings of others only a judicial or pædagogical element, is contrary to the mind of Christ. [Christian sympathy refutes also La Rochefoucault's slander of human nature, that man always sees in the sufferings of others something not altogether displeasing.—M.]

φιλάδελφοι, cf. ch. i. 22; iv. 8; v. 9; Rom. xii. 10.—εὐσπλαγχνος, brave, courageous, then also tender-hearted, compassionate, as here. This quality, like that which follows, has already a bearing on our conduct in relation to the world.—φιλόφρον, kind in thought and deed, benevolent to every body.

[Leighton:—This courteousness which the Apostle recommends is not satisfied with what goes no deeper than words or gestures. That is sometimes the upper garment of malice, saluting him aloud in the morning whom they are undermining all the day, and sometimes, though more innocent, it may be troublesome merely by the vain affectation and excess of it; and even this becomes not a wise man, much less a Christian; an over-studying or acting of this is a token of emptiness, and is below a solid mind. Nor is it that graver and wiser way of external, plausible deportment, which fully answers this word. That is the outer half, indeed, but the thing itself is a radical sweetness in the temper of the mind, that spreads itself into a man's words and actions; and this not merely natural (a gentle, kind disposition, which is, indeed, a natural advantage which some have), but spiritual, from a new nature descended from heaven, and so in its original nature it far excels the others, supplies it where it is not, and doth not only increase it where it is, but elevates it above itself, renews it, and sets a more excellent stamp upon it. See note in Appar. Crit., above.—M.]

VER. 9. Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing, nay, rather on the contrary, blessing, because ye know that to this end ye were called.—The Apostle, by recommending abstinence from every kind of revenge, and the love of our enemies, follows the express declarations of the Saviour; this is also evident from the reason on which he grounds the exhortation, Matt. v. 39, etc.; Lke. vi. 27, etc.; cf. Rom. xii. 17; 1 Thess. v. 15; 1 Pet. ii. 23; Lke. vi. 28.—εὐλογεῖν, the direct contrast of rendering evil for evil and railing for railing. To bless, to desire good, and to show it in word and deed, even as the blessing of God is a reality. The word implies, according to Calov, every kind of temporal and eternal benefits, especially the latter. [See note in Appar. Crit., above.—M.]—εἰς τοῦτο, viz.: to blessing, do not join to καὶ, cf. ch. ii. 12. [On the other hand, see note in Appar. Crit., above.—M.]—ἐκλήθητε, as disciples of Jesus, and children of God, you are destined to be the light and the salt of the world, and to exert a beneficent influence on it, Matt. v. 13. 14.

That ye should inherit blessing.—The idea implied in these words is: as ye sow, so ye shall reap, as ye work, so shall be the recompense, Matt. vii. 2; v. 7; x. 32; Lke. vi. 38. [See note in Appar. Crit., above.—M.]—κληρονομήσητε refers, however, to the free grace in the distribution of the recompense, that it is a reward of grace, then to the title of the Sonship, and constant possession, Matt. xxv. 34. Chrysostom:—"Fire is not extinguished with fire, but with water; likewise wrong and hatred, not with retaliation, but with gentleness, humility and kindness."—Gerhard:—"Believers, if they are offended, should recollect that God has not covered them with His curse, although they deserve it just as much as others, but has blessed them with all heavenly blessing."—Weller:—"Your lot is better than that of the ungodly. God has called you to the inheritance of heaven, that you might be the children of God, and joint heirs with Christ, and become the sharers of the Divine nature. On the other hand, the ungodly are rejected from the presence of God, and excluded from that heavenly inheritance." [Christian revenge is to forgive and forget injuries, and to bury them in love.

The sandal tree perfumes, when riven,
The axe that laid it low.
Let him that hopes to be forgiven
Forgive and bless his foe.

Cf. Prov. xxv. 22; Rom. xii. 20.—M.]

VER. 10. For he who desireth to love life—that they speak no guile.—The exhortation to humble conduct, and the love of enemies is now substantiated by citations from the Old Testament. These embody the truth that such conduct assures us of the protection, the gracious regard and blessing of God. The Apostle quotes, without any material change, from Psalm xxxiv. v. 13 to v. 18, the second person being changed into the third in verses 13–15. Only v. 13 varies somewhat from the LXX., which reads: ὁ θέλων ζῆν, ἀγαπῶν ἡμέρας ἰδεῖν, while here we have: ὁ θέλων ζῆν ἀγαπῶν καὶ ἰδεῖν ἡμέρας. Bengel says, "that the Apostle adds new salt, saying: Who really and truly loves life, who is so thoroughly in earnest about this love that he fulfils its demands." It seems better, however, to put a comma after ζῆν, as in the LXX. "Whoso desireth to live, and to love and see good days." The alteration may have been made with reference to those sayings of Christ which advert to a false love of life, Matt. x. 39; xvi. 25; Mark viii. 35; Lke. xvii. 33; Jno. xii. 25.—ἰδεῖν=ראה, of experience and enjoyment.—παύειν=to make an end of, to allay, to stop, hinder, keep back from a thing. "The expression pre-supposes the natural unruliness of the tongue and its wild, natural impulse to evil." Wiesinger. ["Calvin:—"Primus notat, quæ lingua vitia cavenda sint, nempe ne contumeliosi ac petulantes simus: deinde ne fraudulentis ac duplices. Hinc ad facta descendit, ne quem laedamus, vel ne cui inferamus damnum."—M.]—χεῖρὶ ἀποῦ. (Lachmann and Tischendorf omit ἀποῦ).—τοῦ μὴ λαλῆσαι is governed by ἀπὸ. Winer, p. 278.—δόλος denotes acting the deceiver or hypocrite; ῥαῖμα, cf. Jas. i. 26. David, in this verse, refers primarily to temporal life and experience, so does Peter.

VER. 11. Let him turn away from evil—and pursue it.—ἐκκλίβειν=to bend out or from, turn away from, shun, avoid, decline, Rom. iii. 12; xvi. 17; Is. i. 16. 17; Rom. xii. 9.—ζῆρεῖν=διώκειν elsewhere, 1 Thess. v. 15; Rom. xii. 18. [See note in Appar. Crit.—M.]

VER. 12. Because the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, etc.—The reason is now given why those who act upon the preceding exhortation may cherish the hope of life and good days, and the contrary is stated.—ὀφθαλμοὶ and πρόσωπον are here in antithesis, the one denoting the gracious regarding of God, the other His look in anger.—κύριος=יהוה; not Christ but the Father, cf. Jas. v. 4.—ἐπὶ not = against, as it has not this meaning. Understand: are directed. "We are wont to look with a severe eye on those with whom we are angry." Bengel:—"Anger excites the entire human countenance, love brightens the eyes." cf. 2 Sam. xxii. 28; Lev. xvii. 10 xx. 5; Ps. lxxviii. 8.

V. 13. And who is he that—if ye be emulous of that which is good?—Inference drawn from the gracious regard of God directed upon the righteous. τίς κακῶσιν, who will be able to harm you, who will be suffered to injure you? cf. Is. i. 9; Rom. viii. 38. The sense is not: Nobody will have any mind to harm you. Peter, at least, knew the world differently and his Master had foretold differently, ch. ii. 12. 15. 18; iii. 9; Matt. x. 24; Mk. x. 44; Jno. xiii. 16. The passage supplies therefore no new reason for peaceableness and holiness.—μῦθαι τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ. (Lachmann, Tischendorf [and Alford with A. B. C. and others.—M.], read ζηλωταί; that is the more difficult reading. Frommüller) [ζηλωταί is better sustained and yields a better sense than μῦθαι, which later reading Alford supposes to have come in from 8 Jno. 11.—M.]. μῦθαι is elsewhere only applied to persons, here it is applied to the abstract τὸ ἀγαθόν, because the good as personified in Christ is the point of reference, cf. Tit. ii. 14; 8 Jno. 11.

V. 14. But if even ye suffer—be not terrified with their terror nor be troubled.—But although God should not prevent your suffering, as indeed some of you have been already visited with suffering, ch. iv. 12. 17. 19; v. 9. 10, ye are nevertheless blessed if ye suffer on account of righteousness, as Christ says, Matt. v. 10.—εἰ with the Optative denotes subjective possibility, without any reference to definite time. Winer, p. 309. [Augustine: martyram facit non poena sed causa.—M.].—δικαιοσύνην; cf. ch. ii. 24, not only the confession of the truth, but right and holy thinking and living, well-doing in general, cf. v. 11. 18. 17; ii. 20; Matt. v. 20; vi. 33. There is no reason for seeking here the Pauline idea of δικαιοσύνη.—μακάριοι so. ἐστὲ cf. ch. i. 9; iv. 13; Job v. 17. [Bengel: "Ne hoc quidem vitam beatam vobis aufert, immo potius auget."—M.].—τὸν δὲ φόβον αὐτῶν so. of evil-doers, v. 12. This is a citation from Is. viii. 12. 18. φόβον may be taken actively of the terror which they cause, cf. Job iii. 25; Ps. xci. 5, or passively of the fear with which they are seized. In Is. viii. 12. 18, the word seems to have a passive sense, here an active one. Be not afraid of the terror which they inspire, and do not suffer yourself to be disconcerted. [But see note in Appar. Crit. above.—M.]. παράχθητε, a climax, to become confused, disconcerted, troubled.

V. 15. Nay, rather sanctify God the Lord in your hearts.—κύριον δὲ τὸν θεὸν ἀγιάσατε = יְהוָה יְקַדְּשׁוּ, to adore God as the Holy One, to acknowledge His holiness in thought, word and deed. Mt. vi. 9. Calvin:—"If we are convinced from the depth of our soul that the promised help of God is all-sufficient, we shall be most effectually armed against all fear." Confession, being the outer sanctification, must be united to the inner sanctification; hence the exhortation which follows cf. Rom. x. 10; Matt. x. 82. [I have adopted in Appar. Crit. the reading κύριον δὲ τὸν χριστόν.—M.]

Being ready always for an answer—hope in you.—ἐτοιμοὶ δὲ (Lachmann omits δέ; then ἐτοιμοὶ would define the sanctification). But forget not that freedom from the fear of man does not exclude but include responsibility. The Christian, says Steiger, is not bound to account for his faith to any scoffer or such like (Matt. vi. 7), but to every man asking reasons. cf. ch. iv. 6; Rom. xiv. 12; Heb. xiii. 17; Acts xxiv. 14 etc.; xxvi. 6 etc.—ἀπολογία, a defence, an apology, no learned theories but a brief account of the Person in whom we believe, of the testimony on which, and the reasons why we believe, and of the hope which this belief warrants us to cherish. Cornelius:—"Peter demands an answer, not a disputation."—Join παντὶ τὸ ἀπολογίαν.—περὶ τῆς ἐν ὑμῖν ἐλπίδος. We have already seen, especially in the opening of the Epistle, ch. i. 8; cf. i. 18, that hope, in the Apostle's view, is the real centre of the Christian life. It is the end of regeneration, the sum-total of all the blessings of salvation, the kernel of the whole of salvation. The primitive Christians were often persecuted for their hope in the salvation of the Messiah. Every believer should become thoroughly assured of the reasons for this hope. Christian faith and the hope founded on it, must attain such vital strength in our inmost heart (ἐν ὑμῖν) as to be able to become a counterpoise to the lust and fear of the world. [Luther:—"In persecutione oportet nos habere spem: si ratio spei exiguit, oportet nos habere verbum." Bengel:—"Spes Christianorum saepe commovit alios ad percontandum." Didymus says: "Here is a caution to those who imagine that it is enough for us to lead what is called a moral life, without a sound foundation of Christian faith; and here is a special admonition to the Clergy, to be able to solve doubts and remove difficulties which may perplex their people, and to stop the mouths of gainsayers (Tit. i. 11) and render a satisfactory reason of whatever they do, or teach."—M.]

V. 16. With meekness and fear, having a good conscience.—[The German version, following the Vulgate, begins v. 16 with but with meekness, etc.—M.]. μετὰ πραΰνητος. (Lachmann, Tischendorf [and Alford, following A. B. C. and many others.—M.], insert ἀλλά before μετα); the sense being—"provided" [or as Alford explains "ready, but not over ready."—M.], cf. ch. iii. 4, free from haughtiness, scorn and bitterness in the consciousness of truth and with the desire to convince.—φόβον in respect of God, whose cause we should not prejudice. [Alford defines φόβον "proper respect for man and humble reverence of God."—M.]. Luther:—"Then must ye not answer with proud words and state your cause with a defiance and with violence, as if you would tear up trees, but with such fear and humility as if ye stood before the judgment-seat of God,—so shouldst thou stand in fear, and not rely on thy own strength, but on the word and promise of Christ." Matt. x. 19; 1 Cor. ii. 8.—συνείδησιν ἔχοντες not coördinated with, but subordinated to ἐτοιμοὶ. Harless:—"Only he is able to defend his Christian hope with full assurance, who has kept in a good conscience, as in a good vessel, the grace he has received." cf. ch. ii. 19. A good conversation is the most telling apology before slanderers. [Calvin:—"quia parum auctoritatis habet sermo absque vita, ideo fidei professioni bonam conscientiam adiungit."—M.]

That in the manner in which they speak against you as evil-doers, they who slander your good conversation in Christ, may be ashamed.—ἵνα ἐν ᾧ.—You were not only called to bless your enemies, but to become a blessing to them in putting them to shame, and if possible, to win them. cf. ch. ii. 12. 19. ἐπιπαύειν, to use hard words, abusive and haughty conduct in order to terrify and so to coerce any one. It denotes greater hostility than καταλάλει, ch. ii. 12.—τὴν ἀγαθὴν ἐν Χριστῷ ἀναστροφὴν, see ch. ii. 12; i. 16. Join ἐν Χριστῷ to ἀναστροφὴν not to ἀγαθὴν. A conversation led in communion with Christ, looking up to Him, in His strength and with His help. They slander your good conversation, i. e., you on account of your good conversation. This is to give prominence to the folly of their detraction, which sooner or later must become manifest to themselves.

V. 17. For it is better to suffer for doing well, if the will of God should will it so, than for doing ill.—κρείττον γάρ. In no event will you escape suffering. Peter now meets, as Gerhard observes, the objection: "I should not take it so hard, if I had merited it." He says: Is it not better to suffer for doing well than for doing ill?—κρείττον denotes that which is more advantageous, deserves the preference; cf. ch. ii. 19. Grotius:—"This is what Socrates said to his wife without being instructed, as we Christians are, respecting the right way and whither it leads."—εἰ θέλοι (The textus rec. reads θέλει; but Tischendorf [following A. B. C. K. L. and others. —M.] prefers the Optative.), cf. ch. iii. 14, if and as often as it may be His will. cf. Mt. xviii. 14; xxvi. 89. 42; 1 Cor. iv. 19; Jas. iv. 15; 1 Peter i. 6; iv. 19.—[εἰ θέλοι τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς placuerit voluntati divinae, θέλημα meaning the will itself, and θέλειν the operation of the will (like the stream streams,—the river flows, etc.) cf. Jas. iii. 4, see Winer, p. 627.—M.].—Θέλημα, this will is known from what happens to us. [Luther:—"Go on in faith and love; if the cross comes, take it; if it comes not, do not seek it."—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The above warnings against self-revenge and exhortations to love our enemies are not peculiar to Christianity. They are already found in the Old Testament, and Christianity simply enforces them by new and stronger motives. Steiger:—"The frequent warnings against self-revenge found in this Epistle, seem to have also an individual origin in the vehemence peculiar to Peter and in his holy dread of actions similar to that in the case of Malchus."

2. The exhortation to fear God, which occurs repeatedly in this Epistle, is characteristic of the Petrine doctrine. This enforcing of fear, although more peculiar to the economy of the Law than to that of the Gospel, is equally necessary under the dispensation of the New Testament, and few Christians will be found who are past it. "As the difference of tropes (German, "Lehrtropen") has always a providential signification for different individualities and degrees of development of the Christian life, so it is the case here." Weiss.

3. The manner in which Peter refers to the sufferings of his contemporary fellow-believers supplies us with hints as to the date of this Epistle.

4. To draw from v. 14 the inference that in the opinion of Peter it is possible to acquire and merit heaven on account of righteousness, would be a great mistake; no, only the assurance of salvation and the degree of glory depend upon suffering for Christ's sake and suffering with Him

Try thyself; if thou art able, thou art a child of God, if not, it is idle conceit, Matt. v. 45.—There is no member of the body with which man is more likely and more ready to sin than with the tongue; hence we should carefully reflect upon what we speak and how we speak, Jas. iii. 5. 6; Prov. xvi. 26; xvii. 27; Sir. xxii. 88.—Peace is rare game, in the diligent pursuit of which every Christian ought to be a quick huntsman, Prov. xv. 18; xxv. 15; 2 Cor. xiii. 12.—Nothing is more likely to move us to a holy conversation than the constant and lively recollection that the eyes and ears of God are ever around us. If this cannot fill a man with holy dread, he denies God in deed, though he confess Him in words, Deut. vi. 18.—Although the godly do not cry with their mouth, they cry to God with their heart, Ps. xxxiv. 16-18. The world is enraged, Satan shows his teeth, it rains enemies: should this make thee alarmed, thou who lovest God? Hast thou not a Father who is almighty, and a King who is the Conqueror of all His enemies? STAUDT:—Direction for good days; 1. How we should live inwardly; 2. How we should live outwardly; 3. How we should live upwardly.

V. HERBERGER:—1. What is following Christ? 2. What reasons have we to do it cheerfully and readily?

[LAUGHTON: VER. 8.—Men having so many disputes about religion in their heads, and no life of religion in their hearts, fall into a conceit that all is but juggling, and the easiest way is, to believe nothing; and these agree with any or rather with none. Sometimes it is from a profane supercilious disdain of all these things, and many there be of these, of Gallio's temper, that care for none of these things and that account all questions in religion, as he did, but matter of words and names. And by this all religions may agree together; but it were not a natural union by the active heat of the spirit, but a confusion rather, by the want of it: not a knitting together, but a freezing together, as cold congregates all bodies how heterogeneous ever, sticks, stones and water; but heat makes first a separation of different things and then unites those that are of the same nature.—Beware of two extremes that often cause divisions, 1. Captivity to custom; 2. Affectation of novelty.—The scales of Leviathan, as Luther expresses it, are linked together; shall not the Lord's followers be one in Him? They unite to undermine the peace of the Church, shall not the godly join their prayers to countermine them?—Says one: "Nothing truly shows a spiritual man so much, as the dealing with another man's sin."—Sin broke all to pieces, man from God and one from another. Christ's work in the world was union.—The friendships of the world, the best of them, are but tied with chains of glass, but this fraternal love of Christians is a golden chain, both more precious, and more strong and lasting; the others are worthless and brittle.—The roots of plants are hid under ground, so that themselves are not seen, but they appear in their branches and flowers and fruits, which argue there is a root and life in them; thus the graces of the Spirit, planted in the soul, though themselves invisible, yet discover their being and life in the tract of a Christian's life, his words and actions, and the frame of his carriage. . . . Faith worketh by love, so then where this root is, these roots will spring from it and discover it, pity and courtesy.—He whom the Lord loads most with his richest gifts, stoops lowest, as pressed down with the weight of them; the free love of God humbles the heart most to which it is most manifested.

VER. 9. One man's sin cannot procure privilege to another to sin in that or the like kind. If another has broken the bonds of allegiance to God and charity to thee, yet thou art not the less tied by the same bonds still.

VER. 11. We may pursue peace among men and not overtake it; we may use all good means and fall short; but pursue it up as far as the throne of grace; seek it by prayer and that will overtake it; that will be sure to find it in God's hand, "who stilleth the waves of the sea and the tumults of the people." "If He give quietness, who can give trouble?"

VER. 14. It is a confirmed observation by the experience of all ages, that when the Church flourished most in outward peace and wealth, it abated most of its spiritual lustre (opibus major, virtutibus minor) which is its genuine and true beauty: and when it seemed most miserable by persecutions and sufferings, it was most happy in sincerity and zeal and vigour of grace. When the moon shines brightest towards the earth, it is dark heavenwards, and on the contrary when it appears not, is nearest the sun and clear towards heaven.—M.]

VER. 15. Beware of an external, superficial, sanctifying of God, for He takes it not so; He will interpret that a profaning of Him and His name. Be not deceived, He is not mocked; He looks through all visages and appearances, in upon the heart, sees how it entertains Him, and stands affected to Him, if it be possessed with reverence and love more than either thy tongue or carriage can express; and if it be not so, all thy seeming worship is but injury, and thy speaking of Him is but babbling, be thy discourse ever so excellent; yea, the more thou hast seemed to sanctify God while thy heart has not been chief in the business, thou shalt not by such service have the less, but the more fear and trouble in the day of trouble, when it comes upon thee.

[VER. 8. The following passage from Polybius quoted by Raphaelius, Obs. Vol. II. p. 760, beautifully illustrates συμπάθεια: "Certainly, if Scipio was peculiarly fitted by nature for any thing, it was for this, that he should inspire confidence in the minds of men, καὶ συμπάθει πείθει τοὺς παρακαλούμενους; i. e., make those whom he addressed have the same feelings."—M.]

He said, Call the man in. When he came in the Rabbi said, What is that elixir of life thou sellest? He answered, Is it not written, What man is he that loveth life and desireth to see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil and his lips from speaking guile? This is the elixir of life and is found in the mouth of man." Quoted by Rosenmüller from the Book of Mussar, ch. I.—M.]

[VINET:—"We are debtors of religious truth to our brethren, as soon as we ourselves become possessed of it;" "We are debtors in the strictest sense of the term, for, properly speaking, the truth is not the exclusive property of any one. Every good, which may be communicated by its possessor without impoverishing himself, cannot remain exclusively his own. If this proposition be not true, morality falls to the ground. How much more does this hold good of a blessing which is multiplied by division of a spring which becomes more abundant as it pours out its waters!"

"The truth is not to be scattered at random like contemptible dust; it is a pearl that must not be exposed to be trodden under foot by the profane. To protect it by an expressive silence is sometimes the only way we can testify our own respect for it, or conciliate that of others. He who cannot be silent respecting it, under certain circumstances, does not sufficiently respect it. Silence is on some occasions the only homage truth expects from us. This silence has nothing in common with dissimulation; it involves no connivance with the enemies of truth: it has no other object than to protect it from needless outrage. This silence, in a majority of instances, is a language; and when in the conduct of those who maintain it, every thing is consistent with it, the truth loses nothing by being suppressed; or to speak more correctly, it is not suppressed; it is vividly, though silently pointed out; its dignity and importance are placed in relief; and the respect which occasioned this silence, itself imposes silence on the witnesses of its exhibition."—M.]

[Br. HALL:—"The proper meaning of the Apostle's direction and its connection, with the preceding advice, may be thus stated: give ye unto God in your hearts that honour, which is due unto Him, in trusting to His promises, and reposing upon His providence, by a steadfast confidence and reliance; and since ye live among heathens and professed enemies of the Gospel, be not ye daunted with their oppositions and persecutions; but be ready, when ye are thereunto duly called, to make profession of that true faith and religion which ye have received: but let not this be done in a turbulent and seditious manner, but with all meekness of spirit and reverence to that authority, whereby ye are called thereunto."—M.]

CHAPTER III. 18-22.

ANALYSIS:—Further exhortation to readiness of suffering in consideration of a deeper motive. Only thus do we attain to resembling Christ, who suffered for our sins, whose sufferings had every where, even in the world of the dead, salutary effects, and led to the most blessed issue.

- 18 For<sup>1</sup> Christ also hath once suffered for sins,<sup>2</sup> the just for the unjust,<sup>3</sup> that he might 19 bring us to God, being put to death<sup>4</sup> in the flesh, but quickened<sup>5</sup> by the Spirit:<sup>6</sup> By<sup>7</sup> 20 which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; Which sometime<sup>8</sup> were disobedient, when once the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the 21 ark was a preparing,<sup>9</sup> wherein few,<sup>10</sup> that is, eight souls were saved by water. The like figure<sup>11</sup> whereunto even baptism doth also now save us,<sup>12</sup> (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh,<sup>13</sup> but the answer<sup>14</sup> of a good conscience toward God,) by<sup>15</sup> the resurangels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him.<sup>17</sup>

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 18. Because Christ also suffered.—If, according to our ideas, any one ought to have been spared the cup of suffering, it was Christ; but He also suffered on account of sins and for their atonement.

Once, cf. Rom. vi. 10; Heb. vii. 27; ix. 7.—It requires not to be repeated and as compared with eternity, it is a short suffering, being compressed into the space of several years and days. It probably relates to the exhortation which follows that we also should once for all die unto sin, ch. iv. 1. (Lachmann reads: περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν ἀπὸθανεῖν.)—περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, on account of sins, cf. ch. ii. 24; Rom. viii. 3. Sins were the originating cause of His sufferings and their blotting out His aim.

A just person for (in the stead of) unjust persons.—δικαίως ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων. Although ὑπὲρ per se may be rendered "for the benefit of," yet both the circumstance that the context opposes one innocent person to many guilty persons and the word προσάγειν clearly express the idea of vicarious suffering; for προσάγειν relates to Christ's office of High-priest. Defilement by sin under the Old Testament barred all approach to God; the Priest had the privilege to draw near to God and to mediate the people's approach to Him. This is rendered in the LXX. by προσάγειν. Vide Weiss, cf. προσέρχεσθαι ii. 4.—The word ἀνὰ confirms this view, cf. Heb. ix. 27, 28.—The repeated reference to the sufferings of Christ shows in the opinion of Gerhard, that the Apostle cannot weary to make mention of His sufferings, hence he calls himself ch. v. 1, a witness of the sufferings of Christ.

Put to death indeed in the flesh, but made alive in the spirit.—θανατωθεὶς is best joined to προσάγειν. The restoration of men to the lost communion with God is conditioned by the sacrificial death of Christ, by His resurrection and royal power.—ζωοποιεῖν not = ἐγείρειν, cf. Jno. v. 21; Rom. viii. 11; 1 Cor. xv. 22.—σὰρξ, πνεύματι; the two Datives denote the sphere to which the predicate must be supposed to be limited, cf. Winer, § 41, 8. a. The Datives are evidently parallel and must be taken in the same sense. The sense of the first is clear: He was put to death as to His outward, sensuous nature. If this is established, it is impossible to interpret the second member as follows: He was made alive by the spirit that had been given to Him, by the higher divine part of His nature. Weiss:—The parallelism indicated by μέν and δέ, rather requires us to render, "as to His Spirit He was made alive," (animated.). Death hardly affected the spirit and soul of Christ, but both at the moment of Christ's dying were for a short time put into a state of unconsciousness. But hardly had Christ surrendered His spirit into the hands of the Father, when the Divine Spirit filled and penetrated Him with a new Divine life. Flacius already observes: "the antithesis clearly shows that Christ was put to death as to one part of His nature, but made alive as to another. It is a modus loquendi taken from or alluding to the universal lot of the godly, cf. Gen. xlv. 27; 1 Thess. iii. 8. Roos:—"His soul, for its great refreshing, was endowed with and penetrated by heavenly strength." Others take the view that His death ensued in virtue of the weakness inherent in the flesh, His reanimation in virtue of the strength peculiar to the Spirit, cf. 2 Cor. xiii. 4. But θανατωθεὶς does not well suit this interpretation, which is somewhat forced. [Luther: "This is the meaning, that Christ by His sufferings was taken from the life which is flesh and blood, as a man on earth, living, walking and standing in flesh and blood . . . and He is now placed in another life, and made alive according to the spirit, has passed into a spiritual and supernatural life, which includes in itself the whole life which Christ now has in soul and body, so that He has no longer a fleshly but a spiritual body." Hoffman, Schriftbeweis 2, 387, says: "It is the same who dies and the same who is again made alive, both times the whole man Jesus, in body and soul. He ceases to live in that that, which is to His Personality the medium of action, falls under death; and He begins again to live, in that He receives back this same for a medium of His action again. The life which fell under death was a fleshly life, that is, such a life as has its determination to the present condition of man's nature, to the externality of its mundane connection. The life which was won back is a spiritual life, that is, such a life as has its determination from the Spirit, in which consists our inner connection with God."—M.] [Wordsworth: "St. Peter thus guards his readers against the heresy of Simon Magus, and the Docetæ, who said that Christ's flesh was a phantom; and against that of the Cerinthians, and other false teachers, whose errors were propagated in Asia, who alleged that the Christ was only an Aeon or Emanation, which descended on the Mun Jesus, at His Baptism, but departed from Him before His Passion."—M.]

VER. 19. In which also He went and preached unto the spirits in prison.—Ἐν ᾧ is evidently to be joined with πνεύματι, not = διὰ πνεύματος, but really in the condition of a spirit separated from the body. Bengel:—"Christ dealt with the living in the body, with the spirits in the spirit."—καὶ τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ.—καὶ = even to the spirits in prison He did preach; so great was His condescension and so far reached the consequences of His voluntary, vicarious sufferings. As Paul the Apostle, Eph. iv. 9, 10, adverts to the descent of Christ to the lowest parts of the earth, doubtless in close connection with the exhortation, cf. v. 2, and with the evident meaning that the example of Christ should move believers to descend to the weakest and most abandoned persons, of whose salvation none entertained any hope, so here the descent of Christ to the world of departed spirits occurs in connection with the preceding exhortations to perseverance in well-doing and suffering.—ἐν φυλακῇ not—in the realms of death, for the word always denotes a custody, a place of confinement, a prison, Rev. xx. 7; Matt. v. 25; xiv. 8; xviii. 30; xxv. 86; Mk. vi. 17. 27; Lke. ii. 8; xii. 58; xxi. 12; xxiii. 19; Jno. iii. 24; Acts v. 19; viii. 8; 2 Cor. vi. 6; Heb. xi. 36; consequently it has not the abstract sense of being bound. But this prison must be in the realms of death, cf. 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6; Matt. v. 25. 26. This evidently follows also from the comparison with 1 Pet. iv. 6. That it is not a mere condition, but a locality in Hades, is manifest both from πορεύσεις, for one does not go, i. e., travel into a condition, and from the parallel πορεύσεις εἰς οὐρανόν of v. 22. As heaven is a definite locality, so is the nether-world (Hades).—The power of the death and life of Christ operates in two directions, downwards to the realms of death, and upward to the higher regions of heaven.—ἐκήρυξε. Gerhard takes it not so much of verbal as of real preaching, as in Heb. xii. 24, not in order to liberate them or to give them time for repentance, but in order to show His glorious victory to the spirits of the damned. But the usus loquendi of κηρύττειν, and ch. iv. 6, which should be connected with the passage under notice, militate against his view. The word occurs joined with τὸ εὐαγγέλιον in Matt. iv. 23; ix. 35; Mk. i. 14; xvi. 15. Where it is found alone, it is understood that the chief burden of His preaching was: The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has come nigh, repent and believe the Gospel, Mk. i. 88. 15; Matt. iii. 1; iv. 17; ix. 35. It was just this kind of testimony which was to constitute the sum and substance of Apostolical preaching, Matt. x. 7; xxiv. 14; Mk. iiii. 14; vi. 12; xiii. 10; Lke. ix. 2; Acts ix. 20; x. 42. 48; 1 Cor. i. 23; Phil. i. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 2. It is never used of judicial preaching. It is, therefore, by no means so indefinite an expression as Bengel supposes, but one which has a very definite meaning; further light, moreover, is shed on it by εὐηγγελισθῆναι of ch. iv. 6. The unequivocal sense is: Jesus proclaimed to those spirits in the prisons of Hades the beginning of a new epoch of grace, the appearance of the kingdom of God, and repentance and faith as the means of entering into the same.

VER. 20. Now follows a further definition. They are men, who once were unbelievers, in the time of Noah. Their having repented on seeing the flood break in, or during the long interval until the coming of Christ, is a gratuitous and arbitrary conjecture. Their unbelief was practical, exhibited by their disobedience, for so Peter invariably takes ἀπειθεῖν, cf. ch. ii. 7. They ridiculed the prediction of the coming flood, and despised the exhortation to repent.

When the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was being prepared, in which a few persons, that is eight souls, were saved by water.—Ἀπεξεδέχετο (The Text. Rec. had ἀπαξ ἐξεδέχετο, but our reading is doubtless correct.), the goodness of God, exhibited as μακροθυμία, in the long postponement of punishment and judgment, and the waiting for amendment; none cannot be separated without violence from the following ἐν ἡμέραις Νώε. It waited 120 years for repentance, Gen. vi. 8.—Since Noah was a preacher of righteousness in word and deed to his contemporaries, 2 Pet. ii. 5, and since the difficult building of his floating house, covering so long a space of time, ought to have excited their serious consideration, their unbelief appears so much the more culpable.—κυβωτός = תֵּבָה, the well-known name of the ark, cf. Matt. xxiv. 38; Lke. xvii. 27; Heb. xi. 7.—κατασκευαζομένης denotes the difficulty and long duration of the building which was progressing in their sight.—εἰς ἣν ὀλίγοι, into which a few souls fled, and were saved, through, and by means of, the water. δά suggests both ideas in connection with the comparison with baptism which follows.

A few persons, put designedly, not only because, as Steiger remarks, this narrative shows per se the relation of believers and unbelievers, but also because the fact itself supplies the strongest motive for Christ's descent into the realms of death, as an act demanded by the grace of God. Only eight souls were saved in the deluge—many thousands and thousands, who were very diverse as to their moral condition, perished; how conclusive, therefore, the inference that that event took place in the world of spirits, which Peter, however, knew, not from inferences he had drawn, but doubtless in consequence of a special revelation. As the time of Noah was elsewhere viewed as an important type of after-times, cf. 2 Pet. ii. 5; iii. 6. 7; Matt. xxiv. 37, etc., so here also it ought to be taken in a typical sense, while the activity of Jesus ought not to be considered as being limited to the generation of Noah. By the example of Noah's family, Peter was taught the dealings of God with all men, who, without any fault of theirs, have not known the salvation in Christ. This passage of Christ's descent into Hades belongs to those which have suffered most from the treatment of commentators. Some distorted the preaching of Christ into mediate preaching by Noah or the Apostles, others into preaching, which, although having taken place immediately in the realms of death, was yet confined to the godly only. Steiger has enumerated their vagaries; they carry their confutation within themselves, and rest, one and all, on dogmatical embarrassment. Our explanation is supported by many passages, e. g., Acts ii. 27. 31; Ps. xvi. 10; Eph. iv. 8; Acts xiii. 35–37; ii. 24; Lke. xxiii. 46; Mk. xv. 37–39; Phil. ii. 10; Lke. xvi. 19. Cf. Koenig, Christ's Descent into Hell; Güder, Doctrine of Christ's Appearing among the Dead; Zetzschwiz, Petri ap. de Christi ad inferos descensus sententia; Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, Art. Hades; [and the Excursus on the Descensus ad Inferos at the end of this section.—M.]

[Wordsworth:—"St. Peter's Epistle was probably written in the East (see v. 18). There the belief in two opposite principles, (dualism), a Good and Evil, was widely disseminated by the religion of Zoroaster, and by the Magi of Persia (see Ps. xiv. 8–7). There also the Ark rested after the waters of the Flood.

The author of this Epistle, written in the East, may have heard the objection raised, on the history of the Flood, against the Divine Benevolence and the Unity of the Godhead, and he appears to be answering such objections as those, and to be vindicating that history. He shows the harmony of God's dispensations, Patriarchal and Evangelical. He teaches us to behold in the Ark a type of the Church, and in the Flood a type of Baptism. He thus refutes the Manichean heresy. He says that God was merciful, even to that generation. He speaks of God's long-suffering, waiting for them while the Ark was preparing. He states boldly the objection, that few, only eight souls, were saved in the Ark, and contrasts the condition of those who were drowned in the Flood with the condition of those who have now offers of salvation in Baptism. He says that the rest disobeyed while the Ark was preparing. He uses the Aorist tense (ἀπειθήσαντι). He does not say, when the Ark had been prepared, and when the Ark was shut, and when the Flood came, and it was too late for them to reach it, they all remained impenitent. Perhaps some were penitent at the eleventh hour, like the thief on the cross. Every one will be justly dealt with by God. There are degrees of punishment, as there are of reward (see Matt. x. 15; Lke. xii. 48). God does not quench the smoking flax (Matt. xii. 20). And St. Peter, by saying that they did not hearken formerly, while the Ark was preparing, almost seems to suggest the inference that they did hearken now, when One greater than Noah came in His human spirit into the abysses of the deep of the lower world, and that a happy change was wrought in the condition of some among them by His coming."—M.]

Vrs. 21. Which, in the antitype, is now saving us.—ὁ καὶ ἡμᾶς (The Textus. Rec. reads ἡμᾶς, an easier reading. Lachmann reads ἡμᾶς instead of ἡμᾶς; so also Tischendorf;) resumes v. 18, after the Apostle's manner of returning after a parenthesis, to what had gone before, and by making it the subject of further elucidation, cf. ch. ii. 24. 21. The thoughts now mentioned are by no means accidental, and such as might have been omitted, but the προσάγειν of v. 18 remained to be explained, as to the manner how it was effected, viz.: by baptism, whereof that saving water was a type.—ὁ relates to ὁδὸν. καὶ, similar to the members of Noah's family.—ἀντίτυπον, antitypal, in the antitype, that is, as baptism. Two appositions to ὁδὸν. The water of the flood is here viewed only in the light of having been saving to Noah and his family, inasmuch as it carried the ark.—ὥστε, the Present is used because the saving has only begun and is not yet completed.

Not putting-away the filth of the flesh, but inquiry of a good conscience after God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ.—Now follows a more particular account of the nature of baptism, first, negatively, then, positively. The end contemplated is not, as in the case of Jewish lustrations, purification from the filth of the body. Steiger cites Justin Martyr, Tryph. p. 831, "Of what avail is that baptism, (that of the Jewish lustrations) which cleanses the flesh and the body only?" It is rather an ἐπερώτημα συνειδήσεως ἀγαθῆς. In explaining this dark passage, it is necessary to begin with the more lucid points. The antithesis of the putting-away of the filth of the flesh suggests a reference to the moral import of baptism, to inward, spiritual cleansing. Hence the Apostle names this ἀγαθὴ συνείδησις as the end contemplated in baptism. With this we have to connect the apposition εἰς Θεόν, for a good conscience toward God, which is much more than a good conscience toward men (1 Cor. iv. 4), is just what we need. Connecting, with the majority of commentators, εἰς Θεόν with ἐπερώτημα, as indicating the end of ἐπερώτημα, would yield a very harsh expression, which cannot be illustrated by 2 Sam. xi. 7, besides, the apposition would then appear to be superfluous. But since the Genitive ἀγαθῆς συνειδήσεως corresponds with ἔμπροσθεν σαρκός, it must be like the latter, the Genit. objecti, not the Genit. subjecti. As to the matter itself, the good conscience cannot be supposed to be existing at baptism and preceding it, for the Apostle elsewhere regards a good conscience as something received at, and effected by, baptism, Acts ii. 38. If the good conscience were anterior to baptism, it would be difficult to see how salvation, by means of baptism, could be necessary. What, then, is the meaning of ἐπερώτημα, which occurs only once, and that in this passage, in the New Testament? We should expect a word signifying the cleansing of the conscience: but ἐπερώτημα is never used in such a sense; nor does it signify promise or pledge, as Grotius explains the word from the usage of Roman law, nor address, confidence, open approach, but simply asking, inquiry. This gives quite a good sense: baptism is the inquiry for a good conscience before God, the desire and longing for it. This would define the subjective side of baptism, with reference to the circumstance that from the earliest time certain questions relating to the state of his conscience were proposed to the candidate for baptism. Lutz approaches the right explanation: "Baptism is the request for a good conscience, for admittance to the state of reconciliation on the part of such as have a good conscience toward God, a petition for the pardon of sin, which is obtained by the merits of Christ." Similar are the views of Wiesinger and Weiss, except that they erroneously join εἰς Θεόν and ἐπερώτημα. Adhering to the idea of asking, the thing asked may be conceived, as follows: How shall I rid myself of an evil conscience? Wilt Thou, most holy God, again accept me, a sinner? Wilt Thou, Lord Jesus, grant me the communion of Thy death and life? Wilt Thou, O Holy Ghost, assure me of grace and adoption, and dwell in my heart? To these questions the Triune Jehovah answers in baptism, Yea. Now is laid the solid foundation for a good conscience. The conscience is not only purified from its guilt, but it receives new vital power by means of the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

δι' ἀναστάσεως is better joined with συνειδήσεως ἀγαθῆς than with ὥστε, from which it is too far separated. In ch. i. 8, the living hope is based on the resurrection of Jesus Christ, here, the good conscience. The mediating features of προσάγειν τῷ Θεῷ and of ὥστε have now been indicated. [Most commentators connect δι' ἀναστάσεως with ὥστε, treating the intervening sentence as a parenthesis.—M.]

[Wordsworth:—From the Book of Common Prayer: "Baptism represents to us our profession, which is to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, and to be made like unto Him, that as He died and rose again for us, so we who are baptized and buried with Christ in His death, should be dead to sin and live unto righteousness," "continually mortifying all our evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceeding in all virtue and godliness of living," in order that we who are "baptized into His death may pass through the grave and gate of death to our joyful Resurrection, through His merits who died, and was buried, and rose again for us, Jesus Christ, our Lord."

Waterland, On Justification, p. 440:—"St. Peter assures us that Baptism saves; that is, it gives a just title to salvation, which is the same as to say that it conveys justification. But then it must be understood, not of the outward washing, but of the inward lively faith stipulated in it and by it. Baptism concurs with Faith, and Faith with Baptism, and the Holy Spirit with both; and so the merits of Christ are savingly applied. Faith alone will not ordinarily serve in this case, but it must be a contracting faith on man's part, contracting in form corresponding to the federal promises and engagements on God's part; therefore, Tertullian rightly styles Baptism obsignatio fidei, testatio fidei, sponsio salutis, fidei pactio, and the like."

Baptismal interrogatories were used in the primitive, even in the Apostolical Church, and Peter seems to refer to them here. See Acts viii. 37; Heb. vi. 1. 2; cf. Rom. x. 10. Justin Martyr, Apol. 1, c. 61; Tertullian, de Spect., c. 4; de Coronâ Mil., c. 3, and de Resurrect. Carnis, c. 48. "ANIMA NON LAVATIONE SED responsione SANCTUR." Cf. Cyprian, Ep. 70, 76, 85; Hippolytus, Theophan., c. 10; Origen, Exhortatio ad Martyr., c. 12; Vales in Euseb. 7, 8, and Euseb. 7, 9, where Dionysius, Bp. of Alexandria, in the third century, speaks of a person who was present at the baptism of some who were lately baptized, and heard the questions and answers, τῶν ἐπερωτήσεων καὶ ἀποκρίσεων. VER. 22. Who is on the right hand of God, having gone into heaven, angels and authorities and powers being subjected unto him.—Now follows, as the further consequence of the sufferings of Christ, His ascension into heaven, and exaltation to the right hand of God. A former sufferer is now exalted to the highest dignity of heaven. Thus this verse beautifully connects with the exhortation to willingness of suffering, of vv. 17. 18, and paves the way for ch. iv. 1, etc.—ὅς ἐστιν ἐν δεξιᾷ; cf. Ps. cx. 1; Rom. viii. 34; Eph. i. 20; Col. iii. 1; Heb. i. 3; Phil. iii. 20. He has been received as sharer of the Divine government. He is not only King of His Church, but of the whole world.—ἡσυχαστὴς εἰς οὐρανόν—having gone into heaven. It is incorrect that this designates, not a locality of the universe, but a relation to the world. Wiesinger.—ὑποταγέντων, cf. Heb. i. 4; Eph. i. 21; Col. ii. 10. The spirits, in their various gradations, are now subjected to Him who has suffered so much and so deeply. We do not pretend to determine whether they can be distinguished, with Hoffmann, as ἀγγελοι, inasmuch as they are the executors of the Divine will, as ἐξουσιαί, inasmuch as they sway authority in this world, and δυνάμεις, because they bring about the alternations of this world, cf. Matt. xxviii. 18;

Lke. xxiv. 49; Acts ii. 82–85; iii. 21. 26; iv. 10–12; x. 40–42.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The fact that the Apostles do not separate the vicarious element of the sufferings of Christ from its typical element suggests an important hint to preachers as to the treatment of the atonement of Jesus.

2. The restoration of the lost communion of sinners with God is, according to v. 18, one of the main ends of the sufferings of Christ; but His resurrection is also a co-operating factor in this great work, v. 21.

3. There are no stronger motives for perseverance in well-doing, even where it involves the endurance of great suffering, than those taken from the innocent and vicarious sufferings and death of Jesus. As His sufferings and death conducted Him to life and to a greatly blessed sphere of work, so we are warranted to believe, if through suffering for righteousness we are made like Him, that suffering and death itself will also conduct us, and others by us, to life and blessedness. That which has affected the Head will also in different degrees affect the members, cf. Eph. ii. 5–7.

4. Christ's descent into hell, or rather into Hades, which transpired, not after, but before His resurrection (cf. Acts ii. 27. 31), is by no means a subordinate point in the Apostle's creed that may be surrendered to unbelief, but a fundamental article. But doubtless it is not founded, as Weiss assumes, on a conclusion reached by the Apostle's reasoning, as if he had inferred the necessity of Christ's preaching among the dead, both from the exclusiveness of the salvation wrought by Christ only, and from the justice of God, but rather on an illumination of the Holy Ghost, whose organs the Apostles were. The justice and love of God now appear to us in glorious light, and withhold the definite sentence of condemnation until all men have decided with full consciousness concerning Christ and His Gospel. He is set as the rock of salvation or stone of stumbling for all the world, ch. ii. 6, etc.

5. Hades is not the final, absolute place and state of punishment; this is evident from Rev. xx. 14. 10; the lake of fire and brimstone, the fiery pit, γέεννα, is that final place. There are in Hades two provinces or regions, separated from one another by a gulf. The one is a place of repose, comfort and refreshing, Abraham's bosom, Lke. xvi. 22, probably that paradise to which before His resurrection and ascension (Jno. xx. 17) Jesus went with the thief, Lke. xxiii. 43; lower paradise, as contrasted with the upper, to which Paul was transported, 2 Cor. xii. 2. 4; cf. Rev. ii. 7. Another part of the lower world contains the different prisons of human souls, who in their bodily existence had despised the word of God, acted against the light of conscience, and died in guilty unbelief. Here Jesus, as a spirit, appeared to fallen spirits, to some as Conqueror and Judge, to others, who still stretched out to Him the hand of faith, as a Saviour. We may, therefore, suppose with König that the preaching of Christ begun in the realms of departed spirits is continued there in a manner adapted to the relation of the world of the dead, and analogous to the manner in which such provision has been made adapted to our earthly relations (cf. 1 Tim. ii. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 9), so that those who here on earth did not hear at all, or not in the right way, the good news of salvation through Jesus Christ, shall hear it there. If this truth had always been sufficiently recognized, the anti-scriptural opinion of universal recovery would hardly have found such extensive circulation. [But see the Excursus, below.—M.]

6. Baptism is here taken as a means of grace, although not described from every point of view, but only according to its subjective condition, the desire for a good conscience, which coincides with μετάνοια and according to its saving power which is mediated by the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

7. This passage in connection with Acts v. 32 contains a testimony for the visible ascension of Christ, which has recently been questioned, and, alas! occasionally also by professedly believing teachers.

8. "The doctrine of this section has," as Richter says, "nothing in common with the heresies of purgatory and universal recovery. But it affords a lucid example that the atonement once made (v. 18) is of universal import for all men and for all times. It affects even the dead, and the decision of their eternal destiny depends upon their relation to the announcement of the death and resurrection of Christ."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Suffer gladly for Christ's sake, because He also has suffered for you and for all. Look at the glory into which your Head has entered through suffering.—Consider that suffering happens to us only once in the flesh, v. 18, and that it has manifold blessings for us and for others.—The universal sin-offering of Jesus, the fulfilment of all the typical offerings.—The atonement having been made for all men, must also be preached to all men.—It was part of the reward of the perfect obedience of Christ that He should receive the keys of hell and death. Hence He was able to enter the realms of death and remove thence as many as He chose without the ruler of those prisons being able to prevent it.—There are in the prisons of the unhappy realms of death, in which unconverted souls are detained unto judgment, differences and degrees of which some are more supportable and others more fearful and insupportable, Matt. x. 15; xi. 22.—The descent of Christ into the dark and horrible regions of the world of the dead exhibits the stupendous power of His commiserating love.—Christ appearing to them as Conqueror and Judge, did not proclaim to them the sentence of condemnation but announced to them the only way of salvation from their long, more than two thousand years' imprisonment.—Let nobody die with the false consolation of hearing the Gospel hereafter in the world of death.—As here, so beyond the grave, there are not wanting witnesses of Christ and preachers of the Gospel.—The success of Christ's preaching in those prisons is not recorded; Peter may intend to give a hint on the subject in mentioning the few who escaped the flood.—A threefold fruit of the sufferings of Christ: 1. He has brought us to God by reconciling us to God through His blood and becoming our peace, Rom. v. 10; Eph. ii. 13; Col. i. 20. 2. He brings us daily to God, for through Him we have access to the Father by faith, Rom. v. 2; Eph. ii. 18, and by His Spirit He renews us day by day. 3. He will bring us to God in the end, when it shall appear what we shall be.

BESSER:—"It is infinitely better to suffer once with Christ than to suffer eternally without Christ."

BEDE:—"The ark was lifted up with Noah and his family: so we are carried upward and made citizens of the kingdom of heaven by baptism. As the water of itself did not save Noah, but only by means of the ark, so the water of baptism saves us not as water only but as water with the true ark which is Christ. All the power of baptism flows from the sufferings of Christ, from the wood of the cross." Despair not, little flock; look through the mist of thy tribulation upward to the Prince of glory, to thy King, before whom every thing lies prostrate.—To what manifold and rich glory do sufferings lead!—How will it fare with those who cause tribulation to believers?—Do not abuse the long-suffering of God, believe that the punishment of God comes irresistibly and with more fearful weight, if His grace has been neglected.

STARKE:—Away, popish mass! We need no more offering for sin. The one offering of Christ is mighty and valid for eternity, Heb. x. 12.—O, the riches of the love of God and of Christ! For a righteous man one will perhaps suffer a little, but Christ has suffered every thing for sinners, Rom. v. 7. 8. 10.—The vengeance of God comes slowly but it strikes hard. Long spared, fearfully punished; such has been the experience of thousands who lived after the first world, 1 Cor. x. 6, etc.—Our baptism should continually remind us not to act against the dictates of our conscience or to sin against God, Rom. vi. 4.—There are orders among the holy angels, although we do not understand their nature and condition, Col. i. 16.

LISCO:—The glory of the grace of Christ.—The duty of Christians to make a good confession in word and deed.—The history of the victory of Jesus Christ, the Head of the kingdom.

[As FRONMUELLER's views on this passage, ch. iii. 19. 20 and iv. 6 are rather onesided and the doctrinal inferences drawn from them laid down rather too dogmatically, it is but fair that the question in all its bearings should be laid before the readers of this Commentary, which is done in the subjoined excursus, taken from an article prepared by me for the Evangelical Review. January 1866.—M.]

EXCURSUS ON THE DESCENSUS AD INFEROS.

[The object of our Lord's descent to Hades.—The passage, 1 Peter iii. 19, stands in the context from ver. 18–20, in a literal and grammatical translation, as follows: "Because Christ also suffered for sins once, a just person on behalf of unjust, in order that He might present us to God; put to death indeed in the flesh, but made alive in the spirit, in which also He went and preached to the spirits in prison, which were disobedient formerly, when the long suffering of God was waiting in the days of Noah while the ark was preparing," etc. The reasons for this translation appear from the exegesis, to which we now proceed.

ὅτι, v. 18, gives the reason why suffering for well-doing is better than suffering for evil-doing; because it establishes the conformity of Christians to Christ their Head. He suffered for sins once, that is, He voluntarily underwent suffering for our sins: He made Himself our sin-offering. He suffered in our stead, and His sufferings were the means of everlasting blessedness to others and of eternal glory to Himself; so we also suffer, and for sins, not indeed for the sins of others, but for our own, and by parity of reasoning it follows that the sufferings of Christians not only conform them to Christ (with reverence be it spoken), but are the means of everlasting blessedness to themselves and of eternal glory to Christ. This applies not to all suffering, but only to suffering for well-doing. This "beam of comforting light falls on the sufferings of Christians from this ἀπαξ through καί," BASSER. καί indicates the analogy and shows that ἀπαξ belongs to Christ and His followers. He suffered once and once only, once for all. So it will be with us. Our suffering is only once, limited to a short space of time; it is only for a season, and our present suffering is not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us. The way to glory lies through the valley of humiliation. Christ suffered as a just person on behalf of unjust; of course the comparison is only relative, for although we are called δίκαιοι in v. 12, and suffer as ἄδικοι, yet is our δικαιοσύνη infinitely inferior to that of Christ, and our suffering not vicarious like His, for we suffer not ἕπρ' ἁδίκων, but περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν. The end of our Lord's suffering is stated in the words ἵνα ἡμᾶς προσάγῃ τῷ θεῷ, "that He might bring us near to God." "This is the fruit of our Lord's passion, that He brings the wanderers back to the Father, and the lost to the homes of blessedness;"* or, in the words of BENGL: "That going Himself to the Father, He might bring in, who had been alienated, but now justified, together with Him into heaven, v. 22, by the self-same steps of humiliation and exaltation, which He Himself had trodden. From this verse onward to ch. iv. 6, Peter thoroughly links together the course of progress of Christ and believers (wherein He Himself followed the Lord according to His prediction, John xiii. 36), in conjunction with the unbelief and punishment of the many."† The Apostle next proceeds to specify the manner how Christ opened the way of our being brought to God. We have here a double antithesis θανάτω and ζωοποιεῖς, and σάρκι and πνεύματι; the two nouns have been variously explained. OECUM., THEOPH., GERHARD, CLARIUS, CALOV, HORNEIUS, CAPELLUS makes them erroneously to denote the human and the divine natures of Christ; CASTELLIO (also CORN. A LAP., FLACIUS, ESTIUS, BENGL) interprets: Corpore necatus, animo in vitam revocatus; GROTIUS paraphrases σάρκι by "quod attinet ad vitam hanc fragilem et caducam," and explains πνεύματι by that divine power. There are many other variations; without entering upon their discussion, we hold with ALFORD that the two nouns have adverbial force and that this construction removes the difficulties which otherwise spring up. The fact is that quod ad carnem, Christ was put to death, quod ad spiritum, He was brought to life. "His flesh was the subject, recipient, vehicle of inflicted death; His spirit was the subject, recipient, vehicle of restored life. But let us beware, and proceed cautiously. What is asserted is not that the flesh died and the spirit was made alive, but that "quoad" the flesh the Lord died, "quoad" the spirit, He was made alive. He, the God-man, Christ Jesus, body and soul, ceased to live in the flesh, began to live in the spirit; ceased to live a fleshly mortal life, began to live a spiritual resurrection-life. His own spirit never died, as the next verse shows us." ALFORD.—"This is the meaning, that Christ by His sufferings was taken from the life which is flesh and blood, as a man on earth, living, walking and standing in flesh and blood, * * * and He is now placed in another life, and made alive according to the spirit, has passed into a spiritual and supernatural life, which includes in itself the whole life which Christ now has in soul and body, so that He has no longer a fleshly but a spiritual body." LUTHER.—"It is the same who dies and the same who is again made alive, both times the whole man, Jesus, in body and soul. He ceases to live, in that that, which is to His personality the medium of action, falls under death; and He begins to live, in that He receives back this same for a medium of His action again. The life which fell under death was a fleshly life, that is, such a life as has its determination to the present condition of man's nature, to the externality of its mundane connection. The life which was won back is a spiritual life, that is, such a life as has its determination from the Spirit, in which consists our inner connection with God." HORMANN, Schriftbeweis, 2, 336.

ἐν ᾧ, v. 19, clearly refers to πνεύματι and must be rendered "in which," not by which as in E. V. καί may be connected with the whole period and rendered "in which He also went, etc."—(ALFORD), or with τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύματι, and translated "in which He went and preached also (or even) to the spirits in prison," STREIGER. The latter construction seems preferable, for it not only avoids the awkwardness of subordinating the whole period to what precedes, but also gives prominence to the new idea that the activity of Christ reached even to the spirits in prison. On τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύματι see below, πορευθεὶς denotes the actual presence of the Spirit of Christ in the place of departed spirits, for πορευθεὶς εἰς οὐρανόν in v. 22 clearly shows that the participle must refer to local transference. Ἐκλήρυνεν is almost εὐαγγελίσασθαι (from of. ch. iv. 6, whose εὐαγγελίσθη is used with reference to the dead); our verb in connection with τὸ εὐαγγέλιον is found in Matt. iv. 23; ix. 35; Mark i. 14; xvi. 15; it implies the preaching of the gospel in Mark i. 38, 15; Matt. iii. 1; iv. 17; ix. 35; it has this meaning in the following passages: Matt. x. 7; xxiv. 14; Mark iii. 14; vi. 12; xiii. 10; Luke ix. 2; Acts ix. 20; x. 42, 43; 1 Cor. i. 23; Phil. i. 15; 2 Tim. iv. 2; it is never used in the sense of judicial announcement and N. T. usage clothes it with the meaning "to preach the gospel."

† "Ut nos qui abalienati fueramus. ipse abiens ad Patrem secum una, justificatos, adduceret in cælum, v. 22, per eandem gradum, quos ipse emensus est, exinanitionis et exaltationis. Ex hoc verbo Petrus, usque ad c. iv. 6, penitus connectit Christi et filiorum iter sive processum (quo etiam ipse sequebatur Dominum ex ejus predicatione, John xiii. 36) infidelitatem multorum et penam imponentes."

Ver. 20 describes the character of the spirits in prison; they were still disobedient (ἀπειθήσαντες), i. e., exhibited unbelief in disobedience. They derided the prediction of the coming flood, and despised the exhortation to repentance, ποτέ δε distinctly marks the period of their unbelief, viz., the time during which the ark was preparing. The long suffering of God gave them one hundred and twenty years' time for repentance. In ἀπεφθέχετο, which is doubtless the true reading (A. B. C. K. Z.) the full time during which the exercise of the Divine long-suffering took place, is brought out, just as κατασκευαζομένης intimates the difficulty and protracted duration of the building of the ark.

Sound exegesis clearly establishes the Apostolic declaration, that our Lord Jesus Christ, after His crucifixion, went in spirit to the place of departed spirits (Hades, Sheol as in Syriac) and there preached to those spirits, who, in the days of Noah, during the building of the ark, persisted in unbelief and disobedience. Why, what and with what effect he preached there, is not revealed. The Apostle's declaration, however clearly established, has been felt from the earliest times to present many and great difficulties, and occasioned an almost endless variety of interpretations, the main features of which will appear in the following classification. Making the ἀρχὴν of our Lord the starting point, we have the following survey (given by STEIGER):

CHRIST PREACHED. I. Mediately: 1, by Noah, 2, by the Apostles. II. Immediately, in the realms of the dead: 1. to the good; 2. to the good and the wicked; 3. to the wicked.

I. 1. Christ preached mediately by Noah. AUGUSTINE, BEDE, THOMAS AQUINAS, LYRA, HAMMOND, BEZA, SCALIGER, LEIGHTON, HORNEIUS, GERHARD, ELSNER, BENSON, al., and among more recent authors JOHN CLAUSEN, and HOFMANN, (Schriftbeweise II. 335—341) hold that Christ preached by Noah to his contemporaries, that preacher of righteousness not preaching of himself, but in obedience to the prompting of the spirit of Christ; so that while Noah was the instrument, Christ was virtually preaching by him. In illustration of this view we quote AUGUSTINE (Ep. 99 ad Euodiam; cf. also Ep. 164): "Spiritus in carcere conclusi sunt increduli qui vixerunt temporibus Noe, quorum spiritus, i. e., animæ erant in carne et ignorantibus tenebris velut in carcere conclusi; Christus is non in carne, qui nondum erat incarnatus, sed in spiritu, i. e., secundum divinitatem prædicavit;" and BEZA: "Christ, says he (the Apostle), whom I have already said to be vivified by the power of the Godhead, formerly in the days of Noah, when the ark was preparing, going forth or coming . . . not in a bodily form (which He had not yet assumed) but by the self-same power through which He afterwards rose from the dead, and by inspiration whereof the prophets spoke, preached to those spirits who now suffer deserved punishment in prison, as having formerly refused to listen to the admonitions of Noah?"

This kind of interpretation, notwithstanding the respectable authorities who advocate it, will be rejected by candid scholars as arbitrary and ungrammatical. As arbitrary, because the Apostle neither intimates any such figurative preaching of the spirit of Christ in Noah, nor that Noah preached at all; as ungrammatical, because

a. The subject of discourse is not the Logos but the God-Man (καὶ ὁ θεὸς), and the means by which He preached is not the Holy Spirit, but the spirit of Christ ἐν ᾧ ἡ σὺ, πνεύματι).

b. The object (πνεύματα) designates not living men, but departed spirits (cf. Luke xxiv. 37; Heb. xii. 23; Rev. xxii. 6).

c. The metaphorical φυλακή of AUGUSTINE "caro et ignorantie tenebræ" and the "qui nunc in carcere meritis dant pœnas" of BEZA are inadmissible, the former because it destroys all local reference and thus spiritualizes away the historical value of the Apostle's declaration, the second because it takes an unjustifiable liberty with that declaration in transferring to the present what manifestly belongs to the past: ἐπαθεν, θανατώθεις, ζωοποιώθεις, and πορευθεις ἐκέρυξεν set forth historical events in chronological order, and the τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν "describes the local condition of the πνεύματα as the time when the preaching took place," (Alford).

d. ἀπειθήσαντες ποτέ interrupts the chronological order, and plainly separates the time of Christ's preaching from the time of their disobedience. BENDEL says: "Si sermo esset de præconio per Noe, id aliquando aut plane omitteretur, aut cum prædicavit jungeretur;" and FLACIUS, as he disjoins the kind of preaching from the disobedience of those spirits, so on the other hand, he conjoins it with their imprisonment or captivity.

e. πορευθεις, as compared with v. 22, cannot be resolved into a pleonasm; giving to the words their common meaning πορευθεις ἐκέρυξεν must mean, "he went away and preached." (HENSLEY).

I. 2. Christ preached mediately by the Apostles. This is the view advocated by SOCINUS, VORST, GROTIUS, SCHÖTTGEN, SCHLICHTING and HENSLEY. It is distinguished, like I, 1, by the metaphorical interpretation of τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν; ἐν φυλακῇ—the prison of the body (GROTIUS) or—the prison of sin (SOCINUS, SCHLICHTING, HENSLEY); and the πνεύματα either—the Jews (sub iugo legis existentes), or—the Jews and Gentiles (sub potestate diaboli jacentes). ποτέ is explained in the sense that those to whom Christ preached have now ceased to be unbelievers; HENSLEY, who gives this explanation, is constrained to read in the next clause ὅτι. But it is a purely arbitrary assumption, unwarranted by the facts of the case that all have believed. πορευθεις ἐκέρυξεν, according to the advocates of this view, refers to the efficacy of Christ through the Apostles, but it requires an uncommonly fertile imagination to bring this out. The supposed analogy in Eph. iv. 21; ii. 17, cannot be pressed into the service of these expositors, for the context is too plain to admit of a similar construction; the αὐτὸν ἐκώσταν of Eph. iv. 21 is—ἐμάθετε τὸν χριστόν, v. 20, and ἐν αὐτῷ ἐδιδάχθητε, v. 21, while ἐλθὼν εὐηγγελίσασθαι εἰρήνην, in Eph. ii. 17, clearly refers back to αὐτὸς γὰρ ἔστιν ἡ εἰρήνη ἡμῶν, v. 14, and denotes His coming to the earth in person to make known the covenants of peace, sealed with His atoning sacrifice. On grammatical grounds this view is altogether untenable, and its advocates are constrained to waive grammatical considerations. Although HUTNER justly remarks, "How this interpretation heaps caprice on caprice, need not be shown," the following objections to it may be found useful:—

a. The πνεῦμα in which Christ preached, according to this view, must be the Holy Spirit; but this is, 1. forbidden by the context, for ἐν ᾧ refers to the πνεύματι immediately preceding it. 2. Gives a double meaning to πνεῦμα, for πνεύμασι must signify the souls of men.

b. Christ preached by the Apostles not during His bodily death, v. 18, but after His exaltation, v. 22. STEIGER.

c. πορεύεις in point of time immediately follows θανατωθεὶς μὲν σαρκὶ ζωοποιυθεὶς δὲ πνεύματι and denotes an actual going away. These considerations abundantly refute explanations like that of GROTIVS, which we give as a sample of theological finessing: "Adjungere voluit Petrus similitudinem a temporibus Noe, ut ostendat quanto res nunc melius per Christum quam tunc per Noen processerit."

We now pass on to the second class of interpretations, viz.:

II. Christ preached immediately in the realms of the dead.

I. To the good. MARCION (IRENÆUS I. 24. 27, cf. WALCH, Hist. d. Ketz. I. 512; NEANDER, Ch. Hist. I. p. 799), held that Christ then set at liberty those whom the Old Testament describes as ungodly, but whom he (MARCION) maintained to be better than the believers of the Old Covenant, who had to stay behind in hell. The Apocryphal gospel of NICODEMUS asserts the same concerning the truly good (see BIRON's Auctarium, p. 109-147, cf. MATTHEI, p. 200, and EUSEB. H. E. I.). IRENÆUS (IV. 27. 2; V. 81. 1), taught that Christ announced to the pious (the patriarchs and others), the redemption He had purchased, in order to bring them into the heavenly kingdom, (cf. JUST. MART. Dial. c. Tryph. p. 298). This is substantially the view of TERTULLIAN (de Anima. 7, 55), HIPPOLYTUS (de Antichr. c. 26), ISIDORUS (Sent. I. 16, 15) GREGORY THE GREAT and the GREEK CHURCH, PETR. MOGILAE, Conf. Eccl. Gr. Orth. I. 49, etc.; JOH. DAMASC., de Orth. fide III. 26), the Schoolmen (ANSELM, ALBERTUS, THOM. AQUIN.), ZWINGLE and CALVIN, ZWINGLE (Fidei Chr. Expos. art. de Chr. VII.) says: "It is to be believed that He (Christ) departed from among men to be numbered with the inferi, and that the virtue of His redemption reached also to them, which St. Peter intimates, when he says that to the dead, i. e., to those in the nether world, who, after the example of Noah, from the commencement of the world, have believed upon God, while the wicked despised His admonitions, the gospel was preached." On doctrinal ground he defends his view by the position that no one could come to heaven before Christ (Jno. iii. 13) because He must have in all things pre-eminence (Col. i. 18). (De vera et f. rel. art. de baptismo, p. 214, 29). CALVIN interprets φυλαχὴ by "specula sive ipse excedendi actus," and describes the spirits in φυλαχὴ as "pias

animas in spem salutis promissæ intentas, quasi eminus eam considerarent." Perceiving a difficulty in ἀπεθῆσθαι ποτὲ κ. τ. λ. he explains: "Quum increduli fuissent olim; quo significat, nihil nocuisse sanctis patribus, quod impiorum multitudine pene obruti fuerint;" that as those believers sustained no injury to their souls from the multitude of believers that surrounded them, so also now believers are, through baptism, delivered from the world. The way in which he justifies his interpretation, sets forth views to which many, that now call themselves after the Genevan Reformer, are hardly prepared to subscribe: "Discrepat fateor, ab hoc sensu Græca syntaxis; debuerat enim Petrus, si hoc vellet, genitivum absolutum ponere. Sed quia apostolis novum non est liberius casum unum ponere alterius loco, et videmus Petrum hic confuse multas res simul coacervare, nec vero aliter aptus sensus elici poterat; non dubitavi ita resolvere orationem implicitam, quo intelligerent lectores, alios vocari incredulos, quam quibus prædicatum fuisse evangelium dicit." To this class of interpreters Bp. BROWN also belongs, who makes ἐκθύρῃν to signify proclaimed, and explains that Christ proclaimed to the patriarchs that their redemption had been fully effected, that Satan had been conquered, that the great sacrifice had been offered up, and asks, If angels joy over one sinner that repenteth, may we not suppose Paradise filled with rapture when the soul of Jesus came among the souls of redeemed, Himself the Herald (κῆρυξ) of His own victory; BROWN's view is that of HORSLEY (Vol. I. Serm. 20), who favours, however, in language more decided than BROWN's, the view that Christ virtually preached to those "who had once been disobedient in the days of Noah." The difficulty of ἀπεθῆσθαι BROWN supposes to be met by the consideration that many who died in the flood were, nevertheless, saved from final damnation, which he thinks highly probable. The real difficulty, in his opinion, "consists in the fact that the proclamation of the finishing of the great work of salvation, is represented by St. Peter as having been addressed to these antediluvian penitents, and as mention is made of the penitents of later ages, who are equally interested in the tidings." We have already shown that ἐκθύρῃν cannot be diluted into a mere proclaiming or heralding forth, and we shall show, by and by, that the antediluvian sinners, not penitents, appear to be singled out because of the enormity of their wickedness, and that the fact of their being made the objects of Christ's tender solicitude, seems to shed the light of heaven on one of the most bewildering subjects in irreligion.

The objections to this whole view, in its different modifications, are—a. The text says nothing whatever of the good, but refers explicitly to the disobedient. All interpretations which ignore this distinct and explicit reference, are arbitrary, and substitute speculation for the language of inspiration.

b. The text says nothing whatever of the repentance of the contemporaries of Noah, nor does any other passage of Scripture give us any information to that effect. We must, therefore, conclude that the expedient which makes those antediluvians to have repented at the breaking in of the flood, however ingenious, amounts to simple assumption. (The last view is held by SUAREZ, ESTIUS, BELLARMIN, LUTHER on Ilos. 4, 2, A. D. 1545, as quoted by Bengel, PETER MARTYR, OSIANDER, QUISTORF, HUTTEK, GESSNER and BENDEL. The latter says: "Probabile est nonnullos ex tanta multitudinis, veniente pluvia, respuisse: cumque non credidissent dum expectaret Deus, postea cum arca structa esset et pœna ingrueret, credere cœpisse: quibus postea Christus, eorumque similibus, se præconem gratias præstiterit." BROWNE also shares this view.)

II. 2. Christ preached in the realms of the dead to the good and the wicked. This is maintained by ATHANASIUS, AMBROSE, ERASMUS, CALVIN, Instit. 2, 16, 9. Christ's preaching to the good is described as a "prædicatio evangelica ad consolationem," to the wicked as a "prædicatio legalis, exprobatoria, damnatoria ad terrorem." BOLTON quotes the language of Abraham to Dives (Luke 16. 23 sq.) in support of this view, which is however, open to the same objections as II. 1. viz.: that Scripture is silent concerning the good.

II. 3. Christ preached in the realms of the dead to the wicked. LUTHER (Werke, Leipz. Vol. XII. p. 285) appears to favour this view when he says "that one could not reject this opinion, because that which St. Peter clearly affirms, etc." Even under this head we have divergent opinions in connection with the question whether Christ manifested himself to the disobedient as Redeemer or as Judge.

FLACIUS, CALOV, BUDDIUS, WOLF, ARETIUS, &c., make the burden of Christ's preaching an announcement of condemnation. HOLLAZ (quoted by HUTHEK) says: "Fuit prædicatio Christi in inferno non evangelica quæ hominibus tantum in regno gratiæ annuntiatur, sed legalis, elenctica, terribilis, etque tum verbalis, quæ ipsos æterna supplicia promeritos esse convincit, tum realis immanem terrorem in incussit." Against this view, it may be said—

a. That κηρυσσειν, as already stated, used of Christ and the Apostles, does not admit of such a sense, but uniformly signifies to preach the Gospel;

b. That such damatory preaching, besides being utterly superfluous in the case of spirits already reserved to condemnation (ALFORD) is derogatory to the character of the Redeemer; Christian consciousness revolts from the thought that the holy Jesus, whose dying words were words of forgiveness and love, should have visited the realms of the dead and exulted over the misery of the damned, and publishing His triumph, have intensified their torments and made hell more of hell to them;

c. That the context forbids such a view, "As if Peter would console the faithful with the arguments, that Christ, even when dead, underwent suffering on behalf of those unbelievers" (CALVIN); for it must be borne in mind that the whole passage, of which these much controverted verses form part, is designed to show how the sufferings of Christ minister to the consolation of believers, (cf. WISSINGER, p. 241.)

We come now to the only remaining view, according to which Christ visited the realms of the dead and preached there the Gospel to the dead. This is the explicit declaration of the Apostle, who says nothing, however, of the effect of His preaching, whether many, few, or any, were converted by it. It is necessary to start with this caution, because the disregard of it has led many expositors, especially among the fathers, to unwarranted conclusions. E. g., CLEMENT of Alexandria, says: "Wherefore, that He might bring them to repentance, the Lord preached also to those in Hades. But what, do not the Scriptures declare, that the Lord has preached to those that perished in the deluge, and not to these only, but to all that are in chains, and that are kept in the ward and prison-house of Hades;" adding, that while Christ preached only to those of the Old Testament, the Apostles, after His example, must have preached there, and that also to the heathen, but both only to the good, "to those that lived in the righteousness which was agreeable to the law and philosophy, yet still were not perfect, but passed through life under many short-comings." ORIGEN (on 1 Kings xxviii. Hom. 2) adds to this, that the prophets had also been there, in order to announce beforehand the arrival of Christ, but confines the number of the delivered also to those who, before death, had been prepared for it. This view seems to have generally spread through the Eastern Church. (See STEIGER, p. 225.) These, and similar opinions, cannot be taken as interpretations, for they superadd inferences which are not warranted by the language of St. Peter, who declares that Christ preached the Gospel in Hades to the unbelieving contemporaries of Noah; nothing more, nothing less.

It has been shown above that Hades denotes the place of the departed, and consists of two separate regions, kept asunder by an impassable gulf. As we know from our Lord's promise to the penitent thief, that He went on the day of His crucifixion to Paradise, so we learn from St. Peter that He preached to the spirits in prison, and that these disembodied prisoners were those of men who were disobedient in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing.

The word φωλακή cannot be rendered otherwise than prison. Cf. Matt. v. 25; Luke xiv. 8; xviii. 30; xxv. 36, 39, 43, 44; Mark vi. 17, 27; Luke iii. 20; xii. 58; xxi. 12; xxii. 83; xxiii. 19; John iii. 24; Acts v. 19; xii. 4 and in 13 other places; 2 Cor. vi. 6; xi. 23; Heb. xi. 36; Rev. ii. 10; xxii. 83.

The word ἐκήρυξεν has been shown to signify "preached the gospel." It has this sense in the following passages: Matt. iii. 1; iv. 17; x. 7, 27; xi. 1; Mark i. 7, 38, 39; iii. 14; v. 20; xvi. 20; Luke iv. 44; Rom. x. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 27; xv. 11; and was thus understood by IRENEUS (4, 37, 2, p. 347, ed. Grabe.) "Domini in ea quæ sunt sub terra descendisse evangelizantem adventum suum." (CLEMENT ALEX. Strom. 6, 6, δ κήρυξ δι οὐδὲν ἕτερον εἰς ἅδου κατήλθεν, ἢ διὰ τὸ εὐαγγελισσάσθαι. So CYRIL ALEX. on John xvi. 16, and in Hom. Pasch. 20.)

In concluding this Excursus, it is important to observe that the Apostle teaches nothing that bears any resemblance to the Popish notion of purgatory, since hades and purgatory are two distinct conceptions, the one being the abode of all the departed, the other a supposed place of purification for a particular class of Christians; nor does he teach universal recovery; nor does he intimate any thing in favour of a second probation after death. In addition to this caution, the reader is referred to the capital note of Rev. Dr. Schaff on Matthew XII. 82, pp. 228, 229.

CHAPTER IV. 1-6.

ANALYSIS:—Exhortation to being armed with the mind of the sufferings of Christ, and to killing the flesh in order to make room for the life of the spirit.

- 1 Forasmuch then<sup>1</sup> as Christ hath suffered for us<sup>2</sup> in the flesh, arm yourselves<sup>3</sup> likewise with the same mind: for<sup>4</sup> he that hath suffered in the flesh<sup>5</sup> hath ceased<sup>6</sup> from sin; That he<sup>7</sup> no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.<sup>8</sup> For the time past of our life may suffice<sup>9</sup> us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when<sup>10</sup> we walked in<sup>11</sup> lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable<sup>12</sup> idolatries: Wherein<sup>13</sup> they think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot,<sup>14</sup> speaking evil of you: Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead. For, for this cause<sup>15</sup> was the gospel preached also to them that are dead,<sup>16</sup> that they might be judged<sup>17</sup> according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. Christ then, having suffered for us—do you also arm yourselves with the same mind.—ὡν takes up again ch. iii. 18, and shows that the subject developed in ch. iii. 19-22 is governed by the reference to the sufferings of Christ.—ὡς ἂν ἡμῶν, for our benefit and in our stead, cf. ch. iii. 18.—σαρκί: Roos rightly remarks that Peter never uses σὰρξ in the bad sense in which Paul has used it several times, but only as denoting the weak, mortal nature belonging to our earthly condition.—ἐννοία; Wiesinger [and Calvin, Beza, Gerhard, Bengel and Erasmus-Schmidt.—M.] render it "thought," but it denotes as much as mens, mind, intent, resolution, as appears from a passage from Isocrates, cited by Riemer. [οὐ γὰρ [ὁ Θεὸς] αὐτοχειρεῖς ὅτε τῶν ἀγαθῶν ὅτε τῶν κακῶν γίνονται τῶν συμβαινόντων αὐτοῖς, [τοῖς ἀνθρώποις], ἀλλ' ἐκάστοις τοιαύτην ἐννοίαν ἐμποιοῦσιν, ὥστε δι' ἀλλήλων ἡμῖν ἐκάτερα παρὰ γίνεσθαι τοῦτων; see also Eur. Hel. 1026; Diodor. Sic. II. 80.—M.] Exhibit a manly, constant readiness (intent) to suffer innocently for the sins of others and for their benefit (yet not vicariously) with the purpose, as much as you are able, to remove sin and to conduct souls to God.—ἀπλῶς αὐτῷ, cf. Rom. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. x. 4; Eph. vi. 11; use this purpose as a shield against temptation to sin.

[Arming oneself with a thought, without the intent or resolution of using it as a piece of armour for defensive warfare, conveys no very clear idea. The aforesaid commentators, who render ἐννοία, thought, and ὅτι, that, are clearly embarrassed about καὶ ὑμεῖς and τὴν αὐτὴν, which are decisive for the interpretation given in the text. "Do ye also arm yourselves (καὶ ὑμεῖς) with the same (τὴν αὐτὴν) mind, viz.: put on the purpose to suffer in the flesh, as Christ did, as a piece of armour." This strikes us as being far more to the point than the paraphrase of Amyraut: "Mais encore nous nous devons armer de cette bonne pensée contre toutes sortes de tentations au mal, que celui qui a souffert en cette nature humaine, n'a désormais plus de commerce avec le péché;" or the interpretation of Gerhard: "ὅτι rectius accipitur expositiva, exponit enim Apostolus illam cogitationem ἐννοίαν qua nos vult armari: hæc cogitatio erit vobis uisus firmissimi scuti et munimenti contra peccatum." It is, moreover, difficult to make good sense of

ὅτι must not be joined with ἐννοια, as specifying the substance of this thought, this would require ταύτην instead of τὴν αὐτήν,—but it defines the exhortation more closely. [Rendering ὅτι because, as Alford does, makes his paraphrase very forcible, “and ye will need this arming, because the course of suffering according to the flesh which ye have to undergo ending in an entire freedom from sin, your warfare with sin must be begun and carried on from this time forward.”—M.]

Because He that hath suffered as to the flesh hath rest from sin.—ὁ παθὼν ἐν σαρκί, it appears to me, is best applied to Christ Himself; the expression then connects closely with that which precedes, and defines it. For He who has once suffered as to the flesh, which suffering includes His death, as in ch. iii. 18, has now rest from sin. He is fortified against all its assaults. [πάσχειν σαρκί means to suffer according to the flesh. Winer, p. 481. The Dative, relating to things, denotes that in reference to which an action is done, or a state exists. Winer, p. 228.—M.] He has died unto sin once, as Paul expresses it in Rom. vi. 10. 7. Hence, he who puts on His mind, and is in communion with Him, henceforth must serve sin no more. The Aorist παθὼν denotes an action once existing, but having now absolutely passed away. All other explanations are liable to many grammatical and psychological objections. Weiss: “He that suffers on account of sin, because of opposition to sin, thereby breaks with sin, and testifies that he will no longer obey the will of the world.” But the Aorist παθὼν, not the Present πάσχων is used; again, many experiences might contradict the general statement, and the exhortation which follows would seem to be superfluous.—Others are compelled to have recourse to arbitrary supplements. So Steiger: “Christ suffering bodily freed us from sin, and we, participating by faith in the sufferings of Christ, die unto sin.” Grotius and others, contrary to all grammatical usage, understand the passage of the crucifying and the mortification of fleshly lusts.

VER. 2. To the end that . . . ye should not.—Join εἰς τὸ μηκέτι with ὀφείλασθε, not with ἐκτανται, which concludes the parenthesis. Acquire the mind which has done with sin, so that your relation to sin may be that of one who has died and is risen again, as that of Christ after His exaltation, ch. iii. 21. 22.

To the lusts of men, not to be taken as = fleshly, worldly lusts in general (κοσμικαί, σαρκικαὶ ἐπιθυμίαι, Tit. ii. 12; Rom. xii. 2), not as in ch. i. 14; ii. 11, but in a narrower sense with reference to v. 4, denoting the desire of worldly-minded men, that believers also ought to live as they do, and that they ought not to single themselves out at the world's disposition to coerce them also to serve its idols. The will of God alone ought to be our pole-star. The Dative is the dativus commodi, to live to some one—to devote to him one's life, to place oneself at his service, cf. ch. ii. 24; Gal. ii. 19.

The rest of your time in the flesh,=the time of our pilgrimage, as in ch. i. 17. This is to indicate that our earthly life constitutes only a small part of our existence, and that to individual Christians, after their conversion, only a brief term of grace is allotted. But there is also a reference to what follows.

VER. 3. For sufficient is the past time—to have wrought the will of the Gentiles.—ἀρκετὸς γὰρ ἦν ὑμῖν sc. ἔστιν.—The following Infinitive depends on these words; the time past is sufficient to have wrought the will of the Gentiles. Here is an implied irony. If you believe that you are debtors to the flesh (Rom. viii. 12), and obliged to serve sin, surely you have done enough, and more than enough of it, you have abundantly done your duty in the service of sin. Grotius quotes a passage from Martial: “Lusisti, satis est—” you have played, it is enough. This lessens the severity of the reproach. Otherwise Bengel, who avers that penitents are seized with a loathing of sin.

τὸ βούλημα τῶν ἐθνῶν.—(The Text. Rec. has θέλημα). On the demands made upon them by the heathen, among whom they were obliged to live, cf. v. 2. Suppose that the readers of Peter's Epistle had been formerly heathens, his reproaching them with having formerly done the will of the Gentiles would surely be singular. This passage, therefore, renders it highly probable that he was addressing Jewish Christians, who, belonging to the chosen people of God, and having received extraordinary revelations, ought so much the less have placed themselves on a level with the heathen. Paul also reproaches the Jews with their heathenish, vicious life, Rom. ii. Only the expression ἀθεμίτοι εἰδωλολατρεῖαι might militate against our view.—Ἀθεμίτοι=things forbidden by, wrong and wicked before laws human and divine, especially opposed to the law of the Old Covenant, Acts x. 28. It is asked, Where is the evidence of such open participating on the part of the Jews of that time in such heathen iniquities? Weiss replies that the expression is susceptible of a wider meaning, that the use of the Plural intimates an enlarged application of the term, cf. Eph. v. 5; Col. iii. 5; Phil. iii. 19, and that ἀθεμίτοις relates to persons on whom the law of the Old Covenant was obligatory. Grotius calls attention to their participation in the common meals of heathen communities. Those who are not satisfied with these explanations may reflect that individual former heathen may have joined those Jewish Christian congregations. [On the other hand, the strong expressions used by the Apostle seem to contemplate a great deal more than isolated participation in heathen wickedness and abomination. There is absolutely no evidence that the Jews ever went so far as the language employed indicates. Moreover, there is nothing absurd, or even strange, in the Apostle's reproach, if addressed to Gentile Christians; they had doubtless intimate relations with their friends in heathenism, and the danger of relapsing into their abominations must have been ever present, at all events, it was as great as that of modern Christians, from intercourse with worldly and ungodly people, of relapsing into the ways of an ungodly world.—M.]—κατεργάσθαι alludes to sexual sins.

 "Not only because life is compared to a journey, but also in order to denote the eagerness with which they go on from sin to sin."—ἀσέλγεια, li-centious practices, the outbreaks of intemperance, and excesses of every kind, while ἐπιθυμία denote hidden sins of voluptuousness, inward unchastity and lewdness, where the power to indulge in outward acts is wanting.—οἰνοφύται; φύω to bubble up, overflow like boiling water, intoxication.—κώμοι, cf. Rom. xiii. 13; Gal. v. 21, festive processions on days sacred to Bacchus, characterized by wild revelling, licentious songs and jests, and folly in general. Then banqueting, convivial carousing, terminating, as Eustathius remarks, in deep sleep.—πότος, particularly drinking in common, drinking-bouts.

VER. 4. At which—speaking evil of you.
ἐν ᾧ relates to ἀρκετός. Suffering it to suffice, and giving up your former course, seems strange, and is altogether inexplicable to them. The fuller meaning is brought out by μὴ συντρεχόντων ἑμῶν, because you no longer join them and run with them.—εἰς τὴν αὐτὴν ἀνάχουσι, probably a place reached by the sea at the flood-tide, the flowed-out water forming a pool or puddle.—ἀσωτία from ἄσωτος, without salvation, past redemption, hence extravagant, voluptuous, profligate manner of life, Eph. v. 18; Tit. i. 6; Lke. xv. 18; εἰς τὴν αὐτὴν into which formerly they had thrown themselves, and dragged you.

 ference for reckless indulgence and effusion in sin, cf. Juvenal, 8, 68, "Jam pridem Syrus in Ti-berim defluxit Orontes," etc., and G. Dyer's Description of the Ruins of Rome, vv. 62–66.—M.]

βλασφημοῦντες.—Grotius:—Of Christians as those who leave civil society; Calov:—Of the Christian religion, because it leads to a different manner of life. The two ideas may be combined.

VER. 5. Who shall give account—dead.
 —Let not their evil speaking confuse you, they will have to render account.—τῷ ἐτοίμως ἔχοντι.
 He is fully prepared, all the means and necessary conditions are already in His hand, as described in Ps. vii. 12–44.—ζῶντας καὶ νεκρούς, cf. Acts x.
 42. None can escape the judgment, it compre-hends all, no matter whether at the appearing of the Judge one is alive or dead; and it may come at any moment. "Where the Apostles did not treat expressly of the time of Christ's advent, they were wont to describe it as immediately impending."

VER. 6. For to this end was the Gospel preached even to them that are dead.—
 This evidently goes back to the important passage, ch. iii. 19, 20. The Apostle meets the objection: Can the dead also be judged? Yes, and for this very purpose Christ, as aforesaid, preached the Gospel in Hades to the dead. This is the most natural connection. Bengel takes it in conjunction with ἐτοίμως ἔχοντι, the Judge is ready, for the end must come after the Gospel has been preached. Steiger: "The verse is to prove not the reality, but the moral possibility, the justice of a judgment even on the dead, since the Gospel was preached to them also for the purpose of giving them the means of being delivered from the wrath of God." So Weiss and Wiesinger.—

νεκρούς in our exposition is not to be taken generally, as v. 5, but as applying to those spirits in prison; these are adduced by way of example, from which we may draw a conclusion affecting all other dead men, who before Christ were surely as yet more or less in prison.—κηρύττειν ch. iii.
 19, explains εὐαγγελίσθη; cf. Matt. xi. 5; Rom. x.
 15. The above-mentioned example is therefore simply to prove the universality of the judgment as extending also to the dead; that it is just, is a secondary point. But what is the object of that preaching which was vouchsafed to the dead and particularly to the dead of the deluge?

That they might indeed be judged—as to the spirit.—Various expositions, arising from dogmatical prejudices, have been set up with regard to this passage, which we do not refute in this place. The right exposition depends on the correct meaning of κρίθῃσι. The tense is designedly different from ζῶσι in the corresponding secondary sentence. The Aorist as contrasted with the Present points to some past action; it is used of past actions, see Winer.—ἵνα after εὐα-γγελίσθη refers to something subsequent to the preaching of the Gospel. This apparent contradiction is solved, if κρίνεσθαι is taken to denote a judicial sentence, as such decisions are made by human tribunals (κατὰ ἀνθρώπων). On Christ's appearing in the realms of death and preaching to them repentance and faith, the declaration that was to be published to them was as it were thus: "You have merited death both as to the body and to the soul, because of your disobedience you perished in the flood and were brought to this subterranean place of confinement; but a way of salvation has now been opened for you, so that you may live in the spirit as to God, according to the will of God." This declaration, on the one hand, must have produced a painful impression upon them, but on the other, encouraged them to accept the offered salvation. However we are not informed whether few or many [or any.—M.] did thereby attain unto spiritual life. The ap-position beginning with ἵνα relates not to v. 5, but to ch. iii. 19, thereby shedding more light on the latter passage. How forced, as contrasted with this exposition, is that of Hofmann, that salvation was published to the dead in order that they might secure a life surviving the judgment of death which they have incurred and must continue to incur, or that of Wiesinger, that the Gospel was preached to the dead for the purpose of shaping their condition so that, while on the one hand they are judged according to the flesh (the state of death viewed as a continuing judgment according to the flesh), on the other they might be able through the judgment (Aorist) to attain, in God's way, to the immortal life of the spirit. Nor is the view of König more admissible, that in the resurrection their judgment in the body should consist in their receiving a less perfect resurrection-body. For other expositions consult Steiger and Wiesinger. [See also the Excursus on the Descensus ad Inferos at the end of the preceding section.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The common view, which is shared also by Gerlach, sees in v. 1, the leading idea, that to the Christian, in virtue of the communion of his heart and life with Christ, suffering in the flesh is the dying of sin. So early an expositor as Justin says: "Suffering and temptation, like a medicine, render man more free from his evil intent, and make him more sound." Tauler: "What the fire is to iron, what the crucible is to cold, such is temptation to the righteous." But this is introducing the Pauline doctrine of the communion of suffering with Christ, although the original contains no allusion to it; besides the circumstance is lost sight of, that the original says "who hath suffered," not "who is suffering." According to the exposition given above, it should be the aim of believers not to let the sins of others find a point of support in themselves in order that not sinning after the example of Christ may become their second nature.

2. The abuse which the ungodly cast on the former companions of their sin has its final reason in the circumstance that they feel themselves reproved, opposed and judged by their conversion.

3. Holy Scripture nowhere teaches the eternal damnation of those who died as heathens or non-Christians; it rather intimates in many passages that forgiveness may be possible beyond the grave, and refers the final decision not to death, but to the day of Christ, Acts xvii. 31; 2 Tim. i. 12; iv. 8; 1 Jno. iv. 17. But in our passage, as in ch. iii. 19. 20, Peter by Divine illumination clearly affirms that the ways of God's salvation do not terminate with earthly life, and that the Gospel is preached beyond the grave to those who have departed from this life without a knowledge of the same. But this proves neither the doctrine of universal recovery, even that of Satan, the devils and the ungodly, nor the doctrine of purgatory to the cleansing of which the Romish Church affirms subjected all who reach the other world without being wholly purified, and further maintains, that the stay in it may be shortened by the performance of many good works in this life and even after death by the performance of good works and prayers for the dead on the part of survivors. Gerlach cites a passage from John Damasc., in which the doctrine of the ancient Church on the subject of Christ's descent into hell is summed up as follows: "His glorified soul descends into Hades in order that like as the Sun of righteousness did rise to men on earth, so in like manner He might shine on those who under the earth sit in darkness and in the shadow of death; in order that as He did publish peace to men on earth, gave deliverance to the captives and sight to the blind, and became the Cause of eternal salvation to believers, while He convicted the disobedient of unbelief, so in like manner He might deal with the inhabitants of Hades, so that to Him every knee should bow of those who are in heaven, on earth and under the earth, and that having thus loosed the chains of those long-confined prisoners, He might return from the dead and prepare to us the way of the resurrection." The divine truths contained in this passage may be abused against the cause of missions and the necessity of a holy life; but abuse does not cancel the right use.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The Christian's best armour against the assaults of suffering is the believing, obedient and submissive mind of suffering in which Christ accepted His suffering as a cup tendered by the paternal hand of God.—God's chief design in sending suffering is to withdraw us from sin and the lusts of men up to Himself.—Sufferings under persecution and abuse are a means of purifying and refining.—Which are the dangers against which we ought to be especially armed under persecutions for righteousness' sake?—Consider the comforting fact that Christ has suffered in the flesh for you. Look, 1. at His person; 2. at the greatness of His suffering in the flesh; 3. at His suffering for you; 4. at the result of it.—Preservatives against relapsing into heathenish ways: 1. the communion with and conformity to Christ; 2. frequent reflection on your former sinful condition; 3. the abuse of unbelievers; 4. the nearness of the impending account to be rendered; 5. prayer; 6. continuance in the communion of love with the brethren; 7. the founding of all your actions on the word and strength of God.—The unhappy consistency in the service of sin.—Will you continue in the service of sin, although Christ came to save you?—The appearing of Christ among the dead is both the last degree of His condescension and the turning-point of His exaltation.—The mercy of God extends even to the judgment-prison of the realms of death.—Who will preach to the untold thousands, who after Christ's descent into Hades have been born and have died without a knowledge of the Gospel?—Why should that fact not check, but rather strengthen missionary zeal?

STARKE:—Shall the disciple be greater than his master, and the servant greater than his Lord? Be content, if in the world it fares with you as with your Saviour, it is enough that you shall be like Him in heaven. Matt. x. 24. 25.—Will you fret at sufferings and tribulations? If you knew the wholesomeness of this cup, you would joyfully empty it, Ezek. ii. 6.—The beloved cross is like strong salt: as the latter prevents corruption, so does the cross prevent the corruption of the flesh, Ps. cxix. 71.—Sin at a standstill is the well-being of sinners, continuance in sin the strongest barrier against grace, the best repentance is never to sin.—Christianity renders the best service to the commonwealth, in that it most earnestly forbids the vices which are most dangerous to it.—The children of the world grieve most at your separating from their communion; by that they consider themselves put to shame and despised. Haughtiness and venomous malice are the sources of their abuse.—The remembrance of the last day and its judgment ought to be to us a constant sermon on repentance, Eccl. xii. 13. 14; 2 Cor. v. 10.

LISCO:—The blessed effect of suffering.—The Lord's miracles of grace in His kingdom. The sufferings of Christ present us with a strong motive to arm ourselves with His mind.

[PYTHAGORAS:—VER. 1. Summa religionis imitari quem colis.—M.]

[LEIGHTON:—Love desires nothing more than likeness, and shares willingly in all with the party loved; and above all love, this Divine love is purest and highest and works most strongly that way, takes pleasure in that pain, and is a voluntary death, as Plato calls love.—M.]

[ATTEBURY:—“Forasmuch then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, let us arm ourselves with the same mind,” with a resolution to imitate Him in His perfect submission and resignation of Himself to the Divine will and pleasure; in His contempt of all the enjoyments of sense, of all the vanities of this world, its allurements and terrors; in His practice of religious severities; in His love of religious retirement; in making it His meat and drink, His only study and delight, “to work the work of Him that sent Him”; in His choosing for that end, when that end could not otherwise be obtained, want before abundance, shame before honour, pain before pleasure, death before life; and in His preferring always a laborious uninterrupted practice of virtue to a life of rest and ease and indolence.—M.]

[BENGEL:—VER. 2. “Ἰδούαι. Aptum verbum; non dicitur de brutis.”—M.]

[AUGUSTINE:—Perdit quod vivit, qui te Deum non diligit; qui curat vivere, non propter te, Domine, nihil est et pro nihilo est; qui tibi vivere recusat mortuus est; qui tibi non sapit, desipit.—M.]

[LEIGHTON:—Politicians have observed, that in states, if alterations must be, it is better to alter many things than a few. And physicians have the same remark for one's habit and custom for bodily health upon the same ground, because things do so relate one to another, that except they be adapted and suited together in the change, it avails not; yea, it sometimes proves the worse in the whole, though a few things in particular seem to be bettered. Thus, half reformations in a Christian, turn to his prejudice; it is only best to be thoroughly reformed, and to give up with all idols; not to live one half to himself and the world and, as it were, another half to God; for that is but falsely so and in reality it cannot be. The only way is to make a heap of all, to have all sacrificed together, and to live to no lust, but altogether and only to God.—M.]

CHAPTER IV. 7-11.

ANALYSIS:—Exhortation, in contemplation of the approaching end of all things, to watch and pray, to love and to do, to serve others with the gifts they have received, and in a word to seek in everything the glory of God.

7 But the end of all things is at hand: <sup>1</sup>be ye therefore sober, and watch unto 8 prayer.<sup>2</sup> And above all things have fervent charity among <sup>3</sup>yourself: for charity
10 <sup>7</sup>As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability<sup>8</sup> which God giveth; that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ: to whom be <sup>9</sup>praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.<sup>10</sup>

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 7. The connection is with ver. 5; the Apostle takes up and further enforces the thought that the Lord is ready to judge the living and the dead; here begins also a new series of exhortations closely connected with the thought of the end of all things. It has been shown that Peter in common with the other Apostles, Jas. v. 7. 8. 9; Jude 18; 1 Jno. ii. 18; Rev. i. 8; xxii. 10. 1 Thess. iv. 17; Rom. xiii. 11. 12; 1 Cor. xv

51; 2 Cor. v. 2; Phil. iv. 5, expected that the second advent of Christ and the end of the whole present dispensation were nearly impending, cf. ch. i. 5; i. 6; i. 17. 18; i. 7; v. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 10. 11; Mt. xxiv. 6. This may be accounted for by the fact that the coming of Christ in the flesh is the beginning of the world's last period, during which no further revelation of grace is to be expected; and that according to the mind of Jesus, His disciples ought to consider His second coming as always close at hand, and to be prepared for it. "It ought to be the chief concern of believers to fix their minds fully on His second advent." Calvin. "We live in the latter half of the world's period, which will quickly flow on. Although we may not live to see it, after death we shall realize that we are near it." Roos. It is however to be remembered that nothing but the long-suffering of God is arresting the judgment, and that He is counting by the measure of eternity, according to which a thousand years are as one day (2 Pet. iii. 8; Ps. xc. 4). [The emphasis of πάντων is noteworthy. Bengel; "Finis adeoque etiam petulantiae malorum et passionum primum."—M.]

Be temperate therefore and sober unto prayers.—As our Lord in contemplation of His day exhorts the disciples, Lke. xxi. 34, "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life," so the Apostle here exhorts us to σωφρονεῖν—to act wisely, to be temperate and modest. It primarily denotes bodily temperance, then mental discretion and watchfulness, cf. ch. v. 8; Rom. xii. 8; 2 Cor. v. 18; Tit. ii. 6.—νῆφειν—to live soberly, moderately both bodily and mentally as in ch. i. 13. "Temperance facilitates vigilance, and both aid prayer." Bengel.—εἰς τὰς προσευχάς, the Plural, because, as Huss remarks, there are different kinds of prayer and because prayer ought to be without ceasing. The reference is probably to fixed, regular prayers of the Church.

VER. 8. Then follows the still more important exhortation to brotherly love according to its real nature, cf. on ἐκτενῆ ch. i. 22; 1 Cor. xiii. 1, etc.; xiv. 1. It is the mother of all the duties to our neighbour. Where love is wanting, prayer is hindered.

Because love covereth a multitude of sins.—καλύπτει πλῆθος ἁμαρτιῶν. The words are cited from the Hebrew not from the LXX. of Prov. x. 12, cf. ch. xvii. 9, but the former passage reads: "Hatred stirreth up strifes, but love covereth all sins"; and the latter: "He that covereth transgression, seeketh love." In both instances the reference is to human love which is to consign to oblivion the sins of others. Some see in ῥῶς a reference to Gen. ix. 23, and consider it an easy thing; so Cæsarius of Arles says: "There is nothing more easy than covering oneself or others with clothes." But forgiveness is hardly so easy a task. It is better to explain it of the unsightliness of sin which forgiveness covers up. The old Protestant expositors understand it therefore rightly of human love pardoning the sin of our neighbour. "The covering up relates to man not to God. Nothing can cover thy sin before God except faith. But my love covers my neighbour's sin, and just as God covers my sin if I believe, so ought I also to cover the sin of my neighbour." Luther. So also Steiger, Hoffman, Lechler, Wiesinger and Weiss. Even Estius, the Romish expositor, admits that the quotation sustains the Protestant exposition. But many Romanist and rationalistic expositors explain the passage of merit and atoning virtue, which they ascribe to the love of our neighbour. Some quote Matt. vi. 14. 15, but that passage simply affirms that forgiveness is made possible, not that it is positively effected. Others, with reference to Jas. v. 20, suggest an activity tending to improvement [that of others, —M.], but this is foreign to our passage. δὲ seems however to conflict with our exposition, but its design is to give the reason for the ἐκτένεια of love. "The Apostle takes for granted that Christians love one another, still he recommends them to expand and increase in the brotherly love which they have, because true love forgives a multitude of sins." 1 Cor. xiii. 4-7; Matt. xviii. 22. Steiger. According to Beza the connection is: "Love one another, because love, as the Scripture says, removes the substance of strife." Calov remarks on this covering of sin, that it does not do away with the correcting of our neighbour, Matt. xviii. 15, and that it is necessary to distinguish public and private sins, between known and concealed sins. [Alford thinks that the meaning is the hiding of offences both from one another and in God's sight, by mutual forbearance and forgiveness. He advocates to take the passage in its widest sense, "understanding it primarily of forgiveness but then also of that prevention of sin by kindness of word and deed, and also that intercession for sin in prayer, which are the constant fruits of fervent love. It is a truth from which we need not shrink, that every sin which love hides from man's sight is hidden in God's sight also. There is but One efficient cause of the hiding of sin: but mutual love applies that cause: drains the universal cover over the particular sin. This meaning, as long as it is not perverted into the thought that love towards others covers a man's own sin 'ex promerito' need not and should not be excluded."—M.]

[Wordsworth: "St. Peter had spoken of love, stretching itself out without interruption; and the passage James v. 20, considered together with the context here, where St. Peter is presenting Christ as their Example, may suggest a belief, that he is comparing the act of Love to that of the Cherubim stretching out their wings on the Mercy Seat, and forming a part of the Mercy Seat (Ex. xxv. 18-20), the emblem of Christ's propitiatory covering of sins."—M.]

VER. 9. Be hospitable towards one another without murmuring.—Cf. Rom. xii. 13; Heb. xiii. 2; 3 Jno. 5; 1 Tim. v. 10; Tit. i. 8. "Peter remembers to have heard this saying from the lips of Christ, Matt. xxv. 35; he does not mean pompous hospitality, Lke. xiv. 12, but that Christian, holy hospitality which readily welcomes by the promptings of pure love needy strangers, especially such as are exiled on account of their confession of the true religion, gives them gentle and loving treatment, and cares for them as members of Christ and fellow-citi-

sens of the Church." Gerhard. "Let us take heed lest, having been hard and careless in entertaining strangers, the shelter of the just may be denied us after this life." Ambrose.—ἀνεν ὀργισμῶν, without expressions of murmuring by which one secretly gives vent to his displeasure or reproaches another with the benefits he has received. The opposite is a cheerful, pure and unselfish spirit, Rom. xii. 8; 2 Cor. ix. 7. [Nander Ch. Hist. i. pp. 847. 848, referring to Tertullian, ad uxorem, II. 1. 8.; de jejuniis, c. XII: "The care of providing for the support and maintenance of strangers, of the poor, the sick, the old, of widows and orphans, and of those in prison on account of their faith, devolved on the whole Church. This was one of the main purposes for which the collection of voluntary contributions, in the assemblies convened for public worship, was instituted; and the charity of individuals, moreover, led them to emulate each other in the same good work. In particular, it was considered as belonging to the office of the Christian matron to provide for the poor, for the brethren languishing in prison, and to show hospitality to strangers. The hindrance occasioned to this kind of Christian activity, is reckoned by Tertullian among the disadvantages of a mixed marriage. 'What heathen,' says he, 'will suffer his wife to go about from one street to another, to the house of strangers, to the meanest hovels indeed, for the purpose of visiting the brethren? What heathen will allow her to steal away into the dungeon, to kiss the chain of the martyr? If a brother arrive from abroad, what reception will he meet in the house of the stranger? If an alms is to be bestowed, storehouse and cellar are shut fast!' On the other hand, he counts it among the felicities of a marriage contracted between Christians, that the wife is at liberty to visit the sick and relieve the needy, and is never straitened or perplexed in the bestowment of her charities. Nor did the active brotherly love of each community confine itself to what transpired in its own immediate circle, but extended itself also to the wants of Christian communities in distant lands. On urgent occasions of this kind, the bishops made arrangements for special collections. They appointed fasts; so that what was saved, even by the poorest of the flock, from their daily food, might help to supply the common wants."—M.]

VER. 10. Each man, as he received a gift of grace.—Grotius rightly expounds this not only of the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 4, etc., but also of gifts of the body and estate. These are as well gifts of grace as those. Natural endowments also are included in the expression. The Apostle does not refer to specific official duties and the qualifications necessary to their discharge; he is unwilling to exact too much from and to impose too much on believers.

Even so minister to one another as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.—αὐτὸ διακονήτε, cf. ch. i. 12, to offer something as a servant. The term comprises the different duties of the Church which are not specifically committed to the pastoral office as such, and which are the outgoings of voluntary activity.

As good stewards.—ὡς denotes not only mere resemblance, but, as frequently, the generally known reason [as is becoming, fit in good stewards.—M.]. Christians are not owners, but only stewards of their goods and gifts, 1 Cor. iv. 2; Matt. xxv. 14; Tit. i. 7.—Manifold, because exhibited in various gifts of grace [cf. 1 Cor. xii. 4; Matt. xxv. 15. Lke. xix. 13.—M.]. "We are liberal not with our own goods, but with that of another." Gerhard.

VER. 11. If any man speak - - as of the power which God bestoweth.—Peter specifies two kinds of gifts, gifts relating to speaking and gifts relating to doing, gifts of teaching and exhorting, and gifts of outward service.—These gifts they were to use with humility and fidelity. λαλεῖν here denotes every kind of speaking and exhortation in the Lord's name, Rom. xii. 6-8; 1 Cor. xii. 8. 10.—λόγια properly signifies Divine utterances, oracles, but here the revealed word of God, 1 Cor. ii. 7; Acts vii. 38; Heb. v. 12; Rom. iii. 2. Let him speak with the conviction and reverence, with the earnestness and humility which flow from the consciousness: it is God's holy word to which, as a mean instrument, I lend my mouth, 1 Cor. xii. 8; 2 Cor. ii. 17; 1 Thess. ii. 18.—διακονεῖ applies here to the manifold offices belonging to the single or married estate, Acts vi. 1, 2. [But see Rom. xii. 8; 1 Cor. xii. 28.—M.] ἰσχύς the act springs from the power of God [as from a fountain.—M.] which He supplies. The term relates to powers of the body as well as to those of the mind. χορηγεῖν=παρεχειν, δίδοναι. [The primary sense and origin of the word is Classical, and denotes "to defray the cost of bringing out a chorus", thence to furnish supply in general.—M.]. "Let each man apply to his neighbour all the good in his power with the utmost humility, knowing that of himself [i. e., without God's supplying.—M.] he cannot have any thing to apply." [Wordsworth: This precept of St. Peter deserves the consideration of those who claim to be his successors, and profess great reverence for his authority, and yet derogate from the dignity of the oracles of God, and set up oracles of their own, in place of the Scriptures and against them. See 2 Tim. iv. 3. Rev. xi. 3-10.—M.]. Bede.

That God in all things—to the ages of the ages.—ἐν πάσι, the aim and end of all the Apostle's exhortations.—ἐν πάσι may mean, in all of you or in all your doings; the latter is preferable. "As through Christ all benefits descend upon us from God, so also ought we in humble gratitude to refer all things through Christ to the glory of God." Gerhard. δοξάζειν, the honour should be ascribed to Him for whatever is done in the Church, He should be praised for it, cf. Heb. xiii. 15. Everything is mediated through Christ, through whom we receive all the power we have.—ὡς ἐστὶν ἡ δόξα; ὡς refers to ὁ Θεός as in ch. v. 11, because God has already been named as the subject of adoration, and because Peter elsewhere calls Jesus κύριος=Jehovah, but not absolutely God.—On δόξα see ch. i. 7.—ἀπὸς goes back to ἰσχύς. All power among men is the emanation of His power, cf. ch. v. 11.—εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, cf. Phil. iv. 20.—ἀμήν, not a note of conclusion, but an expression of assurance of heart.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The doctrine of the consummation of all things on the coming of Christ, which is peculiarly prominent in the writings of Peter, contains the most powerful reasons for our encouragement and consolation. They make no mention of the distinction between the first and still impending coming for the establishment of the kingdom of glory and the judgment of a corrupt Christendom and the coming for the final judgment: that distinction was reserved for special revelations made to St. John.

2. The love covering sins, which is here so emphatically recommended, is widely removed from the laxity, weakness and want of principle with which it is frequently confounded. The latter, says Wiesinger, ignores the sacred earnestness of love and fancies to do some great thing by putting some deceptive boards over graves full of mouldering decay and crying, Peace, peace! Hatred which unsparingly uncovers in its effects is preferable to love which thus covers up. The love here insisted upon has these characteristics, it is not put to anger by insults, it does not discover needlessly the sins of others and does not by revenge or passionate reproaches drag them forth into the light of rebuke.

3. The opinion that the love of our neighbour covers our sins before God conflicts with the fundamental principles of the Gospel; it is not the cause, but only one of the conditions on which we are made partakers of Divine forgiveness, Mtt. vi. 14.

4. With respect to God, we are stewards of goods committed to our keeping, with respect to our neighbour only we are owners.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The end of all things, how it should minister to, 1, encouragement, 2, warning, 3, consolation.—Whatsoever thou takest in hand, remember the end, Sir. vii. 36.—If Peter more than eighteen centuries ago was permitted to say the end of all things was at hand, how much more ought we to be prepared, to watch and pray. We should ever consider the great day of Christ to be near at hand. Believers wait for it as a bridegroom waits for his bride. The end of the way and the nearness of home is sweet and comforting to strangers and pilgrims.—Communion with God, the most precious enjoyment of earth, is only possible to those who are temperate and sober.—He that ministers to sensuality cannot soar in thought to God.—Love should be like fire which spreads its flame afar, and like a cloak which covers much. "That godly father would not shut his door to any poor guest, for I am afraid, said he, lest the Lord Himself might some day come, in the guise of a poor man, to test my liberality: how could I ever justify my having suffered Him sadly to depart from me?"

BASSER: There is none so poor as to be unable to serve his neighbour with some gift.—God distributes His gifts unequally, Mtt. xxv. 15. Moses has five talents, Aaron two, Jethro only one. Let each use his gifts to the glory of God, and he will stand before God and men.

HERBERGER: The Christian's motto: Faithful and only faithful!—A Christian's any and every work, should be a Divine service and conduce to the glory of God.

STARKE: Men, beware of confidence! be ready that you may be able to stand worthily before the Son of Man, 2 Pet. iii. 11.—Love has the first place among all virtues and is the first mark of the disciples of Christ, 1 Cor. xiii. 13; Jno. xiii. 35.—To give unwillingly and regretfully is to sin more than to do good, 2 Cor. ix. 7.—As among flowers the form and beauty of each differ from those of others, so among the children of God is seen the manifold goodness of God.—God has given to one something, but not everything, that we might serve one another, and that none should bury his talent, Gal. v. 13.—Are graces and gifts thine own? Who has granted them to thee? God. To what end? To parade them off? By no means, but to serve Him and thy neighbour with them. Love makes thee thy neighbour's servant. The more thou hast received, the more thou hast to communicate in counsel and in deed, 1 Cor. ix. 19.—If thou hast nothing wherewith to serve thy neighbour, thou surely canst pray for him. Discharge this service of love with hearty cheerfulness; it is, if not better than, at least as good as pieces of gold, Rom. x. 1; Acts iii. 6. [But prayer—instead of ministering to the wants of the needy—where the ability is present and the occasion requires it—is sheer hypocrisy.—M.]. The glory of God should be the end and aim of all our works, otherwise they are good for nothing, 1 Cor. x. 31.

LISCO: What does qualify us to receive the gifts of the Holy Ghost?—The conditions of real prayer.

HERBERGER: How should a good Christian, who desires to go to heaven acquit himself, 1, towards God, 2, towards his neighbour, 3, with respect to his own conscience, soul and office?

STIER: How Christians ought to prepare for the end of all things, or how we must live here in time in order that we may stand in the last judgment?

KAPFF: Spiritual ascension, 1, By whom and how it is accomplished, 2, What are its effects on our earthly life?

STAUDT: Christian mutual readiness to oblige, 1, its ability, 2, its opportunities, 3, the condition necessary for its discharge.

[LEIGHTON:—VER. 7. It is reported of one that, hearing the 5th of Genesis read so long lived, and yet the burden still, they died; Enos lived 905 and he died, Seth 912 and he died, Methusaleh 969 and he died, he took so deep the thought of death and eternity, that it changed his whole frame and set him from a voluptuous to a most strict and pious course of life.

VER. 8. Love is witty in finding out the fairest construction of things doubtful.—Where the thing is so plainly a sin, that this way of covering it can have no place, yet then will love consider what will lessen it most.—All private reproofs and where conscience requires public delation and censure, even these will be sweetened in that compassion that flows from love.—If thou be interested in the offence, even by unfeigned free forgiveness, so far as thy concern goes, let it be as if it had not been.

VER. 9. Now for supply of our brethren's necessities, one good help is, the retrenching of our superfluities. Turn the stream into that channel, where it will refresh thy brethren and enrich thyself, and let it not run into the dead sea.—As the disease of the youth of the world, was the abounding of lust, Gen. vi, so of its age, decay of love: and as that heat called for a total deluge of waters, to this coldness for fire, to the kindling an universal fire, that shall make an end of it and the world together. (Aqua propter ardorem libidinis, ignis propter teporem charitatis.)

VER. 10. Manifold grace.—There is such an admirable beauty in this variety, such a symmetry and contemperature of different, yea of contrary qualities, as speaks His riches, that so divers gifts are from the same Spirit. A kind of embroidering of many colours (see Ps. cxxxix. 15) happily mixed, as the word ποικίλειν signifies; as it is in the frame of the natural body of man as the lesser world, and in the composure of the greater world: thus in the Church of God, the mystical body of Jesus Christ exceeding both the former in excellence and beauty.—Be not discouraged, to have little in the account shall be no prejudice. The approbation runs not, thou hadst much, but on the contrary, thou hast been faithful in little; great faithfulness in the use of small gifts hath great acceptance, and a great and sure reward.

VER. 11. Ministers must speak faithfully, boldly and wisely.—Faith's great work is to renounce self-power and to bring in the power of God to be ours . . . When I am weak, then am I strong, 2 Cor. xii. 10.—This is the Christian's aim, to have nothing in himself, nor in anything but in this tenure: all for the glory of my God, my estate, family, abilities, my whole self, all I have and am. And as the love of God grows in the heart, this purpose grows; the higher the flame rises, the purer it is; the eye is daily more upon it; it is oftener in the mind in all actions than before. In common things, the very works of our calling, our very refreshments, to eat and drink and sleep, all are for this end and with a particular aim at it as much as may be; even the thought of it often renewed throughout the day, and at times generally applied to all our ways and employments. It is that elixir that turns thy ordinary works into gold, into sacrifices, by a touch of it.—M.]

CHAPTER IV. 12-19.

ANALYSIS:—Further exhortation to readiness of suffering and becoming conduct in suffering. They are to consider suffering as inseparable from following Christ, as necessary to their trial, and instrumental toward their future glory, as rendering them partakers of the power of the Spirit, and as delivering them from the last judgment. But they should never lose sight of maintaining their difference from unbelievers.

13 though some strange thing <sup>4</sup>happened unto you: But rejoice, <sup>5</sup>inasmuch as ye are partakers
14 of Christ's sufferings; <sup>6</sup>that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad 15 also <sup>7</sup>with exceeding joy. <sup>8</sup>If ye be reproached for <sup>9</sup>the name of Christ, happy
16 <sup>10</sup>are ye; <sup>11</sup>for the Spirit of glory and <sup>12</sup>of God resteth upon you: <sup>13</sup>on their part he is 17 evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified. <sup>14</sup>But let none of you suffer as a mur-
18 derer, or as a thief, or as an evil doer, or as a <sup>15</sup>busybody in other men's matters. Yet
19 if <sup>16</sup>any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God 20 <sup>17</sup>on this behalf. <sup>18</sup>For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of 21 God: <sup>19</sup>and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gos-22 pel of God? And if the righteous <sup>20</sup>scarcely be saved<sup>21</sup>, where shall the ungodly and 23 the sinner appear? Wherefore, <sup>22</sup>let them that suffer according to the will of God
24 commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing, <sup>23</sup>as unto a faithful Creator.<sup>24</sup>

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The exhortations to readiness of suffering are repeated, but urged on different grounds.

VER. 12. Beloved.—This address, as in ch. ii. 11, denotes the Apostle's heart-felt sympathy with them in the sufferings concerning which he is consoling them.

Be not astonished at.—"If the heathen think the behaviour of Christians strange, Christians need not be surprised if unbelievers persecute them on that account," ch. i. 7, Steiger.—ἡ ἐν ὑμῖν πυρῶσει. πυρῶσει=burning, ignition, kindling, fire while burning, from πυρῶμαι, 2 Pet. iii. 12; Rev. xviii. 9; Prov. xxvii. 21; LXX. Zech. xiii. 9. It is a simile of great tribulations, which burn like fire, but conduce to proof.—[Cf. also Ps. lxxvi. 10 in LXX. Oecumenius says, πύρσιν τὰς θλίψεις εἰπὼν, ἐπέφηνεν ὡς διὰ δοκιμασίαν αὐτοῖς αὐταί.—M.] ἐν ὑμῖν may mean "which you feel within yourselves," better, "which is among you."—"As the potter or the goldsmith adjusts the furnace to the earthen vessel or to the gold, so that it be neither too hot nor too cold, so God adjusts temptation (trial) to the strength of man and to the grace which He grants him, and suffers him not to be tempted beyond his ability to bear." Ephrem.—πρὸς πειρασμόν, cf. ch. i. 7; Jas. i. 2. Not unto perdition, but unto salvation. Even this moderates the pain of the heat.—ὡς ἔτι.—Perhaps you consider the suffering accidental, interfering with God's purpose concerning you, and putting you back in your Christianity, but know that it has been decreed from all eternity, it has been repeatedly foretold in the Scriptures, it has been the common experience of all believers from the beginning, and it is absolutely necessary for the mortification of the old man. That cannot be displeasing which is dealt by the hand of a friend." Gerhard.

VER. 13. In as far as ye are partakers with the sufferings of Christ.—καθὸ κοινωνεῖτε.—It is a great consolation that the believer is permitted to consider his sufferings as a partaking with the sufferings of Christ; but it is a greater consolation that he is permitted to infer his communion with the glory of Christ from his communion with His sufferings. καθὸ denotes, at once the reason and the measure of the sufferings.

The sufferings of Christ, as in ch. i. 11; cf. ch. ii. 21; iii. 18, not such as affect Him in His members, but such as He Himself endured in the days of His incarnation. Christians partake with them, if, for the sake of truth and righteousness, their experience of the world's sin is similar to that of Christ. They are in Christ, and the hatred shown to them is really shown to Him, cf. Rom. viii. 17, 29; 2 Tim. ii. 11.

That ye may also at the revelation of His glory rejoice, exulting.—ἵνα καὶ, otherwise the day of the revelation of Christ would be to you a day of terror.—καὶ, as you now rejoice already in hope.—τῆς δόξης, in contrast with the darkness of suffering, ch. i. 5, 7, 11.—χαρῆτε ἀγαλλώμενοι, cf. ch. i. 8. "The joy of the saints will be inward and outward, bodily and spiritual." Huss. The connection is, as given by Weiss: Only he who suffers with Christ and for His cause, is a true disciple of Christ. Such an one may cherish the expectation of the heavenly reward of partaking with His glory, even as Christ has promised again and again, Matt. x. 38, 39; xvi. 24, 25; Lke. ix. 23, 24; xiv. 27; Jno. xii. 26; xiv. 8; xvii. 24; Matt. v. 12; Lke. vi. 22, 23. The real life-communion with Christ, as we find it described in the writings of Paul, is not affirmed here.

VER. 14. If ye are reproached in (German, for) the name of Christ.—ἐν ὀνόματι. ὄνομα, often like ὧ =revealed being (revelation of the being, i. e., nature and existence). Jno. xvii. 6, 26; i. 12; Acts iii. 16; iv. 12; Heb. ii. 12, also=order, command. Here in its proper sense =the name and whatever it involves. Mk. ix. 41 contains the best key to the exposition. The passage reads: "For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward." As the benefactions of others may be the result of their belonging to Christ, so it may be with their hatred. They reproach you because you confess, call upon and bear the name of Christ, which they hate, cf. v. 16. ὡς χριστιανός, and Matt. v. 11; Lke. vi. 22. Christ is to the world a hateful name; if one preaches it, he must suffer. The reproaches cast at their persons and conversation probably proceeded from unbelieving Jews, who blasphemed the name of Christ, Jas. ii. 7.

Blessed are ye—resteth upon you.—μακάριοι, cf. ch. iii. 14. Their state of bliss is inferred from the glory already existing, although invisible to ordinary eyes. τὸ τῆς δόξης—Spirit of glory denotes the Holy Spirit, because, as Calov explains it, He brings glory and seals it in suffering. This Spirit being given to you with the communion of Christ, you are even now, by faith and hope, partakers of future glory, you anticipate it in the Spirit, and therefore you are blessed, cf. ch. i. 8. Hence Paul, in the further development of this thought, called the Spirit the earnest of the inheritance, Eph. i. 14.—καὶ τὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, this second predicate is added by way of explanation. It is not the spirit of Elijah, or of an angel, but the Spirit of God. "This is to the Apostle so great and so blessed a thing, that though the world is against them, God is for them, as their shield and exceeding great reward." Wiesinger. ἐφ' ἧς ἀναπαύεται.—The reference appears to be to Is. i. 2; cf. 2 Kings ii. 15. Lke. x. 6. ἐν, with the Accus., denotes the descent of the Spirit on them.—ἀναπαύεσθαι, according to Olshausen, contains the idea of an abiding that cannot be overthrown, even by doubts and temptations. It is cognizable to those whose spiritual vision has been rendered acute, and is evinced chiefly in a meek spirit of suffering.

[Wordsworth:—"The glory and happiness of suffering for God in the fire of persecution might also well occur to his mind at Babylon, where he is writing, and where he would be cheered by a remembrance of the three faithful childre walking unhurt in the fiery furnace with the Son of God." (Dan. iii. 1-25.)"—M.]

On their part—glorified.—[See note 14 in Appar. Critic.—M.] With and among them, the children of the world], as is their nature and wont, He is evil spoken of; they traduce the spirit of suffering as a degrading and slavish spirit, and humility as cowardice. These invectives fall back on the Spirit Himself.—Others connect βλασφημεῖται with ὄνομα χριστοῦ, which is rather a forced construction. Among you it is glorified by the consolations, the quietness and peace which it brings to you; thus it evinces its Divine power, and excites your praise and gratitude. The passage gives a good sense, and it would be a pity if it were spurious [as the authorities declare it to be.—M.]

VER. 15. For let none of you—prayer into other men's matters.—Here the Apostle takes up the preceding blessedness (μακάριοι, v. 14), and in the form of exhortation emphatically declares that the value of such patient suffering depends on the condition that those who endure it must be innocent sufferers, ch. ii. 20; iii. 17. This is expressed first negatively, then positively. Here is an evident allusion to Matt. v. 11, "if they say all manner of evil against you falsely (lying)."—ὡς φονεῖς.—The reference is not to real accusations which had been brought against them, but to the possibility that such offences might occur among them, as Paul warns the Ephesians against stealing, Eph. iv. 28.—κακοποι- ὄς, cf. ch. ii. 12. 14; iii. 16. 17, in a general, moral sense, not as denoting political offences, as if this had been the official description of Christians, according to Suetonius, Vita Neronis, c. 16, which cannot be proved. See Weiss, p. 867.—

ἀλλοτριοπείλακος, a term unknown to the Greeks. It denotes one arrogating to himself the oversight of matters with which he has no concern. Such indiscreet zeal is not uncommon, as Hottinger remarks, among new religious communities. This may have been a frequent temptation to the primitive Christians, owing to their consciousness of more enlightened views. It is more than περιεργάζεσθαι, 2 Thess. iii. 11. Cyprian: alienas curas agens, cf. 1 Tim. v. 13; 1 Thess. iv. 11; Lke. xii. 14. [ὁ επισκεπτόμενος τὰ ἀλλότρια. Hanc explicationem probat 1, ipsa vocis compositio 2, veterum expositio, Tert. Cypr. Aug. 3, temporis et loci circumstantia. Procul dubio quidam Christiani, ex incogitantia, temeritate et levitate, in actiones infidelium utpote vicinorum suorum curiosius inquirebant, eas propria arbitrio redarguebant ac iudices eorum esse volebant, quod non pertinebat ad eorum vocationem. Gerhard.—M.]

VER. 16. But if (he suffer) as a Christian.—The name Christian appears at that time to have been adopted by believers, Acts xi. 26; xxvi. 28. In the opinion of their enemies, the name was infamous, and so we must understand it here, cf. v. 14. With the Jews it was tantamount to sectary, renegade and rebel; with the heathen it was equal to atheist.

Let him not be ashamed.—Cf. Rom. i. 16; 2 Tim. i. 8. 12. Such sufferings conduce not to shame, but to honour; "they are precious jewels in the sight of God." Calov. Acts v. 41.

But let him glorify God in this part.—"On account of the antithesis, Peter might have said: Let him rather glory; but he teaches that the glory must be ascribed to God." Bengel. Let him glorify God by patience, by good courage, confessing the faith, and by joyful praises and thanksgiving.—ἐν τῷ μέρει τούτῳ.—(Lachmann and Tischendorf read ὀνόματι at because of the name of Christ. Others render, less aptly; matter, case). [See Appar. Crit., v. 16, note 17. M.]—Steiger:—"In this lot which falls to him." It is difficult to prove this use of μέρος. It is rather to be taken as ch. iii. 16. ἐν ᾧ καταλάλουν, they were to glorify God in the very thing for which they were slandered, viz.: their faith in Christ.

VER. 17 introduces a new ground why Christians should gladly suffer for Christ's sake. Possessed of such a mind (the mind of suffering gladly for Christ's sake), they will be delivered from the near and inevitable judgment of God which is about to burst on unbelievers, but begins at the Church of God in the persecutions that are coming on her. The former will feel the whole weight of the judgment, the latter its first beginnings only, whereby they are saved.

It is time.—As it is the inflexible purpose of God that we must through much tribulation enter the kingdom of God, and as it is a well-known law of the Divine kingdom that judgment must begin at the city and house of God, Jer. xxv. 29; x. 18; xiv. 18, 19; xlix. 12; Amos iii. 14; Esak. ix. 6; xxi. 4; Heb. xii. 6, as manifested in the troubles of Israel in Egypt and in the wilderness, so now is the season of the judgment, for the end of all things is at hand, v. 7.

The judgment.—To believers it is a paternal chastisement, contemplating their deliverance from unknown and unrepented sins, in order that they may not be condemned with the world, 1 Cor. xi. 28. 31; it is to them a judgment of mercy, but to unbelievers a judgment of wrath, revealing the punitive justice of God. The one leads to salvation, the other to perdition, cf. Lke. xxiii. 30; Matt. xxv. 41; Rev. vi. 15-17; xx. 11-15; Rom. ii. 5; 2 Thess. i. 6.

At the house of God.—Cf. ch. ii. 5; 1 Tim. iii. 15. The Church of the Lord. Steiger has several quotations from the Rabbis stating that the judgment will begin with the righteous.

What will be the end of them?—What will be their final state? "If the sons are chastised, what have the most malicious slaves to expect? How will it fare with the unrighteous before Thee, if Thou dost not even spare Thy believing children, in order to exercise and instruct them?" Augustine.—Cf. Lke. xxiii. 31; Jer. xlix. 12; Ps. i. 6.—τὸν ἀνεδόκῳ.—Cf. ch. ii. 8; iii. 20; Jno. xvi. 8. 9. [Bengel:—"Judicium, initio tolerabilius, sensim ingravescit. Pii sua parte perfuncti cum immunitate spectant miseras impiorum: impii dum pios affligunt, suam mensuram implent et discunt quæ sua ipsorum portio futura sit: sed id melius sciunt pii, quare patientes sunt."—M.].

VER. 18. If the righteous hardly is saved.—The thought of v. 17 is verified and strengthened by the verbatim quotation of Prov. xi. 31 in the LXX. The Apostle may also have remembered the accounts which Christ Himself gave of the great perils of the last temptations, Matt. xxiv. 12. 13. 22. 24.—μόλις, with difficulty, with hard pains and not without suffering.—τοῦ φαεινῶ, Ps. i. 4. 5, describes the ungodly as chaff which the wind scattereth away.—δικαίος=πιστεύων, one who as a believer leads a life well-pleasing and acceptable to God, is justified and follows after righteousness. The opposite, ἀπειθεῖν and ἀσεβής.—σώζεται sc., unto life eternal. The opposite, to be lost, to fall hopelessly into perdition.

VER. 19. Wherefore—well-doings.—General conclusion from the entire exhortation. If suffering according to the purpose of God is so necessary, if it contemplates such glorious ends, we ought patiently to submit to this Divine necessity (German:—göttlichem Muss), ch. i. 6; v. 9, commit our soul to Him, on whom we have a firm and sacred hold, and never lose sight of the equal necessity that we continue in well-doing.—καὶ οἱ πάσχοντες.—Some take it as in ch. iii. 14: others join it with ὥστε, although it is never used to strengthen ὥστε. Better follow Wiesinger: "The end and aim of every thing should be the glory of God, v. 11, hence also suffering." Those also who do not suffer are to commit their souls to the faithful Creator.

According to the will of God.—Ch. iii. 17; iv. 17. This contains a consolation and a reason for the following exhortation.—ὡς πατὴρ κτίσας.—He has not only created our souls originally, but also created them anew in Christ. Inasmuch as He is faithful, it is His blessed will to finish the good work He has begun, and to make good all His promises. As our Creator, He has the first claim upon us, Acts iv. 24. [Oecumenius:—ἀπαλὴ καὶ ἀνευδὴς κατὰ τὰς ἐπαγγελίας αὐτοῦ.—M.].—παραισθεύσαν.—As Christ's dying words were: "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit," Lke. xxiii. 46; cf. 1 Pet. i. 9.—He is the most trusty Guardian of our souls, Ps. xxxi. 6; Eccl. xii. 7, and our bodies also are in the hands of God. Without His will, not a hair of His children can be hurt. "As the most faithful, He will preserve them, as the most mighty He can do it." Gerhard.—ἐν ἀγαθοποιῶσι.—In well-doings. The apposition goes back to v. 15 and v. 16. Trust in God and well-doing must be indissolubly united. "Only inasmuch as faith restores the primal spiritual relation of Creator and creature, man is warranted to rejoice over this faithfulness of the Creator." Steiger. Cf. Matt. x. 28; 1 Cor. x. 13; 2 Pet. ii. 9; Ps. cxxxviii. 8; ciii. 14.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. There is no reward attached to suffering as such; it is only the patience and constancy with which, for Christ's sake, suffering is borne, to which reward is mercifully promised.

2. The Holy Ghost who rests upon saints, protects them, shines forth from them, is called the Spirit of Glory because, says Roos, He is holy, and causes His holiness to radiate, and because He is worthy of being glorified by men and all other creatures.

3. "The fire of trial belongs to Christianity, it is the rule, not the exception." Richter.

4. Why does judgment begin at the house of God? 1. There is one law for the Church as a whole, and for the individual members of it. Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, Heb. xii. 6. A father, if he is earnestly opposed to evil, chastises first his children, afterward his household. He is first severe to the former, afterward also to the latter. Since cleansing from sin is the end contemplated, enlightened believers recognize a merciful provision in being judged now that they may be saved hereafter. Hence it is one of the prerogatives of the house of God that it is destined to pass through the judgment of grace in time, in order that it may be saved from the future judgment of wrath. 2. Because thereby the accuser of our souls and censurer of God's ways, and his followers, are silenced and deprived of all objections against the justice of God.

5. Verse 17 is not in conflict with Jno. iii. 18. "He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already;" all that is necessary is to distinguish the judgment of grace from the judgment of wrath, and temporal punishment from eternal.

6. The words, "It is time that judgment should begin"—supply a hint concerning the date of this Epistle. The destruction of Jerusalem could not have taken place when the author wrote this passage.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The cross, the fire-proof of faith.—Why ought we not to be astonished at the heat of tribulation? a. It comes from God. b. It is designed to put us to the test. c. It is meet that the flesh should suffer and that sinners should have trouble. d. The way of Christ goes through sufferings to glory. e. Suffering with Christ is a token of the state of grace and an earnest of future glory. f. Sufferings are no disgrace but an honour. g. They are attended by a sense of blessedness in the foretaste of expected glory. h. The patience which we exhibit saves us from the judgment of wrath, which overtakes the ungodly. i. Not even the smallest injury can befall believers without the will of God, and all things must conduce to their salvation.—What is suffering with Christ? a. Not to do any wrong that renders us liable to just punishment. b. To suffer innocently for righteousness' sake. c. To suffer for Christ's sake, and in communion with Him.

ZELLER: "Like as our secular princes distinguish faithful and constant servants and victorious generals with the badge of some order, so the Lord of lords distinguishes His faithful servants and victors with crosses of suffering in order to prepare them a joy, as with a cross of honour and a token and assured expectation of the great honour that, as those, who with Christ continue patient in suffering, they shall be blessed hereafter with joy and gladness when at His second and even at His third coming, He shall reveal the glory of His power, and raise them to participation in the glory of His kingdom."

BESSER: As our Lord at His first coming began with the purifying of the Temple, so it is the token of the commencement of His second coming that He refines His house as with a refiner's fire. Mal. iii. 2.

STARKE: Little pain, great refreshing. Both with Christ, how glorious! What is taken from thee, for which thou dost not receive a million-fold reward? What boots then, thy complaining and weeping? Let us look upon the future and sweeten therewith the present. Marks [German 'Moles' Maalzeichen.—M.] of Christ are tokens of honour. Disgrace before the world is exaltation before God and His angels.—Peter had made experience both of being astonished at the heat of tribulation, Matt. xvi. 22, and of rejoicing in suffering with Christ, Acts v. 41.—Partners in the fight, partners in the coronation. As surely as thou art suffering for Christ's sake, so surely thou wilt be eternally clothed with joy and glory.—Art thou faint-hearted and timid in the state of temptation, observe where thou art suffering for Christ's sake, and rejoice, for this is to thee an infallible token that thou art the Lord's, Jno. xv. 19. Thou sayest: I have to suffer much; examine thyself, if it is not thine own fault; if it is, do not complain, but repent and amend. Lam. iii. 39.—If a Christian, who is neither in the magistracy nor the ministry, is unable to do anything towards the improvement of much that is disorderly, it is enough for him to sigh, to desire and to commit it to God, Ezek. ix. 4.—They call thee, and thou art a Christian; then remember thy Head from whom thou hast thy name, thy anointing which thou hast received from Him, 1 Jno. ii. 27, and thy duty, to follow Him, Matt. x. 38.—The wrath of God is no jest. Fear, whosoever thou art, for sin which cannot stand before the judgment seat, cleaves to thee, Job xxxiv. 11.—Many sorrows shall be to the wicked, Ps. xxxii. 10, while the godly simply hold and taste the cup of God, the ungodly have to drink the very dregs, Ps. lxxv. 9.—Unbelief is the greatest sin and the real cause of the temporal and eternal judgments of God, Mk. xvi. 16.—Let none envy the prosperity of the wicked: alas! it will fare ill with them in eternity, unless they repent, Ps. lxxiii. 12.—A true Christian ought neither to cause his own sufferings, nor wish for them, but commit everything to the will of God, 1 Sam. iii. 18.—Whoso committeth his soul to God must be in a state of grace and holiness, otherwise all his committing is lost and in vain, Job xvi. 17.—The soul, if we die a happy death, will surely go to God, who will preserve it as an immortal spirit, and the more so because it has been saved by Christ and sanctified by the Holy Spirit, Jno. v. 24.

ROOS: God decrees punishment on the righteous on account of their probable indolence, on account of their abuse of His grace and means of grace, or also on account of other disorders and failures, which, unless they are checked, might lead us to positive falling away from grace.—The word of God announces loving severity and wholesome strictness; God is very exact with His family.

LISBO: Blessed are innocent sufferers.—The hidden glory of the sharers of Christ reign. The different import of sufferings, a. in the house of God; b. in sinners.

STRICK: How Christians ought to submit to suffering.

KAPFF: The school of the cross, the school of heaven; 1, There is no way to heaven without the cross; 2, Heaven is opened in the cross; 3, The crown of the cross is in heaven.

LEIGHTON:—VER. 12. In these fires, as faith is tried, the word on which faith relies is tried, and is found all gold, most precious, no refuse in it. The truth and sweetness of the promises are much confirmed in the Christian's heart upon his experiment of them in his sufferings; his God is found to be as good as His word, being with him when he goes through the fire, Is. xlii. 2, preserving him that he loses nothing except dross, which is a gainful loss, leaving only his corruption behind him.

VER. 13. I remember what that pious duke is said to have declared at Jerusalem, when they offered to crown him king there, "Nolo auream, ubi Christus spinam."

VER. 14. Here what the Apostle had said, concerning suffering in general, he specifies in the particular case of suffering reproaches; but this expression seems not to come up to the height of that which he has used before; he spoke of fiery trial, but this of reproach seems rather fit to be called an airy trial, the blast of vanquishing words. Yet upon trial it will be found to be (as it is here accounted) a very sharp, a fiery trial, cf. Jas. iii. 6.—M.

[MACKNIGHT:]—VER. 12. The metaphor is old but noble: it represents the Christians at Pontus as having fire cast upon them, for trying of their faith, as gold is tried by fire, ch. i. 7, to which the Apostle alludes.—M.

[VER. 17. In Bava Kama, fol. 60. 1. the following passage occurs: "God never punishes the world but because of the wicked, but He always begins with the righteous first. The destroyer makes no difference between the just and the unjust: only he begins first with the righteous."—M.]

CHAPTER V. 1-4.

ANALYSIS: Elders are exhorted in sufferings also to tend the flock of Christ aright and to be patterns to them.

1 <sup>1</sup>The elders <sup>2</sup>which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder<sup>3</sup>, and a witness of 2 the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed:<sup>4</sup> <sup>5</sup>Feed the flock of God which is among you,<sup>6</sup> taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint,<sup>7</sup>
3 but willingly; not<sup>8</sup> for filthy lucre,<sup>9</sup> but of a ready mind;<sup>10</sup> Neither as being lords<sup>11</sup>
4 over God's heritage,<sup>12</sup> but being<sup>13</sup> ensamples<sup>14</sup> to the flock. And when the chief Shepherd shall appear,<sup>15</sup> ye shall receive<sup>16</sup> a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

Verse 1. [πρεσβυτερος; without the article, simply elders.—M.]

[<sup>2</sup> Receptus omits ὅν after πρεσβυτερος but supplies τοῦ; so K. L. (and Lachmann); on the other hand the important Cod. A. B. insert ὅν, so Alford; also Sinait.—M.]

[<sup>4</sup> μελλούσης ἀποκαλύψεσθαι δόξης—the glory which is about to be revealed. Translate the whole verse; "Elders therefore among you I, a fellow-elder and witness of the sufferings of Christ, also a partaker of the glory which is about to be revealed, exhort."—M.]

Verse 2. [<sup>5</sup> ποιμάνατε—tend, pasture better than feed which only expresses one office of a shepherd; the Greek denotes all his duties, and it is impossible to convey in English the force of ποιμάνατε τὸ ποίμνιον.—M.]

[<sup>6</sup> ἐπισκοποῦντες, omitted in B. and Sinait.,—overseeing it. Those who remove this word do it perhaps "for ecclesiastical reasons, for fear πρεσβυτεροι should be supposed to be as they really were, ἐπισκοποι." (Alford). "Ipsum episcopatus nomen et officium exprimere voluit." (Calvin).—M.]

[<sup>12</sup> τῶν κληρῶν, κληρος—lot, portion. Simply the lots or portions committed to their care; that is, of the universal flock of Christ, subdivisions such as dioceses, parishes, etc. Erasmus: "Cleros autem vocat non Diaconos aut Presbyteros, sed gregem qui cuique forte contigit gubernandus." Estius: "Gregis Domini portiones, quas singulis episcopis pascenda et regenda velut sortito, obtigerunt." So Bengel, Wiesinger, de Wette, Alford, and others.—M.]

[<sup>16</sup> τὸν ἀμάραντινον στέφανον—the amaranthine crown, not—ἀμάραντος, but the adjective derived from it; the crown made of everlasting flowers. The literal translation might be retained with advantage: the expression is poetical and very beautiful and used by Pope and Cowper.

The only amaranthine flower on earth

Is virtue; the only lasting treasure, truth.—Cowper.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The final exhortation bears on the outward differences of position in the Church.

VER. 1. Elders among you.—עֲלֵיכֶם. The word occurs for the first time in Ex. iii. 16. 18. They were in Israel the heads of the twelve tribes, the chiefs or princes of the tribe, cf. Numb. ii. In the place of this primitive arrangement, at the instance of Jethro, representative elders were chosen, Ex. xviii. 13, "able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness;" and from their number a select committee (as we should say) of seventy elders was taken, Ex. xxiv. 9; Numb. xi. 16. Elders are also mentioned in connection with particular communities, Ruth iv. 2; 1 Sam. xi. 3; Josh. xx. 4. Christianity received these institutions as they existed; they were retained in Jewish-Christian Churches, and introduced into Gentile-Christian Churches. We find them at Antioch, Acts xi. 30, in the Church at Jerusalem, ch. xv. 2. 4; xxi. 18; Jas. v. 14, and thus in our passage. They were not always (yet doubtless often) those oldest in years, but rather the most experienced and matured among the converted members of the Church. They are also called bishops—overseers, Acts xx. 17. 28; Tit. i. 5. 7; Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1. 8. They were chosen by the Apostles, with the concurrence of the Churches, Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5; their functions were to oversee, to administer order and direct discipline, to watch over pure doctrine and even to teach, although the last was not their exclusive function, 1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11; Rom. xii. 7. After the Apostolic age, the office of bishop and elder were gradually separated. During the life-time of the Apostles, the supreme direction of the Churches was wielded by them, but they put themselves on a level with the elders, hence Peter calls himself συνπρεσβυτερος, and John describes himself as πρεσβυτερος, 2 Jno. 1; 3 Jno. 1. "Sp," says Grotius, "the Roman generals were wont to call their soldiers, comrades, commilitones." But the sense is different. The antithesis in v. 5 shows that πρεσβυτερος refers also to age.—τοῦς ἐν ὑμῖν.—τοῦς, as Steiger supposes, has no particular significance as rendering ἐν ὑμῖν more emphatic.

I—exhort.—Gerhard says that Peter advances three grounds taken from his own person, on which he bases his exhortation. First, he calls himself a fellow-elder, as a brother in office rightly exhorts his brethren; he calls himself a witness of the sufferings of Christ, not only because he has preached the death and cross of Christ, but also because he had borne witness to Christ in very deed, in having endured various sufferings for Christ's sake. But it is necessary to add the remark of Grotius, that "Peter had seen Him bound, and probably had been a distant spectator of the crucifixion." The second ground is his Apostolical vocation, sealed by sufferings, cf. 1 Cor. i. 28; Col. i. 24, 25; Gal. vi. 17. The καί evidently indicates that μάρτυς denotes also his actual testimony, cf. Heb. xii. 1; Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13. He is also partaker of the future glory, because he was himself partaker of the sufferings of Christ. The readers of this Epistle were to look forward to the future glory with the same assurance in which he was expecting it. This is the third ground of his exhortation. [But compare Jno. xiii. 36, to which the Apostle not improbably alludes.—M.]. Gerhard:—"The heavenly glory, the reward of fidelity, will be common to you and me, if you also will manifest due zeal in the discharge of your duty." μελλούσης δόξης, cf. ch. i. 5, 7; iv. 13, 14.

VER. 2. Tend the flock.—ποιμαίνω, as distinguished from ἐπισκοπέω, denotes: Lead it to the wholesome pasture of the Divine word, guard it from the poisonous weeds of false doctrine, and go before it by your own example in well-doing, ch. iv. 19; cf. Jno. xxi. 17; Jer. iii. 16; xxiii. 1-4; Ezek. xxxiv. 2; Jno. x. 12; Acts xx. 28; Ps. xxiii. 1. Bernard:—"Tend (pasture) it with thy mind, with thy mouth, with thy work, tend it with prayer, with exhortation, and the exhibition of thy example." Let the Chief Shepherd be your pattern, Jno. x. 11.

The flock of God which is among you.—Know that it belongs not to you, but to God, to whom you will have to render account.—τὸ ἐν ὑμῖν, not, as Erasmus: "as far as in you lieth" [quantum in vobis est], but: the flock which is among you, with you, in your immediate region [in your parish, as we would say,—M.], the section of the one Church which is committed to your charge, cf. ch. i. 18-21; Acts xx. 28; Jno. x. 15; 1 Pet. ii. 25; Lke. xii. 82. Do not imagine that the flock is yours, you are only servants. Of like import are the words of Jesus to Peter, Jno. xxi. 15, 16. [Gerhard says: "qui vobiscum est, videlicet cum quo unum corpus, una ecclesia estis."—M.].

Overseeing it—but zealously.—ἐπισκοποῦντες (Lachmann and Tischendorf, sustained by many authorities, retain this word) defines ποιμαίνειν, and denotes, looking after, overseeing, watching with great care something for some one, Heb. xii. 15; Acts xx. 28; 1 Tim. iv. 16; Tit. i. 9; Hebr. xiii. 17. Take heed that no wolves come to devour the sheep, avert, in general, all dangers from them, and watch with great care over every thing that belongs to their welfare.—How must the flock be tended (pastured)? Peter cautions them against three sins of the pastoral office, and exhorts them to the practice of the opposite virtues.—μὴ ἀναγκαστῶς refers not to the flock, but to the shepherds, and respects at once the acceptance and the conduct of their office. In those days, persuasion, bordering on constraint, was probably necessary in order to induce one to accept or continue in the office of a presbyter. Gregory the Great confesses that he would never compel any one to accept the Episcopate. Steiger expounds: not only because it belongs to our office, but of free will, as God demands it. (Lachmann adds κατὰ Θεόν). "Those pastors are not without censure who, could they do as they would like to do, would rather be any thing than pastors." Bengel. [Coacte pascit gregem Dei, qui propter rerum temporalium penuriam non habet unde vivat, ideo prœdicat Evangelium ut de Evangelio vivere possit. Bede. "Dum agimus ac necessitatis præsceptum, lente et frigide in opere progredimur." Calvin.—M.].

Willingly.—Cf. 1 Cor. ix. 17; Ps. liv. 8; Ex. xxxvi. 2. This willing spirit flows from the love we cherish for the Chief Shepherd and the flock, Jno. x. 12; xxi. 15-17.

Nor yet for the sake of sordid gain.—Some turned religion into a trade, 1 Tim. vi. 5; the Apostle cautions against that sin. Cf. Tit. i. 7; 1 Tim. iii. 8; 2 Pet. ii. 13; Is. lvi. 11; Jer. vi. 13; viii. 10; Micah iii. 11, 5; Ezek. xiii. 19. "Where the love of gain reigns, the shepherds are apt to become hirelings, yea, even wolves."—"Those who pamper their body—seek the milk and wool of the sheep." Luther.—προθύμως denotes inward delight and zeal in the salvation and guidance of souls, in opposition to selfish motives. [Bede illustrates the word by the children of Israel, among whom even the workmen gave their services eagerly and gratuitously in the building of the tabernacle.—M.].

VER. 3. Nor yet as lording it over (the cure committed to them).—[So the German.—M.].—κατακυριεύειν, Matt. xx. 25; Mk. x. 42; Acts xx. 29; cf. Jas. ii. 6; Rom. xvi. 16. It denotes more than κυριεύειν, Lke. xxii. 25; 2 Cor. i. 24, for κατὰ carries the idea of hostility and pride.—τῶν κλήρων; κλῆρος=lot, portion of inheritance, heritage, Acts xxvi. 18; Col. i. 12; cf. Deut. iv. 20; ix. 29. So the people of Israel are called the heritage of God. In the New Testament the word was applied to those portions of the Christian Church which were assigned to individual elders as their lot. So Gerhard, Calov and others. It is altogether erroneous to expound κλῆρος as denoting the clergy in its orders, for it answers to ποιμνίον, cf. Acts xvii. 4; 1 Cor. vii. 85; 2 Cor. ii. 10.

[1. κλῆρος, in the sense of portion, is the meaning attached to this word, besides the Commentators already cited, by Erasmus ("gregem qui cuique forte contigit gubernandus"), Estius ("gregis Domini portiones, quæ singulis episcopis pascendæ et regendæ velut sortito, obtigerunt"), Bengel, Wolf, Steiger, de Wette, Huther, Wiesinger, Alford; 2. κλῆρος, in the sense of heritage of God, is the meaning given by Cyril (on Is. iii. 2), Calvin ("quum universum ecclesie corpus hæreditas sit domini, totidem sunt veluti prædia, quorum culturam singulis presbyteris assignat.")], Beza, E. V., Grotius, Benson, al. The objections to this view are, according to Alford, that κλήροι could not be taken for portions of κλῆρος, and that Θεοῦ could in this case hardly be wanting; 3. κλῆρος, in the sense of the clergy, is the anachronistical meaning attached to the word chiefly by Roman Catholic Commentators; so even Oecumenius, Jerome, à Lapide ("jubet ergo S. Petrus Episcopis et Pastoribus, ne inferioribus clericis impericæ dominari velint"), Fenarientius, al.; 4. Bodwell arbitrarily explains the word of Church-goods, and is refuted by Wolf, Curæ h. l.—The correctness of the meaning of the text, namely, the first as given

But (becoming) patterns.—ἀλλὰ τίποι.—Cornelius correctly remarks that Peter opposes this pattern to their lording. They must rule by example, not by ordering. Athanasius:—"The life should command, and the tongue persuade."

[Wordsworth:—"St. Peter happily uses the plural, κληροί; for in Christian times, it is not one nation, as it had been of old, which is the chosen people and heritage of God, but all national Churches, all congregations of Pastors and People are heritages of the Lord; each "Church and each congregation", which every Pastor serves, is, in a mystical sense, as the English Ordinal declares, "The Spouse and Body of Christ." By the word κληροί, therefore, we may understand here the faithful people of Christ, distributed in regular order into various dioceses, parishes, churches, and congregations, like the companies to which our Lord distributed the loaves and fishes by the hands of His Apostles."

"Here is another caution from St. Peter's mouth, which may be commended to the consideration of those who call themselves his successors. 'The Apostle forbiddeth dominari in cleris.' But they who claim to be his successors are not afraid to 'teach that their own judgments are infallible, and to make their definitions an universal Rule of Faith, and to require subjection to their laws and persons, as of necessity to salvation, and to be called 'Dominus Deus noster Papa,' (Gloss, in Extrav. Papæ; Johann. 22, Tit. xiv. 4), etc., all which and much more is professed by the Popes and in their behalf. No modest man can deny that this amounts to as much as St. Peter's dominari in cleris, even to the exercising of such lordship over the Lord's heritage, the Christian Church, as will become none but the Lord Himself, whose heritage it is." Bp. Sanderson, 8, p. 288. Apposite are also the following quotations from Bernard: ("Monstrata res est gradus summus et animus infimus, sedes prima et vita ima, lingua magniloqua et vita otiosa, sermo multus et functus nullus") Gregory, ("Informis est vita pastoris, qui modo calicem Dei signat, modo talos agit: qui in avibus cæli ludit, canes instigat etc."), and Gerhard ("Pastor ante oves vadit").—M.]

Vxx. 4. And when—amaranthine crown of glory.—"Instead of sordid gain, and the empty honour of ruling, the Apostle shows to them noble gain and a true crown of honour." Besser. Cf. Dan. xii. 8; Matt. xxiv. 45; xxv. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 8.—ἀρχιερωμενος, ch. ii. 25; Heb. xiii. 20; cf. Ezek. xxxiv. 15. 28; Ps. xxiii.; Jno. x. 11.—καί—then also.—φανερωθῆναι, like ἀποκαλυφθῆναι, relates to the visible return of Christ, ch. i. 5. 7; cf. Col. iii. 4; 1 Jno. ii. 28; iii. 2.—κοιμῆσθαι, see i. 9.—ἀμαράντινος=ἀμάραντος, ch. i. 4.—τὸν τῆς δόξης στέφανον.—The crowns (wreaths) with which warriors and the successful competitors in the games used to be adorned were made of flowers, herbs, ivy, laurel leaves, and olive branches. Holy Scripture speaks of a crown of righteousness, 2 Tim. iv. 8, a crown of life, Jas. i. 12; Rev. ii. 10, and here of a crown of glory. Instead of a crown of thorns, the Christian victor shall hereafter be adorned with a living, heavenly crown. Whether there is a difference between these crowns, or whether they are all one and the same crown, will only be disclosed in eternity. Besser explains it as a token of the royal dignity of believers, of which Zech. vi. 18 may be regarded the type, cf. 1 Cor. ix. 25. Hugo, Thomas Aquinas, Salmero understand by it a higher stage of eternal life.—δόξης must not be diluted into "the wreath which is glory"—or a very glorious crown, but the crown which reflects the glory of God, cf. ch. i. 7; v. 10. [The glory of Christ is probably this amaranthine crown, cf. 1 Pet. v. 1; iv. 18; i. 7, and v. 10 below; also 1 Jno. iii. 2, etc.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The title of Chief Shepherd which is here ascribed to Christ in relation to the under-shepherds, His servants, involves the Divine origin of the pastoral office. It describes Christ not only as superior in dignity to the other shepherds, but as their superior in power, in whose name and in whose stead they hold the pastoral office, to whom belong both the sheep and the shepherds, because He has given His life for them, Jno. x. 11; Acts xx. 28, to whom the shepherds are consequently responsible, and from whom they have to expect the reward or the punishment of the conduct of their office, 1 Cor. iv. 5; so Calvin, Calov and others.

2. To give, as Schwegler does, v. 4, a polemical reference to then existing hierarchical tendencies, and thence to argue against the genuineness of the Epistle, is a decided perversion of the right stand point.

3. The institution of the presbyterate is not stated explicitly, but it was already in existence before the death of the elder James, and before Paul's first missionary journey to Jerusalem, Acts xi. 30. It appears, says Weiss, to have everywhere originated with the founding and more independent establishment and organization of the Christian Church, especially in Jewish-Christian congregations, which followed the precedent of their mother Church. Paul on his first missionary journey ordained elders everywhere, Acts xiv. 23.

4. This Epistle does not yet refer to different offices in the Church. We have before us the most simple form of Church-constitution, under which all other offices were as yet included in the Apostolate and the Presbyterate. As in ch. ii. 25, the Lord is called the Shepherd and Bishop (overseer) of the Church, so the elders were to continue under Him—these His functions, that is, on the one hand to teach and exhort, and to arrange Divine worship, and on the other to take care that all things should be done honestly and orderly, to administer the discipline and to provide for the support of the poor.

5. Peter considers self-sacrificing love and self-abasing humility the most essential qualifications of true spiritual pastors.

6. The declarations of Holy Scripture concerning the glory of the life to come, and its crowns of honour, ought to be dealt with as having more reality than common theology is wont to do. "The full import of these crowns we shall never understand in our bodily life. But from their very names, we may conclude that they constitute a great glory, and indicate a title to live with Christ after death and royally to reign with Him after suffering, 2 Tim. ii. 12; Rev. xxii. 5." Roos.

7. [The Commentators justly observe that if Peter had been the prince or chief of the Apostles, as the Papists affirm, he would in this place and in the inscription of his two Epistles, have assumed to himself that high prerogative.—MacKnight.—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The pastoral office a gift of God to the Churches. 1. The extent of its duties; 2. the mind in which it must be administered.—Preachers should give testimony drawn from their own experience.—How to avoid the three capital faults of unfaithful pastors. Look through shame and death to the crown of honour and the crown of life prepared for those who overcome.

STARKE:—A lofty saying: Who would gladly neglect the flock and sheep of Christ? 1 Cor. iv. 2.—We may be fully assured of our salvation: witnesses and testimonies of it abound, Rom. viii. 16.—Rich cross-bearers! which are the riches, and where are they? They are more than those of earth, and well secured in heaven. Believe, hope and desire, and you will know it, 1 Jno. iii. 2.—A minister must lead his flock as a shepherd to wholesome pasture, rule it with the rod of his mouth, Is. xi. 4, with the staves beauty and bands, Zech. xi. 7 (German, "gentleness and pain"), and in all respects be watchful, that they suffer no injury whatsoever, Is. lxii. 6.—Hearers should possess the characteristics of good sheep to acquire the mind of Christ their Chief Shepherd and to hear His voice and that of faithful under-shepherds with ready obedience.—No rule whatsoever belongs to the office of a preacher; preachers are servants, not rulers, Matt. xx. 25. 26.—Teacher, thou oughtest not only to teach rightly, but also to live rightly, lest thou do not build up with one hand and tear down with the other, 1 Thess. ii. 10. If all believers are indiscriminately a royal priesthood, this distinction is especially true of faithful teachers whose dignity is indicated by the crown, and although they possess this dignity already in the new man, it will increasingly appear at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

Roos:—"Let us belong only to those who, leading an honest life, may indulge the hope of receiving such crowns, although as yet we do not understand their nature."

LISCO:—The Christian pastoral office: 1. Its duties; 2. Its motives; 3. Its reward.

RICHTER:—"Christian teachers and preachers must not rule by authority, but guide and direct by the power of truth and love and the force of example. Let no pastor be a pope." The pastors of a Church should seek their preeminence in that they first keep the commandments of Christ, and thus incite others to emulation, Phil. iii. 17; 2 Thess. iii. 9; 1 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. ii. 7.

[LEIGHTON:—VER. 1. The blessing of a faithful pastor. "Satius solem non lucere quam Chrysostomum non docere." VER. 2. Had I, says Bernard, some of that blood poured forth on the cross, how carefully would I carry it, and ought I not to be as careful of those souls that it was shed for?—All believers are God's clergy (κλήρος).—M.]

CHAPTER V. 5-11.

ANALYSIS:—Exhortation, addressed especially to the younger, to subjection, and to all, to continued humility, to submissiveness to the hand of God, to faithfulness and vigilance, and thus to resist the devil. God Himself will then perfect and strengthen them.

- 5 Likewise, ye younger, <sup>1</sup>submit yourselves unto the elder. Yea, all of you be subject <sup>2</sup>one to another, and be clothed <sup>3</sup>with humility: <sup>4</sup>for God resisteth <sup>5</sup>the proud and <sup>6</sup>giveth grace to the humble. Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time: <sup>7</sup>Casting <sup>8</sup>all your care upon him; for he <sup>9</sup>careth for you. Be sober, be vigilant; because <sup>9</sup>your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour. <sup>10</sup>Whom resist steadfast <sup>11</sup>in the faith, knowing that the same afflictions <sup>12</sup>are accomplished <sup>13</sup>in your brethren <sup>14</sup>that are in the world. <sup>15</sup>But the God of all grace, who hath called us <sup>16</sup>unto his eternal glory by <sup>17</sup>Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, <sup>18</sup>make you perfect, <sup>19</sup>stablish, <sup>20</sup>strengthen, settle <sup>21</sup>you. To him be glory <sup>22</sup>and dominion for ever and ever. <sup>23</sup>Amen.

[<sup>3</sup> ἡλικον βύσσαςθε, to bind a thing on oneself, wear it constantly; the sense is, wear humility as a garment, and retaining the translation of E. V., render: "clothe yourselves with humility." For the etymology of the word, see note below.—M.]

- [<sup>1</sup> ὅτι—because.—M.]
 Verse 6. [<sup>4</sup> ἐν καιρῷ—in His time (Germ.), in the time appointed. καιρός, an anarthrous concrete, Winer, p. 180.—M.]
 Verse 7. [<sup>5</sup> πᾶσαν τὴν μέριμναν—all your care, that is, in its entirety, once for all, so as to render the recurrence of it impossible.—M.]
 Verse 8. [<sup>6</sup> Rec., with L., inserts ὅτι before ἀντίδικος.—M.]
 [<sup>7</sup> K. L. and others have τὴν κατασίαν; Sin. καταῖν.—M.]
 Verse 9. [<sup>8</sup> στερεοί—firm, better than steadfast.—M.]
 [<sup>9</sup> τὰ αὐτὰ τῶν παθημάτων—the self-same sufferings; this construction occurs no where else in the New Testament.—M.]
 [<sup>10</sup> ἐπιτελεῖσθαι—are being accomplished, in course of accomplishment.—M.]
 [<sup>12</sup> Translate the whole verse: "Be sober, be vigilant, because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour; whom (to whom offer resistance) resist, firm in the faith, knowing that the self-same sufferings are being accomplished by your brotherhood in the world."—M.]
 Verse 10. [<sup>13</sup> Rec., with K. and several versions, reads ἡμᾶς, but A. B. L. and others have ὑμᾶς; so also Sinait.—M.]
 [<sup>16</sup> Rec., with K. L., inserts ὑμᾶς after καταρίστε; A. B. and others omit it. στήριξε—to confirm, establish.—M.]
 Verse 11. [<sup>17</sup> θεμελιώσε—ground you, fix you on a foundation.—M.]
 [<sup>19</sup> εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων—unto the ages of the ages. B. omits the last words.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 5. Likewise ye younger — the elder.—ὁμολῶς, as in ch. iii. 7, leads to the corresponding duty of the younger members of the Church in general. These are not laymen, but the younger members of the Church in general. The antithesis would seem to warrant taking πρεσβύτεροι as describing the aged members of the Church, but this would involve understanding πρεσβύτεροι in a sense different from v. 1; moreover ὁμολῶς would conflict with such an interpretation. They are accordingly elders in office, who were, as we have already shown, generally also elders in years. At the same time, it may be assumed that all the elder persons were to take a voluntary part in some, though not in all the functions of presbyters. πρεσβύτεροι and νεώτεροι denote, therefore, the contrast between those who were either bound to lead, or might voluntarily do it, and those who were led and obeying. The view of Weiss, who understands by νεώτεροι or νεανίσκοι, Acts v. 6. 10, of young persons who were to assist the elders in outward ministrations, is hardly tenable, at least on the ground on which he puts it. πάντες δὲ in what follows, embraces πρεσβύτεροι and νεώτεροι, and is not antithetical to the latter. Could a small portion of the Church only be exhorted to be subject to the presbyters? This would, at all events, necessitate the idea of official subordination in a narrowed sense. Such an observance in other Churches is also doubtful. [Alford, who takes a similar view, expresses it with more clearness and logical force. He says: "As the name πρεσβύτεροι had an official sense, viz.: superintendents of the Church, so νεώτεροι likewise describes those who were the ruled, the disciples of the πρεσβύτεροι. Thus taken, it will mean here, the rest of the Church as opposed to πρεσβύτεροι.—M.]—ὑποτάγητε, cf. ch. ii. 18. 18; iii. 1. Calvin:—"Nothing is more repugnant to the mind of man (in his fallen state) than to be subject."

Yea all.—πάντες δὲ, inferiors are to subject themselves to superiors, wives to their husbands, children to their parents, slaves to their masters, yea, in a certain sense, all to all, cf. Phil. ii. 8; Eph. v. 21; Rom. xii. 10. This subordination, which is insisted upon as a principal point in the order of the Christian commonwealth, must be founded on humble submission to God, cf. Matt. xx. 27; xxiii. 12; Lke. xiv. 11; xviii. 14.

And clothe yourselves with humility.—τὴν ταπεινοφροσύνην, lowliness of mind, which to the heathen was vile, brokenness of a proud heart, the opposite of ἐψηλὰ φρονεῖν, Rom. xii. 16; cf. Phil. ii. 8; Eph. iv. 2; Col. iii. 12.—ἐγκομβοῦσθαι from κόμβος, a string or band to tie something with, to fasten it, a knot, or from ἐγκόμβωμα, explained by Pollux, according to Riemer, of a white apron or frock worn over the clothes to keep them clean, like the dusters used by coachmen and travellers. It was a garment usually worn by slaves. Calvin and others consider it to denote a show-dress, but this cannot be proved. Calov combines the two ideas: "We are to put on humility as a garment (cf. Col. iii. 12) and have it fastened tight to us." [His language, literally translated, is somewhat ludicrous: "We should be buttoned up tight in it."—M.]—We should be thoroughly surrounded by it, have it fit close all round, and suffer nobody to tear it away from us (cf. Jno. xiii. 5, etc.), even if it should be regarded as a servile garment. [Alford renders ἐγκομβώσασθε, gird on, from ἐγκόμβωμα, used for a kind of girdle by Longus, Pastoralia, 2, 33, and Pollux, 4, 119. See in Wetstein.—M.]

Because God opposeth Himself to the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.—The Apostle gives the reason for his exhortation in a citation from Prov. iii. 34, in the LXX., the only variation being the substitution of ὁ θεός for κύριος, cf. Jas. v. 6; Prov. xxix. 23; Job xxii. 29.—ὑπερήφανοις, Heb. , scorners, haughty, insolent men, unmindful of God, and proudly looking down upon others, Lke. i. 51; Rom. i. 30; 2 Tim. iii. 2. "They assault, as it were, the honour of God in seizing that which belongs to God. Other sins fly from God, pride only opposes itself to God; other sins crush men, pride only raises them against God. Hence God also, in His turn, opposes Himself to the proud." Gerhard. [Alford quotes the saying of Artabamus to Xerxes, Herod., vii. 10, ὁρᾷς τὰ ὑπερέχοντα ζῶα ὡς κεραυνὸς ὁ θεός, οὐδὲ ἐφ' ὧν ἀντάττειται, τὰ

ὁ σμικρὸν οὐδὲν μιν κνίξει; . . . φιλέει γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς τὰ ὑπερέχοντα πάντα κολοῦει.—M.]—ἀντιτάσσεται, He opposes Himself to them as with an army. This sentiment was known to some extent to the better among the heathen, because the history of the world proves it. See Steiger, cf. Dan. iv. 84.—

ταπεινοίς = תלפ, the lowly, those who acknowledge their vileness, and consider themselves mean and low.—δίδωμι χάριν = חן. His good pleasure rests upon them, and He gives them proofs of it, cf. Gen. vi. 8; xviii. 8; Lke. i. 30; ii. 52; Acts ii. 47.—“The proud who persist in offering Him armed resistance, are struck down by His mighty hand.” Gerhard. “There are, as it were, two hands of God under which we must humble ourselves, the one abases the proud, the other exalts the humble.” Augustine. [“Humilitas est vas gratiarum.” ibid.—M.]

VER. 6. Humble yourselves therefore.—A new inference drawn from the citation from the Old Testament and the concluding exhortation. The Apostle once more reverts to suffering and causes, says Besser, the light of the citation to shine on the darkness of suffering of the Church.—ταπεινώθητε = bow yourselves in humility, recognize your impotence and the might of God; submit yourselves to Him quietly and willingly.

Under the mighty hand of God.—An allusion to ch. iv. 17, to the impending judgments. He can put down and exalt, kill and make alive, wound and heal, Acts iv. 28, 30; Deut. xxxii. 39; 1 Sam. ii. 6; 2 Kings v. 7; Deut. iii. 24; Ex. xiv. 81; iii. 19; xxxii. 11; Lke. i. 51. He reveals His chastising hand also to believers in the sufferings which He sends for their refining and trial.

That He may exalt you in His time.—ἐν ᾧ, in order that in you may be fulfilled that law of the kingdom of God, “he that shall humble himself, shall be exalted,” Matt. xxiii. 12.—ἐλθεῖν = to raise from the dust, to comfort and help, to advance to honour from disgrace, to joy from grief, ch. i. 6, 7; cf. Jas. iv. 7, 10.—ἐν καιρῷ (Lachmann adds ἐπισκοπῆς [A and many versions.—M.], probably a later addition from ch. ii. 12) in the time appointed, the right time, here on earth or hereafter without any reference to our time.

VER. 7. Casting all your care upon Him.—Holy freedom from all anxious care is essential to submission to God. “The mighty hand of God is in the service of a Father’s heart for He careth for you.” Besser :—ἐπιρρίψαντες from Ps. lv. 23.

ἐπιρρίπτω = רלל and רשל to roll a burden, cf. Ps. xxii. 11; xxxvii. 5; Matt. vi. 25–34; Phil. iv. 6, to cast upon, to, over, Lke. xix. 28; xii. 22.—“We cast our cares upon God in believing prayer and tell Him the need which excites our care, as children are wont to confide their grief to their father. We implore His help, remembering His mercy and His mighty hand. And He is not implored in vain.” Roos :—“Hence we must not struggle long with the burden of our cares but ease ourselves at once by earnest heart-yearning and fervent sighing.” Calov: “μέριμνα from μέρος, μερίζω, care, as it were, divides the heart into different parts, drawing it hither and thither.—πᾶσαν τὴν, anxiety in its entirety, the whole of it, undivided and without any reserve whatsoever; great cares and small ones, cares seen or hidden, pour them out before Him.

Because He careth for you.—μέλει, because He has you at heart, He has taken it upon Himself to care for you; not a hair of your head shall perish without His will, Lke. xxi. 18; Mtt. x. 80.—[περί ὑμῶν. περί after verbs of caring denotes about. As to the distinction between περί and ὑπέρ, Weber, Demoth. p. 280, says: “περί solam mentis circumspeditionem vel respectum rei, ὑπέρ simul animi propensionem etc. significat.” See Winer p. 890.—M.]. “Believers daily ascend Mount Moriah with Abraham, appropriating as their motto, the words, ‘God will provide,’ Gen. xxii. 8. The Lord will provide on that mountain, that is on the mountain of Divine Providence, whence cometh our help; Ps. cxxi.” Gerhard.

VER. 8. Be sober, be vigilant.—That freedom from care must not degenerate into apathy, for we are still in the Church militant, not yet in the Church triumphant. To the care which troubles from within must be added the temptations which come from the kingdom of darkness. Hence the Apostle exhorts them anew to sobriety and vigilance, ch. iv. 8, i. 18. “Let this be your care.” Bengel.—νήφατε, γρηγοράσατε, go inseparably together, hence no copulative. γρηγοράσατε cf. Lke. xxi. 34, 36. This watching consists, says Calov, in the prudence by which we avoid the lying in wait of Satan, in the shunning of false security and of sins and in the throwing out of sentinels, Eph. vi. 11; Matt. xxiv. 42; xxv. 13; 1 Cor. xvi. 13. The exhortation based upon the words of our Lord, springs simultaneously from the Apostle’s own experience, Matt. xxvi. 40, 41; Luke xxii. 45; cf. 1 Thess. v. 6. [Augustine: “Corde vigila, fide vigila, spe vigila, caritate vigila, operibus vigila.”—M.]

Your adversary.—The exposition which sees in “adversary” human slanderers, (Hensler and others) needs no refutation. Satan is called absolutely the adversary of believers, who stands up as the champion of law when he opposes them, their enemy, Matt. xiii. 39; John viii. 44; Rev. xii. 10; the prince of this world, Eph. ii. 2; 2 Cor. iv. 4; John xvi. 11; xii. 31; xiv. 30; Acts xxvi. 18; 2 Thess. ii. 9; 1 John iii. 8. He is the declared opponent, both of Christ and of His members. He is the accuser of the brethren, Rev. xii. 10; cf. Job i. 6, etc.

Walketh about.—As in Job i. 7, he is said to go to and fro in the earth, so here he is said to walk about, which applies not to visible appearances, but to his operations by his instruments. Scripture indeed teaches that the evil spirits are confined in hell, 2 Peter ii. 4; Jude 6; Luke viii. 31; but they are bound only in respect of their visible appearing, while they rule invisibly in the regions of the air, Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12; in darkness, they roam over desert places, Matt. xii. 43, 44; Luke xi. 24; and influence man, mediately and immediately, Luke xxii. 23; John xiii. 27.

As a roaring lion.—The lion, according to Pliny, roars most violently, when he is hungry. Elsewhere Satan is compared with a serpent, on account of his cunning, 2 Cor. xi. 3; Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2; here, with a lion on account of his cruelty and boldness, his power and strength, and his lust of injury. "When furious Jews and mad heathens began a persecution of the Christians, or attacked individual Christians, or simply threatened them, it was the devil's work, who then showed himself as a roaring lion. But since such things happened here and there, he is described as a roaring lion who walketh about. His object is to terrify and to tear, but especially to tear. His terrifying consisted of old in menacings, threatening edicts and anathemas, his tearing in executions."—Roos. [Gerhard: "Comparatur diabolus leoni famelico et præ impatientia famis rugienti, quia perniciem nostram inextinguibilem appetit, nec ulla præda ei sufficit."—M.]

Seeking whom he may devour.—Cf. Matt. xxiii. 34; 1 Cor. xv. 32; Heb. xi. 36. The comparison relates to both.—καταπινεῖν, to drink greedily, to gulp or swallow down. He cannot devour every body, move them to fall away from Christ into sin, but only those who are not sober and vigilant. "The enemy and opponent of the Church despises those who are already in his power, whom he has estranged from the Church and led away captive and conquered. He passes them over, and continues to tempt those of whom he knows that Christ dwells in them."—Cyprian.

VER. 9. Whom resist firm in the faith.—How shall we offer resistance to this powerful enemy? 1. In firm faith. 2. In the thought that such suffering is not peculiar, but the universal lot of Christians.—ἀντιστήτε. James iv. 7, cites the same passage; Prov. iii. 34, has the same exhortation, "Submit yourselves therefore to God;" cf. ver. 10, and the charge: "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." This circumstance renders the reference of the one Epistle to the other very probable.—"Resist him, in order to drive him back when he attacks us. The Lion of the tribe of Judah is more mighty by far than the lion of hell. His victory and His might become our own through faith." Calov. Eph. iii. 16; John xv. 4; 1 Cor. vi. 17.—"Unbelievers fear the devil as a lion, the strong in faith despise him as a worm." Isidor. "Victory over Satan lies in faith, because faith unites us to Christ, the victor. By faith the devil is driven to flight as is the lion by fire." Gerhard.—στερεοί, firm, immovable in faith, in faithful cleaving to Christ and His word; cf. Acts xvi. 5; Rom. iv. 20; Col. ii. 5, 7; Eph. vi. 16; iv. 14.

Knowing that the self-same sufferings—in the world.—εἰδοτες, cf. ch. i. 18; iii. 9.—τὰ αὐτὰ, the same kind of sufferings of trial. The thought that these sufferings are common to all the brethren, is designed to warn against the conceit that they are rejected by God and man, that they are either extraordinary sinners or uncommon saints; cf. 1 Cor. x. 18.—ἀδελφότητι, ch. ii. 18.—ἐν κόσμῳ, to indicate the reason of their sufferings. You live in an imperfect world, among transitory things, and with the children of unbelief, John ix. 5.—ἐπιτελεισθαι, used of the payment and discharge of taxes and debts; of the discharge and completion of some business or combat. The ideas of payment of debt and completion may be combined; they are endured by your brethren with a view to their completion (perfecting, so German) by the appointment of God.—τῇ ἀδελφότητι for ὑπὸ τῆς ἀδελφότητος. De Wette and others take it as thé Dative of the more remote object [i. e., the Dative of reference.—M.] as in γίνεσθαι ὑμῖν, ch. iv. 12; so Wiesinger. "They not only are partakers of our sufferings, but our confederates in prayer and in combating the enemy."—Calov.

VER. 10. But the God of all grace.—A final promise full of rich consolation. χάρις denotes here, as in ch. iv. 10, a Divine gift of grace, πάσης involving a plurality of gifts, cf. ch. iii. 7; Jas. i. 17; 1 Cor. xii. 6; Heb. iv. 16; 2 Cor. v. 18; i. 8; Rom. xv. 6. "He is the source of all grace and of all goods." Gerhard. "With the idea of Him [i. e., God.—M.] there is indissolubly united whatsoever is called grace." Steiger.

Who hath called you, ὁ καλέσας ὑμᾶς (Lachmann and Tischendorf read ὑμᾶς, which is the more authentic reading). His call discloses to us His gracious disposition. He will complete that which He has begun, cf. ch. i. 15.

Unto his eternal glory in Christ Jesus.—The Divine act of calling us to that glory contains the earnest, that every thing will so come to pass as to take us forward to the end [τέλος, —M.] of the calling. καλέσας belongs to ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ not to ὀλίγον παρόντας.—αἰώνιον δόξαν, ch. v. 1; iv. 18; i. 11. 5.—ἐν χριστῷ. In His power, for His sake and by His word, Eph. i. 8; iii. 11; 2 Tim. i. 9, as the calling also takes place with reference to Him, cf. Gal. i. 6; 1 Thess. ii. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 14.

When ye have suffered a little while.—ὀλίγον παρόντας are rightly connected by Steiger with what has gone before in the sense: which glory will come to pass in the natural order, after we have suffered a little, or on condition that we have suffered a little, ch. iii. 14; Rom. viii. 18. So Wiesinger, cf. Phil. i. 6.—ὀλίγον, time as contrasted with infinite eternity, ch. i. 6. Gerhard: "The Apostle shows that from the same fountain of grace proceed both the first calling to heavenly glory and the ultimate consummation of this benefit."

Himself will perfect you.—(The Fut. Indic. of this and the following verbs is preferable to the Optat.). καταρτίσει from ἀρτιος, complete, perfect of its kind, ready. He will perfect your deficiencies, make you ready in every sense, "so that no defect remain in you." Bengel. Cf. Heb. xiii. 21; 1 Thess. iii. 10; 2 Cor. xiii. 11.

Confirm, στηρίξεν—to prop, make fast, to give firm stay and support to what is tottering, Luke xxii. 32; Rom. i. 11; 1 Thess. iii. 2; 2 Pet. i. 12; Jas. v. 8. "Nothing shall cause you to shake." Bengel.

Strengthen, σθενώσει from σθένος, might, bodily strength, hence to impart spiritual might, to strengthen spiritually. Gerhard thinks of the figure of a castle which is fortified, cf. v. 9.

Ground, θεμελιώσει (Lachmann omits ὑμᾶς and θεμελιώσει. Tischendorf also omits the former), θεμελιώω, to found, fasten in the ground (fix as on a foundation), render strong, Mtt. vii. 25; Lke. vi. 48; Heb. i. 10; figuratively, Eph. iii. 17; Col. i. 28; 1 Cor. xv. 58; 1 Pet. ii. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 19. Take note of the intrinsic development and rise of these verbs.

To Him is the glory and the might.—αὐτῷ ἡ δόξα. Expression of gratitude for these exhibitions of grace; men dare not take any share of the credit to themselves.—κράτος, the might, the rule, the authority which He employs in our preparation, Eph. iii. 20; 1 Tim. vi. 16; Heb. xiii. 21. The glory of God is the ultimate purpose of all.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Classical antiquity holds along with the recognition of the truth that God opposes Himself to the proud, the error which the prince of darkness threw into the heart of our parents, that the Deity is an envious Being, who, from jealousy, is impatient of any exaltation (Germ. Höhe) alongside His own. So in Herodotus, Lucanus. Many productions of modern literature, and many opinions of degraded men, exhibit just such suspicious thoughts.

2. Mute resignation, as found among fatalists, is infinitely different from that believing submission to the appointments of God, which Holy Scripture requires.

3. The teaching of Peter concerning the influence of Satan, decidedly annihilates the distortion of the truth, which here and there is advanced in our time, that the power of Satan ceased with the advent of Christ. Satan asks, says Calvin, nothing better than to be able to attack and capture us unawares. How could he better gain his end than by deceiving us into the belief of his non-existence, so as to deprive us of all fear of him.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Humility is like Jacob's ladder, which leads from earth to heaven. 1. Its ground; 2. Its manifestation.—The Christian's art of casting his care upon God. "Oh, he that can thoroughly learn this casting will experience the truth of Peter's assertions. But he that does not learn this casting remains a cast-away, a broken and subjugated man, an outcast and cast off." Luther.—Grace is a river which flows downwards.—Humility, the most precious attire.—The mighty hand of the wrath and grace of God.—The Christian's way leads from the crowd to open space, from the depth to the height.—As the devil tempts men especially to unbelief, so he can only be resisted with firm faith.—The most powerful consolation is in the cross.

STARKE:—Humility, the most lowly virtue, is the highest in value, for it brings grace; rain moistens the deep valleys; lowly violets are fragrant. Pride, the portrait of Satan, and an abomination to God; a poison which mars and corrupts whatever is good. Flee, soul, from this serpent, which has bitten many saints, and, as it were, cast them out of heaven.—Art thou high, God is higher: strong, God is stronger; mighty, God is more mighty; eminent, God is majestic. Thou art under (less than) God, humble thyself under Him. Sir. iii. 20.—We must suffer before we can come to honour, and God tests our humility by suffering, to see whether it be worthy of honour, Prov. xv. 33.—Humility is not a meritorious cause of exaltation, but a way to it, Col. iii. 8. 4.—We must cast our care upon God not only in things temporal but also in things spiritual, especially in what belongs to the state of grace. Then we may feel assured that in God's might, through faith, we shall be preserved unto salvation, ch. i. 5.—Man is like a pilgrim passing through a forest inhabited by bears and lions, and lodging at a place which is the home of robbers and murderers. Satan, holding unbelievers already in his power and in his claws, directs his most earnest endeavours against the godly.—Burdening oneself with eating and drinking, cares of living, and fleshly security, opens the gate and the door to the devil, that he may catch and ruin men.—Satan is strongly armed, but vincible. Faith is the best weapon, arm thyself with it for offensive and defensive warfare, Eph. vi. 16.—Nobody suffers anything new, singular or strange. Others before you also have made experience of it; the devil does not remit it to any.—Believers must always be combating, if not with men, yet with the devil and his angels. Earthly weapons are of no avail, but faith conduces to victory, Job vii. 1; Heb. xi. 30, etc.—High calling of men! not to a royal wedding, not to the receiving of a transitory heritage but to the eternal glory of God. O what riches! what honour and grace! 1 Thess. ii. 12.—Thou thinkest that thou hast to suffer a long time: vain conceit! Is not thy whole life short, how then can thy suffering be long? 2 Cor. iv. 17.—Everything with God, from God, to God! Is. xl. 29.—He who always talks of his human weakness as presenting a barrier to earnestness in the Christian life is virtually denying the God of all grace. Rev. xxi. 8.

ROOS:—Confirming is opposed to being overpowered by outward sufferings and inward temptations; strengthening to weakness, timidity and want of courage exhibited in the confession of the name of Christ, and in doing His will. Grounding is an exhibition of grace, whereby Christ and the Gospel preached by the Apostles, are made so clear to the soul, that it always knows why it does or suffers anything.

HEERBERGER:—1. What should be our deportment in adversity, and in evil days? 2. What should be our deportment in prosperity and in good days? 3. What we ought to say, if fortune smiles or frowns on us?

STIER:—The way in which we must persevere, after having come to Christ, and the great perils of this way. These are: 1. The pride of our own heart; 2. the temptation and seduction in the world around us.

KAPFF:—The great blessing of humility. 1. It finds favour with God and with men; 2. it is a power against Satan; 3. it imparts strength in suffering.

STAUDT:—How one resists the adversary: 1. By humility; 2. by freedom from care; 3. by sobriety; 4. with a firm faith; 5. with the remembrance of these sufferings of the brethren, of the calling to glory and of the faithful and mighty God.

[LEIGHTON:—VER. 5. The hoary head is indeed a crown; but when? when found in the way of righteousness, Prov. xvi. 31. There it shines and has a kind of royalty over youth: otherwise a graceless old age is a most despicable and lamentable sight. What gains an unholy old man or woman, by their scores of years, but the more scores of guiltiness and misery? And their white hairs speak nothing but whiteness for wrath.

Humility.—That the Christian put on that (the thing itself), not the appearance of it, to act in as a stage-garment, but the truth of it, as their constant habit, be clothed with humility. It must appear in your outward carriage. . . . It is seen as a modest man's or woman's apparel, which they wear not for that end, that it may be seen, and do not gaudily flaunt and delight in dressing; though there is a decency as well as necessity, which they do and may have respect to, yet that in so neat and unaffected a way, that they are a good example, even in that point. Thus humility in carriage and words is as the decorum of this clothing, but the main end is the real usefulness of it.—Rebecca's beauty and jewels were covered with a veil; but when they did appear, the veil set them off and commended them, though at a distance it hid them.—O humility! the virtue of Christ, (that which He so peculiarly espoused) how dost thou confound the vanity of our pride!—One says well, "that he who carries other graces without humility, carries a precious powder in wind without a cover."

But He giveth grace.—Pours it out plentifully upon humble hearts. His sweet dews and showers of grace slide off the mountains of pride and fall on the low valleys of humble hearts and make them pleasant and fertile.

VER. 6. His gracious design is to make much room for grace by much humbling. . . . It is necessary time and pains that is given to the unballasting of a ship, casting out the earth and sand, when it is to be laden with spices. We must be emptied more, if we would have of that fullness and riches which we are longing for.

VER. 7. The whole golden mines of all spiritual comfort and good are His, the spirit itself. Then will He not furnish what is fit for thee, if thou humbly attend on Him and lay the care of providing for thee upon His wisdom and love? This were the sure way to honour Him with what we have, and to obtain much of what we have not; for certainly He deals best with those that do most absolutely refer all to Him.

Vv. 8. 9. That we may watch, it concerns us to be sober. The instruction is military, and a drunken soldier is not fit to be on the watch.

VER. 10. As the first, perfect, implies more clearly than the rest, their advancement in victory over their remaining corruptions and infirmities and their progress towards perfection. Stablish has more express reference to both the inward lightness and inconstancy than is natural to us, the counter-blasts of persecutions and temptations and to outward oppositions, and imports the curing of the one and support against the other. Strengthen, the growth of other graces, especially gaining of further measures of those graces wherein they are weakest and lowest.

And settle, though it seems the same, and in substance is the same with the other word establish, yet it adds somewhat to it very considerably; for it signifies to found or fix upon a sure foundation, and so indeed may have an aspect to Him who is the foundation and strength of believers, on whom they build by faith, even Jesus Christ, in whom we have all both victory over sin and increase of grace, establishment of spirit, and power to persevere against all difficulties and assaults, Is. xxviii. 16; Matt. vii. 24-29.—M.]

[VER. 5. Beware of the pride of humility.

VER. 7. Most of our cares are either imaginary or about unnecessaries. Faith and trust in God, the infallible remedy for them.—VER. 8. Our enemy is expert in the variation of his tactics; defeated, he is even more dangerous than victorious. οὐ δίδωσι ἐνάντιον, οὐδὲ νικῶν, οὐδὲ νικώμενος. Plato in Vita Marcell.—VER. 9. The motives to resistance are thus strongly put by Tertullian, Lib. ad Martyr, 8: "Stat confictus conspector et victorie, Agonotheles, Deus vivus: Xystarches, Spiritus Sanctus: Epistates, Christus Jesus: Corona, eternitatis brabium, angelice in celis substantie politia, gloria in secula seculorum."—VER. 10. The God of all grace.—Mohammed heads every sura or chapter (with the exception of one) of the Korân with the words Bismillahi, arrahmani arraheemi, signifying, "In the name of the most merciful God," or, as some prefer, "In the name of the God of all grace." Savary says: "This formula is expressly recommended in the Korân. The Mohammedans pronounce it whenever they slaughter an animal, at the commencement of their reading and of all important actions. It is with them that which the sign of the cross is with Christians. Gidab, one of their celebrated authors, says, that when these words were sent down from heaven, the clouds fled on the side of the east, the winds were lulled, the sea was moved, the animals erected their ears to listen, the devils were precipitated from the celestial spheres," etc.—M.]

[VER. 5. PARKHURST: The original word, here rendered "be clothed," is very beautiful and expressive. It signifies to clothe properly with an outer ornamental garment tied loosely upon the wearer with knots. And it implies, that the humility of Christians, which is one of the most ornamental graces of their profession, should constantly appear in all their conversation, so as to strike the eye of every beholder, and that this amiable grace should be so closely connected with their persons, that no occurrence, temptation or calamity should be able to strip them of it.—M.]

[VER. 8. STANHOPE: Be sober; the advice comprises not only a temperate use of the creatures appointed for our sustenance and refreshment, but the government of our passions and desires in general, with respect to any objects or events whatsoever, which in this present life are wont to provoke them to violence and excess.—M.]

The first of Peter.<sup>10</sup>

Verse 12. [1 τοῦ πιστοῦ ἀδελφοῦ.—the faithful brother.—M.]

[2 ὑμῖν, not as E. V., "a faithful brother unto you," but dependant on ἐγράψα, "By Silvanus, etc., I have written to you."—M.]

[3 Better retain the position of ὡς λογίζομαι in the original, and render, "By Silvanus, the faithful brother, as I reckon, etc."—M.]

[4 δι' ὀλίγων.—in (by means of) few words.—M.]

[5 εἰς ἣν ἐστῆκατε. A. B. Cod. Colb. Sin., so Lachmann and Alford; εἰς ἣν ἐστῆκατε.—K. L. Tischendorf and others. The weight of authority is on the side of the first. We may render, with E. V., "in which ye stand," or, with Alford, "in which stand ye."—M.]

Verse 13. [6 ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή.—"She that is elected together with you in Babylon;" so German. See note below.—M.]

Verse 14. [7 Better render ἀσπάζεσθε as ἀσπάζεσθαι, v. 13, "salute."—M.]

[8 ἡ ἀκτίς.—A kiss of love.—M.]

[9 Rec. with K. L., and many versions inserts ἐν ᾧ ἐστῆκατε.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 12. By Silvanus—in few words.—

Silvanus is very probably the same as Sijas, Acts xv. 22. 27. 32. 34. 40; xvi. 19. 25. 29; xvii. 10. 14; xviii. 5; the companion of St. Paul (1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1; 2 Cor. i. 9). He accompanied the Apostle on his second missionary journey, and was with him at Corinth in A. D. 53. Acts xviii. 5. The statements of Lachmann, that Silvanus and Silas are different persons, cannot be substantiated. See Weiss.—ὑμῖν is to be joined with ἐγράψα, not with τοῦ πιστοῦ, which would require: τοῦ ἡμῖν πιστοῦ. Grotius explains ἐγράψα of a lost epistle, but this is quite arbitrary, cf. 2 Pet. iii. 1. I wrote by Silvanus, may mean, I have called in his assistance in writing; this exposition seems to be sustained by the tradition, that Peter was obliged to use an amanuensis; or rather, I send you this Epistle by the hand of Silvanus, so Acts xv. 23, and in the subscriptions of several of Paul's Epistles.—The apposition τοῦ πιστοῦ, of the brother faithful to Jesus and the Church, and worthy of all confidence, and the circumstance that v. 13 specifies no salutation from him, favour the latter view. But ὡς λογίζομαι, I reckon, I suppose, is decisive. Some connect it with δι' ὀλίγων: I have written in few words, it seems to me, as I think, considering the importance of the subject. But such an apposition would have been more appropriate in Heb. xiii. 22. Hence others join it with τοῦ πιστοῦ, saying that Peter did not know, from personal experience, the fidelity of Silvanus in his peculiar relation to those congregations. Still this would not fail to indicate a problematical opinion of this brother, even though ὡς λογίζομαι should be rendered, "as I am fully convinced concerning him," cf. Rom. iii. 28; vi. 11. Beza already remarks, that it is doubtful that Peter should have praised a man, who belonged to the ἡγουμένους, Acts xv. 22, in such vague terms, particularly if he intended to recommend him as the bearer of the Epistle. The most natural exposition is obtained by connecting ὡς λογίζομαι with διὰ Σιλβανοῦ ἐγράψα. "I calculate that you will receive this Epistle by the hands of Silvanus," which was the less certain since it was designed to pass through the hands of several congregations. If this interpretation is correct, ἐγράψα διὰ refers decidedly to the transmission, and not to the composition of the Epistle. [But the above exposition of ὡς λογίζομαι as connected with τοῦ πιστοῦ, is hardly exhaustive. It seems to be the most natural connection, and indicates, says Alford, the Apostle's judgment concerning Silvanus, given, not in any disparagement of him, nor indicating, as De Wette and Bengel, that he was not known to St. Peter, but as fortifying him in his mission to the churches addressed, with the Apostle's recommendation, over and above the acquaintance which the readers may already have had with him.—M.]

[WORDSWORTH:—St. Peter avouches to his readers, that St. Paul's fellow-labourer among them, Silas, is "their faithful brother." He calls St. Mark his son, who had once faltered in the faith, but who had afterwards preached to them in Asia (See Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24), and whom St. Paul, writing from Rome to the churches of Phrygia, mentions as being there among his own tried and trusted friends, and calls him "Sister's son to Barnabas."

St. Paul, as well as St. Peter, now also, at the close of his career, writes to Timothy about the same time as the date of this Epistle of St. Peter, and bears witness that Mark "is profitable to him for the ministry," (2 Tim. iv. 11). And St. Peter here joins Mark with Silas, who had once been preferred in his room.

So may all wounds be healed, and all differences cease in the Church of Christ. So may all falterers be recovered, and Christian charity prevail, and God's glory be magnified in all persons and in all things, through Jesus Christ!—M.]

δι' ὀλίγων, an expression of modesty, and an exhortation to use the little conscientiously.

Exhorting.—παρακαλεῖν, to cheer, encourage and console. This is the main design of the Epistle, and the fulfilment of the charge Christ gave him: "Strengthen thy brethren," Luke xxii. 32.

Testifying.—ἐπιμαρτυρεῖν.—Bengel refers ἐπὶ to the testimony of Paul, which Peter intended to confirm. Without reason. It rather denotes the confirmation of the oral announcement they had received. The result, the substance of all, is contained in what follows.

That this is the true grace of God, viz.: that you have been made partakers of the grace of God truly, and not only imaginarily; that you stand on the right foundation, from which you must not suffer yourselves to be pushed away; see ch. i. 10. 20; ii. 4. By means of the preaching of the Gospel, they had been brought through faith to the possession and enjoyment of the grace of God. Therein they should stand firm and grow, cf. ch. i. 8. 21; ii. 7. 9. 10.—In two ways they might come to doubt if they were right and standing in the grace of God: first, by being surprised at their sufferings, second, by false teachers. "Jewish teachers of the law called in question, 'Whether the Galatians were standing in the true grace of God.' Afterwards other seducers, whom Peter denounces in his second Epistle, may have arisen in those countries, and tried to make those Christians believe that they were not standing in the true grace of God." Roos.

εἰς ἣν ἐστήκατε—in which ye have come to stand and still stand. [See note in Appar. Crit. Frommüller considers ἐστήκατε as most authentic, but the probability is strong that it is a correction from Rom. v. 2; 1 Cor. xv. 2; see Alford.—M.]

Vers. 13. She that is elected together with you in Babylon saluteth you.—"The design of the salutation which follows is to assure them that other believers have their perseverance in the faith and ultimate salvation greatly at heart."—ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή.—The most current exposition is that it denotes a congregation at Babylon, cf. ch. i. 1. So the ancient versions, the fathers and reformers down to the eighteenth century; see Weiss. The view of others, who explain it of Peter's wife or some noble lady at Babylon, has in its favour the circumstance that the names of individuals are mentioned immediately before and after this salutation; but it would be rather singular that Peter should describe his wife or another lady so periphrastically as she that is elected together with you in Babylon. This would require: my coelect (one) who is now in Babylon. 2 Jno. i. 13 probably refers to a congregation. Hofmann. Wiesinger.—Some expositors see in Babylon a reference to Rome, on account of its hostility to Christianity, cf. Rev. xiv. 8; xvii. 5. 18; xviii. 2. 10; others to Jerusalem, and others again to Babylon in Egypt, but which was only a Roman military post. We prefer, with Weiss, the exposition according to which the literal Babylon in Chaldea is meant, although we have no account of a journey of Peter to Babylon. The designation of Rome by the term Babylon seems only to fit a later period, and to be ill-suited to the style of the Epistle and the sending of salutations. According to Schöttgen, the Jews did not begin to call Rome Babylon until after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Marcus, my son.—Probably not his actual son, as we have no information on that head, but his spiritual son, Mark the Evangelist, cf. Acts xii. 12; Col. iv. 10; Phil. xxiv.; 2 Tim. iv. 11; 2 Tim. i. 2; 1 Cor. iv. 16; Gal. iv. 19; Matt. xii. 27. Papias reports him to have been Peter's interpreter, so Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria. But the statements of these fathers do not warrant the inference that the Epistle was written in Rome, as a spurious subscription in several manuscripts declared.

Vers. 14. Salute ye one another in a kiss of love.—Cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26; Rom. xvi. 16. The custom of a holy brotherly kiss was at that time universally observed among Christians. "It was designed to be the seal of His love in whose name they kissed one another, but also the seal of their own mutual love, for without taking its existence for granted such a charge could hardly have been given." Wiesinger. [For a full account of this custom, see Winer, Real-Wörterbuch, s. v. Kuss.—M.]

Peace—Amen.—εἰρήνη, see ch. i. 2; Rom. xvi. 24; Eph. vi. 23. 24; 3 Jno. 15. It is the peace flowing from grace. It is enjoyed only by those who are in Christ Jesus, but by all thus situated, 1 Cor. i. 8; Phil. i. 2; Col. i. 2.—ἀμήν is wanting in many manuscripts.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Which are the infallible marks of the state of grace? "It is a great guilt to make those who stand in the true grace of God doubt their state of grace, or at least to endeavour to make them believe that they will always remain beginners in Christianity, because, forsooth, they are unwilling to castigate their bodies with some uncommonly hard discipline, to join some peculiar party, and to receive some uncommonly high and profound wisdom of which that party, without any warrant of Holy Writ, makes boast, cf. Gal. v. 10; i. 8. 9; 2 Pet. iii. 17. 18." Roos.

STARKE.—Believers stand ever in need both of instruction and exhortation to constancy under the cross in the course of Christianity, Prov. ix. 9.—Many a one may imagine himself to stand in grace, though he is under wrath and losing his hope. How much depends upon one's being found in the true grace of God, and of being vitally assured thereof both inwardly and outwardly, 2 Tim. iii. 5.—It was a custom of long duration that each sex, male and female separately, kissed, Lks. vii. 45. 46. Peace and Christ, the Prince of Peace, go together.—Whoso desireth peace, must be in Christ. Whoso is in Him has true peace with all the blessings of salvation forever and ever, Jno. xvi. 33.

LISCO:—Do you stand in the grace of God?

[LEIGHTON:—To testify the true grace of God—the end of our preaching.—M.]

[NEANDER:—“The fraternal kiss with which every one, after being baptized, was received into the community, by the Christians into whose immediate fellowship he entered—which the members bestowed on each other just before the celebration of the Communion, and with which every Christian saluted his brother, though he never saw him before—was not an empty form, but the expression of Christian feelings, a token of the relation in which Christians conceived themselves to stand to each other. It was this, indeed, which, in a cold and selfish age, struck the Pagans with wonder: to behold men of different countries, ranks, stages of culture, so intimately bound together; to see the stranger who came into a city, and by his letter of recognition (his Epistola formata) made himself known to the Christians of the place as a brother beyond suspicion, finding at once among them to whom he was personally unknown all manner of brotherly sympathy and protection.”—M.]

THE

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. OBJECT OF THE EPISTLE.

THIS Epistle is designed to be a hortatory memorial addressed to believers, standing and already established in the truth, as appears plainly from ch. i. 12. 15. The first Epistle deals with warnings against dangers and enemies from without; the second warns Christians against the more dangerous enemies from within, and exhorts them to vigilance and resistance to the deceivers and scoffers, who had gradually crept into the Christian churches. "Beware, lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own stedfastness," (ch. iii. 17).—"Use with all diligence the received gifts of grace to the furthering of your holiness," ch. i. 3, etc. The rich contents of the Epistle concentrate in this exhortation. The motives to a holy life are chiefly taken from the consideration of the nearness of the coming of Christ and the catastrophes connected with that event, ch. iii. 11, etc. The deceivers against whom Peter warns his readers, are described not so much intellectually as morally. They are men of the Sadducee cast of mind, libertines, antinomists, living in uncleanness, unrighteousness and covetousness, according to the promptings of their own lusts, ch. ii. 10. 3. 14, some of whom scoffed at the truth, and particularly at the coming of Christ, ch. iii. 3. 4, etc. They used great swelling words of vanity, spoke evil of dignities and the celestial powers, and derided the Lord that bought them, ch. ii. 1. 18. 10. Their wisdom consisted in lying, blaspheming, and the promise of unbridled licence, ch. ii. 19. Here we may discern the roots of the antinomistic Gnosis, which afterwards was maintained by Carpocrates, Epiphanes, Prodicus, the Simonians, the Antitactes, and others. Similar errors are referred to by Paul, 1 Tim. iv. 1; vi. 20; 2 Tim. iii. 1, etc.; cf. Rev. ii. 14. 15. 20. The author predicts their appearance, and prophetically sees them already extant, ch. ii. 1, etc.; 10, etc. Their false knowledge is opposed by the vital knowledge of Christ, on which great stress is laid in this Epistle, ch. i. 2. 3. 8; ii. 20.

§ 2. CONTENTS AND ANALYSIS OF THE EPISTLE.

The Epistle consists of two parts: the first, ch. i. 1-21; the second, from ch. ii. 1-iii. 18. Each of these parts are again divided into two sections. In the first section of the first part, ch. i. 2-11, the Apostle reminds his readers of the great and precious riches and promises which had been vouchsafed to them on the part of God, and exhorts them on their part to comply with the demand of the Divine Will, and to make their calling and election sure. In the second section, ch. i. 12-21, he specifies the motive which then constrained him to exhort them, viz., the nearness of his decease; he then, v. 16, etc., confirms the truth of the doctrine in which they had been instructed: 1. By the fact that he and all the Apostles had been eye-witnesses of the works of Jesus; 2. By the testimony of prophecy. In the first section of the second part, he announces the speedy appearance of false prophets, gives a brief sketch of their character and conduct, and adverts, by way of warning, to three examples, to show that their wickedness would surely be punished, ch. ii. 1-10, the examples being, the case of the fallen angels, the case of those who perished in the waters of the flood, and the case of Sodom and Gomorrah. Then follows the more specific description of their thorough carnality, their presumptuousness, their spirit of rebellion and blasphemy, their brutal want of reason, their licentiousness, their perseverance in evil, their covetousness, their seductive arts, their vaunting with all their nothingness and emptiness, their perverseness, obduracy and perdition, v. 10-22. The fiery flow of prophetic utterance having found a point of rest, the Apostle, in the second section, resumes at ch. i. 15, states the design of his writing still more clearly than in ch. i. 15, to be the stirring up of their pure minds. He refers to a still more dangerous class of enemies of Christ, to mockers, who scoff at the coming of Christ and the events connected with it, and who in their Epicurean bias are on a level with the former, ch. iii. 1-5. He then refutes the vain reason they assign for their denial of the coming of Christ, by the fact of the flood (v. 5-7), followed by the instruction given to believers, that the heavens and the earth will be destroyed by fire in a fearful catastrophe, and that the apparent delay of judgment should be considered as an act of the long-suffering of God, v. 7-10. Then follows, for the edification of believers, the announcement of the Lord's coming, and of the mighty events connected with it, especially the establishment of new heavens and a new earth. With this is connected an earnest exhortation to holiness of life, v. 10-15. He strengthens the weight of his exhortations by a reference to the Epistles of Paul, with whom he professes himself thoroughly to agree, while those destroyers of the peace of the Churches probably maintained that Peter and Paul were at variance with each other, v. 15. 16. In conclusion, he exhorts them not to suffer themselves to be moved from their steadfastness by the error of wicked men, but to grow in grace and the knowledge of Jesus Christ, as a chief means for the conservation of the faith. Lastly, a doxology to Christ.

§ 3. GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLE.

The authenticity of no writing of the New Testament has been so much denied and doubted in ancient and modern times, as that of this Epistle. Modern critics consider it proven, that a pseudo-Peter of a later period clumsily manufactured this Epistle from that of Jude. Misled by their confident assertions, even circumspect investigators have here and there assented to this result.

Beginning with the external testimonies of this Epistle, we have the fact that it was ecclesiastically acknowledged as part of the Canon in the fourth century, (Guerike, Gesamtgeschichte des Neuen Testaments, p. 477. 615). Going backwards from this fixed point of time, we find that Jerome considered it genuine, observing, however, that it was generally held to be spurious on account of the difference of its style from the First. Eusebius, it is well known, reckons it among the Antilegomena, describes it as not included in the then received Canon of the Church, although many considered it profitable, and used it along with the other Scriptures. Origen says: Peter has left an Epistle which is universally acknowledged; perhaps (ἴστω δὲ) also a second, for it is doubted—one is not agreed about it. He cites, however, the second Epistle as part of the Holy Scriptures in several passages, cf. Dietlein, p. 61, etc. The Syriac version, the Peshito, which originated at the latest in the third century, does not contain it; it is not known on what grounds. It is also wanting in the Muratorian Canon, which however does not mention the first Epistle and other Epistles of the New Testament. Tertullian and Cyprian do not mention it; Eusebius states that Clement of Alexandria wrote a commentary on it and other Antilegomena. Justin and Irenæus probably allude to 2 Peter iii. 8; the latter also to 2 Peter ii. 4-6, and the former also to 2 Peter ii. 1. Theophilus of Antioch seems to refer to 2 Peter i. 19. 21; iii. 3. The Epistle of Hermas, about the middle of the second century, contains almost undeniable references to 2 Pet. ii. 15. 20. 22; iii. 3; i. 5-8. In Barnabas, whose Epistle perhaps reaches down to the end of the first century, Dietlein perceives several allusions, the clearest of which is that to 2 Peter iii. 8, which is however not certain, because this saying occurs also in the Mishnah. In Clement of Rome, Dietlein discovers massive proofs, by which this author testifies in favour of our Epistle even before the destruction of Jerusalem. A certain affinity of language cannot be denied, but the citations of Dietlein, among which the expression of ἡ μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα is the most weighty, will hardly do more than carry conviction to the minds of those who are already sure of the genuineness of the Epistle. The same applies to the Epistle of Polycarp. Huther justly maintains that not a single sentence is cited literally from 2 Peter, as is the case with 1 Peter. Nor can Ignatius be proved to be dependent on 2 Peter, although there are several distant allusions. It follows, from the preceding data, that the Epistle was used about the middle of the second century; that the earliest fathers cannot be proved to have used it; that it gave rise to doubts in the third century, which however arose on internal grounds; and that its genuineness was established by the Church at the end of the fourth century. The supposition of Thiersch is altogether inadequate, that fears were entertained that too early a disclosure of the whole form of the evil, as given in the thunder-words of Peter, might have exerted a soliciting influence on the evil, and even on its manifestation in that time, which was shaken to all the depths of the spiritual world (that is, the time when the Canon of the Homologoumena was fixed). Now, since no certain result can be arrived at from external evidence, which however rather favours than disfavours the genuineness of our Epistle, we are so much the more dependent,

Secondly, on internal evidence, under which head we have to offer the following remarks:

1. We encounter in the Epistle a person concerning whom we feel that he stands in the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ, that he loves truth above all things, ch. i. 8; iii. 18; i. 12; that he has received the forgiveness of sins, and along with it, a Divine vital energy, ch. i. 9. 10. 2; that he is thoroughly in earnest about Christianity, ch. i. 5, etc.; iii. 14. 17; that he has personal intercourse with Christ Jesus, ch. i. 14; that he looks steadfastly at His coming, and hastens to meet the coming of His day, ch. iii. 12; that he fears the judgments of eternity, ch. ii. 1, etc., and is penetrated with the sense of the superintending justice of God, ch. ii. 9; that he cultivates with all diligence a holy conversation and a godly life, and feels constrained to oppose fine-spun fables with the severity of truth, ch. ii. 16. This spirit, thus enlightened and animated with the earnestness of Christianity, calls himself Simon Peter, a Servant and an Apostle of Jesus Christ, ch. i. 1; iii. 2; he speaks in the spirit of prophecy, ch. ii. 1, etc.; iii. 8; he specifies details of his life, that he had been an eye-witness of Christ's transfiguration on the holy mount, ch. i. 16, etc., that Jesus had revealed to him the nearness of His death, ch. i. 14; he describes himself as the brother and colleague of the Apostle Paul, with whose Epistles he professes fully to agree, ch. iii. 15. 16, and considers it his duty to remind, strengthen and stir up the believers to whom he writes, ch. i. 12, etc.; iii. 1. 2. His doctrines, exhortations, confessions, testimonies and warnings are full of power and fire, full of firm assurance and glowing zeal for the honour of the Lord, full of emphasis and originality. If Peter is really the author of this Epistle, every thing is in glorious harmony; if he is not, we have before us an insoluble psychological riddle. Is it possible, we are constrained to ask, that a man, animated through and through with the spirit of Christianity, who expressly renounces all cunning fabrications, should have set up for the Apostle Peter, and have written this Epistle in his name? Intentional fraud and such illumination—who is able to reconcile them?

2. If, as many critics superficially assume, a deceiver did father this Epistle upon Peter, he must have done so with some evil intention. But where is there any thing in this Epistle that could possibly be construed into an error, or a moral impurity? On the supposition that the object was the mediation between the Apostles of the Jews and the Apostles of the Gentiles, the alleged antithesis unfortunately resolves itself into a fiction (see a citation from Clement of Rome, in Dietlein, p. 30. 31), and the contents of the Epistle, in that case, ought to be very different from what they are. An otherwise honest man would not have ventured to place the name of the Apostle at the head of his writing for the purpose of attacking false teachers (Olshausen, Nachweis der Echtheit, etc., p. 124).

3. A forger would not have omitted to designate with greater precision the readers for whom the Epistle was written, while the author with the utmost ingenuousness addresses those who have obtained the like precious faith, and expects to meet the same class of readers as in the first Epistle.

4. The second Epistle is an integrant part of the first, which deals with external enemies, while the second Epistle cautions against internal adversaries of the truth. The two cannot well be separated from each other.

5. The doctrinal contents of the second Epistle essentially agree with the first in the conception of Christianity as the fulfilment of Old Testament prophecy, ch. i. 19-21, and in the promise given to the coming of Christ, as we have seen in the Apostle of hope in the first Epistle, ch. iii. 10, etc. The second Epistle is not inferior to the first in spirit, power, vivacity and glowing zeal against evil, in originality and wealth of thought, and no production of the second century can compare with it in this respect. Compare the Shepherd of Hermas with the second Epistle of Peter—what a contrast! How beautiful, in particular, is the opening of the Epistle, which introduces us at once into the whole plenitude of evangelical grace! The mode of representation in the two Epistles exhibits also many points of agreement, e. g., the connection of sentences by means of participles and the choice of particular expressions. Thus, Guerike mentions the words ἀναστροφή, 1 Peter i. 15. 18; ii. 12; iii. 1. 2. 16; cf. 2 Peter ii. 7; iii. 11.—ἀπόθεω, 1 Peter iii. 21; cf. 2 Peter i. 14.—ἀρετή, 1 Peter ii. 9; cf. 2 Peter i. 3.—ἐλθέτω, in a peculiar sense, 1 Peter i. 22; cf. 2 Peter i. 12.—κομίζεσθαι, 1 Peter i. 9; v. 4; cf. 2 Peter ii. 13.—ἐποπτεύειν, 1 Peter ii. 12; iii. 2; cf. 2 Peter i. 16.—δοσιλος and ἀμωμος, 1 Peter i. 19; cf. 2 Peter iii. 14.—On πᾶσαν μαρτίαν, cf. 1 Peter iv. 1; cf. 2 Peter ii. 12.

6. The Epistle, if written by Peter, admirably fits in the history of the development of the Christian Church. This has been well brought out by Thiersch, who says: "Supposing the Epistle were not the production of Peter, it cannot, because of the sum-total of its contents, belong to any other period of history than to that of that great catastrophe, the mighty breaking forth of an unparalleled wicked Gentile Gnosis, which was posterior to the ministry of Paul, and anterior to that of John."

7. The objections raised on internal grounds against the Epistle, are not of great moment.

a. It is alleged that ἐλπίς is the leading idea of the first Epistle, while ἐπιγνώσις predominates in the latter. This is the natural consequence of the different tendencies of the two Epistles. Is it probable that both would move in the same fundamental ideas?

b. That the day of Christ's coming is expected in the first as about to take place immediately, while the author of the second Epistle adverts not so much to its nearness as to its suddenness. This may be accounted for by the comparatively early date of the composition of the first Epistle. See Introduction to 1 Peter.

c. That the idea of Christ's advent in the second Epistle is altogether kept in the back-ground of that of the final destruction of the world. This is quite correct, according to ch. iii. 10, and the second Epistle completes in this respect the discourses of the first.

d. That in the first Epistle the redemptive acts of the death and resurrection of Christ are described as the groundwork of the Christian life, whereas they are not mentioned in the second. Evidently because the caution against seducers is the tendency of the second Epistle, which presupposes those redemptive acts.

e. That the ideas of communion with the Divine nature, of the origin of the world out of water, and that of its destruction by fire, are peculiar to the second Epistle. But there is no reason why there should not be ideas peculiar to this Epistle.

f. That faith in the second Epistle stands in the back-ground, and knowledge in the foreground. This is the necessary adjunct of the controversy with the adherents of the false Gnosis, and said ἐπιγνώσις does not differ materially from πίστις.

g. De Wette says, that Κύριος is applied, ch. iii. 10, to God. But this is also occasionally the case in the first Epistle, 1 Peter iii. 12. 15.

h. That the heretical denial of the coming of Christ, and the view of the origin and destruction of the world, are surprising and, as Neander thinks, not in keeping with the practical, simple mind of Peter and the doctrinal development of the New Testament. But even Huther is constrained to pronounce this a purely subjective opinion.

i. The diversity of style in the two Epistles, which were already alleged in ancient times are not very important and counterbalanced by the aforementioned, obvious coincidences of language. Even if they were greater than they are, we might assume, with Jerome, that Peter used different amanuenses in the composition of the two Epistles. See Olshausen, p. 118.

k. That 2 Peter iii. 15, seems to assume that a collection of the Epistles of St. Paul was already circulating in the Church. But the reference here is not to a complete collection of his writings.

l. Neander raises the doubt, that the author assumes a different relation to his readers, in the second Epistle, from that which existed between them in the first, for according to the second Epistle they must have been personally instructed by the Apostle; but in the interval between the dates of the two Epistles, a closer personal relation between them may easily have sprung up.

Thus all these objections and doubts are not sufficiently weighty to upset the above argument for the genuineness of the Epistle.

[A very excellent digest of this section, with full citations of the authorities, may be seen in Alford's Prolegomena, Vol. IV., Part I.—M.]

§ 4. RELATION OF THIS EPISTLE TO THAT OF JUDE.

The second chapter of the present Epistle to the beginning of the third chapter, and the Epistle of Jude, exhibit so remarkable an agreement, that the dependence of the one Epistle on the other is undeniable, cf. Jude 4. 6–13. 16, with 2 Peter ii. 1. 4. 6. 10–13. 15. 17. 18; Jude 17. 18, with 2 Peter iii. 2. 3. The view which makes the Epistle of Jude the original that was used by the author of the second Epistle of Peter, stated by Herder, has become dominant in modern times. This is the view of De Wette, Guericke, Huther and Kurz, who allege that the language of Jude is more simple than that in 2 Peter, and that many passages in the latter cannot be thoroughly understood without the light derived from the Epistle of Jude. But that assumption is opposed on weighty grounds, by Hofmann (Weissagung und Erfüllung), Thiersch, Stier and Dietlein. It is rightly contended, that at the time of the composition of the Epistle of Jude, the false teachers had already appeared, whereas in the second Epistle of Peter their appearance is simply predicted, ch. ii. 1, etc.; and that the second Epistle of Peter is free from the apparently apocryphal elements contained in that of Jude. Dietlein attempts to prove the originality of the second Epistle of Peter in every respective passage; and although he has not always succeeded, we can hardly withhold our assent in some passages. Those who, like ourselves, are profoundly impressed with the authenticity of the second Epistle of Peter, deem it a priori highly improbable that Peter, the Prince of Apostles,—that illumined and highly-gifted man, who proves his originality in the first Epistle as well as in 2 Peter i. and iii.,—should have borrowed, in a part of his Epistle, the language, figures and examples of a man evidently less gifted than himself. Especially remarkable, moreover, would be his silence concerning Jude, seeing that he made mention of Paul and his Epistles. If we add to this the fact that the second Epistle is rich in peculiar expressions, that the three chapters contain more than twenty ἀπὸ λέγουμενα, that the Epistle of Jude expressly refers to the words of the Apostles, v. 17, and specifies that it was quickly composed to meet a particular emergency, v. 3, the hypothesis that Jude made use of the second Epistle of Peter, is more probable than that Peter made use of the Epistle of Jude. We call particular attention to the word ἐμπαισσει, Jude 18; cf. 2 Peter iii. 3, which does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament.

[Those who wish to study this question in all its bearings, are referred to Brückner's Excursus on 2 Peter ii., in his edition of De Wette's Handbuch, Vol. I., Part III., pp. 163–170, who maintains the priority of St. Jude and St. Peter's acquaintance with his Epistle, but vindicates the independence of the latter; to Huther's Appendix to his Commentary on the Epistle, Davidson, Introduction, etc., Vol. III., pp. 399–408. Alford, in his Prolegomena to this Epistle, Section 3, pronounces for the priority of St. Jude. Wordsworth reaches the opposite conclusion, which is also the opinion of Oecumenius, Estius, Mill, Benson, Witsius, Dodwell, Lenfant, Beausobre, Hengstenberg and Heydenreich, besides the authors named by Fronmüller. For convenience' sake, I have given the most important parallel passages in the Introduction to St. Jude's Epistle, to which the reader is referred.—M.]

§ 5. DATE OF THE EPISTLE.

Mayerhoff undertakes to prove that it was composed by a Jewish Christian at Alexandria, about the middle of the second century. Schwegler considers the end of the second century to be the earliest date of its origin. Huther ascribes it to the beginning of the second century. This disagreement among critics entirely ignores, first, that the intellectual strength which characterizes this Epistle, is not found elsewhere in the second century; and secondly, that the appearance of the seducers, against whom this Epistle is directed, coincides, according to the notices found in the Pastoral Epistles of St. Paul and in the Revelation of St. John, with the very period to which the Epistle, which must have been written shortly before his death, introduces us. "At the beginning of the second period of the Apostolical age, the Gentile Gnostic apostacy broke out with gigantic energy in the Churches of Asia. Paul had finished his work, but Peter was still destined to raise his warning voice before the end of his life." Thiersch.

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER I. 1-11.

ANALYSIS:—The brotherly salutation and prayer of blessing (v. 1. 2) are followed by the exhortation: Forasmuch as God richly furnishes you with whatever is necessary for your spiritual life, do ye also furnish whatever is agreeable to His will; then the entrance to His kingdom shall be opened to you.

- 1 Simon<sup>1</sup> Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us through<sup>2</sup> the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus
2 Christ: Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and
3 of Jesus<sup>3</sup> our Lord, According as his divine power hath given unto us all things<sup>4</sup> that 4 pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to 5 glory and virtue.<sup>5</sup> Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious<sup>6</sup> promises; that by these ye might be partakers<sup>7</sup> of the divine nature, having escaped<sup>8</sup> the 6 corruption that is in the world through lust. And besides this,<sup>9</sup> giving all diligence, 7 add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; And to knowledge, temperance;
8 and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; And to godliness, brotherly 9 kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity. For if these things be in you,<sup>10</sup> and 10 abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge 11 of our Lord Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot 12 see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins.<sup>11</sup> Wherefore 13 the rather, brethren, give diligence<sup>12</sup> to make<sup>13</sup> your calling<sup>14</sup> and election sure: for 14 if ye do these things, ye shall never fall: For so an entrance<sup>15</sup> shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. Simon Peter.—The opening of the first Epistle has only Peter. It seems that he uniformly bore the name of Simon only while he continued to accompany Jesus till after His ascension; at least Jesus always called him Simon, Matt. xvii. 25; Mark xiv. 37; Luke xxii. 31; John xxi. 15, 16, 17. The disciples also appear to have called him Simon, Luke xxiv. 34; Acts xv. 14. Afterwards they began to distinguish him from others of the same name by the honourable surname Peter, Acts x. 5, 18. The Evangelists call him more frequently Peter than Simon Peter; in the Pauline Epistles Peter is already the constant form; in the Gospels the two names are sometimes used alternately, John xiii. 36, 37; cf. Matt. iv. 18; x. 2; xvi. 16; xvii. 25.—It is improbable that the conjoining of both names denotes on the part of Peter the design of describing merely his natural and his new birth. There is more probability in Besser's suggestion, "that the full name, Simon Peter, has a kind of testamentary form," for he was near his life's end.

[Simon, or rather Simeon, Συμεών, Σίμων, cf. Acts xv. 14. The Aramaic form of Simon seems to favour the view, that this Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians. Alford remarks, that the occurrence of this form is at all events a testimony in favour of the independence of the second Epistle. It was not adapted to the first: which, considering that it refers to the first, is a note, however slight, on the side of its genuineness.—M.]

A Servant and Apostle of Jesus Christ.—The same designation is used by St. Paul, Rom. i. 1; Titus i. 1; and St. James also calls himself a servant of Christ, one of the highest titles of honour, ch. i. 1; cf. Gal. i. 10. The former denotes his relation of dependence; the latter, the dignity of his office.

To them that have obtained like precious faith with us: τοῖς λαχοῦσι sc. χάρις λέγει, λαγχάνω—I obtain by lot, by fortune, by Divine appointment, or by inheritance, cf. Luke i. 9; John xix. 24; Acts i. 17. The word excludes all personal agency and merit.—Faith may here be taken objectively or subjectively, either as a cycle of truths believed, or as a definite disposition of faith; the former agrees better with λαχάω and ἰσότης, and accords with παρόση ἀληθεία, v. 12, cf. Jude 8. Every faith and every construction of the truths of faith are not of equal value; there are inadequate and adequate, light and weighty representations of the Divine truths. But Peter here assures his readers that the faith, which in the dispensation of God was communicated to them, is equal in value and weight to that confessed by him and the other Apostles, cf. Acts xi. 17; xv. 9, 11. The consideration of these passages seems to convey the idea that Peter is here addressing Gentile Christians.—ἡμῖν, elliptically for τῇ ἡμῶν πίστει, Winer, 6 ed., p. 645, equal in value to our faith. [Hornejus: "Dicitur fides æque pretiosa, non quod omnium credentium æque magna sit, sed quod per fidem illam eadem mysteria et eadem beneficia divina nobis proponantur." The references to Acts are hardly necessary; whoever they were, Jewish or Gentile Christians, their faith, says Peter, is equally precious in the sight of God with his (Peter's) faith and that of the other Apostles.—M.]

In the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.—This clause also favours the objective construction of faith. Its centre and foundation are in the righteousness of God. Gerlach and Dietlein maintain that "our God and Saviour Jesus Christ" are here intimately connected, so that Jesus is called God. But seeing that the Petrine doctrine calls Jesus Lord, but in no other place except this, God, the former is more correctly applied to the Father. But what is the righteousness of God and that of the Saviour? We must here distinguish two subjects. So Huther, δικαιοσύνη derived by Aristotle from δίχα, διχάζειν, to divide in two equal parts, to appoint to each his own. δικαίος, one who sustains a right relation to others, who is just what he ought to be. צִדִּיק applied to the judge or king who protects and administers justice, hence frequently used of the judicial acts of God as evidenced in the salvation and reward of the godly, and in the punishment of the ungodly. This is often expressed by the terms צִדְקָה, צִדִּיק, which sometimes denote truth and goodness. Here it is clearly not to be taken, as in Rom. i. 17, in the sense of righteousness which comes from God and is valid before Him, i. e., imputed righteousness; this, to say nothing of its being an essentially Pauline idea, is impossible on account of the following καὶ σωτήριος. It is rather to be taken as an attribute of God, as it occurs in Rom. iii. 25, 26, descriptive of the judicial activity of God. The manner how Peter understood its manifestation in the centre of our faith, viz., in the work of redemption, is not further indicated in our passage. But we may doubtless infer from ch. ii. 1, where the term "to buy" is used, that his conception is the same as in Rom. iii. 25, that Jesus satisfied the justice of God, which demands the death of the sinner, by paying a sufficient ransom for all mankind. This required Jesus to be perfectly sinless and holy. This is the δικαιοσύνη σωτήριος; so that the word bears a double sense, applicable to the righteousness of God and to the holiness of Jesus. That our passage is closely connected with the doctrine of Paul, seems almost unmistakable, and is not surprising in consideration of the passage ch. iii. 15. Huther takes δικαιοσύνη=the conduct corresponding to His holiness, which makes no difference between the one party and the other; de Wette incorrectly=grace and love. [Winer, p. 142, has fully shown that τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ σωτήριος I. X. may be grammatically rendered "of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ"; Bp. Middleton, p. 595, also asserts that "this passage is plainly and unequivocally to be understood as an assumption that Jesus Christ is our God and Saviour." The ostensible design of the Epistle to refute the errors of those who separated Jesus from Christ, and denied the Lord that bought them, and rejected the doctrine of His divinity, supports this construction. See more in Wordsworth.—M.]

VER. 2 contains the salutation of blessing, as 1 Pet. i. 1; but further specified by ἐν ἐκκλήσει, a stronger expression than the simple ἐν χάριτι, and of frequent occurrence in this Epistle, vv. 3, 8; ch. ii. 20. Paul often uses it, especially in the Epistle to the Colossians, ch. i. 9, 10; ii. 2; iii. 10; also Rom. i. 28; iii. 20; x. 3; Eph. i. 17; iv. 18; Phil. i. 9; 1 Tim. ii. 4; vi. 20; Tit. i. 1; Phil. 6; Heb. x. 26.—It deserves to be particularly noticed because of the tendency to false gnosis, which was then beginning to appear. The word denotes acknowledgment, a knowledge which enters into an object and takes affectionate cognizance thereof; which is not satisfied with a merely outward relation to it, but seeks to enter into and to lay hold of that object. The verb is also found in the Gospels; e. g., Matt. vii. 16; xi. 27; xiv. 35; Mk. ii. 8; Luke i. 4. Ca-

lov defines it correctly as "practical, confiding knowledge=faith." He adds, that it contains a gentle caution against their forfeiting grace and peace by sins against their conscience or by apostasy. The gifts of God presuppose not only a vessel to receive them, but an advance on our part. ἐν ἐκκλήσει, it is the medium and vehicle of the multiplication of grace. τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Ἰησοῦ; Ἰησοῦ does not require the Article, because the Father and the Son are one in Essence.

VER. 3. Here begins the Epistle proper, which, as Roos observes, may be compared to a stream which is wide and deep at its very source. In this it resembles the first Epistle. Vv. 3, 4, show what God does for believers, vv. 5-8, what they are expected to do. Gerlach: "The beginning of the Epistle is peculiarly full of fire and life, and translates us forthwith into the whole plenitude of Gospel grace."

Forasmuch as His Divine power hath given us all things; ὥς—δεδορημένης. Grotius connects ὥς with the preceding, and explains that he did not value that knowledge so highly for nothing, forasmuch as it is the means whereby the Divine Power communicates all things to us; but it is better to connect ὥς with Calov with what follows. ὥς is not pleonastic, but denotes here, as frequently elsewhere, a well founded assurance; so De Wette, Dietlein, Huther. One might therefore translate: "Assured that the Divine Power has given us all things, strive," cf. 1 Cor. iv. 18; Acts xxvii. 30; Winer, p. 639.—δεδορημένης, from the Middle δαπτομαι, not as if the perf. passivi were used instead of the perf. activi. Winer, p. 277. So LXX. Gen. xxx. 20. αὐτοῦ refers both to Θεοῦ and Ἰησοῦ.

His Divine Power.—The Holy Ghost is not any more referred to here than in Eph. i. 19, although the Holy Ghost is described as "power from on high," Lke. xxiv. 49; cf. Acts i. 5, and He is usually the medium whereby God bestows grace. Which are (necessary) for the (true spiritual) life, which is planted through regeneration, for the life emanating from God, and for the evidences of the same, for the exhibition of godliness. Gerlach: "The Divine Power has given us all things necessary for regeneration and holiness, so that the Christian has no excuse." Bengel: "Look, it is not only by piety that we attain life, the Divine glory brings life, the Divine power godliness, to the one is opposed destruction, to the other lust (v. 4)."

Through the knowledge of Him that called us.—Here, as in v. 2, believing knowledge is the medium of the attainment of the Divine communications of life.

That called us, cf. 1 Pet. ii. 9; i. 15; 2 Pet. i. 10. The calling of God is the temporal fulfilment of the pra-temporal [eternal—M.] act of election. The end of the calling is not indicated here; where it is not mentioned, as in 1 Pet. ii. 21; iii. 9, we may supply it, as importing eternal salvation and glory, 1 Pet. 5. 10; cf. 1 Thess. ii. 12; 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim. i. 9; Heb. ix. 15.

By His glory and virtue.—διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀρετῆς. [The reading ἰδίᾳ δόξῃ καὶ ἀρετῇ given in Appar. Crit., which see, is the most authentic. ἰδιος=suus is peculiar to Peter; cf. ii. 22; iii. 8. 16. 17; 1 Pet. iii. 1. 5. Athanasius, Dialog. de

Trin. i. 164, cites this passage as from "The Catholic Epistles."—M.] Peter, who often uses the word glory, connects it elsewhere with κράτος, 1 Pet. iv. 11; v. 11, here with ἀρετή. So Paul also praises the glory of the grace of God, Eph. i. 6; cf. Acts vii. 2; Rom. i. 23; ii. 7; v. 2; ix. 4; xv. 7; 1 Cor. ii. 8; 2 Cor. iii. 18; viii. 23; Phil. i. 11; Col. i. 11. On glory see the note on 1 Pet. i. 7. δὲ ὧν shows that δόξα and ἀρετή must not be reduced to one idea and rendered "glorious power." Respect being had to the above mentioned connection, and to the derivation of ἀρετή (from ἀνὴρ or ἀρεῖα, like virtus from vir), which denotes primarily manhood, strength, valour, we cannot, with Bengel, refer ἀρετή to the moral attributes of God, but rather adopt the exposition of Roos, that "God calls us by means of a glorious, great, rich and wonderful grace, which is worthy of His Divine Name, and by a mighty energy, because His call is powerful and also a drawing, which renders our coming to Christ possible, Jno. vi. 44; cf. 1 Pet. ii. 9."—δόξα; connect with the brightness with which God shines in the hearts of those whom He awakens, 2 Cor. iv. 6. Others refer δόξα and ἀρετή to the manifestation of the glory and moral perfection of God in the Person of Christ. Jno. i. 14; Acts ii. 22; x. 38. Huther refers δόξα to His Being, ἀρετή to His acts.

VER. 4. Through which He hath given unto us the greatest and (most) precious promises.—Through which, i. e., His glory and Divine power.—ἐπαγγέλματα properly, promises, which, although they are gifts per se, are the more precious because their bestowal involves also the bestowal of part of the promised riches. Thus we read in Acts ii. 38, "having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost," i. e., the Holy Ghost who had been promised. Hence Gerhard understands it of the promised riches themselves, i. e., redemption and atonement, adoption, union with God, the gift of righteousness and eternal life. Only it should be remembered that these are likewise the earnest of still greater riches to come.—δεδώρηται, again Middle, to be joined with καλέσας.

That by means of these ye might become partakers of the Divine nature.—It is incorrect to construe with Roos and al.: "The sum-total of what is contained in the great and precious promises of God, is that we may become partakers of the Divine nature." ἵνα rather intimates that the reference is to the end contemplated in those glorious attributes and promises of God.—διὰ τούτων refers both to δόξα and ἀρετή and to ἐπαγγέλματα. [But it is doubtful whether there is such a double reference; τούτων seems to point to ἐπαγγέλματα as the nearest noun. See Winer, p. 170. ἵνα is telic, and the end proposed in these promises is their becoming partakers of the Divine nature.—M.]

Partakers of the Divine nature; φύσις, the Being, the Essence proper, cf. Rom. xi. 24; Eph. ii. 8; Jas. iii. 7, from φύσις, as it is with God from all eternity, and comprises all His perfections. "What is the Divine nature?" asks Luther. "Eternal truth, righteousness, eternal life, peace, joy, delight, and whatsoever good may be named. Hence he, who becomes a partaker of the Divine nature, is wise, righteous and omnipotent against the devil, sin and death." Calvin aptly compares the incarnation of Christ. As His human nature partook of the Divine, so believers are to become partakers of the Divine nature.—The reference, consequently, is not only to a moral resemblance, to an ideal communion, but to a veritable communion of being, which begins here below in our regeneration, 1 Jno. i. 3, but will be consummated hereafter. Cf. Rom. viii. 29; Jno. xvii. 21. This involves the glorification of the body, Phil. iii. 21, seeing God and sharing in His glory, 1 Cor. xiii. 12, and increasing resemblance to Him, 1 Jno. iii. 2. "When He shall appear we shall resemble (ὁμοιοῦν) Him." "This does not mean that the partakers of the Divine nature shall be exactly like (i. e., equal to) God. God reserves to Himself His Person, although He shares with us His nature. As the sun reflects his image in a clear lake or a dew-drop and yet remains the sun, so also does God remain as He was and as He is, although He has made men partakers of His nature." Zeller's Biblisches Wörterbuch. [Origen, in Levit. Hom. 4, cites this passage as from a genuine writing of Peter, also Athanasius, c. Arian. Orat. 2. 1. 138. Wordsworth.—M.]

Having escaped from the corruption, etc.—ἀποφυγόντες, not in a preceptive sense, as Calov takes it, "only ye shall escape," for it is immediately connected with the preceding clause and not with the following Imperative: it rather means after, on the supposition that, ye have escaped. The Aorist, which denotes an action merely as a past event (Winer, pp. 290. 291) forbids the rendering, "if ye escape forthwith." Bengel: "There is an antithesis between partakers and escaping, and also between Divine nature and corruption in lust. This escaping denotes not so much our duty as a Divine benefit which accompanies the communion with God."

τὴν σάρκα (cf. Rom. viii. 21; Gal. vi. 8; Col. ii. 22; 2 Pet. ii. 12. 19) not Active, but Passive, not only moral, but physical corruption. Here we meet again the antithesis between the perishable and the imperishable which is deeply rooted in the Apostle's soul. Cf. 1 Pet. i. 4. 7. 18. 23-25; 2 Pet. iii. 10, etc.—Corruption reigns in the world and penetrates it in all its parts; its source and strength lie in the anti-divine lust which excites the wrath of God and ruins human nature, in soul and body. Cf. Eph. iv. 22. Roos: "There lies a corruption in the lusts common to the world. The old man through lusts corrupts himself in error, so that he grows worse and worse. The carnal lusts war against the soul, which thereby is increasingly enfeebled and darkened. It grows in wickedness, becomes more like the devil, and inclines to hell. Through many of these lusts the naturally good condition of the body also is ruined." [Calvin: "Hanc non in elementis quas nos circumstant, sed in corde nostro esse ostendit, quia illic regnant vitiis et pravi affectus, quorum fontem vel radicem voce concupiscentias notat. Ergo ita locatur in munda corruptio, ut scimus in nobis esse mundum."—M.]

VER. 5. But for this very reason—knowledge.—καὶ αὐτὸ τοῦτο διὲς begins the apodosis. αὐτὸ τοῦτο used adverbially, it is just therefore—wherefore I exhort you, it is for this very reason, on this very account, see Winer, p. 156.—καὶ as God does His part, so do ye yours. δὲ is added, because the positive side of their escape is now made prominent. [τοῦτο δὲ σπ. παρεισενέγκαντες stands parallel to ὡς πάντα . . δεδωρημένης, etc., and v. 4 is an explanatory relative clause to the words διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀρετῆς, so Winer.—M.]

All diligence.—Cf. vv. 10. 15; iii. 14. A very comprehensive term. Use with all earnestness the energies of faith which have been bestowed upon you for your holiness.—Luther:—"Ye have a goodly heritage and a good field, take care that you suffer no thistles and weeds to grow in it."—παρεισενέγκαντες (ἀπαξ λεγ.) denotes bringing in something along with one, quietly and without ostentatious display.—ἐπιχορηγεῖν, a word peculiar to Paul, 2 Cor. ix. 10; Gal. iii. 5; Col. ii. 19, to furnish, supply. Generally the reference to the chorus is entirely ignored. The word is often used of expenses that are incurred, and denotes here that we must be prepared to incur expenses in order to furnish this garland of virtues. The furnishing on our part corresponds to the furnishing on God's part, v. 10. "The gifts of God are followed by our diligence, our diligence is followed by the entrance into the kingdom." Dietlein gives the ungrammatical reading: "leads in the dance."—ἐν τῇ πίστει. Faith, which leads the chorus, identical with the practical knowledge of vv. 2, 3, is the root of those virtues, love, its crown, ends it. Augustine: "Faith is the root and mother of all virtues." It appears here as a gift of grace, 1 Jno. vi. 29; Eph. ii. 8. 9.—ἀρετῇ, manly, decided conduct before the three enemies of our salvation, and readiness to good works. It corresponds to the ἀρετῇ of God, v. 4, which energetically repels all evil. De Wette and Huther are too general in rendering "moral fitness." Of the seven fruits on the tree of faith this is the first and the best, cf. Phil. iv. 8. It must be coupled with γνώσει, which is different from ἐπίγνωσις, of which it is the fruit, cf. 1 Pet. iii. 7; Phil. i. 9; a wise demeanour with a ready perception of what is useful or harmful, of what is to be done and to be avoided, cf. Eccl. viii. 9. It preserves us from indiscreet zeal and exaggerations. Luther:—"Prudence is the eye of all virtues, without which virtue easily degenerates into faults." Calov:—"It leads and moderates all virtues, so that in the practice of it we err neither by doing too much nor too little, nor stray from the right goal."

Vv. 6, 7. And in knowledge—love.—ἐγκράτεια, abstinence from the lust of the world, self-control. "It abstains from the evil it knows to identify, and in Christian liberty steadily bridle the desires, 1 Pet. iv. 8; Gal. v. 22." Richter. ἐπομονή, endurance, perseverance under abuse, want, troubles, dangers and sufferings. "Self-government accustoms men to be hard to themselves, and thus to endure sufferings." Ph. M. Hahn.—τὴν εὐσέβειαν, the disposition in which the consideration of God controls the whole life, in which He is held in supreme honour, whereby His approval is sought, and the doing of which things constitutes its own happiness.—φιλαδελφία, 1 Pet. i. 22; Rom. xii. 10; 1 Thess. iv. 9; Heb. xiii. 1; Gal. vi. 10.—τὴν ἀγάπην, love in general, universal kindness toward all men. Bengel:—"Each of these several steps begets and famili-tates the next; each next tempers and perfects the preceding."—Gerlach:—"The import of this scale of Christian graces may be still more appreciated by considering it in an inverted order, and by acquiring the conviction that each successive step necessarily presupposes the one which precedes it."

VER. 8. For if these things are in you, etc.—ὑπάρχειν, to lie under, to be taken for granted, to be truly subsisting, to be at one's command, like a property. If these qualities have become your inward property, cf. Acts iii. 6.—πλεονάζοντα, and if by daily practice they multiply, Rom. v. 20; vi. 1; 2 Thess. i. 8, they will not suffer you to appear as unworkful [ἀργός = ἀεργός.—M.] and unfruitful; they will exhibit themselves in all manner of good works, and impel you to an ever-growing, profound, comprehensive and thorough knowledge of Jesus Christ. Thus there is an admirable fitness, in that the knowledge of Christ, which consists of different gradations, is first described as the source and afterwards as the fruit of those virtues. [Christ is the Author and Finisher of our faith.—M.]

VER. 9. For he to whom these things—not seeing afar off.—Supply before γάρ the thought, 'strive so much the more earnestly after these things, for—otherwise you go in the direction of relapse and blindness.' Huther:—"A negative illustrative explanation of the preceding verse. He is blind while he thinks after the manner of those false teachers, that he has light; he knows neither himself, nor God, nor Christ; he is in the darkness, 1 Jno. ii. 9. 11; Rev. iii. 17; Prov. iv. 19."—μυωπάζων from μύω, one who is near-sighted and obliged partly to shut his eyes in order to see objects at a distance. Such an one accordingly is blind both in regard of the present and of the future; he intentionally shuts the eyes of his spirit against the light, wherever it is disagreeable to him. Grotius, falsely:—"He is blind, or if not wholly blind, short-sighted." Huther:—"He only sees that which is near (earthly things), not that which is distant (heavenly things)." [Fronmüller's view is the reproduction of that of Suidas: "Ἰταque τυφλὸς μυωπάζων is dicatur qui ideo cæcus est, quia sponte claudit oculos, ut ne videat, aut qui videre se dissimulat, quod vel invitatus cernit."—M.]

Having placed in forgetfulness the purification of his former sins.—This describes the way in which that getting blind is brought about. Bengel notes the fitness of the term λήθην λαβὼν as expressive of that which man willingly suffers, that which he wishes for, cf. Rom. v. 19. An example is found in the wicked servant, Matt. xviii. 23.—τὸν καθαρισμὸν τῶν πάλαι αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτιῶν.—Winer inclines to the interpretation, "purification of sins=putting away of sins, removal of sins," p. 200. But one can hardly say: καθαρίζονται ἁμαρτίαι. Sins are purified=removed. Translate, rather, "the purification of their sins, i. e., of their guilt, which takes place in justification," cf. Ps. li. 4; Ex. xxix. 36. 37; Heb. i. 3; ix. 22. 28; 1 Jno. i. 7. It emanates from the blood of Christ by means of faith, Rom. iii. 24. 25. [Oecumenius:—"καὶ γὰρ καὶ οὗτος ἐπίγνωσις αὐτῶν διὰ τὸ καθαρῶσαι τὴν αἰνὴ βαπτίσματι, ἐνὶ πλῆθους ἁμαρτιῶν ἐξεπλάσθαι, δὲον εἶδέναι ἐνὶ καθαρότητι καὶ ἀγιότητα εἶλαβε, ὥστε" ἵνα διαπαντὸς τηρῇ τὸν ἀγιασμόν, οὐ χωρὶς οὐδεὶς ὀμνῶναι τὸν κύριον, ὃ δὲ ἐπελάβετο."—M.]

VER. 10. Wherefore the rather, etc.—σπουδασαὺ βεβαίαν.—Lachmann's reading (see Appar. Crit.) is only in apparent conflict with Paul, who also insists upon a faith evidenced by love and good works. "Peter desires that our calling and election should be also secure with us and not only with God, and that we should make it thus secure by good works." Luther.—Our calling becomes secure, sure and certain, if it leads to the issue which is desired.—Brethren.—This address is not found in the first Epistle; but we have its equivalent: Beloved, ch. ii. 11. [Bengel: In priore epistola nunquam, in altera semel hanc appellationem Petrus adhibet: ex quo gravitas huius loci apparet.—M.]

Your calling and election sure.—The calling is placed first with reference to ourselves, who become first conscious of our calling, and afterwards of our election. ἐκλογή denotes not the worthiness and distinction conditioned by our own doings, nor our entering here in time into communion with God, but as usual, the eternal purpose of God, cf. 1 Pet. i. 1; ii. 4. 6. 9; Acts ix. 15; Rom. ix. 11; xi. 5. 7. 28; 1 Thess. i. 4. Those who consider themselves elect are still liable to stumble and fall. Huther applies it to the separation of the called from the world and to their translation into the kingdom of God, in which their calling is instrumental.—Augustine:—"Even for perseverance in obedience you must hope in the Father of Light, and implore Him in daily prayers; but in doing so you must have the assurance that you are not excluded from the election of His people, because it is God Himself who enables you to do so."

For if ye do these things, if ye exhibit these qualities (v. 5, etc.), ye shall never stumble.—οὐ μὴ πταίσητε.—πταίειν, to strike the foot against a stone, to stumble, to fail, to come to grief. The figure is taken here, as in 1 Cor. ix. 24, from those who, at the games, run within the course. Tossan:—"James (iii. 2) says, indeed, that we all fail or stumble in various ways; but Peter here refers to a stumbling which denotes a man's keeping down, or his falling wholly away from the grace of God, or forfeiting it," cf. Heb. xii. 18.—The Intensive οὐ μὴ with the Conj. Aor. is used when something is to happen at an indefinite period, or very rapidly, see Winer, p. 528.

For thus shall be richly furnished to you, etc.—Richly corresponds to πλεονάζειν, v. 8, and is the antithesis to 1 Pet. iv. 18, "that ye may enter not as from shipwreck or a fire, but as it were in triumph." Bengel.—"But those who enter otherwise (although we ought not to despair of the weak) will not pass on thus joyously, the door will not be open as wide for them, but it will be narrow and hard to them, so that they struggle and would rather be weak all their life than die once." Luther.—Huther understands the rich fulness of future felicity.—ἐπιχορηγήσεται corresponds to v. 5. If ye richly contribute, furnish forth those virtues, God also will furnish you a richly opened entrance into His kingdom. Roos thinks that this entrance begins already here upon earth. "The state of grace builded upon the foundation of the calling and election of God becomes more and more immovable, so that the danger of losing it is continually lessening. One enters also further and further into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, so that one receives more and more richly the Spirit who rules all things therein, and through this Spirit one obtains more and more fully the knowledge of the Father and the Son and the capacity of acting in all cases more and more in conformity to the laws which are valid in that kingdom."—βασιλείαν is connected with the synoptical sayings of Christ, and is not found in the first Epistle, which describes eternal life by the figure of an inheritance, 1 Pet. i. 4; iii. 9, 7.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It is impossible to enter into the stream of truth, power and Apostolical majesty which we encounter at the opening of this Epistle without gaining the firm conviction that here speaks not an unknown personage of the second century, who falsely arrogates to himself the title of an Apostle and the name of the Prince of the Apostles, but that it is he himself, as he testifies in the Introduction to the Epistle.

2. As in Paul, so here, the atonement whereby the justice of God was satisfied, and justification by faith in the free grace of God in Christ, are represented as the centre of the Christian faith.

3. An essential moment of faith is knowledge, to which peculiar prominence is given in the second Epistle of Peter, doubtless, among other reasons, because the Apostle had to deal with an intellectual tendency which attached a very great value to knowledge, although it was only one-sided and theoretical. He, therefore, vindicates the claims of vital, practical knowledge, ch. i. 2. 8. 5. 6. 8; ii. 20; iii. 18; the beginning, progress and completion of which should be duly distinguished from one another, ch. i. 8. 8. "He opposes to the falsely celebrated knowledge of those false teachers the true knowledge." Besser. Cf. Rev. ii. 24; 1 Jno. ii. 28; Jno. xvii. 8.

4. The wakening of a sinner from spiritual death and the communication of a new life to him require on the part of God the same putting forth of power as the resurrection of Christ from the dead, Eph. i. 19. 20. Hence every thing is here referred back to the Divine Power. "In conversion, justification, and the first bestowal of grace, grace alone works for and in us sinners. But afterwards we are bound and able to coöperate, not in our own strength, but in the strength of God by grace." Richter. Our confessions teach rightly: "That as those who are physically dead cannot of themselves and of their own strength reanimate their dead bodies and restore them to life, so also those who are dead in sins cannot of their own strength achieve their spiritual and heavenly righteousness and spiritual life, unless the Son of God deliver them from the death of sins and quicken them," 2 Cor. iii. 5; 1 Cor. ii. 14; Jno. xv. 5; Phil. ii. 13; Formula Concordiæ. Müller, p. 590.—Confess. Aug., Art. 2, 18.

5. How lofty the vocation of us poor, sinful men! The kingdom of God, communion with God, His glory and actually participation in His Nature are all held out to us. While pantheism dreams of a God, who as the universal Spirit of the world is ever engaged in an incessant alternation of ebb and flow, now distributing and again gathering Himself, now scattering in innumerable drops and again flowing back into an ocean, Holy Scripture makes us acquainted with the living, personal God, eternally exalted above His creatures, and yet so condescending to those who love Him as to make them partakers of His Being. The Triune God wills to dwell in His elect, to make them one spirit with Him, and yet to make them personally different from Him.

6. "Corruptible and perishable lust often commends itself as a thing permitted, and wicked men often turn and twist the commandments of God until they think that they have found a warrant for the gratification of that lust; because then this perverted dogma of Christian liberty constitutes the whole of their Gospel, which they are minded and ready to practise." Roosa.

7. Doubts of one's calling and election to eternal life are best overcome by giving all diligence in furnishing those virtues (v. 5), and warring against the opposite sins. "Although all the rest (v. 5, etc.) flows from faith in the grace of God in Christ, it attains only gradually the control of man's doing and not-doing through proof." Gerlach. "On the seven-fold tree of faith one part grows out of the other; the first contains the germ of the second, the second enables the third to come to a healthy growth, and all of them together are consummated in love." Besser. "Good works are indissolubly united to the true knowledge of Jesus Christ, so that knowledge also must be denied to the idle and unfruitful."

8. Those who forget the principal article of the forgiveness of sins through the blood of Jesus, lack the most efficient incentive to holiness, the Spirit, who teaches men to abhor sin as the greatest evil, takes flight, and relapse inevitably ensues.

9. The election of believers is forever objectively secure; but they must become more and more firmly established in it, so that nothing shall be able to upset their being sealed with the Holy Spirit.

10. "The seven-fold furnishing forth of virtue on the part of believers will encounter in the eternal kingdom of Jesus Christ, the riches of which are unfathomable, a seventy times seven-fold furnishing forth of glory. As on the arrival of a welcome guest with numerous attendants, we throw open the folding door of the house, so likewise a rich entrance into the hall of heaven awaits those who arrive there with the retinue of honest works of faith, Rev. xiv. 13." Besser.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The highly-important knowledge that Jesus is my Lord.—The fountain of all godliness flows in the living knowledge of Christ.—Participation in the Divine Nature the highest aim of Christianity.—VER. 7. Glorious fruits on the tree of faith.—The gifts of God and the fidelity of man must go hand in hand.—The cycle-life of Christianity which begins and ends with the knowledge of Jesus.—The straight way to the heavenly Zion.—The great blindness of those who forget the purification from their former sins.

STARKE:—The Apostles have no privileges over other believers, either in salvation or the appointment of it, but they are all alike loved by God in Christ, and regarded, as it were, as one, Rom. iii. 23, 30; Gal. iii. 28; Eph. iv. 5.—The omnipotence and might of God is as evident in the kingdom of grace as in the work of creation and the kingdom of nature. The same power wakens, enlightens, quickens, cleanses, sanctifies, strengthens, confirms, and keeps the sinner unto salvation.—Nobody can be right in complaining of his inability to do good; is it not given to him of God? Piety is not impossible in the power of God. Use it with all diligence and earnestness, Phil. iv. 18.—To receive in faith according to the Gospel, and to give in love according to the law, must ever go together in the Christian life, so that receiving may truly promote giving, and the giving truly evidence the receiving.—False conceit, to hanker after sinful desires, and yet to imagine that one is the child of God! The two cannot exist together. If you desire the latter, you must let go the former, Eph. v. 1.—The regenerate must faithfully use all the powers of grace they have received, and be very diligent in good works, and thereby prove their new birth, Titus ii. 14.—The golden chain of virtue is man's most becoming ornament; let no one sever its links; who wants one, shall have them all, Jas. ii. 10.—Although godliness begins at once with faith, it does not truly evidence itself in its proofs until it endures; then it is not confined to good motions and resolutions, but the practice of good becomes a continual and blessed habit, Titus iii. 14.—How very different is genuine Christian love from merely natural love! Who knows this truly but those who are born of God?—The more a believer grows in holiness, the more vanish the obstacles to true enlightenment, and the clearer grows his knowledge of spiritual and heavenly things, Rom. xii. 2.—Those who have received gifts from God and do not use them faithfully, are worse off than if they had received nothing at all, for they only increase their condemnation, Luke xii. 47, 48.—Godliness does not merit eternal life, but it belongs to the order of salvation.—Shameful deceit, if thou ledest a godless life, and yet fanciest to be saved at last. Art thou sure that thou wilt be converted on thy dying bed? Depend not on the case of the dying thief; it may happen to one, but the most are lost, Sir. xviii. 22.—To live a truly godly life belongs to a happy, as well as to a joyful death. For although a joyful readiness to die is purely of God's grace, it can only happen to those who, because of an unblemishable life, have a good conscience, Prov. xiv. 32.

LISCO:—The heavenly possessions of the Christian.—The communion of faith of Christians: 1. Its foundation; 2. Its effect.—The most precious jewel of the members of the Kingdom.—The final aim of the members of the Kingdom.

BEK:—Of true enlightenment.—How faith evolves a whole garland of virtues.

GENOK:—The Divine garden of a Christian heart; 1. With its heavenly nurture; 2. Noble plants; 3. Its glorious prospects.

W. HOFACKER:—The most necessary and important prayers.

SCHAEFFER:—Man glorified into a Christian.

H. RIEGER:—If God sends rain and fruitful seasons from heaven, the husbandman also does not fail in diligence, and thus the expected harvest is attained. So, likewise, if God accords to us in various ways His Divine power, and man gives all diligence, that which is proposed in the heavenly calling is also attained.—The diligence we use, impels us more and more to the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, to make a good use of all the treasures it contains on all occasions, and to overcome thereby remaining obstacles.—There is no want of occasions to stumble. Unless the heart increasingly enters into purity, and the eye into simplicity, we shall stop here and there to our hurt, take a wrong view of things, make not the proper use of the power contained in our heavenly calling against those things, and this occasions stumbling, inward uncertainty, entanglements in lust and complaisance, outward stumbling and laying hold of something which weakens the hope of our calling.

VERSES 5-8. Three figures suggested by the Apostle's language:

1. The chain or garland of Christian virtues.
2. Faith, the foundation of the Christian life, has been laid by God; on that foundation let Christians rear the superstructure, taking care that each succeeding virtue rests firmly in and on the one preceding it.
3. The tree of the Christian life bearing sevenfold fruit, of which the last kind, charity, is the most precious and perfect.—M.]

The Christian's triumphal entry into the everlasting Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The things, not seen, are ETERNAL. Life there is everlasting. Luke x. 25; the inheritance is everlasting, Heb. ix. 15; the house and the tabernacles are everlasting, 2 Cor. v. 1; Luke xvi. 9; the glory is everlasting, 2 Tim. ii. 10; salvation is everlasting, Heb. v. 2; and so is the kingdom of the King eternal, 1 Tim. i. 17.—M.]

CHAPTER I. 12-21.

ANALYSIS:—The Apostle enforces his exhortation to holiness by the consideration of the expected nearness of his departure, confirming the certainty of the doctrine in which his readers had been instructed, a, by the eye-witness of him self and all the Apostles; b, by the word of prophecy.

- 12 Wherefore I will not be negligent<sup>1</sup> to put you always in remembrance of these
- 13 things, though<sup>2</sup> ye know them,<sup>3</sup> and be established in the present truth. Yea, I think
- 14 it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remem-
- 15 brance;<sup>4</sup> Knowing that shortly<sup>5</sup> I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord
- 16 Jesus Christ hath showed me. Moreover I will endeavour<sup>6</sup> that ye may be able after
- 17 my decease to have these things always in remembrance. For we have not followed
- 18 cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming<sup>7</sup> of our
- 19 Lord Jesus Christ, but were<sup>8</sup> eye-witnesses of his majesty. For he received from God<sup>9</sup>
- 20 the Father honour and glory, when there came<sup>10</sup> such a voice to him from the excel-
- 21 lent<sup>11</sup> glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. And this voice
- 19 which came from heaven<sup>12</sup> we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount. We - have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as
- unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day<sup>13</sup> dawn, and the daystar arise
- 20 in your hearts: Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private
- 21 interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy<sup>14</sup>
- men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 12. Wherefore.—The connection is as follows: In order that this glorious consummation [of participation in the blessings and glories of Christ's Kingdom, Alf.—M.] may be yours, I will not fail to exhort you to the zealous cultivation of holiness, more particularly, because my departure is close at hand. Here we have the tendency of the whole Epistle. The Apostle's aim is neither dogmatical instruction nor the refutation of false teachers, but the strengthening and encouragement in the practice of good, the growth of a virtuous disposition and of a virtuous life on the part of those to whom he writes. He mentions first the vital knowledge of God and Christ as the chief means to that desirable end.

I will not be negligent, etc.—οὐκ ἀμελήσω. [See Appar. Crit.—M.] His anxious care for their encouragement and confirmation is made more intense by δέι. Bengel:—"I will always think of the one thing, that it is my duty to stir you up (admonish you)."—This was doubly necessary, because of the danger of their being seduced by false prophets, ch. ii. 1. 2. Luther:—"The Christian ministry is of two kinds, as says St. Paul in Rom. xii. 7. 8. Teaching is laying the foundation of faith, and preaching it to those who are ignorant of it. Exhorting, or, as St. Peter says, reminding, is preaching to those who know and have heard (the Gospel), admonishing and stirring them up to recollect what they know, to continue and increase therein."—ὑπομνησκειν, cf. Jno. xiv. 26; 2 Tim. ii. 14; Tit. iii. 1; 8 Jno. 10; Jude 5. Paul uses the term ἐπαναμνησκειν, Rom. xv. 15

Although ye know them and have been established.—εἰδότες so. ταῦτα.—ἐστηρικμένους; στήριζω, to set fast, establish. The truth was preached to you, 1 Pet. i. 12, confirmed by me, ch. v. 12, and you are fully convinced of it.—ἐν τῇ παροβῳ, the truth has been brought near to you, yea it is present in your hearts. Similarly, Paul in Rom. x. 8. 6, "The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart." [Calvin: "Vos quidem, inquit, probe tenetis quoniam sit evangeliz veritas, neque vos quasi fluctuantes confirmo, sed in re tanta monitione nunquam sunt supervacue, quare nunquam molestate esse debent. Simili excusatione utitur Paulus ad Rom. xv. 14."—M.]

VER. 13. But I deem it right—reminding.—δὲ is often used by way of explanation. γάρ might have been used, but on account of the preceding εἰδότες and ἐστηρικμένους we have an adversative conjunction. Winer, p. 474, 475.—σκηνώμα like σκηνή, στήνος, tent, tabernacle. Thus the Doric poets and Pythagorean philosophers call the body the σκήνος of the soul. Plato calls σῶμα the σῆμα of the soul, its prison, or grave. Paul makes use of the phrase, "earthly house of tabernacle," 2 Cor. v. 1, with reference to the metaphor in Is. xxxviii. 12 and Wisd. ix. 16. Bengel:—"It denotes the immortality of the soul, the brevity of its stay in this mortal body, and the facility of its departure in faith." We may add that it also describes Christians as strangers and warriors, who use tents or huts instead of houses.—δευρίπτειν. Intensive form of ἐγείρειν, thoroughly to arouse from sleep and sleepiness through every impediment.

VER. 14. Knowing that—hath declared me.—Our Lord had announced to St. Peter the manner of his death, death upon the cross when recommended by Winer, who gives Frommüller's in a note, but says in the text: "The structure is interrupted by the parenthetical clause φωνῆς—εὐδόκησα; and the Apostle continues in v. 18 with καὶ ταύτην τὴν φωνὴν ἡμεῖς ἠκούσαμεν, instead of saying ἡμᾶς εἶχε ταύτην τὴν φωνὴν ἀκούσαντας, or something similar." To give this in English reader, "For having received from God the Father honour and glory, (when a voice was borne to Him—well pleased), and this voice ye heard, etc."—M.] The transfiguration of Jesus on the mount is produced as an example of the personal experience of the Apostle of the power and appearing of Christ, cf. Acts x. 39; v. 32, where Peter also refers to his having been an eye-witness.—τῆσθε καὶ ὄψαν, see 1 Pet. i. 7; Rom. ii. 7. 10. The former may apply to His mission, the latter to His person. [Or perhaps, better, and less far fetched, τῆσθε may refer to the voice which spoke to Him, and ὄψαν to the light that shone from Him; so Alford. Burgon calls attention to the remarkable resemblance of this passage and Jno. i. 14 concerning the same event, of which St. Peter and St. John were eye-witnesses.—M.]

When there came to Him such a voice—well pleased.—εὖχεσθαι indicates the manner how He received honour and glory: φέρεται

φωνῆς—נָפַל, Is. ix. 8; Dan. iv. 28, elsewhere γίνεται, Lke. ix. 35. 86, or ἐρχεται, Jno. xii. 30. 28, denotes the objective, unmistakable, important character of the voice. It was not a dream or an imaginary illusion, like many fables, but it was a voice sounding from on high. The word is repeated with emphasis in the next verse. According to Matthew xvii. 5, and Mark ix. 7, it came out of a bright cloud, but Peter carries us higher up to the μεγαλοπρεπὲς ὄψα, of which the cloud was only the symbol. The last words seem to be a periphrasis of God Himself (so Gerhard, de Wette, Huther and al.), such as θεῖα φωνή is used in Matt. xxvi. 64; cf. Ps. cii. 2; 1 Tim. vi. 16.—Οὐτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός; the same words occur in Matt., but with the addition: αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε, and ἐν ᾧ instead of εἰς ὃν; the latter occurs also at Matt. xii. 18.—εἰς indicates the direction of the Divine pleasure on Him from before the foundation of the world; according to Dietlein, the historical motion of the Divine plan of salvation with reference to Him. [Wordsworth:—The originality of the reading εἰς ὃν εὐδόκησα may be remarked as an argument for the genuineness of the Epistle. A forger would have copied the reading in St. Matthew, xvii. 5.—M.]

VER. 18. And this voice we heard, etc.—ἡμεῖς refers specifically to the three Apostles, Peter, James and John, while the plural number in v. 16 includes also the other Apostles. The celestial declaration was not reported to us by others, but we heard it, being with Him at the time, with our own ears.

On the holy mount.—Not on Mount Zion, as Grotius maintains, connecting it erroneously with the incident recorded in Jno. xii. 28. Calvin: "Wherever the Lord comes, He halloweth (because He is the fountain of all holiness) everything by the fragrance of His presence." The mountain of transfiguration is generally identified with Mount Tabor, about two hours' distance from Nazareth, in the north-eastern part of the plain of Jezreel; but because Mount Tabor was fortified, and consequently not a solitary place, and because Jesus at that time had retired to the head-waters of the river Jordan, the mountain of transfiguration is placed by others in the neighbourhood of Hermon. See Zeller, Biblisches Wörterbuch II. 710. [The epithet "holy," applied to that mount, affords evidence that the history of the transfiguration was well known at the time when Peter wrote this Epistle. The inference of de Wette, that it indicates a belief of the miraculous, is neither logically correct nor creditable to his estimate of Apostolical Christianity.—M.]

VER. 19.—Here follows the second testimony for the glory of Christ and the irrefragable certainty of his doctrine, viz.: the word of prophecy. The reference here is evidently to the prophecies of the Old Testament, which are taken as a connected whole, and not to the prophecies of the New Testament, as Griesbach alleges. Ch. ii. 1, etc., settles this point, which is further confirmed by other references of Peter to O. T. prophecies, cf. 1 Pet. i. 10; Acts iii. 18; x. 43. Bengel: "The words of Moses, Isaiah and all the prophets really constitute only one word (sermo) exhibiting a perfect agreement in all its parts."

And we have the prophetic word as more sure.—ἐχομεν. "We possess," not, "We hold it surer." βεβαιώτερον, not "fast" or "very fast," as Luther and Beza. The force of the comparative must be brought out. Gerhard: "The testimony of the prophets is declared to be more sure than that of the Apostles concerning the voice of the Father in heaven and the transfiguration of Christ. Not more sure per se and absolutely, but in respect of the readers of the Epistle. Among these were converts from Judaism who paid the utmost reverence to the prophetic writings and did not set so high a value on the preaching of the Apostles." Cf. Acts xvii. 11. So (substantially) Augustine, Bede and al. But Peter was hardly prepared to subordinate the testimony of his eyes and ears to that of the prophets. The view of de Wette is forced, "the prophetic word is more sure to us now (that we have seen and heard these things, vv. 17. 18)." Nor can we approve of Huther's exposition, that in respect of the Christian's hope the word of prophecy is more sure and certain than the testimony of the transfiguration, which presented only the glory of Christ in the days of His flesh, but did not directly confirm His future coming in glory (this is the sense in which he takes the παρουσία), whereas the prophetic word does point to the future coming of Christ. Oecumenius gives the right sense, saying that the truth of the promise was confirmed by its fulfilment, and that this has made the prophetic word more sure and certain now than it was before. So Grotius, Bengel, Dietlein. "We possess now the prophecies of the Old Testament as more sure than they were before." Gerlach: "The fulfilment of the chief burden of the prophecies, viz., the manifestation of Jesus Christ, has now confirmed them altogether more fully to us than before." [But although Frommüller endorses the view of Oecumenius, Grotius, Bengel, Dietlein, as the right view, we have to object, that the Apostle has no such reference to now and then; but which is the right view? Alford seems to come nearest; he adheres to the grammatical force of the comparative, and renders "We have, i. e., we possess, more sure," etc.; and explains the comparison of the word of prophecy and the incidents of the transfiguration. The Apostle calls the former more sure than the latter, because of its wider range, embracing not only a single testimony to Christ, as that Divine voice did, but τὰ εἰς χριστὸν παθήματα καὶ τὰς μετὰ ταῦτα δόξας, 1 Pet. i. 11; as presenting a broader basis for the Christian's trust, and not only one fact, however important.—To this may be added the fact that the voice from heaven and the vision of the transfiguration were vouchsafed to the three Apostles only, but the testimony of the word of prophecy, as the concurrent testimony of many inspired persons in different ages, is vouchsafed to the whole Church and to every individual believer.—M.] Hence the increased responsibility of those who despise it.—Others refer the comparison to the myths, mentioned in v. 16, so Semler; but saying that the word of prophecy is more sure than those myths, would be saying very little indeed.

Whereunto ye do well—dark place.—ὡς καλῶς ποιεῖτε προσέχοντες, to which ye do well that ye take heed. The Participle is used because they had already begun to do so (Winer, p. 46, 1). De Wette remarks that this seems to apply to Jewish Christians, but it applies still better to Gentile Christians, because it was self-evident in the case of the former.—προσέχοντες sc. νοῦν, to give attention, bend the mind, give heed to a thing, cf. Heb. ii. 1; Acts viii. 6. 10. 11; xvi. 14; 1 Tim. i. 4.; iv. 1. 18; Tit. i. 14; Hebr. vii. 18.—ὡς λυχνῷ φαίνοντι; λυχνός, a light, a lantern, a candle used at night. Bengel takes φαίνοντι as the Imperfect on account of διαγύσσειν; but better take it as a Present.—αἰχμηρὸς=dry, arid, rough, dusty, dirty, dim, dark, because filth and darkness are often found together. What is meant by this dark place cannot be determined until we have ascertained the sense of the words following.

Until the day shall have dawned.—ἕως οὗ belongs to προσέχοντες, not to φαίνοντι. Many commentators understand the day of the blissful eternity. So Calvin: "This darkness I extend to the whole course of earthly life, and interpret that that day shall dawn when we shall see face to face that which we now see only through a mirror and in a riddle. Christ indeed shines on us in the Gospel as the Sun of Righteousness, yet so that our spirit, in part at least, remains shrouded in the darkness of death until we shall enter heaven from this carnal prison-house. Then shall dawn the splendour of the day, when no mists and clouds of ignorance and error shall shut out from us the clear view of the Sun." Similarly Dietlein: "The moment of Christ's coming." τὸτος αἰχμηρὸς would accordingly denote not only the whole pre-Christian era, but also the whole of this present life, the world not yet illumined by the glorious coming of Christ, and the hearts of believers, as yet not seeing, but only longing for the glory of Christ. This gives a beautiful meaning, and we may certainly call even the time of the New Testament, night, as contrasted with the future era, in which the glory of God shall light the heavenly Jerusalem and the Lamb shall be the light thereof, Rom. xxi. 23. But Gerhard rightly objects to this interpretation, that if the day referred to were the day of a blissful eternity, ἡμέρα ought to have the article, and that such a description of the day of Christ's advent to glory, or of the last judgment is against all analogy. Others interpret the verse of the contrast between the time of the Old Testament and that of the New. But it is against this view that the time of the N. T. had already dawned in a general sense, while the Conj. Aor. points to something future and possible. The reference, as Calvin observes, is rather to the antithesis between the state of nature and the state of grace. The day dawns in the heart, when man awakes from his dream-life, when the light of the holiness and justice of God shines into his heart, and enables him clearly to perceive his sinfulness; the morning star arises, when thereupon he is profoundly and vitally moved by the mercy of God in Christ, and faithful to the leadings of grace, gradually attains to a knowledge of Christ and the Divine mysteries, which is continually growing, expanding and developing into greater clearness and perfection, cf. Rom. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. iv. 6; Eph. v. 14. The readers of this Epistle are indeed spoken of as knowing and established in the truth, v. 12, but immediately before it is also said that they stand in need of constant reminding. This involves not any more a contradiction than does the language of Paul in the Epistle to the Ephesians, where, at ch. i. 18, he prays that the eyes of their understanding might be enlightened, although he had said before that God had abounded toward them in all wisdom and prudence, ch. i. 8. 9. The majority of the readers of this Epistle we may consider to have stood only in the outer court of the sanctuary, at the beginning of true conversion; they believed the external evidences, held to the word of prophecy, separated themselves from the world, but had not yet attained a vital knowledge of Christ and entered into intimate communion with Him.—[This is substantially the view of Huther and Alford; see the latter, whose notes are very full on this passage.—M.]

And the morning star shall have arisen in your hearts.—φωφόρος, light-bringing sc. ἄστὴρ, the morning star. Hesyeh. understands by it the Sun. [This is a tradition among commentators, which has been set aside by Alford, who, instead of quoting from the commentators, quotes Hesyeh., who merely says: φωφόρος, φωτοδότης, λαμπρὸς ἄστὴρ, light-bringer, light-giver, bright star.—M.], but the word is not used in this sense elsewhere, whereas Christ calls Himself the bright Morning Star, that heralds the eternal sunrise, Rev. xxii. 16. To him that overcometh he promises the Morning Star, i. e., Himself and the brightness of His grace, Rev. ii. 28.—διαγύσσειν used of dawn. Huther quotes a passage from Polybius [ἀμα τῷ διαγύσσειν.—M.] ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις, in the hearts touched by grace, not in the world generally. Now we perceive clearly what is meant by the dark place (αἰχμηρὸς τόπος); it is, as Bengel explains it, our heart, which before conversion, is unclean, dry and dark. But considering that the same state of heart is everywhere in the world, the world in general may be described as an arid, desert and dark place.—ως οὖν with Aor. Conj. denotes the duration of an action, until the possible event has actually taken place. Winer, p. 812. But this does not imply that the use of prophecy is superfluous after the illumination has taken place, cf. Matt. i. 25; v. 18, 26. This is evident from the examples of the Apostles themselves.

VER. 20. Knowing this first of all.—The Apostle having exhorted them to give heed to prophecy, now further reminds them of the origin of prophecy, and that it must be interpreted in the same spirit, out of which it proceeded.—τοῦτο belongs to what follows.—πρῶτον, not as Bengel, “before I say it” [priusquam ego dico], but first and foremost, 1 Tim. ii. 1, being conscious, bearing in mind, Jas. i. 8; Heb. x. 84, like εἰδότες, 1 Pet. i. 18.

That all prophecy of the Scripture is not matter of its own interpretation.—It is not necessary to understand here a Hebraism, Winer, p. 185. The preceding shows that the reference is to the prophecies contained in the Old Testament. The prophecy of the Scripture is opposed to the false prophets. Ch. ii. 1.—ὡς ἰδίας ἐπιλυστέως, happens not as matter of its own interpretation. ἐπιλυθεν, Mk. iv. 84, to interpret, to expound, to settle, to determine, to decide, Acts xix. 39.—פָּתַר Gen. xli. 12, xl. 8.

The reference is to the origin, not to the interpretation of the prophecy, as is evident from v. 21. Even as to its origin it is not matter of its own interpreting. “The prophets, receiving the prophecies, were passive: a vision, a painting appeared before their mind, which they described to their hearers and readers as they saw it, without understanding all it signified, so that they themselves searched what or what manner of time the Spirit did signify, 1 Pet. i. 10-12.”—“A prophecy only expresses that which God had communicated to the seer, and is consequently as much an object of search and deciphering to him as it is to us.” Gerlach.—“ἰδίας is most simply construed with θελήματι ἀνθρώπου; that which depends on the exercise of the natural power and will of man. De Wette cites the following passage from Philo: “A prophet utters nothing of his own.” Dietlein’s interpretation is too full: “No prophecy occurs in the Scripture that could be regarded as already possessing its own interpretation; all prophecy has rather the significance and interpretation of history, and therefore must not be treated allegorically, but has its fulfilment in the facts of history and thence also its interpretation.” Huther institutes a comparison with Joseph’s interpretation of dreams, Gen. xl. 8. The words in which Joseph foretells the prisoners their fate constitute the προφητεία; this presupposes, on the part of Joseph, an ἐπίλυσις, an interpretation of those dreams; but Joseph ascribes that power to God, cf. Gen. xli. 15. 16. Better take those dreams as προφητεία, the interpretation of which was communicated to Joseph from on high. Bengel defines ἐπίλυσις as the interpretation in virtue of which the prophets were enabled to unlock to men things previously locked up.

[Alford shows that the reference here is to the prophets themselves, who were unable to solve or interpret. He quotes from Oecumenius; τοῦτο ἐστὶν ὅτι λαμβάνουσι μὲν ἀπὸ θεοῦ οἱ προφῆται τὴν προφητείαν, ἀλλ’ οὐχ ὡς ἐκεῖνοι βούλονται, ἀλλ’ ὡς τὸ κινεῖν αὐτοὺς ἐνεργεῖ πνεῦμα. καὶ ᾤδεσαν μὲν καὶ συνέσαν τὸν καταπεμπόμενον αὐτοῖς προφητικὸν λόγον, οὐ μὲντοι καὶ τὴν ἐπίλυσιν αὐτοῦ ἐποιοῦντο. . . . καίπερ εἰδότες οὐ χρεῖαν εἶχον ἐρμηνεύειν τὰ ἑπ’ αὐτῶν, ἀλλ’ ἑτέροις διηκόνουν ταῦτα ἡμῖν γάρ. De Wette adds that this is said to excuse the difficulty of the interpretation of prophecy, and to remove occasion of unbelief and scoffing (ch. iii. 8). Alford agrees with Huther that the last purpose is not only not indicated in the context, but is quite out of the question; the Apostle referring to prophecy not as difficult of interpretation, but as a candle shining in a dark place, nay, as being even more firm and secure than external proofs of the same truth. Huther’s view arises from the consideration that ἐπίλυσιν is not the subsequent interpretation of a prophecy already given, but the intelligent apprehension of the meaning of the prophecy out of which (but not ἰδίας on the part of those by whom it is sent), the prophecy itself springs. This Alford considers much confirmed by γίνεσθαι, which with a Genitive, as here, is not—εἶσθαι, but rather seems to denote origin. So that the sense will be, that prophecy springs not out of human interpretation, i. e., is not a prognostication made by a man knowing what he means when he utters it; but, etc. This seems also to be the view of Bengel.—M.]

VER. 21. For no prophecy—Holy Ghost.—Further substantiation of the foregoing position negatively and positively.—Θελήματι, Dative of the cause, cf. ad rem John i. 13. The pleasure, the arbitrary will of man as opposed to the Spirit of God.—The sense: The production of a true prophecy does not depend upon the exercise of man’s own power, as it was attempted in the case of heathen divination.—ἡνέχθη, answers to ἐνεχθείσης φωνῆς, verses 17. 18, and denotes not the utterance (so De Wette), but the origin.—φερόμενοι corresponds to the classical terms θεοφρονητος, θεοφοροῦμενος. They were impelled, borne along by the Holy Ghost, like a ship before a strong wind. Under this influence they remained passive, although they were fully conscious. Josephus says of Balaam, that he was moved by the Divine Spirit, cf. Heb. i. 1. Calov: “It relates as much to inward illumination as to outward impulse, yet not so that the prophets lost all self-control,” Ps. xlv. 1.—ἐλάλησαν (see Appar. Crit.) This includes also their writings, Acts ii. 31; Jas. v. 10. Their written words were determined by the Holy Ghost not only as to their contents, but, in a certain manner, also as to their form.—ἅγιοι θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι, cf. 1 Tim. vi. 11, particular instruments of the Holy Ghost, prophets or other holy men. This proves the security and the venerable character of the testimony of prophecy. But it is also to suggest the conclusion, that due regard being had to the matter, prophecy must not be arbitrarily interpreted, but in the sense of the Holy Ghost. Bernard says: “With the same spirit in which the Holy Scripture is written, it must be read and understood." For the Holy Ghost is the best interpreter of His words.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The evangelical Church rests upon the double foundation of the pure, unadulterated word of God and the great truth of the sinner's justification through faith in the saving merit of Christ. "It is remarkable," says Besser, "that in the first chapter of this Epistle, written with the design of fortifying the Church against false teaching, the Apostle extols first that precious faith whereby we possess righteousness and exhibit virtue, and then the precious Scriptures, the light of the world in a dark place."

2. Mark the Apostle's anxious care to leave to believers a written testimony of the fundamental truths of the Gospel directed against the many false teachers, who even then began to stir themselves. "Peter therefore was not of opinion that oral tradition could preserve the memory of Apostolical teaching. It was for this very reason that he wrote; yea, he foretells, that the truth would be perverted by feigned words (ch. ii. 8); to these he opposes Holy Scripture, that is, the sure prophetic word of the Old Testament and the Apostolical eye- and ear-witness of Jesus Christ, which is written in the books of the New Testament, oh. iii. 16."—Chemnitz.

3. VER. 16 and the following verses contain strong evidence of the genuineness of our Epistle. Stier: "The presumption that words, dogmas, testimonies like those contained in the second Epistle of Peter from beginning to end, could have originated in the mind of a forger, that such power and illumination, such assurance of speech could have coëxisted in the same soul alongside of a so-called pious fraud,—that this μυθολόγος, should intentionally personate in a "second Epistle" the Apostle exhorting, confessing and prophesying before his death, and yet have the audacity of expressly renouncing all οσσοφισμῶν μίμους, and withal endowed with such extraordinary knowledge, and using such bold original language—such an hypothesis contradicts the whole psychology of the Christian consciousness, and the real defenders of the genuineness of the Epistle should not be ashamed to confess it openly out of their Christian consciousness."

[VER. 19. Wordsworth: "A forger, personating St. Peter, would have magnified the importance of the supernatural visions vouchsafed especially to him whose character he assumed. He would have exalted those revelations above prophecy. But the Apostle, whose characteristic is humility, is not "elated by the greatness of his revelations," but wisely and soberly commends the ordinary means of grace, which all Christians, of every age and country, possess in the sacred Scriptures, as of more cogency and value for their assurance and growth in grace, than any extraordinary visions which were vouchsafed personally to himself."—M.]

4. We should consider the Transfiguration of Jesus not only as a miraculous testimony in favour of His Divine mission for the disciples, but also as a seal set to His glory for Himself. See Stier, II., 198; Lange on Matt. xvi. 28. 17. 1; Beck, Lehrwissenschaft, I., 512.

5. De Wette thinks it strange that the author, in his argument, verses 19-21, does not quote the speeches of Christ Himself concerning His coming, as recorded by the synoptists; that ch. iii. 16, shows that he must have been acquainted with them, and that he passes them by because the rapid succession of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the advent of Christ announced in them, had not been verified. But this remark proceeds on wholly false premises, and it formed part of the Apostle's plan to advert not to the testimony of Christ, which might have been disputed by the scoffers, and of which the adversaries, at all events, did not think very highly, but to the testimony of eye-witnesses of Christ.—Delitzsch, Psychol., 812: "The manner of the revelation of prophecy is not always ecstatic; it may also consist only in that the willing, the thinking and the feeling Spirit-life of the prophet in a state of full and waking self-power is raised and borne along by a gentle, Divine influence, which he (and this is indispensable) is able clearly to distinguish from the working of his own spirit."

6. Those who, like many adherents of separatist tendencies, take so one-sided a view of prophecy that they place it alongside, or even above the work of Christ, prove that the day has not yet dawned to them, and that the morning-star has not yet risen in their hearts. But the pretext that the day has dawned, says Roos, should not cause men to despise the word of prophecy; they should rather inquire whether it is day?

[7. Wordsworth: "Herein consists the probationary use of prophecy, viz., to try the faith and exercise the vigilance and patience of believers, and to make unbelievers themselves to become witnesses to the truth, and instruments in establishing it. If prophecy had been ιδίαις ἐπιβύσεως, if its interpretation had been declared at the same time with its delivery, then none of those moral and probationary purposes would have been answered. The fulfilment of prophecy in a manner contrary to all previous expectation, proves the prophecy to be Divine."—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The Apostle's motto is that of his Master: "I must work . . . while it is day; the night cometh when no man can work."—The nearness of departure a powerful motive of working for the Lord.—"Those who in unbelief despise the revelation of God, fall superstitiously into fables," 2 Thess. ii. 11, Besser.—Christianity is objectively given and revealed from on high, and infinitely remote and different from all human devices, subjective opinions, and personal imaginings.—The testimony of the prophets and the Apostles two immovable pillars for the support of the truth of the Gospel.—Dawn in the conversion of a sinner.—When does the morning-star arise in the heart? The true key to understanding the word of prophecy.—The secret of the true interpretation of the sacred Scriptures.

STARKE:—Teachers must not desist from teaching, exhorting and admonishing, 1 Tim. iv. 13.—Grow not weary in exhorting one another. Foremost among good works is the work of saving souls from the burning, Jas. v. 19. 20. The opportunity is daily at hand; we must not wait for to-morrow.—There is nothing more certain than death, nothing more uncertain than the time of death. Happy is the man who daily lives as if he were to die to-day, Eccl. ix. 12.—It cannot be denied that God by some peculiar grace announces to some the time of their death, not indeed in virtue of immediate revelation, but in virtue of some deep impression conveyed to the heart; but this happens hardly to one in a thousand: dear friend, wait not for it, but prepare betimes.—The good which hearers have heard from their teachers, or seen in them, they should diligently remember after their decease, Heb. xiii. 7.—Those who run after will-o'-the-wisps, will sink into morasses. Christians are on their guard against such lights. Christ and His word the true Light on our ways, John viii. 12.—Those who seek to glorify Christ in others, and desire to fill worthily the office of glorifying Him in a manner worthy of the Holy Ghost, must have experienced with Christ (although in an inferior degree, and in a different yet true manner,) the power and glory of Christ in themselves, and be able to speak according to the Holy Scripture from their own experience (2 Cor. iv. 6).—With those who suffer themselves to be found in Christ through faith, God is as well pleased as with Christ Himself. For He has been made righteous unto us, so that in Him we are considered righteous, 2 Cor. v. 21.—O man, that art by nature dark, suffer thyself to be made a bright and shining light through the right use of the word of God, or thou wilt not see the light of heaven, John v. 35.—Whatever remains as yet dark to us in the word of prophecy, shall hereafter become all light, if not in this present time, yet, according to the promise in Dan. xii. 4. 9. 10, when Christ, the true Morning Star, shall arise on that great day both of judgment and light, 1 Cor. xiii. 12.—It is enough to have learnt something from the word of God. As the light of day grows more bright after dawn, so also the knowledge of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ must grow and increase.—Holy Scripture does not contradict itself. Though it seem so, it is not so. Compare the one with the other, and you will find the most beautiful agreement.—God uses holy (sanctified) men in His service, so that those who would be His instruments, must also be His temples and work-shops.—Reasonable proof of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost: He spake of future things by the prophets, which things, for the most part, have come to pass; but this is solely a work of the omniscient God.

GERHARD:—There is no other access to reconciliation with God and to forgiveness except through the Son, Is. xlii. 1; for Christ's sake and through Christ only are we made partakers of those blessings.

ROOS:—Woe to him, whose works, words and writings cause others to sin, even after his death. Happy he, whose works, words and writings bear good fruit, even after his death. Such an one's reward of grace will be great.

LISCO:—Pastoral fidelity even unto death.—The legacy of a departing pastor.—The firm foundation of the citizenship of the heavenly kingdom.

KAPFF:—The firm reason of our faith. This reason rests, 1. on the outward testimony of the Apostles and the miracles of Christ; 2. on the inward testimony of the Holy Ghost.

STAUDT:—How firmly Christians may step forward in their faith, 1. in all that depends on the coming of Jesus in the flesh; 2. in all that depends on the coming of Jesus to glory.

[On VER. 15.—Illustration:—When Socrates was about to take the poison, to which the Athenian judges had condemned him, Crito asked him, "But how shall we bury thee?" Socrates replied, "As you please, if you can take me, and I do not elude your pursuit." Then gently smiling and looking at us he said: "Friends, I cannot persuade Crito that I am that Socrates who now converses with you . . . , but he thinks that I am he whom he shall shortly see dead, and asks me how I would be buried. I have already declared that after I have drunk the poison, I should no longer remain with you, but shall depart to certain felicities of the blessed." Plato, Phædon, 64.—M.]

[SECKER:—We find in multitudes of places, from the earliest book of Scripture to the latest, supernatural impulses and illuminations ascribed to the Spirit of God: Gen. vi. 3; xli. 38; Numb. xi. 25. 26; xxiv. 2; 1 Sam. x. 10; 2 Kings ii. 9, etc.; 1 Chron. xii. 18; 2 Chron. xv. 1; Neh. ix. 30; Ezek. ii. 2; Zech. vii. 12; Rev. i. 10; ii. 7; iv. 2, etc.; we cannot doubt, therefore, but they proceed from Him always, though sometimes it is not expressly affirmed. So that we are to honour the third Person as the immediate inward instructor of men from the foundation of the world; as Him who hath admonished, reproved and striven with the wicked; who hath warmed and cheered the hearts of the pious in all times with the manifestations of God's will, with declarations of His favour, with precautions against unseen dangers, with promises of deliverance from the heaviest afflictions, with His presence and guidance in the most intricate difficulties.—M.]

CHAPTER II. 1-10a.

ANALYSIS:—Warning against the false prophets with reference to their inevitable punishment, illustrated by three examples.

- 1 But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who<sup>1</sup> privily<sup>2</sup> shall bring in damnable heresies,<sup>3</sup> even<sup>4</sup> denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways,<sup>5</sup> by reason of whom the way of truth<sup>6</sup> shall be evil spoken of. And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of<sup>7</sup> you: whose judgment now of a long time<sup>8</sup> lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not. For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains<sup>9</sup> of darkness, to be reserved<sup>10</sup> unto judgment; And spared not the old world, but saved Noah, the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly; And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly; And delivered<sup>11</sup> just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation<sup>12</sup> of the wicked: (For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds:.) The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation,<sup>13</sup> and to reserve the unjust<sup>14</sup> unto the day of judgment to be punished: But chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and despise government.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection:—The Apostle, having exhorted them to give attention to the prophecy of Holy Scripture, ch. i. 19, now warns them against the false prophets, delineating their character and adverting to their fearful end. As he often takes up the words of our Lord in the first Epistle, so he doubtless alludes here to passages like Matt. xxiv. 11. 12; vii. 15: "Beware of false prophets." He makes the transition with reference to the false prophets in Israel, in order that the believers to whom he wrote might not be alarmed at the appearance of erroneous teachers. Paul also had prophesied concerning such erroneous teachers, Acts xx. 29. 30. Those seducers are referred to in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, the first of John, and the book of Revelation, but especially in the Epistle of Jude. In those writings they are mostly described as already existing.

VER. 1. But there were false prophets also—destruction.—Besides those holy men of God, there were also false prophets among the people; the history of Ahab shows this, the books of the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel prove it more particularly, and ver. 15, below, gives an example in the case of Balaam.—ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι found here only, formed analogously to ψευδολόγος, 1 Tim. iv. 2; and ψευδοπροφήται. [Alford remarks that ψευδο, in the latter, is ambiguous, the word being either subjective=pretenders, not real prophets, or objective=prophesiers of false things; cf. for the latter, Jer. xiv. 14, LXX., ψευδῶς οἱ προφήται προφητεύουσιν . . . ; ib. 15; xxiii. 25.—M.] Dietlein: "Not a prophet or teacher who prophesies or teaches falsehood, but one who is not a prophet and yet falsely pretends to be one, cf. 2 Cor. xi. 13; Rev. ii. 2.—[Better make ψευδο, in ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι, ambiguous, and understand not only unauthorized pretenders, but also teachers of falsehood.—M.]—καρπεισάσουσι, not to bring forward, but to bring in beside, introduce secretly. In Jude occurs the similar term καρπεισάντων, they crept in through a false door. Bengel: "Beside the salutary doctrine of Christ."—Αἵρεσις from αἰρέω, a doctrine, a school, a sect. In the New Testament it is applied to the religious parties among the later Jews, contending with one another, Acts v. 17; xv. 5; xxvi. 5; in a bad sense, ch. xxiv. 5. 14; xxviii. 22. So especially, Titus iii. 10. "A man that is an heretic . . . reject." It denotes voluntary, deliberate deviating from purely Christian articles of belief, leading to divisions in the Church, cf. Herzog, Real. Encycl. Art. Häresie.—Ἀπολείας intensifies the idea of αἰρέσις. Not all heresies are equally pernicious, not all lead so decidedly to destruction. [Doubtful whether this distinction can be drawn; it certainly does not pertain ad rem; these false teachers, who surreptitiously bring in false teaching by the side of the true faith, bring upon themselves destruction. Their end is destruction, cf. Phil. iii. 19.—M.]

Deniers of the Master that bought them.—Winer assumes that the two Participles ἀρνούμενοι and ἐπάγοντες are not coördinate to each other, but that καὶ—ἐπάγοντες is to be connected with the principal verb thus: "Who shall bring in corrupting heresies, and also, denying the Lord, bring upon themselves swift destruction;" too artificial. Others take καὶ for even, "even denying the Lord," but this use of καὶ cannot be substantiated. Huther proposes to take the Participle ἐπάγοντες as the verbum finitum, but without any analogy. The construction, however, becomes quite simple by taking the three Participles coördinate and alike dependent on ἔσονται, and making ἐπάγοντες to refer to the two classes of seducers, without distinguishing them from each other. This precludes the necessity of changing the construction while καὶ retains its usual signification. The second form of seducers is a species of the former. The terms καρπεισάσουσιν and ἐπάγοντες correspond: they introduce their errors by stealth, but they draw upon themselves open and manifest destruction. [The reader has Frommüller's construction in the translation, and may think it less artificial than awkward. The construction of Alford (who takes καὶ as the simple Copula, and regards ἀρνούμενοι as standing in the place of the finite verb, coördinate with καρπεισάσουσιν, followed, as a consequence, by ἐπάγοντες κ. τ. λ.) seems least difficult; he renders "and denying the Master who bought them, bringing upon themselves swift destruction."—M.]

Of the Master that bought them.—δεσπότης denotes an absolute ruler [an autocrat.—M.] of bondmen or slaves. It is used of God the Father, Luke ii. 29; Acts iv. 24; Rev. vi. 10. Here the context requires us to apply it to Christ, cf. Jude 4, and Rev. i. 8, where Christ is called the Almighty. This term suits ἀγοράζειν better than κτρίζει.—1 Peter i. 18, has λυτροῦσθαι for ἀγοράζειν, the former of which indicates the infinitely precious ransom, generally ἐξαγοράζειν, to buy back from, out of, Gal. iii. 18; iv. 5; Eph. v. 16; Col. iv. 5. The simple ἀγοράζειν occurs at 1 Cor. vi. 20; Rev. v. 9; xiv. 8. 4. Calov: "The ransom is the blood of Christ, Matt. xx. 28. He, to whom it has been paid, is God, who chiefly held us in prison, whereas the devil is only His prison-keeper, from the hands of whom Christ has delivered us, Eph. v. 2; Heb. ix. 14. God in virtue of His justice required a ransom for our deliverance; in virtue of His mercy He accepted the ransom, which Christ paid for us."—Gerlach says: "These erroneous teachers had already become Christians, they had already experienced the saving effects of redemption, and had really left the service of the devil in Judaism or Paganism for the service of Christ." In support of this view v. 21 may be cited. But ἀγοράζειν is generally used to denote absolutely the vicarious satisfaction of Christ extending to all men, and consequently also to these false teachers; it is not used with the limitation that the effect of it has been experienced, as Calvin maintains, cf. 1 Tim. ii. 6; Eph. v. 2; Heb. ix. 14. Gerhard makes use of the illustration of a Christian ruler who pays a certain ransom for the redemption of prisoners into the hands of the Turkish Sultan. Those prisoners are truly redeemed, although they should refuse to accept the benefit of their liberation and continue in their bonds.

Deniers of the Master.—Their wickedness is the more enormous, because they deny their greatest Benefactor, in the service and confession of whom they ought cheerfully to die. The manner of their denial is not further defined. Bengel adds: "By their doctrine and works." Perhaps it is the same kind of denial as that of the false teachers in 1 Jno. ii. 28; iv. 2; v. 12; 2 Jno. 7. 9. The denial of the historical Christ, at once God and Man in one Person, as held and afterwards developed by the Gnostics into an anti-christian doctrine, partly with highly dangerous practical consequences.—Their denial may have had particular reference to the virtue of His sacrificial death and to His royal power over us, as His bondsmen.—[St. Peter, in inditing these words, doubtless felt deeply his own conduct in this respect, for notwithstanding the warning of Jesus, he denied Him thrice under the most painful circumstances. Matt. xxvi. 70. 72.—M.] ταχὴν ἀπώλειαν; ἀπώλεια, destruction, ruin in temporal and eternal death. This will be sudden, cf. ch. i. 14; their end will be attended with terrors, Ps. lxxiii. 19. Destruction shall overtake them swiftly, 1 Thess. v. 8, just as the coming of Christ will be sudden.

V. 2. And many shall follow after their licentiousnesses.—Cf. Matt. xxiv. 11, 12; 2 Tim. ii. 17. Errors, particularly those which give free scope to the flesh, are very contagious. [For an account of the Gnostic false teachers see below under Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 4.—M.] ἀσελγείας, licentiousnesses, dissolute habits, unclean living. We see from v. 19 that a false liberty [really libertinism.—M.] was the gospel of those false teachers. They confounded Christian liberty with unbridled license. The roots of the bold antinomian tendency, which we find in the second century among the Carpocratians and other Gnostics, descend to the middle of the first century. "The haughtiness of false spirituality and unbridled sensuality with them went hand-in-hand." Gerlach. De Wette exhibits gross confusion in the remark that "αἱρέσεις being called here all of a sudden, ἀσελγείαι, can only be explained from Jude 4."

By reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of.—ὅτι οὗς; refer the relative to those who are seduced. The way of truth is an expression taken from the Old Testament, cf. Gen. xxiv. 48; Ps. cxxxix. 24; Jer. xviii. 15; Amos viii. 14. The right manner of worshipping and serving God. So Acts xix. 9, 23. As a way to a traveller such is true religion to us men. It is evil spoken of among the heathens and the worldly-minded [Bengel: "ab iis qui foris sunt, discrimen ignorantibus verorum et falsorum Christianorum."—M.] who charge Christianity with the sins of false Christians. "They are wont to say: Look at the fruits of the Christian religion! The inference, although false, does harm, because it confirms those who draw it in their aversion to the truth and to Christ Himself." Roos.—Peter in his first Epistle, ch. iv. 14, and Paul in Rom. ii. 24 (cf. Jas. ii. 7) allude to this evil speaking. [Oecumenius describes the Nicolaitans and Gnostics as most "unholy in their doctrines and most licentious in their lives." Clem. Alex. states as a reason for his own writing, that false teachers, professing the name of Christians, and yet living shameless lives, have brought infamy (βλασφημίαν) upon the Christian name, even among the Gentiles, and that it was necessary to disabuse their minds of this illusion, and to vindicate the Gospel of Christ. See Wordsworth, who is very rich in illustrations on this subject.—M.]

V. 3. And in covetousness with feigned words they will make merchandise of you.—ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ; not only the lust of money, but also the lust of honour and pleasure. 'Εν is significant and denotes that they were sunk and immersed in it.—Πλάστοις λόγοις, another expression characteristic of Peter, with speeches deceitfully conceived and invented ["speciously fashioned in fair forms so as to allure and deceive," Wordsworth; Wetstein quotes Artemid. 1, 53, πλάσσειν δοκεῖ. . . . ἀγαθὸν ῥήτορας. . . . καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς ἀπατεῶσι, διὰ τὸ τὰ μὴ ὄντα ὡς ὄντα δεικνύειν τὰς τέχνας ταύτας.—M.] Cf. ch. i. 18; Rom. xvi. 18. Perhaps the reference is to fictitious stories of the life of Jesus and the Apostles.—Ἐμπορεύεσθαι, to trade (Jas. iv. 13), to import goods, to traffic, to make gain of, to overreach, cheat, cf. Hos. xii. 1; Prov. iii. 14; to deal in a thing, and to acquire a thing by traffic, is construed with the Accusative. Winer, p. 255, German ed., quotes from Josephus: ἐμπορ. τὴν ὄραν τὴν τοῦ σώματος, to trade in the beauty of the body; and from Philo: ἐνεμπορεύετο τὴν λήθην τῶν δικαστῶν, he made profit of the forgetfulness of the judges. Hence Winer inclines to the rendering, "they will seek to get profit out of you, to make gain of you," or as Dietlein puts it, "they will cheat you" (beschachern).—[The 6th ed. of Winer, Engl. Transl., does not contain these quotations. Winer says plainly, p. 236, that the word here means, "make merchandise of you."—M.] Gerlach: "They will sell you for coin the doctrines of their own inventing," cf. 1 Tim. vi. 5; Tit. i. 11. The equally proven sense, "to cheat, to deceive," seems to be most simple.

For whom judgment from of old liereth not.—οἷς τὸ κρίμα ἐκπαλαι. De Wette thinks it necessary to connect κρίμα and ἐκπαλαι, as if it were the judgment from of old decreed and predicted (Jude 4); for, taken with the verb, it would contain a contradiction; a judgment long since hastening! Dietlein defends this sense, saying that both the promises and the threatenings are from of old in process of continual fulfilment, although their final fulfilment is long delayed, ch. iii. 9. But this cannot be the meaning of the Apostle, for he speaks of a ταχυνὴ ἀπόλεια; the sense is rather: "for whom, according to an old experience, the judgment is not dilatory." De Wette's rendering, at any rate, is inadmissible; for it would require ἐκπαλαι before κρίμα. [Alford renders "for whom the sentence from long since is not idle"—after Bengel: "non est otiosum," who explains: i. e., "plane viget unum idemque est iudicium super omnes peccantes, quod in animo Judicis sine intermissione agitur dum erumpit: et in iis, qui puniti in Scriptura memorantur, ostenditur quid ceteros maneat: tametsi peccantes putant, illud cessare ipsique dormiant."] ]

And whose destruction slumbereth not.—An original expression, peculiar to Peter. It is generally used only of men, as is shown in the passage from Plato cited by Huther: μηδὲν εἶσθαι νυστάζοντος δικαστοῦ. Gerlach: "Punitive judgments live in God's immutable decree and break forth at the appointed time, and the specific instances recorded in history teach us what is in store for all. God is awake as the Judge, while He seems to be sleeping; but they, the recreants, sleep the sleep of security, while they seem to be awake in undisturbed activity and work." Hugo extends the expression to stings of conscience, which form already a part of hell, in Gerhard, p. 195.

V. 4. For if God spared not the angels that had sinned.—Now follow three examples in illustration of ἐκπαλαι, which clearly exhibit the punitive justice alongside the saving justice of God.—εἰ γάρ. Winer, de Wette and al. assume here the existence of an anacoluthon; but the apodosis of the three prataes [1.—εἰ γάρ; 2. καὶ ἀρχ. κόσμ; 3. καὶ πόλει.—M.] occurs at v. 9, although couched in more general terms than might have been expected, respect being had to the exhibition of Divine justice to the pious.

Spared not.—Bengel: "Severe judgment is announced upon those of whom we should have expected that they would be spared." Complete the sentence thus: "If He did not spare those who stood higher and enjoyed greater dignity, much less will He spare the less." [But in order to bring this out ἀγγέλων ἀμαρτησάντων should be rendered without the article, viz.: "For if God spared not angels having sinned," then supply, "much less will He spare these false teachers."—M.]

That had sinned.—In Jude 6, we have the addition, "who kept not their principality, but left their own habitation," or according to Stier, "who left their original true dominion and dignity," cf. Jno. viii. 44. Dietlein supposes on untenable grounds that vv. 4 and 5 belong together, and that Peter therefore stands up as an authority that Gen. vi. 2, refers not to the Sethites, but to angels; that he alludes more particularly to that last form of the development of sin when they entered into sexual relations with the daughters of men. As to Gen. vi. 2 we are unable to abandon the view that it relates to the amalgamation of the Sethites and Cainites, cf. Luke xx. 34-36. (Dettinger, Tübinger Zeitschrift, 1835, 1; Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, 1858, No. 29.)—ἀμαρτω. ἀγγ. above, probably would never have been interpreted otherwise than as setting forth the first fall in the realm of spirits, unless the passage, Jude 6, 7, had been believed to contain a reference to a propeia on the part of angels. But this view is founded on a false interpretation of τοῖσιν, which belongs not to the first mentioned angels, but clearly to the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, hence the masculine τοῖσιν. So Keil. It is alleged in the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung that ἐκτροπ. is only used to describe that kind of incontinence which violates an existing bond, that Gen. vi. refers to matrimony, while v. 8 discountenances altogether all reference to angels; that angels indeed denote sometimes fallen angels, 1 Cor. vi. 8 (against Stier); that Jude must not be interpreted by the book of Enoch, which, at the time when that Epistle was written, was perhaps not even extant (?). Hence the sinning on the part of angels in our passage can only be understood of the revolt of Satan and his associates, 1 Jno. iii. 8. 10. Kurtz, Delitzsch and al. interpret differently, while Keil (Lutherische Zeitschrift, 1855, 2), defends our view of Gen. vi. 2 and 2 Peter ii. 4, on weighty grounds. The angel interpretation is found in Justin, Athenagoras, Cyprian and al.; also in the Syrian Church; in the Hellenistic and Palestinian synagogue; the Sethite interpretation is held by writers of the Middle Ages, but also earlier by Julius Africanus, Ephrem the Syrian and al.; also by Luther, Melancthon, Calvin.

But cast them in bonds of darkness into hell and committed them.—σείρα from εἶπεν, to tie, bind, wind (?), a cord, a rope, a band, a noose, not a chain. Jude 6 has instead, δεσμός, a bond, a band, a fetter. [But the most authentic reading (see Appar. Crit. on v. 4) is σείρας from σείρος=σίφος or σῖβρος, σῖφος, properly a cave where corn is stored (Demosth.); a pit, a wolf's den; in that case render "dens of darkness." Cf. Alford and the Lexica.—M.]

xvii. 18, in connection with the plagues of Egypt, uses the following expression: "ἀλύσει σκότους ἐδόθησαν, they were bound with indissoluble (?) bonds of darkness." As the bonds here are only a figure of the binding (?) power of darkness, so they are doubtless in our passage. Hence Bengel: "Darkness itself keeps them bound and is to them like a chain." Jude 5. 6 is more explicit: "he hath reserved them (bound) in everlasting chains under darkness." In both passages ζόφος, profound, extreme darkness, is used for σκότος. Jude 13. gives both words to express the highest degree of darkness. Although these bonds must not be taken literally, the darkness must not be confined to the darkness of their wickedness, but should be taken to denote real darkness, and the custody in which they are kept, a real custody. But this custody of the evil angels, says Bengel, is as yet preliminary, and the servants of hell may still remain on earth, Lke. viii. 31; Eph. ii. 2; Acts v. 8; xiii. 10; just as prisoners of war are sometimes permitted to go beyond the place of their confinement.—Ταρταρώσας, another term peculiar to Peter and not found in the LXX. Grotius rightly remarks that it denotes in Classic Greek to cast down into Tartarus, not to condemn to Tartarus. Nor does τάρταρος occur either in the N. T. or in the LXX.; the Greeks conceived it to be the lowest region of the earth, full of darkness and cold, not a region in the air, as Grotius, quoting Plutarch, supposes. So Tertullian, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Theodoret. It is=ἄβυσσος, while ᾗδης describes the abode of the dead in general, and γέννα denotes the final place of punishment, the lake of fire, Rev. xx. 10-14; Mtth. xxv. 44, consequently the preliminary place of confinement and state of spirits, similar to what Sheol is for men. Huther connects παρέδωκε with σείραϊς; but the most simple construction is to connect ταρταρώσας with σείραϊς.

Being kept unto judgment.—Εἰς κρίσιν προσημνίου belong together. A judgment has probably been passed upon them already, but the final judgment is still in store for them, cf. Matt. viii. 29; Rev. xx. 10; Jas. ii. 19. The Epistle of Jude amplifies "unto the judgment of the great day."—Τηρουμένους, as criminals that are now reserved for judgment [from a present point of view.—M.] Winer, p. 858.—"They are as unable to work themselves out of their darkness as is a prisoner to extricate himself from his chains."—Roos. But this author errs when he continues: "Just as the word prison, Job xxxvi. 13, and the term hell, 1 Sam. ii. 6, do not describe a place, but a condition, so the term tartarize with reference to the apostate angels does not describe a being locked up in a bad place, but rather the translation to a bad condition. These angels, be they wherever they may, are in a tartaric condition." The latter is true, but the abstraction, which precedes it, is not biblical.—Grotius sees in their being reserved a particular reference to their inability of going beyond the confines of the place assigned to them, and of doing any thing without permission. Stier calls attention to the deep irony which he detects in these words, whereby the Almighty holds those mighty ones up to derision, an irony of the initial judgment of their perverse doings. "They would not keep their first estate and appointed habitation, and for this they must now, in virtue of the new power exerted against them by the Creator, be sadly kept and held fast unto guilt and punishment in the state of sin of which they made deliberate choice." This is perhaps too ingenious.

VER. 5. And spared not the old world, but preserved Noah, the eighth person, a herald of righteousness.—The second example, which is not given by Jude, is taken from the flood.

The old world, the world primeval. Dietlein: "Not absolutely the antediluvian race; it includes impersonal creation in so far as it surrounded that primordial race and being, as it were, its body, participated both in its corruption and punishment."—"Ὀὐδὸν Νῶε. As the Apostle in 1 Peter iii. 20, attaches importance to the small number of the saved, so he does here in the case of Noah and his wife, three sons and their three wives; cf. on this use of the ordinal, Winer, p. 268. "The eight souls are contrasted with the most numerous world of the ungodly."—Bengel. Among the Patriarchs Noah is the tenth. There is here consequently no room for a prophetic-symbolical reference. The allusion is plainly to the small number of the saved at all times. [Wordsworth: "Seven is the number of completion and rest, the Sabbatical number: and in Enoch—the seventh from Adam—who walked with God, and did not die, but was translated from the turmoil of this world to a heavenly rest, and taken up to God, there appears to be a figurative adumbration of the Sabbath of heavenly rest, which remaineth to the people of God, Heb. iv. 9." Wordsworth has this note with reference to Jude, v. 14: "Enoch, the seventh from Adam," and thinks that Peter not only calls attention to the fact that Noah was saved with seven others, but that it places him as it were at the highest point of the climax.—M.]

Herald, preacher of righteousness.—He stood up against the world, denounced its unrighteousness and corruption, and exhorted it to repentance and conversion. Διακοσίτην. Huther: "Here not=righteousness of faith, but in the Old Testament sense=piety exhibited in obedience to the will of God." [Alford: The fact that Noah was thus a preacher of (moral) righteousness to the depravity of his age, is found alluded to in Joseph. Antiq., I., 8. 1.—Ὁ Νῶεος δὲ, τοῖς παττομένοις ἐν αὐτῷ δυσχεραίνων καὶ τοῖς βουλευμασιν ἀφῶς ἔχων, ἐπέδεν ἐπὶ τὸ κρείττον αὐτοῦ τὴν διάνοιαν καὶ τὰς πράξεις μετασφύρειν. Bereschith Rabba, XXX., 6, in Wetstein: "κῆρυξ generationis diluvii, id est, Noachus."—M.]

Bringing the flood upon the world of the ungodly.—κατακλυσμὸν from κατακλύω, the deluge, confluence of the seas, cf. ch. iii. 6.

מבול Gen. vi. 17.—Ἐπάφας, that which here is referred to the operation of God, is described in ch. ii. 1, as the guilt of man. The two should go together. [Human depravity the cause of Divine punishment.—M.]

VER. 6. And burning to ashes the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, etc.—The third example is the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, cf. Jude 7.—Τερροῖν from τέραρα, to burn to ashes.—Καταστροφήν κατέκρινεν. Dietlein and al. translate: "He condemned them actually by overthrow;" but we prefer rendering with de Wette, Huther and al.: "He condemned them to overthrow," like κατακρίνεν θανάτῳ, Matt. xx. 18; Mark x. 33.—Καταστροφή, cf. Gen. xix. 29, LXX.; 2 Tim. ii. 14; Jude amplifies, see v. 7.—Ἰσὺς δειγμα τεθεικὸς=παράδειγμα: Jude has δειγμα, proof, figure, example, similitude, by which something is shown, cf. Jas. v. 10; Heb. iv. 11; viii. 5; John xiii. 15.—Dietlein strangely accounts for the use of the word by Peter's preference for ἐν. The Perfect is very emphatic, being usually employed to denote an action completed, conceived as continuing in its effects, cf. Winer, p. 286. Bengel: "It was an irrefragable monument of God and of the Divine judgment."—Peter probably alludes here to 8 Macc. ii. 5.

VER. 7. And delivered righteous Lot, etc.—Καταπονόμενον, cf. Acts vii. 24, καταπονέω to wear down or tire out, to oppress, to harass beyond bearing (Alf.). Connect with ἐν τῇ ἀναστροφῇ. Others join ἐν with ἐρρίσαστο, rendering "out of the power of the bad conversation, under the influence of which he had been left," cf. Winer, p. 886.—Ἐν ἀσέλγεια ἀναστροφή, cf. 1 Peter i. 17.—Ἀθεσμος from θεσμός, a lawless, abandoned man, an antinomian; Bengel: "One who sins against nature;" Gerhard: "One who cares neither for right nor law." Only here and ch. iii. 17.

VER. 8. For seeing and hearing the righteous man, etc.—Parenthetical explanation of καταπονόμενον. Instead of the lawless tormenting his soul, it was he, the righteous man, who tormented his righteous soul.—Βλέμματα καὶ ἀκοὴ belong to ἐπαρσίνευν. Wherever he turned and saw and heard, his soul was distressed at the wickedness that surrounded him. The sense here is similar to John xi. 83, where it is said of Jesus that He ἐπάραθεν ἑαυτὸν. Dietlein: "Pain at one's own sin and at sin in general must not only be felt, but it must be a pain effected by the soul itself by reason of its turning to God."—Καταπονόμενον denotes the passive side of the pain. Bede connects δικαίος with βλέμματα καὶ ἀκοή, and renders, "righteous because he did not suffer himself to be seduced by seeing and hearing."—Ἀνόμους ἐργούς denotes the object of his distress.

VER. 9. The Lord knoweth, etc.—The apodosis is expressed in terms which apply the preceding examples not only to the lawless, but also to the pious.—Οἶδε. Knowledge and power combined. Κῆριος, God the Father, according to v. 4.—εἰσεβείς, those who like Noah and Lot walk in faith in the living God.

Out of temptation, cf. 1 Peter i. 6; iv. 12; Matt. vi. 13; xxvi. 41; Luke viii. 13; Acts xx. 19; 1 Cor. x. 13; 1 Tim. vi. 9; Heb. iii. 8; Jas. i. 2; Rev. iii. 10.—To deliver (rescue), cf. Jer. xxxix. 11. 18; xlv. 5; Ex. xviii. 10.—Κατασφύεινους τηρεῖν.—Some take κατ. as Future, but Winer remarks that this is unnecessary, because the idea of the Future is already implied in τηρεῖν εἰς ἡμέραν; and the Present seems to have been chosen intentionally in order to show that their punishment has already begun before the last judgment, cf. v. 4.

V. 10. But chiefly those who go after the flesh.—Jude v. 7, applies to the cities of the plain that which here is affirmed of the false teachers, viz., “Πόλεις . . . ἐκπορνέουσιν καὶ ἐπιδοῦναι ὀπίσω σαρκὸς ἐρέρας. Then in v. 8 it is said of the false teachers, that “likewise these . . . defile the flesh.” The comparison of the two passages will show that Jude amplifies and explains more fully than is the case in our passage. Stier interprets ἐκπορνέειν with reference to the next following expression, as—excess of debauchery, to commit fornication out of all rule and order, beyond the limits of nature.—Ὀπίσω σαρκὸς ἐρέρας, besides the horrors of sensuality, mentioned in Gen. xix. 5, and Rom. i. 27, refers evidently to the terrible sins of Sodom, which are enumerated in Lev. xviii. 22-24 among the horrors of the Canaanite heathen.—Our passage, on the other hand, is kept more in general; they seek their pasture in the flesh, in all manner of sensuality, they go in their infamous lust after every flesh.

In lust of defilement.—Ἐπιθυμία μασμοῦ, not as Dietlein contends, “in lust, which is defilement,” nor like Huther, “in lust after impure, polluting enjoyment,” for where does μασμός signify “polluting enjoyment?” It denotes defilement, stain, intercourse; connect it with the lust of concupiscence, 1 Thess. iv. 5; cf. Rom. i. 24-27; Eph. iv. 18, 19. Μασμός also peculiar to Peter, and found only here in the New Testament. The description of these erroneous teachers reminds us of the Balaamites and Nicolaitanes in Rev. ii. 14. 15. 20. 24, in whom we recognize a stem of the fourfold Gnosticism of the second century. The circumstance that Peter now passes from the Future ἔσονται, v. 1, to the Present, must not be turned with de Wette into a reason for suspecting the genuineness of this Epistle. It may be accounted for in part by the Apostle's prophetically exalted frame of mind, for his fiery language shows him throughout as a φερόμενος πρὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου (cf. ch. i. 21), and in part by the fact that the beginnings of those melancholy phenomena were already stirring. A forger of that capacity, which the Epistle presupposes, would have consistently adhered to the position he had taken at v. 1.

And despise lordship.—The first mark of those false teachers was the denial of Christ, ch. ii. 1; the second, covetousness, v. 8; the third, unbridled sensuality, ch. ii. 10; the last, arrogant despising of lordship. Κυριότητος καταρροῦντας. Jude 8 has κυριότητα ἀθετοῦσι, which goes further than καταρρ., and is its consequence. Κυριότητα should be taken in a general sense; every and any lordship, whatever shall be and shall be called Lord, all Divine and human authority. So Stier. The word must not be limited to the dignity of Christ's lordship, because that had already been referred to v. 1. Dietlein applies it to Divine and superhuman powers, cf. Eph. i. 21; Col. i. 16; ii. 18; Calvin, to earthly governments; Huther understands it of the Divine Being, because all power and authority repose in It; while with reference to the book of Enoch he explains δόξα of the halo of glory surrounding the Being of God.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. We must not believe that those false teachers passed theoretically from the denial of Christ's redeeming grace and lordship to their moral libertinism and sensual enormities; the usual psychological course is rather that the heart is first corrupted, that the will is sold to sin, and that then the understanding becomes darkened.

2. The account of the angels given in v. 4 falls in with what the Bible teaches concerning angels in general, and must not excite in us the suspicion that it is apocryphal. It is doubtless founded on special revelations.

3. It is remarkable that anti-Christian phenomena, similar to those which threatened to overthrow the foundation of the Church in the beginning, spring up in our time. Stier refers more particularly to the rapidly spreading, fearful doctrines of the liberty of the flesh, and to the sins darkly skulking among the ungodly men of our time, especially to self-abuse.

4. [The principal heresies which sprung up in the Apostolical age, and developed themselves before the close of the first century, were:

1. Simonianism, or the opinions held by followers of Simon Magus, who taught that the three Persons of the Trinity were only three revelations of the same Person, and that Simon was the great power which emanated from the invisible God. Neander thinks it possible that the words of which Simon made use are contained in the apocryphal writings of the Simonians; see Jerome's Comm. on Matth., 24: “Ego sum sermo Dei (ὁ λόγος), ego sum speciosus, ego paracletus.”

2. Docetism, or the doctrine of the Docetæ, who denied the reality of the human body of Christ, of His crucifixion, resurrection and ascent to heaven.

3. The doctrine of the Nicolaitans, who were noted for their licentiousnesses.

4. Ebionism, or the heresy of the Ebionites, who denied the Divinity of Christ, and maintained that He was a mere man, descended from Joseph and Mary.

5. The doctrine of the Cerinthians, who separated Jesus from Christ, and asserted that Christ descended from the Father into the person of Jesus at His baptism, in the form of a dove, preached during His ministry and worked miracles, that at the end of His ministry Christ flew away from Jesus, and did not suffer death, and that only the man Jesus was crucified.

These all “denied the Lord that bought them.”—M.]

6. [The following note of Wordsworth on evil angels embodies much valuable information. He says: This passage and the parallel in St. Jude 6, are two important texts on the present condition and future destiny of evil angels, and, consequently, of those persons who yield to their solicitations (cf. Matt. xxv. 41); these two texts declared:

1. That some angels sinned, and, as a penalty for their sin, were cast out of their original habitation; and,

2. That they have been committed in custody to chains of darkness; and that they are now being kept in them, and they there endure some punishment.

8. That they there remain even to the end of the world, and are reserved there for the judgment of the great day.

This appears also from the language of the devils themselves to Christ: "Art thou come to torment us before the season (καιρος) of judgment?" See Matt. viii. 29; Lke. viii. 31.

It is also evident from our Lord's words, describing the transactions of the great day. He there pre-announces that He will then say to them on the left hand, "Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, that hath been prepared for the devil and his angels." They are, therefore, not yet cast into it.

It is also further apparent from the Apocalypse, revealing the casting of the devil into the lake of fire, as an event which has not taken place, but is yet future, Rev. xx. 10.

4. Comparing also these texts with other portions of Holy Scripture (1 Pet. v. 8), where the devil is compared to a roaring lion walking about, seeking whom he may devour; and (Rev. xx. 7), where Satan is described as loosed; and with the clear assertions of the Apostolic writings, describing his present liberty, energy, and influence, and designating him as "the prince of the power of the air" (ἀέρας, not αἰθέρας, Eph. ii. 2), and as "the god of this world" (2 Cor. iv. 4), we must conclude, that the chains of darkness, of which the Apostles St. Peter and St. Jude speak, and to which Satan and his associates are now confined, and in which they will be kept even till the day of judgment, are of such power as to restrain them from ever recovering their place in the regions of light; but not such as to prevent them from exercising great power over those persons in the lower world who allow themselves "to be taken captive by them at their will." See Wordsw. on Eph. ii. 2, and Rev. xx. 1-8.

The book of Enoch in like manner describes the evil angels as chained under the earth, till the day of judgment, when they will be cast into the lake of fire. See there ch. v. 16; x. 6; xiv. 4; xxi. 6; xxii. 4. Huther, p. 205. Cf., also, the Catena here, p. 91, where we read, that "at the end of the world, Christ will condemn to severer punishment those evil angels whom He has already shut up (in the abyss), and this He will do by casting them into everlasting fire." And Bede says here: "The apostate angels are yet to be condemned to the penalties of the final judgment; for although they have already received the nether regions of the murky air as a prison house, which, when compared with the bright glories of heaven, where they once dwell, may be called an inferno, yet there is a deeper gulf below, which awaits them."

Accordingly, Jerome (in Eph. vi.) delivers it as the opinion of all the doctors of the Church, that "the devils have now their abode in the space between heaven and earth." And Augustine (de Civ., Dei, 8, 22) says, "that the devils dwell in this nether air, and being cast down from heaven for their sin, they are here pre-condemned as in a prison, suitable to their sin." And it is asserted as an article of the Catholic faith by Irenæus (1, 2), that "Jesus Christ will come again hereafter, to raise all bodies, and to judge all men, and to cast the rebel angels into everlasting fire." Justin Martyr, Origen, in

Numb., cap. 22, Irenæus (5, 26), and Eusebius (4, 17), were of opinion "that the devils never openly blasphemed God before the publication of the Gospel, because they did not know till then what their future punishment would be," which opinion, whether true or no, shows that those ancient writers did not imagine that the devil has, as yet, been cast into hell. See the discourse of Joseph Mede; Works, p. 25, Disc. 5.—M.]

6. [The Gnostic teachers, says Wordsworth, despised and annulled κυριότητα, or lordship, in various ways:

1. With regard to God the Father, the Κύριος Κυρία, LORD OF LORDS. Tillemont (2, pp. 17, 28), "all who took the name of Gnostics distinguished the Creator of the world from the God who reveals Himself by His Son; thus they made two gods," i. e., they despised lordship by their dualism.

2. With regard to the Lord Jesus Christ. The Ebionites, as we have seen above, regarded Jesus as a mere man; the Cerinthians separated Jesus from Christ, and denied the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, by which He had acquired universal lordship over the Church and the world; they also invoked other mediators in place of Christ. They denied the Lord that bought them, and would not call Him Lord (Iren. 1, 1.).

3. With regard to earthly rules, by affirming themselves to be free to do all things, and to be exempt from all civil restraints. See more in Wordsworth, from whom this note is taken in a condensed form.—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The history of the Divine judgments an earnest monitor for all times.—The great comfort of the doctrine of universal redemption.—It is not enough that we teach sound doctrine, we must also denounce false teachers.—The rise of false teachers among the people of God is a historical necessity, 1 Cor. xi. 19; Matt. vii. 15.—In how many different ways may Christ be denied?—Which is the greatest gain?

CHRYSOSTOM:—"We admire Abraham, Lot and Moses, because they shone like bright stars in the darkness of night, because they were as roses among thorns, and as sheep among countless wolves."

The pious are distressed at the wickedness of the godless, 1. because it sullies the glory of God; 2. because it shows that they are tyrannized by Satan; 3. because it conduces to their condemnation.

GERHARD:—"The pious are not preserved from every distress and affliction, but they are rescued from them, so that the help of God is so much the more manifest. Thus it fared with Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, David, Daniel and the three men in the furnace."

STARKE:—"Try the spirits whether they are of God, 1 Jno. iv. 1. If not before, a happy death is sure to bring perfect redemption, Ps. lxxiii. 17. 19.—As there are degrees among believers, and as some excel others in spiritual gifts, and as they will be distinguished in glory, so there is also a difference in point of sin and punishment among the ungodly. Some excel others in wickedness; so the punishment of some will excel that of others, Heb. x. 29.

CHAPTER II. 106-22.

ANALYSIS:—Further description of the false teachers; their radical corruptness and daring scoffing; their perilous state.

- 106 Presumptuous are they, self-willed, they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities.<sup>1</sup>
 17 These are wells without water, clouds<sup>19</sup> that are carried with a tempest; to whom the mist of darkness is reserved for ever.<sup>20</sup> For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean<sup>21</sup> escaped from them who live in error. While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same<sup>22</sup> is he brought in bondage. For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord<sup>23</sup> and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning. For it had been better<sup>24</sup> for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from<sup>25</sup> the holy commandment delivered unto them. But<sup>26</sup> it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and, The sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ψ. 106. 11. Darens, self-willed, etc.—τολμηταί.—Here begins a new section. Peter anticipates the future here, as well as in the first Epistle. Before his prophetic eye, the false teachers, who were afterwards to arise, appear as already present. This word, peculiar to Peter, denotes bold, daring, audacious, or insolent men. [The word occurs only here, but is found in Joseph., B. III., 10, 12, and Thucid., I., 70; in the latter passage, the Corinthians describe the Athenians as καὶ παρὰ δύναμιν τολμηταί, καὶ παρὰ γνώμην κινδυνεύοντες.—M.]

Αἰθάδεις from αἰτῶς and ἀέτω, self-willed, presumptuous persons, Tit. i. 7.—βλασφημοῦντες, on the Participle, see Winer, pp. 857–872.—δόξας, not: glorious attributes of God, but angelic powers, majesties, as is evident from the next verse and the Epistle of Jude. The reference is doubtless to the angels surrounding the throne of the Most High, cf. Eph. i. 21; Col. i. 16.

[Wordsworth:—What are δόξας or glories here? Doubtless the word δόξα is chosen, as the word κυριότης before, for its large and general import. It signifies,—

1. The μεγαλοπρεπὲς δόξα, the excellent glory, the Divine Shechina of the Godhead itself, i. 17.

2. The glory of the Incarnate Word, Jno. i. 14; James ii. 1.

3. The glory of the Holy Ghost.

The false teachers blasphemed the glory of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, by disparaging the Creator and Redeemer, and by ascribing the work of the Divine Sanctifier to their own magical arts, and by calumniating the prophecies of Holy Scripture, given by His inspiration.

4. They denied the resurrection of the flesh, and thus they derogated from the future glories of Christ, when He "will come in His glory (Matt. xxv. 81) and in the glory of His Father" (Matt. xvi. 27), and when "He will be glorified in His saints" (2 Thess. i. 10); and in "their glorious bodies" fashioned to be like unto His glorious body," Phil. iii. 21. See 1 Pet. i. 11, the only other passage in N. T., beside Jude 8, where δόξα is found in the Plural, as here.

5. They spake evil of the glory of the holy angels. The Simonians represented them as the offspring of Simon Magus, who "was glorified by many as God." See Catena here, p. 98, where it is truly said, "Peter here refers to the Simonians, who blended licentiousness with ungodliness," and they traduced the holy angels as rebels against God; See Iren., I., 23, 1. And the successor of Simon Magus, Menander, called himself the Saviour, and affirmed that he could impart knowledge greater than that of the angels, Iren., I., 23, 6.

6. They spake evil of earthly dignities, which are images and glories of God's majesty (Rom. xiii. 1–3), and are even called gods (Ps. lxxii. 6), as man himself is, in his headship over woman, 1 Cor. xi. 7.

7. They spake evil of the glories of the natural world (1 Cor. xv. 40), ascribing their creation to the operation of the Demurge, hostile to the Supreme God.—M.]

Dietlein applies it both to the Divine dignity of Christ and to the angels, and afterwards adds that even Satan is included among the glories that are evil spoken of. Stier, with most modern commentators, explains: "The angels, although greater in strength and might, do not pass before the Lord a railing sentence on the majesties; they know and perhaps announce the judgment, but leave it in humility to the one Lord, aware that they, as well as the evil powers, are before His face; any other word of self-willed abuse appears to them as a railing of those who are as yet spared the executive judgment, and really as a railing of the power and long-suffering of God, and therefore they abstain therefrom." He agrees with Gerlach, who says: "Even if the Lord in His own presence charges them with the execution of the (preliminary) sentence on such high (evil) spirits, they do not utter it in the form of self-willed railing." But this interpretation is not without grave objections. 1. δόξαι are made to denote angelic and demoniac powers; since, according to this view, κατ' αὐτῶν is referred to evil spirits, logical consistency requires that δόξαι also be referred to them. But is it probable that these are called δόξαι, glories? This reminds one of lucus a non lucendo. The railing is to consist in saying that they are only phantoms and superstitious ideas. This would be denial, not railing. 2. The reference in v. 4, with which our passage is connected, being to evil angels, it would be very surprising to have in v. 11 an abrupt reference to good angels. The qualifying μειζονες applies much better to evil angels than to good ones, to whom it belongs as a matter of course, and its application to them would be rather weak. Moreover, ἄγγελοι here answer to the τολμηταί of the preceding verse, and we have, therefore, to assume a similar disposition in these. 3. φέρειν κρίσιν, v. 11, is said to mean "to pass a sentence"; but it will be difficult to verify this rendering, although ἐπιφέρειν is used in the Epistle of Jude, 4. But would that be a railing judgment, a railing decision in the same sense, in which the false teachers pass it, if the good angels were to give a true, although a harsh judgment of the evil angels? For βλασφημεῖν means to defame one, to speak evil of one, contrary to the truth. 5. Οὐ φέρονται is evidently related to οὐ τρέμονται, and this relation would be entirely effaced if φέρειν were rendered to pass (judgment). These reasons could be overlooked only because it was thought necessary to expound this passage by the parallel passage in Jude. But this changes the true point of view. We must endeavour to explain our passage independently of that in Jude, and this leads to the result that the angels are evil angels, that φέρειν means to bear (Luther), and βλασφημον κρίσιν = βλασφημίας κρίσιν, cf. Jude 9, the judgment on their railing at God. The sense is as follows: "The wrath of God and the judgment which God passes on them in judgment of their railing, are unbearable to the evil angels, who have stronger shoulders than those false teachers, how much more then ought these to tremble at blaspheming the angelic majesties, cf. v. 4." It is not known to us what those blasphemings were. It is evident from ἐν οἷς ἀγνοοῦσι, v. 12, that the reference could not have been to terrestrial majesties, governments and princes.—Ὅπου = cum, where, whereas, 1 Cor. iii. 8.—κατ' αὐτῶν = κατ' ἐαυτῶν.—Παρά κυρίῳ, before the Lord, in the face of the Lord, or from the Lord, with Him the Judge, cf. Acts xxvi. 8; 1 Pet. ii. 20; Winer, p. 413. De Wette's remark that the sense in our passage is incoherent is superficial and unjust.

VER. 12. But these, as irrational animals, etc.—ἄλογα.—Evil angels know and feel the wrath of God; those false teachers are inferior to them, they are like animals that know nothing of a higher world. They are φυσικά, they belong altogether to the sphere of nature; it is as if they had no soul and still less a spirit. They are not led by reason, but only by their natural appetites, cf. Ps. xlix. 13. 21; cxli. 10. Some take φυσικά for φυσικῶς.—[Bede here excellently remarks that there is a resemblance between these false teachers and brute beasts, in that both are led by their fleshy appetites to fall into snares and destruction. Cf. Bava Mezia, quoted by Wetstein, p. 706: Quidam vitulus, cum ad macellandum adduceretur, R. Judam accessit, caputque in ejus gremium reponens flevit. Sed ille, abi, inquit, in hunc finem creatus es.—M.]

Γεγεννημένα.—This is their natural destination, for this purpose they are created, i. e., to be caught by men, and to be killed for their use. Εἰς ἁλῶσιν καὶ φθοράν, both to be taken passively, not actively.—"Peter may be supposed to allude to their falling as prisoners into the hands of the government, and their suffering punishment according to human laws." Roos. Ἐν οἷς ἀγνοοῦσι βλασφημοῦντες, attraction for ἐν ἐκείνοις ἃ ἀγνοοῦσι, like בְּחִירָה, 2 Sam. xxiii. 9, בְּקֶלֶב, Is. viii. 21, Winer, p. 651. Dietlein sees in ἐν τούτοις the sphere in which the railing takes place, cf. 1 Pet. ii. 12. Therein lies the ground of their perishing, that which constitutes their guilt and distinguishes them from brute beasts.—Ἐν τῇ φθορᾷ φθαρσονται. Φθορά is inward, moral corruption and the spiritual death to which it leads, cf. ch. i. 4. The verb denotes outward destruction and future condemnation.—Their outward destruction here is still followed by retribution hereafter, the reward of their unrighteousness.

VER. 13. Receiving the reward of unrighteousness.—Κοιμώμενοι, cf. 1 Pet. i. 9. The participial sentences which follow must not be connected with ἐπλανήθησαν, which does not contain the leading thought of this paragraph, but they belong to what precedes and explain the unrighteousness of those false teachers, which unrighteousness should be taken in a general sense (cf. Lke. xiii. 27; Rom. i. 18). Some of these participles are subordinate to the preceding ones, e. g., ἐνωχόμενοι, but most of them are coördinate.

Deeming revelling in the daytime their highest pleasure.—Ἡδονὴν ἡγοῦμενοι.—They know no other pleasure than τρυφή, rendered by the Syriac, deliciae, voluptuousness, revelling, luxurious living.—Τὴν ἡμέραν. Oecumenius = καθ' ἡμέραν, Lke. xvi. 19, daily. Others = momentary, transient well-living, as the day supplies it. So de Wette. Or: spending the day, without thinking of the future. So Dietlein

But all these renderings are contrary to grammatical usage. Gerhard:—the time of this present life, which compared with eternity, is only as one day. The right sense follows from a comparison with 1 Thess. v. 7: "They that be drunken, are drunken in the night." But these are so lost to all sense of shame, that they revel at noon-day. We may also cite the case of those heroes of drunkenness, who revel all day long, Is. v. 22. [The Gnostics were renowned for such excesses. Jerome (adv. Lucif., p. 58) says, tunc Nicolaus diu nocturne nuptias faciens obscenas, etc.; and Epiphanius, haer., 25, gives one of their maxims, "that a man had no hope of everlasting life, ἐὰν μὴ καθ' ἐκάστην ἡμέραν λαγυεῖν."—M.]

They are full of spots and blemishes, revelling in their deceits, while they feast with you.—Σπίλοι, in Jude 12 σπίλιδες, from σπίλω, to stain, to soil. Both are identical in point of meaning, only the one is an adjective, the other a substantive. Stains, spots on garments, or in the face, moral stain.—Μῶμος=blame, disgrace [disfigurements, causing shame. Alford.—M], peculiar to Peter. They are people full of spots and disgrace, who stain the body of Christ and themselves, Deut. xxxii. 5. The two words must not be connected with ἐντυφώντες, as de Wette maintains, but they stand by themselves.—ἐντυφώντες ἐν ταῖς ἀπάταις αὐτῶν, they revel in the gain of their deceits. The abstr. pro concreto. [A good sense may be obtained if the reading ἀγάταις, cf. Jude 12, be retained. They called their gatherings ἀγάται, love-feasts, but they were occasions of revelry.—If ἀπάταις be retained, the remark of Windischmann (Vind. Petr., p. 45) will be found useful: "St. Peter would not call these heretical feasts by an honourable name (ἀγάταις), but styles them ἀπάταις, and describes their true character by adding the word ἐντυφώντες." There is also a similar paronomasia or play on the words ἀπάτη and ἀγάπη in 2 Thess. ii. 10.—M.]—Συνευχόμενοι from εὐωχία, ἐχω, ὀχέω and εὐ, explained by Polux, of public banquets.

VER. 14. Having eyes full of an adulteress, etc.—Dietlein has the curious notion that the allusion is to some female member of a house into which they had crept, who had already become the victim of their seduction. Μοιχαλίδος is more pregnant than the reading ὀφθαλμοῖς μεστοῖς μοιχαλίας, which evidently originated with later transcribers. Horneus explains it well: "adulteresses dwell, as it were, in their eyes." But this does not yet account for the Singular. Respect is probably had to the harlot in Prov. ii. 16; vi. 24. Ἀκαταπαύστος connected with ὀφθαλμοῖς: full of ungratified lust of sin, insatiable in it. Another most pregnant term, peculiar to Peter, cf. 1 Pet. iv. 1. Lustfulness is reflected in their eyes.

Luring unstable souls—children of malediction.—Δελεῖοντες from δέλεω, a bait to allure and attract with a bait, as does a fowler to catch birds, or a fisherman to catch fish, Jas. i. 14. [Wordsworth: "A word twice used in this Epistle, see v. 18; and a metaphor likely to occur to St. Peter, the fisherman of Galilee, to whom our Lord said, Matt. xvii. 27, βάλε ἄγκιστρον, cast a hook."—M.]

Ἀσθηρίκτους, cf. ch. iii. 16, a peculiar expression, explained by Jerome thus: "Souls which are not yet strong through the love of Christ," and therefore easily turn hither and thither.—Γεγυμνασμένην, practised, exercised, schooled.—Πλεονεξίας, covetousness in its various kinds and forms, cf. 1 Pet. ii. 1; 2 Pet. ii. 8, especially also the lust of honour and enjoyment. Erasmus interprets it by rapinae.—Children of malediction, according to the Hebraism=persons devoted to and worthy of the curse, cf. 2 Thes. ii. 8: Ps. cix. 17, etc. Calov: "From the throat he passes to the eyes, the tongue, the heart, and the life."

VER. 15. Having forsaken the right way they are gone astray.—Gerhard gives the following connection: "He illustrates the covetousness of the false teachers by the example of Balaam, who once, by his love of lucre, suffered himself to be beguiled into cursing the people of Israel, cf. Jude 11." Another point of comparison, which is not made prominent here, is the commingling of the Divine and the worldly, hypocrisy and allurements to harlotry, Numb. xxi. 1, etc.; xxi. 16; Rev. ii. 14.—Τὴν εἰδεῖν ὁδόν. This is the way of revealed truth, ch. ii. 2; of righteousness, ch. ii. 15. It is called sometimes the way of the Lord, Gen. xviii. 19; Judg. ii. 22; Acts xviii. 25; the way of peace, Is. lix. 8; Rom. iii. 17, the way of wisdom, Prov. iv. 11, the way of life, Prov. x. 17; the way of salvation, Acts xvi. 17.—They were consequently persons who at one time had taken the right way, but had now backslidden.—Πλανᾶσθαι, to go astray, to err, take a wrong way, a figure denoting the various by-roads into which they get, and the uncertainty which attends their aberration, cf. Matt. xxiv. 5; Jno. vii. 12; 2 Tim. iii. 13.

Following after the way of Balaam, etc.—Ἐξακολουθήσαντες, ch. i. 16; ii. 2; defines ἐπλανήσαν.—Τοῦ Βοσόρ, the son of Bosor. Hebrew and ע are often interchanged; so Gesenius and Ewald.—The wages of unrighteousness.—Gerhard: "The reward which the Moabite ambassadors carried in their hands, Numb. xxii. 7, are called wages of unrighteousness, because Balaam hoped to receive the money for an unjust and wicked work (the cursing of Israel)." Ἠγάπησεν, a mild term but suited to the circumstances. The sacred narrative does not explicitly refer to the covetousness of Balaam, Numb. iv. 22; he seemed inclined to shape his course wholly according to the will of God; but when the second embassy offered him greater gifts and honours, he induced the messengers to prolong their stay that he might once more inquire of the Lord whether he should go. v. 19. His dominant lust is also exhibited in v. 34. [See Bp. Butler's Sermon "Upon the character of Balaam."—M.]

בְּעוֹר ע is changed into ס, because some grammarians maintain that in the Babylonian pronunciation the ע was a kind of sibilant. ס

VER. 16. But was rebuked for his peculiar iniquity.—Ἐλεγξεν δὲ ἔσχεν, he received not punishment, but a rebuking conviction, as indicated below. Παρανομία=ἀδικία. He clearly knew that it was the will of God that he should not curse the people: yet he resisted it.—Ἰδίας. Dietlein: "The perversion of the law peculiar to him, and the archetype of the same perversion in the false prophets." Far-fetched.—Huther arbitrarily takes it in the sense of αἰρού. It rather denotes that the transgression was peculiar in that he transgressed the will of God, Numb. xxii. 12, while complying with His commandment, which gave him up to the counsel of his heart, ch. xxii. 20, 85.

A dumb beast of burden, etc.—Ἰπποζύγιον, a yoke-beast, a beast of burden, especially an ass, Matt. xxi. 5, ἄφρων, in antithesis to the human voice. The antithesis between ἄφρων and ἀνθρώπου φωνή φηγεῖσθαι is designed to bring out the miraculous character of the incident.—Ἐκώλυσε. De Wette says: "It was not the ass that forbade him, but the angel, Numb. xxii. 22. etc." But this is not a discrepancy between our passage and the Mosaic account, for God made use of that dumb animal to prevent his going onward, while the angel suffered him afterwards to pass on to punishment, as de Wette himself observes. Gerhard: "Balaam was able and ought to have seen, from so uncommon a miracle, that his way was perverse." In the Epistle of Jude, v. 11, two additional examples are given, that of Cain and that of the company of Korah; the reward of Balaam being only briefly introduced.—Παραφρονα, folly, senselessness, madness. It is madness indeed to fight against God, Ps. cix. 8; Acts v. 39. It is, says Luther, an unequal fight, if old pots will fight with rocks; for let it happen as it will, the pots will come to grief.—Προφήτου. The Mosaic account shows that revelations were made to him, Numb. xxii. 8. 18. 19; xxiii. 5. 16; xxiv. 17. 16; but also that his soul was open to influences of the kingdom of darkness, ch. xxiv. 1. etc.; xxiii. 1. Ambrose, Gregory of Nyssa and Theodoret infer from the latter passages that he was a prophet of the devil. Compare on the enigmatical character of Balaam, Kurtz, Geschichte des alten Bundes, 455 [and Butler's Sermon on the Character of Balaam.—M.]

VER. 17. These are wells without water.—Two figures are now introduced to describe the influence of the false teachers upon others. Calov sees here a reference to Jer. ii. 13, where God compares Himself to a fountain of living waters, and the idols, so much run after by the many, to broken cisterns, that can hold no water.—"They contain no water of wholesome wisdom and living consolation." Oecumenius: "They have lost the water of life." Augustine: "He calls them wells, because they had received the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ, without water, because they do not live agreeably to their knowledge." Prov. x. 11 states the contrary. We are especially reminded of Prov. xxi. 6, the original of which refers to scattering mist, to dispersing vanity, cf. ch. xiv. 24; Is. xxxv. 7. Umbreit suggests the well-known mirage. The thirsty traveller in the desert perceives a moving sheen which he takes for a stream or a lake, hastens to it, but, reaching it, is bitterly disappointed, for it all dissolves into empty vapour.—Huss: "Where you find a well without water, you find dirt and mire. So these contain no water of inflowing grace, but the mire of wickedness. No wonder, seeing that they have forsaken the fountain of living water." They are not hallowing, but polluting wells.

Clouds driven along by a whirlwind.—Νεφέλαι ὑπὸ λαίλαπος ἐλαυνόμενοι. Dietlein incorrectly renders fogs, alleging them to be clouds with the lateral idea of inward absence of clearness. [If the reading ομίχλαι be retained, render "mists." See Appar. Crit. Comm. in Catena: οὐκ εἶσι, φησί, διανγείς ὥστε οἱ ἄγιοι οἱ διπτες νεφέλαι, ἀλλ' ομίχλαι, τούτῃσι, σκότους καὶ γνόφου μεστοί, ὑπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ πνεύματος ἐλαυνόμενοι.—M.] Λαίλαψ. Gerhard produces the definition of Aristotle, who describes it as a violent wind turning upward and downward, cf. Mk. iv. 37; Lke. viii. 23; LXX. Job xxxviii. 1; Jer. xxv. 32.—Ἐλαυνόμεναι, used of ships driven to and fro by strong winds, Jas. iii. 4, and of the possessed driven by demons, Lke. viii. 29. The parallel passage in Jude 12 reads: νεφέλαι ἄνθρωποι (cf. Prov. xxv. 14) ὑπὸ ἀνέμων περιφερόμεναι, clouds which promise rain, but give none because they are chased away by the wind. Jude adds three other figures. Peter's point of comparison is different; with him the emphasis rests on ἐλαίνεσθαι, which is designed to denote the inconsistency, the wavering and unquietness of the false teachers. Huther says that νεφέλαι denotes inward emptiness.—Huss: "Clouds driven along by the wind produce a tempest and obscure the splendour of the sun, so in like manner those false teachers disturb the peace of souls and obscure the Sun of righteousness by the darkness of error."

For whom the blackness of darkness is reserved forever.—Οἷς ὁ ζόφος. De Wette observes that ἀστέρες πλανῆται, Jude 12, is here left out and that οἷς ὁ ζόφος is inappropriately put down; most unfair, for Peter as well as Jude use the figure with reference to the false teachers. Dietlein rightly replies that "if Peter had found ἀστέρες πλανῆται, which would be even more telling in connection with his οἷς ὁ ζόφος than νεφέλαι, he would hardly have omitted those words." [Add that darkness is predicable of clouds driven by the wind as well as of wandering stars; the charge of inappropriateness is therefore unfounded.—M.] The relative οἷς necessarily belongs to οὗτοι, not to πηγαί or νεφέλαι, which would require αἷς.

Reserved.—Reverts to the judgment of the angels, ch. ii. 4; cf. 1 Pet. i. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 7, 17. Stier: "That blackness of the judgment is reserved, spared, laid in store for them which is due to the darkness of their sin." A dark life is justly punished with darkness, especially because of the seduction of so many souls.—Εἰς αἰῶνα, it is reserved for them down to the remotest periods in time to eternity, no matter what changes may take place with the earth and the world.

VER. 18. Speaking great swelling words of vanity, they entice, etc.—ὑπερόγκα from ὄγκος, bulk, exceeding bulk, swelling, figuratively, pride. Jude 16, has: τὸ στόμα αὐτῶν λαλεῖ ὑπερόγκα. Luther: "Proud words with nothing to back them," hollow, vain phrases, bombast. Want of mind, want of power and emptiness are generally concealed under a hollow sound of words.—Δελεύουσιν, see v. 14.—Bengel: "They pretend, as if they were lights of the Church, over-great things, but these wells, these clouds yield nothing. —'Εν ἐπιθυμίαις σαρκός. Gerhard: "These are the bait with which they attract others." —'Ασελγείαις in apposition with ἐπιθυμίαις. We may also translate with Huther: "They entice in the lusts of the flesh (i. e. ensnared, in them, ruled by them) by licentiousness those, etc." —'Οὕτως in truth, in sincerity and not only in the mask of hypocrisy [but ὀλίγως=ὀλίγον, cf. Appar. Crit. seems preferable. —M.] —'Αποφυγόντας suits ὀλίγως better than ὅντως. —Τοὺς ἐν πλάνῃ ἀναστροφεμένους dependent on ἀποφυγόντας. Huther: "Those from whom the deceived persons had separated, non-Christians, especially the heathen, who spend their life in error, ἐν πλάνῃ."

VER. 19. Promising them liberty, etc. — The subject of their great swelling speeches turns especially on liberty, that is, on the false liberty of living as they pleased, of indulging the flesh to the full. Grotius refers to certain Gnostics, whom Irenæus reports to have boasted that their soul had been liberated from all moral restraints, as if Christ had acquired for us the liberty to sin. [This was the doctrine of Simon Magus and his followers. —M.] A promise similar to Gen. iii. 5; cf. 1 Pet. ii. 16; they use liberty as a cloak of malicioussness, cf. Gal. v. 13.

Slaves of corruption, ch. i. 4; ii. 12, of those sins and vices which end in perdition. — Ἡττηται, by whom a man is permanently overcome, of him he has also become the slave, cf. 1 Sam. xvii. 9. He cites martial law; by whom a man is overcome in war, by him also is he enslaved. Those persons are brought by Satan into the slavery of sin and death, cf. Jno. viii. 34; 1 Jno. iii. 8; Rom. vi. 16.

VER. 20. For having escaped the pollutions of the world, etc. — The question is, which is the subject of this verse? Huther thinks that we must understand the false teachers, because of the connection of this verse with the clause at the end of the preceding verse. Then the γάρ would refer back to the φθορά of v. 19. But the hypothetical form of this verse is against Huther, whereas the false teachers are introduced before as very decided persons, although it may be said that the reality is here expressed hypothetically, as is so often the case. But since ὅντως ἀποφυγόντας (v. 18) belongs to the deceived, it is better to apply ἀποφυγόντες here with Bengel, and al. to the same persons. But then we have to supply before v. 20, the sentence: "As the false teachers are themselves slaves of corruption, so they make those whom they deceive slaves of corruption: for—." Μίασμα occurs here only in the New Testament, but μαυμός, v. 10, stain, pollution. The reference to noxious particles floating in the air, called by physicians miasma, is out of the question here, for the word was not used in this sense at the time the Epistle was written, although, as Gerhard shows, those exhalations are an apt figure of sin. —'Εν ἐπιγνώσει, cf. ch. i. 2. 8. 8; iii. 18. Here also it denotes vital knowledge. —'Εμπλεκέντες. Gerhard: "This word is very emphatic; it describes those who become entangled with snares and ropes; 2 Tim. ii. 4 it is used of those who are so entangled with the affairs of this life, that they are unable to please Him any longer whom they stand pledged to serve. The LXX. use it for to fall, Prov. xxviii. 18, from animals which fall, if they become entangled in snares and traps." —'Ηττώνται, they return again into the slavery of sin and Satan, from which they had been delivered.

Their last state is worse than the first, appears to have been a proverbial mode of speech, cf. Luke ix. 26; Matt. xii. 45; xxvii. 64. Grotius cites a passage in Hermas, ch. iii. 2, which evidently has respect to this place: "Quidam tamen ex iis maculaverunt se et projecti sunt de genere justorum et iterum redierunt ad statum pristinum, atque etiam deteriores quam prius evaserunt." —τὰ πρότερα is the condition anterior to their conversion; τὰ ἔσχατα, the state of entire captivity in sin and its corruption. The reason being, that as there is no standing still in the way of a secure sinner, the power of sin, and with it also the guilt and punishment, have become so much the greater.

VER. 21. For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness. —Γάρ does not introduce the proof, but the explanation and confirmation of the preceding proposition. It were better for them if they had no such great guilt. Chrysostom: "Do not sin after forgiveness, suffer thyself not to be wounded after thy healing, nor to be stained after grace. Think, O man, that guilt is greater after forgiveness, that the renewed wound is more painful after healing, and that the stain is more troublesome after grace. He therefore is ungrateful for forgiveness who sins again; he is unworthy of health who wounds himself anew, and he deserves not to be cleansed who stains himself after grace." —'Η, Imperf. Ind. where we use the Conjunctive (cf. Winer, p. 327.) [Translate: "For it were better," etc. —M.] —'Οδὸν δικαιοσύνης. Gerhard: "The doctrine of Christ, of the Gospel, which points out the way how to acquire righteousness before God and eternal life." Cf. v. 2.

Than having known it, to turn back, etc. —ἐπιγνοῖσιν. Supply ἴσιν or ἴν, a well known attraction. —ἐπιστρέψαι to turn to something and return, cf. Mark xiii. 16; Luke viii. 55; Acts iii. 19. Huther considers ἐπιστρέψαι the true reading; de Wette prefers the former.

From the holy commandment. —'Εντολῆς, that part of the fore-mentioned way of righteousness which comprises the doctrine of morals, and especially the cardinal commandment of love, John xiii. 34; xv. 12; 1 John i. 28. But it may also denote the whole of the doctrines of Christ, as a commandment that must be believed and practised, as we have it in John xii. 49; xv. 10. It is called holy on account of its origin, substance and end, on account of its contrast to the pollutions of the world, and because it is the means of man's holiness.

Delivered to them, cf. Jude 8.

VER. 22. But it is happened to them that saying of the true proverb. —Their relapse into their old sinfulness is elucidated by two similes taken from the animal world, with reference to v. 12. —Συμβέβηκε δέ. The truth of that proverb has been fulfilled in them, cf. Matt. vii. 6. —Παροιμία (from παροιμα, way) a proverb, wisdom by the way, in the street. —Κίων, the first proverb with a slight variation is taken from Prov.

xvi. 11. The Participle must not be changed into its finite verb, but δεικτικῶς should be taken as referring to a case really under observation, see Winer, p. 369.

The dog, etc.—Ἐξέραμα from ἐξέρω, to throw out, to vomit.—Εἰς, supply ἐπιστρέψασα.—Κύλισμα, something rolled, and—κυλινδρίβρα, a place for horses to roll in, the place of wallowing.—Βόρβορος, dirt, filth, mire. The second proverb is not found among Solomon's; it seems to be taken from popular tradition, although parallels are by no means wanting. Grotius produces several from Aratus and Philo. Similar passages are found in the Rabbinical writings. Augustine adds: "See how terrible is that to which he compares them; for it is a terrible thing: a dog, etc.—What wilt thou be in the sight of God?"

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Luther and other evangelical teachers show that the prophecy of Peter met its fulfilment not only in the first age of the Church, but especially in the papacy. Gerhard, e. g., mentions the written words of Ulric, bishop of Augsburg, about A.D. 800: "Popes, bishops and clergymen rush so passionately into voluptuousness, that they perpetrate the most horrible and unnatural vices." Sixtus IV., says Gerhard, was a Sodomite, and granted leave to cardinals with whom he was on terms of intimacy, to indulge this vice during three summer-months. Paulus Jovinus affirms the same atrocity on the part of Leo X. Consult, for the fulfilment of the other marks of false teachers, Gerhard and Calov on the respective passages.

2. Augustine specifies four kinds of destruction or death. The first death is the death of the soul, if through sinning it becomes separated from God, who is the life of the soul, as the soul is the life of the body. The second death is that of the body, when it becomes separated from the soul. The third is the second death of the soul, when, in a state of separation from God and the body, it endures punishment. The fourth and last death is the death of the whole man, when the soul, without God, but with the body, will have to suffer eternal punishment.

3. As Christ has His forerunners and types, so has antichrist his. To these belong Balaam in particular. "The souls of oracular personages, prophets, magicians and enchanters like Balaam resemble the strings of a lute, which vibrate in unison with kindred notes, and récho them. The true prophets who were in sympathy with God, caught those notes of sympathy from above, but the false and devilish prophets caught them from beneath (Ex. vii. 11); those like Balaam caught them from both directions without being able to identify them until their heart inclined more to one or the other." Richter, Hausbibel.—The history and character of Balaam affords us important insight into the nature of prophecy.

4. Spiritual and carnal adultery, says Gerhard, go mostly hand-in-hand. The devil is a liar and an unclean spirit, John viii. 44; Luke xi. 24, and hence incites those whom he holds captive in his bonds to the propagation of lies and impure lusts. Those strong spirits of the post-Apostolic age, who began to stir in the time of Peter, and whose rise he foresaw, were wont to indulge in such swelling words: "Only a small standing pool can be polluted by unclean things that are poured into it, not so the ocean, which receives every thing, because it is conscious of its greatness; so little men are overpowered by meats; but he that is an ocean in power (ἐξουσία) receives every thing without being polluted thereby." So says Porphyry. See Neander. "We must," (Clement of Alexandria reports them to have said) "fight lust in the enjoyment of lust, for it is no great thing to abstain from lust if it has not been tasted, but it is a great thing to indulge lust without being overcome by it." Those false teachers have met their brethren in the restorers of the flesh and the Latter Day Saints. What sophisms and powerful errors may not be brought forth in the last days of the Church!

5. What we read here of extreme darkness, is by no means in conflict with those passages which speak of fiery flames and the lake of fire; for as intense heat and intense cold prevail in different localities here on earth at one and the same time, so the Scripture informs us that there are very different localities in the wide extent of the lower world.

6. If those who have truly escaped from the pollutions of the world, may again be entangled therein, then Holy Scripture teaches that relapsing from the state of grace is possible,—a doctrine denied by the Calvinistic School on untenable grounds.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The great folly of preferring momentary pleasure to eternal happiness. Salvation may be gained or lost in one moment of time.—"Sin is fruitful: it does not end where it begins; the sin that succeeds another is usually the punishment of that which precedes it, and that which precedes, mostly the cause of that which follows." Gerhard.—An unfortified mind opens the gate and the door to false teachers.—Stability of mind is a precious jewel.—Wicked men who fan the sparks of carnal lust in others, are able by means of such inflaming to do with them what they please.—"As soon as the heart is removed from trust in God, from glorying in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, so soon all seductions have again free entrance into the same. At first men resist for awhile, but by and by their courage flags and they are overcome at last." Rieger.—The most wretched slavery is the service of sin, for sin is the greatest tyrant.—"Those who lead a disgraceful and a vicious life, are threatened not simply with transient punishment in fire." Augustine.—The great danger of relapse: 1. The greater the measure of grace received, the greater the punishment, Heb. vi. 4-6; x. 26. 27. 2. Conversion is increasingly difficult in the case of those who have fallen from grace, just as a disease is more difficult to cure on its return than at its first occurrence.—How does relapse take place? It is usually not sudden, but gradual. Remissness in watching and prayer, indifference to the punishment of the Spirit are its precursors. The company of pious Christians is exchanged for that of vain worldlings; the reading of entertaining books is substituted for the study of the wholesome word of God, and Christian liberty is enlarged to its utmost limits. If, to crown the whole, deceivers step in, the relapse is completed.—A relapsed person is more dangerous to others, "because knowing Christianity, he is able to hurt it more seriously by cunning than another who never knew it." ROOS.

STARKE:—The deceits of sin and Satan degrade many men not only to the level of brutes, but in many points below it. O hateful monsters, ye fare worse than dumb brutes, Is. i. 8.—VER. 18. Excellent portraiture of Romish false teachers! but the evangelical Church, alas, is not free from such shameful blemishes. O Lord, heal this great hurt, Ps. xii. 2.—The wicked, as he seeks rest in sin of every kind, seeks it also in debauchery, but does not find it, although he fancies to find it forthwith, fresh lusts evermore disquiet him again and urge him to sin, so that he is a veritable slave of sin.—Every human heart is sinful, but if it is thoroughly trained and practised in sin, it is altogether imbedded in corruption and nigh to the curse. O accursed man, tremble and pray without ceasing: "O God, create in me a pure heart," and exercise thyself hereafter in godliness, 1 Tim. iv. 7. He that is devoted to covetousness, has already departed from the right way, 1 Tim. vi. 10; Lke. xii. 15.—Wilt thou and canst thou compel God to prevent thy wickedness by miracles? If thou wilt not suffer His word to deter thee from evil, He will allow it, but, look, what He will do, Lke. xvi. 30. 31.—Many words, little power! Falsehood-mongers are deceivers. The reverse is equally true. Happy the cities and countries which have teachers after the pattern of Paul, 2 Cor. ii. 17; iv. 2.—None wants to be a servant, none a slave of the fiend, but all sinners are the slaves of their lusts, of their belly, of their flesh and of the worst enemy of their temporal and eternal happiness, Jno. viii. 34.—Mark the deceit of the devil and of sin; they show thee not fire and sword, the gallows and the wheel, but portray only that which pleases and attracts; yet if thou sufferest thyself to be entangled and caught, all those things will follow, and damnation at the last, Heb. iii. 13. Fearful to hear, but true; relapses are dangerous and finally incurable, Heb. x. 26. 27.—Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall, 1 Cor. x. 12.—O man, thou makest so much of outward cleanliness in dress, in ornament and beautifying, but in the natural state of thy soul thou art like unclean dogs and sows. Remember that in proportion as thy soul is more noble than thy body, so shouldst thou the rather provide for her cleansing and beautifying.

CHAPTER III. 1-9.

ANALYSIS:—Reference to the long-predicted rise of scoffers, and refutation of their unbelief.

- 1 This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your
- 2 pure minds by way of remembrance: That ye may be mindful of the words which
- 3 were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us<sup>1</sup> the apostles
- 4 of the Lord and Saviour: Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days<sup>2</sup>
- 5 scoffers,<sup>3</sup> walking after<sup>4</sup> their own lusts, And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were<sup>5</sup> from the
- 6 beginning of the creation. For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word
- 7 of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the
- 8 water:<sup>6</sup> Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished:
- 9 But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word<sup>7</sup> are kept in store,
- 10 reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. But,
- 11 beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with<sup>8</sup> the Lord as a thousand
- 12 years, and a thousand years as one day.<sup>9</sup> The<sup>10</sup> Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is longsuffering to us-ward,<sup>11</sup> not willing that
- 13 any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

Frommüller agrees with Alford in the construction but, retaining ὑμῶν, renders: . . . and the commandment of the Lord and Saviour, given to you by us the Apostles.—As the authorities are overwhelmingly against ὑμῶν, Alford's rendering is the most correct and grammatical.—The construction is difficult, but the sense is clear and ὑμῶν so far from affecting the genuineness of the Epistle, is an evidence for its genuineness. A forger would certainly have used ὑμῶν, but a real Apostle may content himself with modestly saying ὑμῶν.—M.]
- Verse 3. [Lachmann and Tischendorf read ἰσχυάτων. [ἰσχυάτων Rec. K. L. ἰσχυάτων. A. B. C., Cod. Sin., Vulg., Copt., al., Alf., Words.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. This Epistle now, beloved, the second.—The flow of fiery, prophetic diction beginning with ch. i. 16, comes here to a point of rest. Peter takes up ch. i. 15.—ἤδη in the acceptance of already, gives no good sense. [But this is doubtful: we have only to render "this Epistle, already a second" and the idea is plain that this Epistle was written very soon after the former; this is the opinion of Bengel, "priorum paulo ante scripserat;" cf. the same author on ch. i. 12, "alteram hanc epistolam scribit brevi intervallo post primam."—M.] Connect ἵδη with γράφω not with δευτέραν. Now in the near prospect of death and in the presence of scoffers denying the coming of Christ, write I unto you. This passage defines more explicitly the somewhat indefinite statement of ch. i. 15; but this does not therefore exclude a reference to the Gospel according to St. Mark.

In both which I rouse, etc.—Ἐν αἷς, the pronoun is in the Plural, because ὅτι is implied in δευτέραν, Winer, p. 154.—Διευρίψω, it seems, must be taken as a Conjunctive for ἵνα ἐν αἷσις. On the sense see ch. i. 18.—Ἰμῶν may be connected with ὑπομνήσει or διανοίαν; the latter seems preferable.—Ἐλικρινῇ, see Phil. i. 10 from εἰλη (sun-light) and κρίνω, something attentively examined in the light of the sun and found genuine, hence pure, clear, unmixed, [unadulterated.—M.] Διάνοια, 1 Pet. i. 13, "this pure mind is at once opposed to errors in doctrine and to excuses for the practice of vices. A man of a pure mind believes and loves the truth, and grows holy in the truth." Roos. Such a mind can only be roused in the case of those, who are not in the truth, cf. Jno. xviii. 37; iii. 21; 1 Jno. i. 6. A principal means thereto is the remembrance of the revelations of God, deposited in the writings of the Prophets and Apostles.

VER. 2. That ye should remember the words, etc.—Here, as in 1 Pet. i. 10-12 and 2 Pet. i. 19, great weight is attached to the word of prophecy, which is brought into most intimate connection with the Apostolical doctrines.—Ἀγίων προφητῶν, see ch. i. 21.—Ἐντολῆς, ch. ii. 21.—Ἡμῶν in apposition with ἀποστόλων as in Acts x. 41. The author here repeatedly describes himself (as in ch. i. 1) as an Apostle, just as he describes himself in ch. iii. 1 as the Author of the first Epistle.—Μνησθῆναι, further definition of ἐν ὑπομνήσει. The Infinitive of intention or of further definition, Winer p. 341.—Τοῦ κυρίου καὶ σωτήρος; de Wette makes these words to be governed by the Infinitive and gives the ungrammatical rendering "of our Apostles." But it is more natural to connect τοῦ κυρίου with ἐντολῆς. This has a double Genitive; cf. Winer, pt. iii. 80. The one of these Genitives relates to the announcement, the other to the origin of the doctrine.—In the parallel passage, Jude 17, the reference to the Prophets is omitted.—De Wette's interpretation being manifestly incorrect, we need not stop to refute his inference that the non-apostolical author here betrays himself and acts out of his character.

VER. 3. Knowing this first that in the last of the days scoffers shall come.—2 Tim. iii. 1; cf. 1 Tim. iv. 1. They are to consider it as a principal point of the prophetic and apostolical word that—γινώσκοντες. Here we should expect the Accusative, governed by μνησθῆναι. Such, probably intentional, anacolutha are of frequent occurrence. Conceptions expressed by the casus recti of Participles, are exhibited with greater prominence, Winer, p. 594; cf. Acts xv. 28; Eph. iv. 2; iii. 17.

Shall come, cf. ch. ii. 1; Mtt. xxiv. 5. 11. 24; vii. 15. 22; 1 Jno. iv. 1. The parallel passage Jude 18 is almost identical; οἱ ἐν ἐσχάτῳ χρόνῳ ἔσονται ἑμπαῖκται, κατὰ τὰς ἐαυτῶν ἐπιθυμίας πορεύμενοι, with the addition τῶν ἁσέβειων.—Ἐν ἐσχάτῳ τῶν ἡμερῶν. The Adjective Neuter is often used emphatically instead of the Substantive. Winer, p. 248. At the end of these present days of the world. [But as ἐσχάτῳ is the best supported reading, cf. App. Crit., it is better to translate "in the last of the days"; there is perhaps no difference in meaning, but the Plural seems to extend the expression over a wider space, so Alford; Wordsworth: "From this reference, it appears that St. Jude wrote his Epistle after the present Epistle, and that he owned this Epistle to be the work of an Apostle, and therefore an authentic writing; and if authentic, then it must be also genuine, for it asserts itself to be written by St. Peter, ch. i. 1 and i. 17, where the writer describes himself as present at the transfiguration, at which only three Apostles were present, viz.: Peter, James and John."—M.]—ἑμπαῖκται (from ἐμπαίω to play, sport in or on) scoffers, deceivers; cf. LXX. in Is. iii. 4, for

תַּעֲלִילִים, petulantiz, petulantes, people that jest about things of the greatest importance. Here we encounter another class of adversaries of Christ, different from the false prophets and teachers described in the second chapter. The two classes have this in common, that they are Epicurean and Antinomian in mind, cf. v. 17; ch. ii. 18. 19. The appearance of such men is predicted Acts xx. 29; 1 Tim. iv. 1; 2 Tim. iii. 2, etc. If the reading ἐμπαίγμονή is retained, it is necessary to use a mark of distinction after the latter word, rendering: "they shall come in the spirit of scoffing, as scoffers, walking, etc." ["They will not only be scoffers, but they will come in scoffing, like those of whom the Psalmist says, that their delight is in cursing, and that they clothe themselves with it, as it were, with a raiment (Ps. cix. 16. 17); and the contrast is striking to the Divine words εὐλογῶν εὐλογήσω, Gen. xxii. 17, cf. Eph. i. 3, ὁ εὐλογήσας ἡμᾶς ἐν πάσῃ εὐλογίᾳ, and Clem. Rom. i. 24." Wordsworth.—M.]

Walking after their own lusts.—They no longer appear in sheep's clothing, but exhibit their wolf-nature.—κατὰ τὰς ἰδίας αἰνῶν. Ἰδίας brings out the self-will and opposition of these men to the law of God.—ἐπιθυμίας πορεύμεναι. Bengel: "This is the origin of error, the root of libertinism." Luther: "These are our Epicureans and Sadducees, who believe neither one thing nor the other, who live as they think best and walk after their own lusts, considering permitted whatever suits their pleasure: examples of such are met on every hand."—Πορεύμενοι, see 1 Peter iv. 8.

VER. 4. Where is the promise of His coming?—Similar to the daring words of the scoffers in Mal. ii. 17: "Where is the God of judgment?" The same form of speech occurs in Luke viii. 25; Ps. xlii. 4; lxxix. 10. Where is it? e. g., Where is its fulfilment? It is nowhere to be found.

The promise.—They use the language of believers, to whom the coming of their Lord is the most cherished desire, cf. Luke xxi. 28.

Of His coming.—παρουσίας. Used here in a more special sense than in ch. i. 16, of the visible coming of Christ to the judgment of the wicked and to the consummation of His Kingdom, Matt. xxiv. 8. 27. 37; 1 Thess. ii. 19; iii. 13; 2 Peter iii. 12.—αὐτοῦ, they do not take His name on their lips, so much do they disdain it. [Polycarp, c. 7: "Whosoever does not confess the suffering of the cross, is of the devil; and whosoever perverts the oracles of the Lord to his own lusts, and says that there is neither resurrection nor a judgment,—he is the first-born of Satan."—M.]

For since the fathers fell asleep.—Ἀφ' ἧ γὰρ σείλ. ἡμέρας. De Wette is wrong in saying: "The author appears to assume these scoffers as present and that prediction as fulfilled." No; this appearance springs solely from critical prejudices. Peter puts himself into the time of the fulfilment of that prediction, when the first generation of believers had already fallen asleep; most of them had expected the visible coming of the Lord as immediately connected with the destruction of Jerusalem; but after that catastrophe had taken place without the expected visible coming of the Lord, the scoffers took occasion to deny the coming of the Lord altogether. This Peter foresees in the Spirit. The word fathers denotes therefore not the Patriarchs, the ancestors of the Jewish people, nor (as Dietlein maintains) any preceding generation standing to that immediately succeeding it in the relation of fathers, but the fathers of the second generation of Christians. Otherwise the sentence would be pleonastic, because ἀπ' ἀρχῆς follows after.—ἐκοιμήθησαν like ἐπαγγελία, to be understood in a mocking sense, as imitating the language of believers.

All things remain thus from the beginning of the creation.—διαιτῶνται, they remain without intermission, the whole world remains according to its old constitution, in the consistence which it has once for all, it remains through all mutations. Huther arbitrarily inserts the idea, "since the fathers . . . hath come to pass; all things continue thus . . . ."—Others supply ὡς ἦν, as it was from the beginning of creation, which is equally arbitrary. The construction is pregnant: "All things from the time of our fathers remain in a general way, as they are; yea, from the beginning of creation all things remain essentially the same." Bengel gives to οὕτω a pregnant force: "All things remain thus as they remain from the beginning of the world." [Sic permanent, ut permanent.—M.] Dietlein makes these erring spirits speculative philosophers who advance the proposition that "the history of creation is endless; the destiny of the human race is not one that actually occurs at a given time and terminates the course of the world, but it fulfils itself in an untemporal (unzeitlich) manner (it is immanent, to use the language of modern speculation); and this they infer from the circumstance, that one generation passes away after another, and is dispatched as they suppose, and that therefore it cannot be otherwise with all succeeding generations." There is no reason to assume such a system in the case of these trifling Epicureans, and ἀπ' ἀρχῆς is absolutely in conflict with such an assumption.—Luther explains the inference of the false teachers as follows: "The world has stood so long, and has always remained thus; should it now at last become otherwise?" We must however add in the sense of those scoffers: The coming of Christ and the destruction of the world were long since predicted as connected with the destruction of Jerusalem without coming to pass; where then is now the word of the Scripture?

Vss. 5. For it is hidden to them, because they thus will it.—Refutation of the assertion that all things remain in the same condition by the fact of the flood.—Toiro belongs to dei, not to θελοντες, as in ch. iii. 8, and θελοντες denotes not "to choose a view" (eine Ansicht belieben, as Dietlein maintains), for this meaning cannot be verified. Huther, indeed, cites a passage from Herodotus, but it is isolated and proves nothing for the New Testament. It denotes "a guilty ignorance," as Luther translates; they are wilfully ignorant of it; they are wilfully blind to the consideration of the flood. Winer, p. 489, note [says: In 2 Peter iii. 5, λαμβάνει τοῦτο θέλοντες I prefer the rendering: latet eos hoc (what follows) volentes, i. e., volentes ignorant, to the other: latet eos (what follows) hoc (what precedes) volentes, i. e., contententes. The former brings out more clearly the guilt of the mockers. Neither in Col. ii. 18, is θελοντες to be taken as an adverb.—M.]

That the heavens and an earth were from of old, etc.—οὐρανοί, as usual in the Plural like οὐρανός, cf. 2 Cor. xii. 2.—Ἐκπαλαι, from of old, from the first origin of all things.—How, de Wette, Huther, al., refer it primarily to οὐρανοί, but then also to γῆ συνεστῶσα. This might pass grammatically (Winer, p. 368), but how are we to conceive the heavens to consist out of and through water? De Wette, indeed, observes that the conception that the heavens (the firmament) were made out of water, may be justified by Gen. i. 6, but he is conscious of the unsatisfactoriness of this exposition, since he proposes to refer ἐκ to the earth and διὰ to the heavens (through the water). This is very forced, and in no event applicable to the starry heavens, which are of course included in οὐρανοί. According to the representation of the Bible, the firmament (רקיע) consists not out of water, but forms a wall of partition between the waters above and the waters below, Gen. i. 7. 8.—The earth originated out of water, out of the dark matter in which it was comprehended, and through water, i. e., (as Winer, p. 488, explains it) through the agency of water, which partly descended into the lower parts of the earth, and partly formed the clouds in the sky. The earth, moreover, manifoldly received its diversified form through the water, consists in a great measure in water and this element, as already noticed by Oecumenius, holds it together and cements it.—The Indo-Ægyptian cosmogonies, to which de Wette refers, and which are said to contain an account of a chemical origin of the world out of water, are altogether irrelevant. [Bengel: "Gradatio, aqua terram texerat: ex aqua terra emerit: et aqua inservivit, ut terra consisteret, sicut Creator eam formavit et collo- cavit. Aqua cateroqui levior est, et terra inferiores partes petit, usque eo, ut omnis aqua, in linea recta a superficie ad centrum orbis hujus sive rotundi systematis, terram semper sub se habeat: sed in ipsa superficie terra passim supra aquas plus minusve eminet; et vel hunc aqua locum quasi invita, et potentissimo jussu divino coacta, terræ concessit et reliquit. Ex. xx. 4; Ps. xxiv. 2; civ. 5-8; cxxxvi. 6; Job xxxviii. 10."—The assertion that the earth arose out of the water is opposed to the dogma of Simon Magus, that it was engendered from fire. Wordsworth referring to Hippolyt., Refut. hæres. p. 165.—M.]

By the word of God may refer both to the heavens and to the earth, cf. Gen. i. 6. 9. But we may also join these words more intimately with συνεστῶσα, which appears to be preferable, as it gives greater prominence to the thought, that it does not consist a moment longer than God permits. Bengel: "By the word of God is defined the duration of all things, so that it cannot be longer or shorter." [The reference here is to the creative energy of the Divine Logos. The Jewish readers of Peter's Epistle were familiar with that doctrine, which was opposed to the error of the Gnostics who held that the universe was made by angels or by the demiurge opposed to the supreme God. Irenæus I., 19, declares, that the world was not made by angels, nor by any powers separated from God, but by His Word, i. e., Christ. Ps. xxxii. 6; John i. 8. The same author says, II., 2: "All things which God made, He made by the indefatigable Word, even as John the disciple of the Lord declares concerning Him, John i. 8."—M.]

Vss. 6. Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished.—Δι' ὧν cannot possibly refer to ὕδατος (Huther), more especially because ὕδατος follows after; nor can it signify: quapropter, nor "through which circumstances it also came to pass that . . ." (Dietlein), still less "yet" (dennoch—Luther). It evidently belongs to οὐρανοί καὶ γῆ. It was just the heavens and the earth which became the instruments of destruction of the then κόσμος, i. e., for the then existing world of human beings and animals. Peter uses κόσμος in precisely the same sense, ch. ii. 5. The heavens became such an instrument of destruction, when their windows were opened and it rained as never before since the creation of the world, Gen. vii. 11. The earth which had been founded upon the waters and risen out of the water, Ps. xxiv. 2, in obedience to the command of God was compelled to pour forth its treasures of water, Gen. viii. 2, in order to destroy man and beast. Who would have believed this before the flood came? Who would have supposed that the heavens and earth did contain within them such powers of destruction, seeing that they consisted so long before? Every attempt of taking κόσμος in another sense, understanding it of the whole world, of the universe (Huther, al.), or more particularly of the earth (Calov), fails to bring out the full force of ἀπόλετο, which was then to be circumscribed to such an extent as to denote a great mutation, which conflicts with grammatical usage. But here we must take a retrospective view of ἔκπαλαι, v. 5, in order to understand the full refutation of the antagonistic proposition. 1. Ἐκπαλαι should be joined not only with οὐρανοί, but also with γῆ. The heavens and the earth even in the time of Noah had consisted from of old, upwards of 1600 years; from this circumstance the men of that time might have drawn the inference that all things in the world of man would ever remain, even as they were; but how fallacious was that inference! 2. With this is connected the thought, that considering that the earth came into existence and does consist by the Word of God, the people of that time might surely have been able to understand that it could be destroyed by the self-same Word. 3. The event has shown, that the world of man was destroyed just by the heavens and the earth, which to them had the appearance of an imperishable existence. 4. Now the heavens and the earth, as intimated in v. 7, underwent also a change in that catastrophe. That flood which covered the whole earth would be inexplicable without an extraordinary influence exerted by God upon the heavens and the earth, whereby their condition was changed. Gen. ix. 11, of x. 25, where reference is made to an extraordinary terrestrial catastrophe, expressly testify that the earth was destroyed by the flood, and that it presented in many respects an appearance very different from that which it had before that mighty revolution.

Vss. 7. But the heavens and the earth which are now, by His word are kept in store.—Οἱ δὲ νῦν οὐρανοί. Nῦν belongs also to γῆ and presupposes a change wrought upon the heavens and the earth by the flood; according to our exposition, it is not in antithesis with ὁ τότε κόσμος.—Τῷ αὐτοῦ λόγῳ. The same Divine omnipotence which commanded the water to destroy men and to lay waste the earth, will hereafter destroy the present world by fire, and not only change the surface of the earth. [Irenæus calls the last conflagration, "diluvium ignis." Bengel: "Ignis confutabit impietates."]—M.]

Kept in store.—θήσαυρίζειν, properly, to lay up in store, to treasure up, e. g., grain or a treasure. The meaning is not, that the present world is only a treasure gathered together and saved from the deluge, merely a remnant of the original world-totality. Such an idea belongs not to θήσαυρός. But the reference is doubtless partly to the promise (Gen. ix. 15), and partly to the redemption in Christ. Calov:—"The world, for a certain time, is as yet in store and left untouched, like treasure stored up in a chest, as yet untouched." Huther justly rejects Dietlein's notion that the idea of profit must be held fast, in the sense that the heavens and the earth are the materials stored up for the exercise of punishment, yet so that they shall perish under the punishment.

Reserved unto fire, etc.—Πυρὶ must not be connected with τεθήσασιν, but with τηρούμενοι. Just as fire is even now an instrument of punishment to the world, so it will be used as an instrument of the destruction of the world in the final judgment, of. Gen. xix. 24; Amos vii. 4; Is. lxvi. 15; Dan. vii. 9; 2 Thess. i. 8; Matt. iii. 12; xxv. 41; Rev. xix. 20; xx. 10. This is enlarged upon in v. 10.—Τηρούμενοι, used several times by Peter, 1 Pet. i. 4; 2 Pet. ii. 4. 9. 17.—Ἀπωλείας.—Calov:—"Not perfect destruction, but perdition and eternal death."—Τῶν ἀσεβῶν ἀνθρώπων.—Dietlein applies this to the whole human race, because with the exception of the converted, it is ungodly. [But he is here, as so often, inaccurate and unreliable. The reference is simply to the ungodly among men. The following passage from an oration by Melito, Bp. of Sardis, in the second century, published from the Syriac by Cureton, is an interesting relic of ancient exegesis: "There was a flood of water, and all men and living creatures were destroyed by the multitude of waters, and the just were preserved in an ark of wood by the ordinance of God. So also it will be at the last time; there will be a flood of fire, and the earth will be burnt up, together with its mountains, and men will be burnt up with the idols which they have made; and the sea together with the isles will be burnt, and the just shall be delivered from the fury (of the fire), as their fellows in the ark (were saved) from the waters in the deluge."—M.]

Vss. 8. But let this one thing not escape you, etc.—This is not a second refutation of the scoffers, but the removal of an obstacle which believers might find in the protracted delay of Christ's advent.

That one day is before the Lord.—The shortest space of time before Him, is in His sight long enough for the execution of events, which in our computation would require a thousand years, and the longest space of time before Him passes away as rapidly as does a day to us. In order to occupy the right stand-point with respect to the coming of Christ, we must apply the standard of eternity, and not use human measures of time. The second clause of the proposition is taken from Ps. xc. 4. Time is not absolutely denied in the case of God, but His relation to time is very different from that sustained by us men, the creatures of a day. Bengel:—"God's enologium (time-piece for eternity) differs from the horologium (time-piece for hours) of mortals. But how shall we understand this? If we could understand it, Moses and Peter would not have been under the necessity of adding "with the Lord."—Stier:—"He who created the heavens and the earth in six days, because He thus willed it, may also suddenly accomplish in one day that which under other circumstances would require a thousand years; in like manner He may ordain thousands of years to be to the world week-and-work-days before His great Sabbath begins to dawn. The longest time is only brief after God's measure; yet it hastens and rushes irresistibly into eternity, just because it is time."—Thiersch:—"The internal development of mankind, which must have reached its consummation before the end of the world, is so entirely dependent on the Divine disposal that at one time there may occur a step forward so mighty that we should hardly have expected it to take place in a thousand years, while at another time, the course of development, retarded by God, does not progress in a thousand years any further than at other times in a day." This is as incorrect as Dietlein's view, that God will punish in one day the sin of thousands of years, and thus equalize the great disfiguring which by so long a duration had come into eternity; that otherwise the duration of time with God is of great, though not of necessary, importance, be-cense a thousand years are before Him as one day.—The Fathers, as is well known, have drawn from this passage the inference that the world is to last six thousand years, especially as Heb. iv. 9 speaks of a Sabbath-time of the people of God, but without sufficient reason.

VER. 9. The Lord is not tardy.—Ὁὖ βραδύνει ὁ κύριος. Bradyne, to delay, to postpone [to be late.—M.], usually construed with the Accusative, but here with the Genitive. See Winer, § 80.—De Wette:—bradyne is not taken in relation to a definite point of time, according to human expectation, as in 1 Tim. iii. 15, but with reference to the purpose and counsel (of God); for although with reference to the former the author admitted a delay, he denied the title to such an expectation, according to v. 8, because God's views of time (as well as His thoughts and ways, cf. Is. lv. 8) are different from men's. Similarly, Sir., 35, 22; cf. Hab. ii. 3.—Calov:—“Although it seems as though He were tardy (Rev. vi. 10), He is not tardy after the manner of men, from procrastination or neglect, but from long-suffering, for, as Justin observes, He prefers repentance to punishment.”—Kύριος, as in v. 8, denotes God the Father.—ὡς τὰνδ' bradyne—τῆς. The reference here is not to scoffers, who deny the coming of Christ, but to weak believers.

But He is long-suffering towards us, etc.—μακροθυμεῖ. He is long-suffering, putting off His punishment for a long time, Matt. xviii. 26, 29; Lke. xviii. 7; 1 Thess. v. 14. Εἰς ἡμᾶς, towards us, the called, then to us all, to men in general. Βούλεσθαι, to will, as the result of conscious deliberation, but not with irresistible coercion. Calov:—“As an earthly king would desire to see all his subjects happy, as far as they are his subjects, not as far as they are malefactors.”—Χωρεῖν εἰς, to go into, to enter, Matt. xv. 17; cf. Esek. xviii. 23; xxxiii. 11; 1 Tim. ii. 4.—The adherents of the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination wrongly restrict this passage to the elect. Calvin himself explains it of the will of God revealed in the Gospel as contrasted with His hidden counsel.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. A sure means of resisting the temptations of the last anti-Christian times and of repelling the assaults of deceivers is keeping the prophetic and apostolic word in an honest and good heart, even as Christ often exhorts us to keep His sayings against the subtle attacks of the enemy.—“In the last days there will be a thorough confluence of all the corruption engendered by former unbelief.”—“He who by his lusts is corrupted in error, will do what he desires, and will not be deterred from it by any fear of God. This necessitates an unbelieving cancelling of all the truth of God, and if good proofs of such pretences are wanting, scoffing and witty humour must become the substitutes of proof.” H. Rieger.

2. Peter in making mention of the last days, draws no distinction between the second and third coming of Jesus, as made prominent in the Revelation of John, and alluded to in 1 Cor. xv. 23, 24. This circumstance deserves to be noticed in connection with the inquiry relating to the date of this Epistle.

3. “The Word of God composed in writing is the instrument of our conversion and illumination, the store-house of all salutary knowledge and wisdom, and the armory against all sorts of enemies.” Gerhard.

4. Although we must identify the scoffers primarily as those deceivers, who arose at the end of the Apostolic age, the prophecy, nevertheless, is ever undergoing new fulfilments in the course of time, and will have its most fearful fulfilment in the last times. In ancient times, Simon Magus is cited as denying the end of the world (in the Pseudo-Clementine Recogn., v. 3); in the middle ages, a heresy sprung up, which maintained the imperishableness of the world. v. Meyer asks whether that portrait of the future does not perfectly apply to the rebellious liberty and wanton licentiousness of the corrupt priesthood and monastic orders of the middle ages and later times? “The Hegelian school of philosophers (at least those of the left side) deride the Church's faith in a visible advent of Christ, in the judgment and the end of the world, as a pietistic notion. They see in the dominant influence of the idea (Begriff), brought about by the Hegelian philosophy, Christ returned, and regard the end of pietism, of orthodox Christianity as heretofore existing, to be the end of the world.” Rich-ter.

5. “It is an old trick of the devil to oppose the course of nature to the word and promises of God, seeing that God is the Author of nature, and able at His pleasure to change or wholly destroy it.” Gerhard.

6. The traditions of other nations also contain the hypothesis that the world originated out of water. The Chinese and the Egyptians teach that water is the oldest element. The Vedas of the *Hindoo*s declare that this world was originally water; the code of Manu declares that water was the first thing which God created; Ramayana reports that originally all things were water, and that the earth was formed out of it. But this, so far from being a ground of suspicion against the teaching of Scripture, in connection with other reasons, constitutes a proof in its favour.

7. In like manner all nations have their legends of the great deluge, of which the highest mountains, the graves and caverns of the earth bear testimony. The deluge, according to Scripture, was not partial and local, but universal; but natural science, to be sure, is incompetent to account for it by natural causes.

8. The preservation of the world, as well as its beginning, depends altogether on the will, the word and the direction of God. “The word of God is not only the architect of the heavens and the earth, but also the prop and foundation of this edifice, Heb. i. 3.” Gerhard.

9. The statements of Peter respecting the world being reserved unto fire, are partly connected with the sayings of Christ, Mk. ix. 44; Matt. iii. 10. 12; xv. 41; xiii. 40. 42; vi. 22, and partly, where he goes beyond them, to be regarded as a revelation which he had received. The religions of the pagans and the philosophemes of the Greeks and Romans, frequently describe fire as the end of the world. Zoroaster assumed a dissolution of the mountains by the action of fire. The Orphic cosmogony, Heracitus and the Stoics, the Epicureans, Pliny, Ovid, the Gallicans and the Scandinavians coincide in this respect. The Mexicans describe the fourth age of the world, as the age of fire. The Hindoos also teach the future burning of the world. "This fact proves nothing against the truth of this doctrine. On the contrary, it can only deepen the overpowering impression of the sacred revelations of the final judgment." Dietlein.—"As men are melted and purified by the fire (of the law, the love of God and the sufferings of Christ), so it will fare with the earth which goes the course of man. In the time of Tycho de Brahe, according to the opinion of some, another solar system met perhaps a similar fate." Richter.

10. Although time was created simultaneously with the creature, it is nevertheless to God also a reality, otherwise He would not interfere with time and be conscious of what occurs in time; but He is superior to the river of time and controls it. A thousand years with Him are as one day, similar, (so Bengel puts it), as a thousand flourins are with a rich man as a farthing.

11. Even before Justin and other fathers gave currency to the opinion that the world should last six thousand years, the ancient Etruscans taught from tradition that the world's duration was fixed at 6000 years, that the sixth millennium would bring the end and the great year.

12. Calov rightly declares verse 9 to be an unanswerable proof against the absolute decree of Calvin, and quotes also 1 Tim. ii. 4. God wills to save all men only in Christ and in the order of repentance and faith.

[18. Bp. Conybeare on v. 5: "The truth of the case is, God does not interpose in a miraculous manner upon every instance of sin: as He hath made men free agents, so He doth not interrupt the use of this liberty by breaking in upon the common order of causes and effects. Hence nature goes on for the most part in one uniform course; and exemplary punishments are reserved only for extraordinary occasions. Yet still God hath not left Himself without witness: many predictions of His prophets have been already confirmed by fact; the old world was destroyed by a miracle, and Sodom and Gomorrah are set forth for an example, having suffered the vengeance of eternal fire." Instances of this kind, it must be confessed, are rare: however, those few which have been afforded us are enough to alarm the sinner. Men should not flatter themselves that their crimes are forgotten, because they are yet unpunished: but rather dread the delays of vengeance. Though mercy spares them for the present, yet this very mercy, if slighted, will increase their future ruin.—M.]

They will not then any longer, with the scoffers, that Peter tells us should be in the last days, say, "where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation;" for they shall be convinced that, however His coming was for good reasons deferred, yet He shall then come to purpose; to the everlasting confusion of their faces, that opposed, or despised, or neglected Him and His religion. Then shall they say, Yonder He is, whom we slighted, whose religion we denied, whose servants and followers we took to be no better than a company of credulous fools! Lo, yonder He is in the clouds, whose tenders of mercy we have refused, whose counsels we have rejected, to whose Spirit we have done despite! - 10 But the day<sup>1</sup> of the Lord will come as a thief in the night,<sup>2</sup> in the which the<sup>3</sup> heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt<sup>4</sup> with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up.<sup>5</sup> Seeing then<sup>6</sup> that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye<sup>7</sup> to be in all holy conversation and godliness, Looking for and hastening<sup>8</sup> unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat?<sup>9</sup> Nevertheless<sup>10</sup> we, according to his promise,<sup>11</sup> look for new heavens and a new<sup>12</sup> earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. ## EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 10. But the day of the Lord will come.—The Apostle having made mention of the long-suffering of God, now says, as it were, let none deceive himself, the day of the Lord will not fail to appear, but it will come surely and suddenly. Ἦξει δὲ ἡ ἡμέρα κυρίου; it is called the day of God in v. 12; hence κυρίου is here doubtless—Θεοῦ, as in v. 9. So Joel i. 15; Ezek. xiii. 5; Isa. ii. 12. The day of Jehovah; cf. Jas. v. 7. Elsewhere the day of the Lord Jesus, 2 Cor. i. 14. The day of Christ, 2 Thess. ii. 2; also the day of the Lord's coming, Mal. iii. 2. The last expression contains an intimation that the beginning of that great period of judgment must be distinguished from the Lord's coming in the same. The former sets in unexpectedly and without notice. The Lord's coming will be unexpected, but not unnoticed by the ungodly; it will be attended by a war-cry, the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, 1 Thess. iv. 16.

As a thief in the night.—The same figure is used by the Lord Himself in the Gospels, Matt. xxiv. 43; Luke xii. 39. Paul also compares the coming of that day to the burglarious entry of a thief. The passages in Revelation, ch. iii. 8; xvi. 15, which contain this description of the Lord's coming, give prominence to the suddenness and surprise of His coming, not to its being unnoticed. His coming is free from surprise and terror to those who watch and observe the signs of the times; it is to them rather a joyful event, Luke xxi. 28.—The figure of the thief contains also the secondary thought, that those who are held fast in the sleep of sin and security, shall lose in that catastrophe whatever they have, Matt. xiii. 12; John x. 10.

In which the heavens shall pass away with a crashing roar; βοῶντος from βοῶ, to βοῶ, to rush, to whiz, to crash; a word formed to resemble the sound, rushing, whizzing, crashing, here only in the New Testament. Occumenius understands it of the crackling noise of a destructive fire; de Wette, of the crash of falling houses. The Apostle probably thinks of both, (Huther).—Παρελθόντων; our Lord uses the same word, Matt. xxiv. 35; cf. Ps. cii. 27; Isa. xxxiv. 4; Rev. xx. 11.—Οὐρανὸς, the sky and the starry heavens, as in v. 7; cf. Ps. lxxii. 7; cii. 26; Isa. xxxiv. 4; li. 6; lxx. 17.

But the elements shall be dissolved in fire, and—shall be burned up.—στοιχεῖα; the rudiments of speech, then the constituent elements of the universe; of course not the elements in the sense of chemistry, but in the sense of antiquity, which since the time of Empedocles assumed the existence of four elements or rudiments of things; cf. Wisd. vii. 17; xix. 17.—Calov restricts the word to water and air, because the earth is specifically mentioned afterward. But de Wette rightly observes that the earth is referred to first as an element, and afterward as a totality. There is nothing contradictory in the idea that this elemental fire shall be suspended in its action by a stronger and supernatural fire. A total annihilation of the elemental constituents is out of the question; the reference is rather to the supposition of Gennadius and Occumenius, that "the old heavens and the old earth shall be changed and renovated into better."—A reference to v. 12, where the στοιχεῖα are mentioned, and not the earth expressly, shows plainly that στοιχεῖα relates primarily to the earth. ὁ, moreover intimates as much. Bengel, on the other hand, sees here, with many of the fathers, a reference to the sun, the moon and the stars. The sense—θεμέλια, foundations of the earth, given by others, cannot be verified. [The view of Bengel is that of Justin, Theophilus of Antioch, Polycrates, Mede, Hammond, Whitby and Alford. The last named author, after quoting Justin, argues that de followed presently by the καὶ when reference is made to the earth, necessarily belongs to the heavens, and that the mention of the heavenly bodies as affected by the great day is constant in Scripture, cf. Matt. xxiv. 29; Isa. xlii. 9, 10; xxiv. 23; xxiv. 4, etc. On the other hand, the view propounded in the text is that of Wordsworth, who says that "St. Peter's meaning seems to be, that the στοιχεῖα, elements or rudiments, of which the universe is composed and compacted, will be loosed; that is, the frameworks of the world will be disorganized, and this is the sense of στοιχεῖα in the LXX., Wisd. vii. 17; xix. 18, and in Hypolyt. Philos. pp. 219. 818. The dissolution is contrasted with the consistency described by the word συνεστῶσα in v. 5. The heavens are reserved for fire (v. 7) and will pass away with a rushing noise, and, being set on fire, will be dissolved (v. 12), the elements will be on fire and melt (v. 12), and be reduced to a state of confusion; the earth and the works therein will be burnt up.—There does not seem, therefore, to be any cause for abandoning the common meaning of στοιχεῖα, the elemental principles of which the universe is made."—M.] —Λυθισσούσιν. Gerhard: "When the preserving and supporting power of God, which is, as it were, the soul of the world, shall separate itself from the macrocosm, it will fall together like a soulless corpse."

The works.—To wit, the works of nature and of art [Bengel: operæ naturæ et artis.—M.] trees, plants, minerals, animals, cities, houses, provisions, instruments, etc., cf. Hab. ii. 13.

[Shall be burned up.—The variation εἰσθροῦσαι of Cod. Sin. B. and K. is difficult to account for.—M.]

Vrs. 11. Since then all these things are being dissolved.—Λυόμεναι, not λυθισσόμεναι. The Apostle vividly enters into the catastrophe and mentally anticipates it according to the characteristic, which has been noticed in ch. ii. 10; iii. 8, and especially also in the first Epistle. Winer, p. 358, explains it as follows: "These things, by their nature intended to be dissolved—the destiny of dissolution is already inherent in them." Calov applies the Present to the certainty of the event. [The reading οὕτως accords with the abrupt style of Peter, and makes the scene all the more vivid.—M.]

As what sort of persons ought ye to evidence yourselves? etc.—Ποταπός or ποταπός from τόπος or δάπεδον, land, soil, signifies properly, from what country, where born, whence in point of origin, not equivalent to πῶτος. Cf. Matt. viii. 27; Luke i. 29; vii. 39; 1 John iii. 1. It often denotes a question of surprise, to which no answer is given; but here the answer is added in v. 12. Sense: "Ye must evidence yourselves as persons of more noble origin, as citizens of the heavenly kingdom that are only strangers here on earth." This seems to be an echo of the first Epistle. The common use of ποταπός in the New Testament as connected with an exclamation, is not decisive against our interpretation. Huther wants to supply before ποταπός, "consider then," but this is arbitrary. De Wette takes ποταπός in the sense of quantus, how great, how strong, how diligent ought ye to be in holy conversation. But this is ungrammatical. The connection is this: Considering that this entire world-system, with whatever it contains, is doomed to perish, it becomes us Christians to tear our hearts from all inordinate love of the world, and to qualify ourselves even now as citizens of the celestial world. Augustine: "If there is an end of the world, if we have to move away from this world, we must not love the world;" and in another passage: "Seeing that Christ shall come to judgment the very day in which the world shall be dissolved, and that all must appear before His judgment-seat, let us live in the true fear of God, serve Him in holiness and righteousness, and carefully guard against sins." —Ἀναστροφάς. The Plural as in 1 Peter i. 15; ii. 1, to mark the different forms and directions of a holy walk and piety, cf. 2 Peter ii. 2; i. 3.

Vrs. 12. Expecting and hastening the coming of the day of God.—Προσδοκῶν.—Not with Luther: To wait as contrasted with haste, but looking for, expecting something while enduring the pressure of evil, cf. v. 14.—Ἐνεδύοντες. Some commentators arbitrarily supply εἰς; the sense of yearning or longing for cannot be verified; it signifies to urge, to press, to hasten, and applies therefore not only to earnest occupation, but, as Bengel asserts, to inward struggling, to perseverance in prayer for the hastening of the Kingdom of Christ, and to preparation for it in repentance and holiness. At the same time the remark of Richter is true, that "in a certain respect it is visionary, dangerous and passionate to pray for the hastening of the end of the world and the termination of the æon of Gospel-calling."

[Trench Bible Revision, p. 112) pronounces for the marginal reading in E. V., "hasting the coming" (accelerantes adventum, Erasmus), and explains: The faithful, that is, shall seek to cause the day of the Lord to come the more quickly by helping to fulfil those conditions, without which it cannot come—that day being no day inexorably fixed, but one the arrival of which it is free to the Church to help and hasten on by faith and by prayer, and through a more rapid accomplishing of the number of the elect." De Wette, followed by Alford: "They hasten it by perfecting, in repentance and holiness, the work of the Gospel, and thus diminishing the need of the μακροθυμία, v. 9," to which the delay of that day is owing. Alford, in reply to Huther's objection, says, "It is true that the delay or hastening of that day is not man's matter, but God's: but it is not uncommon in Scripture, to attribute to us those Divine acts, or abstinences from acting, which are really and in their depth, God's own. Thus we read, that 'He could not do many mighty works there because of their unbelief,' Matt. xiii. 58, compared with Mark vi. 5. 6; thus repeatedly of man's striving with, hindering, quenching God's Holy Spirit."—Wordsworth considers this remarkable thought as compared with St. Peter's speech in Acts iii., as another silent evidence of the genuineness of this Epistle.—M.]

τὴν παρουσίαν. See v. 10, cf. Tit. ii. 13; Rev. xvi. 14; Acts xvii. 31. The term "day of God" cannot excite surprise, if respect is had to the Old Testament. Lachmann's notion that the author had given up the hope of Christ's coming, and mixed it up with God's future day of judgment, is incongruous, for he treats of the Lord's παρουσία in ch. iii. 4.

For the sake of which the heavens being on fire, shall dissolve (themselves), and the elements shall melt away with fervent heat; δι' ἣν. It is best to connect ἣν with παρουσίαν, and to take διὰ as indicating the occasioning cause. Winer, p. 418, [who sanctions however the construction recommended in Appar. Crit., which is also that adopted by Alford.—M.] Dietlein renders "in honour of which, as it were," but this rendering is inapposite. If the plan of God is to be carried out, this sin-stained world must perish. Augustine says of the succession of the events, "After the judgment the world will be on fire; that is, it will be entirely burned up." This is also thought probable by Gerhard, who holds moreover that the burning of the world will take place before the wicked are cast into hell and the godly received to heaven.

Καννοῦσθαι and τήκεσθαι, to melt like wax, are ἀπασί λεγ. The Present is used here for the same reason, as in v. 11, above. [The note of Wolfius, (Curæ Philologicæ et Criticæ) on the force of these Presents will be found useful: "Interim nihil est mutandum. Patet enim, Apostolum in duobus his commutibus, data opera, nunc præsentis λυομένων et τήκεται, nunc futuro λυθήσεται de ea ru uti, quæ tam certa futura erat, ac si jam fieret."—M.]

VER. 13. But we, according to His promise, expect new heavens and a new earth.—The Apostle, for the comfort of believers, contrasts the destruction of the present world-system with the expectation of new heavens and a new earth. This hope is founded on the word of prophecy, Isa. lxi. 17; lxvi. 22; xxx. 26; cf. Rev. xxi. 1. This does not denote an ideal state of blessedness, but a real spirituo-corporeal body-world. So Anselm: "The whole earth, which carried in its lap the body of the Lord, will be a paradise." Augustine: "The promises of God are apprehended by faith; hope cannot reach them, love cannot understand them; they surpass our longings and desires; they may be obtained, but cannot be estimated." Grotius mentions that Plato also speaks of a pure earth and a pure heavens. Calov suggests a substantial recreation of heaven. More correctly even Irenæus: "Neither the substance, nor the existence of the creature will be annihilated." According to His promise, κατὰ τὸ ἐπάγγελμα αὐτοῦ sc. God.

In which dwelleth righteousness.—Not abstr. pro concreto, the righteous, but true righteousness itself or a perfect agreement with the will of God, cf. Rev. xxi. 27. 3. This is added partly for the encouragement, partly for the consolation of believers with reference to their unrighteous oppressors. Huther produces similar passages from the book of Enoch, in which reference seems to be made to our Epistles. [The passages are ch. x. 27; lv. 5; liv. 4. 6; xo. 17.—Wordsworth says, that the Apostle "does not represent the heavens as destined to destruction, but as hereafter to be transformed (ἀναστροφισμένους) to a more glorious condition. As the mortal bodies of the saints are dissolved by death, and will not be reduced to annihilation, but will, by reason of Christ's resurrection, and of their incorporation in Him who is the Resurrection and the Life, be renewed to immortality, so the heavenly bodies will be renewed by fire and delivered from the bondage of corruption. See Rom. viii. 20–22.—The material creation has sympathized with us in our fall, and it will rejoice with the righteous in their redemption and revivification, when their mortal bodies will rise and bloom anew like vernal herbs and flowers, in the glorious spring-tide of the resurrection. See Eusebius, Severus and others here in the Catena, Cramer, p. 100.—Thus the benefits of the incarnation and the redemption wrought by the second Adam extend also to the natural world. He has restored already the free use of the creatures to us (cf. 1 Cor. iii. 23), and He will raise the Creation itself to a more glorious state of being."—M.]

VER. 14. Wherefore, beloved, expecting these things, be diligent, etc.—The Apostle founds here an exhortation to holiness on the last named circumstance [i. e., the expectation of the new heavens and the new earth.—M.], as in v. 11; on the expectation of that catastrophe. —Ἀσπιλοι; cf. 1 Peter i. 19; 1 Tim. vi. 14; Jas. i. 27.—Ἀμώμητοι, Phil. ii. 15, ἡκε ἀμώμους, blameless; that you cannot be blamed; for the opposite, see ch. ii. 13.—Ἀντὶς, in His judgment, before Him, connect with ἐνεδέχνηαι; cf. 2 Cor. xii. 20.—Ἐνεδέχνηαι, 1 Peter i. 7; ii. 22, in His day.—Ἐν εἰρήνῃ. De Wette explains it: For your peace—εἰς εἰρήνην; but in that case the Apostle would certainly have expressed it. Better Calov: "In peace with God and with men." [Alford suggests, that considering the familiarity of the Eastern tongue with the expression ἐν εἰρήνῃ, the phrase may have an onward as well as a present meaning, as in πορεύσθαι ἐν εἰρήνῃ and εἰς εἰρήνην, Acts xvi. 36; Jas. ii. 16; Luke vii. 50; viii. 48; and denote that eternal peace of which all earthly peace is but a feeble foretaste.—M.] More specific definition of ἀσπιλοι καὶ ἀμώμητοι. Gerhard: "Strive that the Lord at His coming may find you peaceful and reconciled." The thought is connected with δικαιοσύνην, v. 13. Dietlein thinks that it is added with reference to the subject about to be stated by the Apostle, viz., the peace-destroying animosity of the deceivers, and refers to Jude 19. But Peter states first something else. It has a good meaning with reference to the many internal and external peace-breakers, especially at that time, Heb. xii. 14.

VER. 15. And account the longsuffering of our Lord your salvation, [see Appar. Crit.—M.]; μακροθυμίαν, cf. v. 9; Rom. ii. 4: ix. 22. Every postponement of the day of judgment is also an extension of grace for believers, as far as they may make further progress in holiness. Dietlein: "Apart from it, every converted Christian, reviewing his conversion, is constrained to admit that unless the longsuffering of God did insert a development-process of sin and redemption between apostacy and judgment, his conversion would have been impossible and the merited judgment would have overtaken him also." To this must be added the observation that since the text reads σωτηρίαν in general, not σωτηρίαν ὑμῶν, the salvation of many others also is founded on this longsuffering. [After this exegesis, it is difficult to understand why Frommüller retains the old Lutheran rendering.—M.] Roos: "The passage must not be limited to those persons who live at that time, but rather be extended to those who may still be born, if the long-suffering of God preserves this present world for a long time."

Even as also our beloved brother Paul—hath written unto you.—The deceivers, to whom Peter refers, probably abused the Epistles of the Apostle St. Paul, and represented Peter and Paul as contradicting each other; on this account Peter cites the testimony of Paul as confirmatory of his doctrine, and shows that between Paul and himself there is an intimate communion of spirit, and that the incident, mentioned Gal. ii. 11, was unable to extinguish his love.

As also, relates, not to what immediately precedes, but to the whole exhortation, vv. 14. 15, to holiness in view of the coming of Christ. Dietlein supposes that since the μακροθυμία of God is treated of only in Rom. ii. 4; ix. 22, the reference is evidently to the Epistle to the Romans, but the supposition that καθὼς is to be thus limited, is wrong, and ἐγράψεν ὑμῖν is decidedly opposed to it. Peter must allude to an Epistle of Paul, which, like the present Epistle of Peter, is addressed to the Christians of Asia Minor. To say that the Epistle to the Romans was addressed to Gentiles in general, is no sufficient explanation. Hence Bengel, Gerhard, al., think it to be the Epistle to the Hebrews on account of ch. ix. 26, etc.; x. 25, 37; others, the Epistle to the Ephesians, on account of ch. iv. 30; vi. 8; Col. iii. 4, 24. The reference is perhaps to all these; de Wette conjectures 1 Thess. iv. 18; v. 11, and 2 Thess. ii. 16; but the above named reason is against this view [which is also that of Alford, who meets the objection founded on ὑμῖν, by saying that this Epistle is addressed to all Christians alike, cf. ch. i. 1; and that all that can be inferred from ὑμῖν amounts to this, that this Epistle belongs to a date when the Pauline Epistles were no longer the property only of the Churches to which they were written, but were dispersed through, and were considered to belong to the whole Christian Church.—Benson considered the reference to be the Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians and Colossians, because addressed to Asia Minor Churches; this is also the opinion of Wordsworth, who notices also that this text is quoted by Origen de Recta Fide, sect. II., and ascribed by him without any hesitation to St. Peter.—M.]

Our beloved brother.—Brother must be taken in the narrow sense of "fellow-apostle." How beautiful is this trait of Peter's character, that he harboured no unkind remembrance of the sharp rebuke which Paul, who excelled him in his labours for the kingdom of God, had administered to him, and that he joyfully acknowledged his Apostolic calling.

According to the wisdom.—Dietlein: "Not so much preëminence in knowledge as aptitude in teaching, knowledge which peculiarly qualifies for teaching; hence ministerial grace accorded to him." Chrysostom does not hesitate to prefer Paul as a teacher to all others and to call him the teacher of all wisdom. [Polycarp ad Philipp. I. 3; "No one like me can equal the wisdom of the blessed Paul, who being absent wrote to you Epistles (ὑμῖν ἐγράψεν ἐπιστολάς) into which, if you look diligently, you will be enabled to be built up unto the faith."—M.]

V. 16. As also in all his Epistles, speaking in them of these things.—Ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς. Even if the Article is retained, which is probably spurious, there is no necessity to suppose here a reference to all the Epistles of Paul as a finished whole. It cannot be determined which and how many of the Pauline Epistles were known to Peter.—Ὡς sc. ἐπαύχε; περὶ τούτων; of the coming of Christ, the end of the world and of what is connected with those events; steadfastness in faith and zeal in good works. Here Peter might refer more particularly to the Epistles to the Thessalonians.

Among which are some things difficult to understand.—ἐν οἷς. Gerhard: "Peter here makes no direct reference to the Pauline Epistles, but to the subjects of which they treat, among which are some hard to understand," which belongs to the nature of the last things.—"Α στρεβλοῖσιν; στρεβλῶ from στρεβλῆ, an instrument of torture, a rock, a screw, a press, hence to screw, to strain, to wind, to twist or distort. A very striking word, peculiar to Peter, to describe the perversion of the Scriptures. As to the things themselves Bengel refers to 2 Tim. ii. 18; Gerhard, to false views of the millennium, of justification by faith, of Christian liberty, of the coming of Antichrist, and especially to the justification and excuses of lawless extravagancies.

The ignorant and unstable.—The reference is perhaps rather to the deceived than to the deceivers and scoffers, for whom these two words would be too mild. On ἀσθητικοί, cf. ch. ii. 14.

As also the other Scriptures; ὡς καὶ τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς. Here again the reference is not to a completed collection of the writings of the New Testament, from which the inference might be drawn that this Epistle is of a comparatively late origin. De Wette, without sufficient reasons, understands passages of Scripture. The reference is probably to the Pauline Epistles, the Epistle of James and the prophetic writings, which, according to v. 2 and ch. i. 20, must not be excluded.

To their own perdition.—Cf. ch. ii. 2; Deut. iv. 2; xii. 82; Rev. xxii. 19. Huther: "The perversion of the Scriptures has this consequence, since they use their distorted sayings in order to harden themselves in their carnal lusts." We have only to add, that they also bring perdition on themselves because they deprive others of salvation.

V. 17. Ye, therefore, beloved, knowing it before, beware, lest being led away together with the error of the lawless.—Final exhortation not to suffer themselves to be made to waver in their hope by the error of the ungodly, and to grow in grace and knowledge.—Προγινώσκοντες. Bengel supplies: the danger Dietlein refers it to the imminent attempts of deception. The Lord Himself set great value on the foretelling and fore-knowing of the future. Cf. Jno. xiv. 29; xvi. 4.—Φυλάσσετε, ἵνα μή. Take heed, be on your guard that ye—fall not from.—Thus taken, the construction is not singular; cf. Lke. xii. 15; Acts xxi. 26; 1 Jno. v. 21.—Ἀδελφoι, ch. ii. 7; iii. 8; πλάνη, ch. ii. 18, error, delusion, not deception, as Dietlein maintains;—συναρξάντες. Cf. Gal. ii. 18. Similar to what is said of sins, that, like the wind, they have taken us away, Is. lxiv. 6. [Alford notes the remarkable coincidence, that Peter, well acquainted as he was with the writings of Paul, should have written this word, which is the very one used by that Apostle of Barnabas, at Antioch, when he συναρξάθη with the hypocrisy of Peter and the other Jews.—M.] ;—συναρξάντες, together with them and others which they had long since deceived.

Ye fall from your own steadfastness.—ἐκπίπτειν. Cf. Gal. v. 4, to fall from, to be banished;—στηριγμός, standing fast, steadfastness in faith and hope; contrast to v. 16, above. He refers to ch. i. 12 where he declared his readers to be established in the truth. Roos: "The state of grace is the fortress. There God Himself is the stronghold and castle; Christ the rock on which we are builded; there we are assured by the privilege, that all things must work together for good to them that love God; there we are, by the power of God, kept unto salvation. A Christian falls from this his own fortress, if he loses grace, and neglecting to watch and pray and to attend to the word of God, gradually yields to the commission of intentional sins, which, whether by some thoroughly matured dogma or only by hasty judgments, he erroneously regards now in a very different light, and consequently excuses or even justifies."—Ἰδίου. Gerhard: "Not, as though they could of their own strength persevere in faith, but because only true believers continue firm to the end."—There is no reference here to continuance in communion with the Church.

Ver. 18. But grow in the grace, etc.—Gerlach: "The best preservation is continual practice of faith, continual growth in grace and knowledge: then we are proof against all assaults." Similarly Calvin. ["Hæc unica est perseverandi ratio, si assidue progredimur"].—M.] ; αὐξανετε. Cf. 1 Pet. ii. 2; 2 Pet. i. 5; Eph. iv. 15; Col. i. 10. We grow in grace, if we apprehend it with ever increasing faith and keep it, and thus we are privileged to enjoy it more and more richly. Cf. 1 Pet. v. 10.—Κυρίου belongs only to γινώσκει not to χάρει. [This is doubtful, since the preposition extends to both. There is no difficulty if the subjective force of χάρει and the objective force of γινώσκει as connected with Christ is brought out. "Grow in the grace of which Christ is the Author, in the knowledge of which Christ is the object."—M.]—Great value is set here at the close, as before at the beginning of the Epistle, on the knowledge of the person, the office, and the benefits of Christ, cf. ch. i. 2.—Αἰῶν ἡ δόξα. The doxology refers to Christ in proof of His Divinity. [Alford suggests Pliny's letter, "hymnus Christo quasi Deo."—M.] Cf. Jude 25; Rev. i. 6; iv. 9; Eph. iii. 21.—Εἰς ἡμέραν αἰῶνος not found elsewhere. Bengel explains ἡμέρα in contrast with night: "Eternity is a day without night, purely and perpetually enduring." Luther: "The day in which eternity begins as contrasted with time, but which day is likewise all eternity itself." The selection of this expression is best explained by reference to ch. iii. 8. Eternity counts with God as one day. Augustine: "It is only one day, but an everlasting day without yesterday to precede it, and without to-morrow to follow it; not brought forth by the natural sun, which shall exist no more, but by Christ, the Sun of Righteousness."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Unbelief is generally blind to the grossest contradictions in which it is entangled, even as those scoffers do neither see the folly of affirming a beginning of the world and to deny the end of the world, nor the absurdity of the conclusion: "That which has not yet happened until to-day, will happen nevermore." "God has not made the worlds for eternity, like Himself, but they come and pass away. In the case of each world there was a time when it did not exist, and there will be a time, when its place shall not be found. How distant soever the day of the destruction of our earth may be, when it does come there will be men on earth, like ourselves, occupied, as we are, with expectations and hopes of a long future. He that rolls up the heavens like a garment and scatters suns and earths like dust, He only is the Lord. Our science will never reach the laws which bring about the destruction of our earth." Schleiermacher.

2. Although loving gratitude to Jesus, who gave up His life as a sin-offering for us, must after all remain our strongest motive to holiness, Scripture teaches us that the thought of death and the judgment, of the end of the world and eternity, should move us to vigilance, seriousness, soberness, and to be on our guard against the security of the world. If the disciples in their time needed the pre-announcement of Christ's coming and the end of the world, it is doubly and trebly needed in our time. "Hastening the coming of Jesus must not degenerate into an impatient drawing near of the Judge by murmuring against others; we ought the rather be occupied with clearing away and preparation in our own affairs, in order that we may be found in peace." Rieger.

3. "The new earth is the eternal and chief scene of the Kingdom of God, Ps. xxxvii.; Rev. xxi. It will not be uninhabited. As the nature of the earth has been made to correspond and conform to man in his fallen and corrupt condition, so it will be made to correspond and conform to man purified, recovered and transfigured into glorious righteousness. Augustine already teaches that the renovated world will answer to the bodies of men which will likewise be renovated." Richter.

4. Even the older theologians held that the day of the Lord, in which such great and decisive events are to be transacted, in which so many millions are to be judged, must not be made to denote a day of twelve or twenty-four hours. It ought rather to be taken in the sense of a diet [In German, Reichs-tag, Land-tag, Fürsten-tag, literally, day or diet of an empire, county or princes, i. e., a congress of the representatives of an empire, a country, or of princes. The reference in the text is to the name of such assemblies, which although referring to a day, continue in session for weeks or months. So the day of the Lord denotes not a single day, but an indefinite period of time.—M.]

5. The Roman Catholic Church charges the Scripture with obscurity, and founds her charge on ch. iii. 16. In reply we may notice, a. The correct interpretation of the passage shows that Peter refers immediately to the difficulty of understanding the subjects treated in those Epistles.

b. These are difficult to understand because they relate to future events, and because the soul-man [so called in respect of the predominance of the ψυχ.—M.] finds it so difficult to understand the things of the Spirit.

c. Chrysostom's assertion concerning the Scripture is irrefutable, viz.: "Whatever is necessary [to be known and to our salvation.—M.] is plain and sure in it, so that all, even the unlearned, may understand it."

d. There are good reasons why many things in the Scriptures are hard to understand.

"Many parts of the truth of God must be clothed in concealment in order to prevent aversion to it, to prompt diligent inquiry, and in order to be reserved as a reward of the fidelity exhibited in such search." Bieger. These difficulties contain a peculiar attraction, a stirring up to prayer, a confounding of our vanity, a concealing of the truth from the eyes of the meddling.

6. If the genuineness of this Epistle be admitted, it affords us a clear proof of the futile pretences of the critics of the Tübingen school in respect of the Pauline Epistles, e. g., of Zeller, who says in the Theol. Jahrb., 1846, II.: "Of the twenty-seven writings contained in our Canon, there is not one for which can be shown credentials of its origin reaching up to the pretended date of its composition."

[7. Augustine says concerning the question arising from v. 16: 'Which are the things hard to understand in the Epistles of Paul?' "Even in the times of the Apostles, certain persons, who did not understand some of Paul's rather obscure (sub obscuras) sentences, alleged that he said, 'Let us do evil, that good may come,' because he had said, 'that the law entered in, that sin might abound; and where sin abounded, there did grace much more abound,' Rom. iii. 8; v. 20.—When the Apostle Paul says that a man is justified by faith (per fidem) without the works of the law, he does not mean thereby, that, when a man has received and professed the faith, he may despise the works of righteousness; but that every one may know that he may be justified by faith, although works of the law have not gone before his faith. For works follow him that is justified, 'Sequuntur justificatum, non precedunt justificatum.'—Since, however, the notion above mentioned had arisen at that time (viz., that works were not requisite), the other Apostolic Epistles of Peter, John, James and Jude, specially contend against that notion; in order to maintain earnestly, that faith without works does not profit. Indeed Paul himself has defined faith to be not any kind of faith by which man believes in God, but he defines true faith to be that healthful and evangelical faith, whose works proceed from love: 'Faith which worketh by love,' Gal. v. 6. And he asserts, that the faith which some men think sufficient for salvation is so worthless, that 'If I have faith (he says) so as to remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing,' 1 Cor. xiii. 2; and doubtless that man's life is good, where faithful love works, for he says, 'the fulfilling of the law is love,' Rom. xiii. 10.—Evidently, therefore, for this reason St. Peter in his second Epistle, when he was exhorting to holiness of life, and was declaring that this world would pass away, and that new heavens and a new earth are looked for, which are to be assigned as dwellings to the righteous; and when he was admonishing them to consider what ought to be their life in this world, in order that they may be made meet for that future habitation; and being also aware that many ungodly men had taken occasion from certain rather obscure sentences of the Apostle Paul, to be reckless of living well, and to presume of salvation by faith, has noted that there are some things hard to be understood in St. Paul's Epistles, which men wrested, as they did the other Scriptures, to their own destruction; whereas, in truth, that Apostle (St. Paul) entertained the same opinions as the rest of the Apostles concerning eternal salvation, and that it would not be given to any but to those who live well. Thus therefore Peter writes." Augustine then quotes this chapter, vv. 11-18.—Augustine, de fide et operibus, c. 22, ed. Bened. 6, p. 303.—M.]

[8. Wordsworth, who cites the foregoing passage from Augustine, gives also the following useful table of the testimony of prophets and Apostles to the authority of Holy Scripture:

The prophet Malachi closes the Canon of the Old Testament by a solemn appeal "to the law of Moses, and to the statutes and judgments." He says: "Remember them," (Mal. iv. 4.)

The Apostle and Evangelist St. John closes the four gospels with a similar reference. "These things are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing, ye might have life through His name," John xx. 31.

St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentile world, closes his Epistles with a testimony to the sufficiency and inspiration of Holy Scripture: "Abide thou in those things which thou hast learned, and wert assured of, knowing from whom thou didst learn them; and that from a child thou knowest the Holy Scriptures, which are the things that are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith that is in Jesus Christ. Every Scripture, being divinely inspired, is also profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, in order that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto every good work," 2 Tim. iii. 14-17.

St. Peter, here, in like manner closes his Epistles with a similar exhortation, and with a warning against perversion of Scripture.

St. Jude also closes the Catholic Epistles with a memento to his readers: "Remember ye the words spoken before by the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ," Jude 17.

Lastly, the Apostle and Evangelist St. John closes the Apocalypse with a promise of blessing to those who keep its sayings, and a curse on those who take from it or add to it, Rev. xxii. 7. 18. 19.

Thus the duties of the Christian Church, as the Guardian of Holy Scripture, and the duties of every member of the Church, as bound to receive, to meditate upon, and to obey the written word of God, are solemnly inculcated by the farewell voices of prophets and Apostles.

Prophets and Apostles pass away to another and a better world. But the word of God, written by their instrumentality, endureth forever, 1 Peter i. 25.—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

There is a twofold day of the Lord, a day of His mercy in which He still causes sinners to be bidden to His Kingdom by the word (preached), 2 Cor. vi. 2, and a day of righteousness and wrath (Acts xvii. 31), which has its various gradations and divisions.—What is necessary to watching and being prepared for the coming day of the Lord? Luke xii. 39; 1 Thess. v. 6, 4; Matt. xxiv. 38; Rev. xvi. 15.—We cannot be translated into a state of peace, rest and happiness, unless we have been purified within by sanctification of the Spirit, and there arise a cessation of the reproaches and accusations in respect of the transgressions of which we were guilty.—If by carelessness or indiscretion we contract once more spots or blemishes, let us hasten to the opened fountain for all uncleanness, that we may be cleansed by the blood of Jesus.—If all things shall dissolve into fire, the idols of secure men will also perish. How ill is it with us, if we have nothing that is fire-proof!—The only means of escaping the terror of the coming of Christ, is a holy walk and godliness. The former relates to other men and earthly things, the latter to our conduct towards God.—Who does sufficiently realize the end of all things, which has come nigh, and which after the death of the body we shall quickly be made to meet?—According to Tertullian, the primitive Christians were wont to pray for a postponement of the end. The Church sings:

Hasten, Lord, the judgment-day,
Thy glorious countenance display;

Es, Heber Herr, eil zum Gericht, Lass seh'n Dein herrlich Angesicht;

both sentiments are well founded.—The hope of that new world, wherein dwelleth perfect righteousness and constant joy, a chief means of consolation among all the trials and afflictions of this world.—It is one of the chief aims of believers to strive that hereafter they may be found without spot before the Lord.—Who will hereafter be found without spot?—The long-suffering of God our salvation and that of many others.—Beautiful example of Peter in his attitude towards Paul.—Harmony among the teachers of the Church is as necessary as the joint operation of the members of our body.—To honour the gifts of God in others, is to honour God Himself.—If the forgery of a testament (will) which disposes of an earthly inheritance is a great crime, how much greater is the sin of those who forge and distort the Testament of the Eternal God.—The grace of steadfastness should be daily implored with earnest prayer.—The grace of God and the knowledge of Jesus Christ are indissolubly united.—Christ is duly glorified by us, if we acknowledge, praise and publish His benefits.

STARKE:—That must be a fearful day; who does not tremble at the birth-pangs of the last time? But ye holy ones, rejoice, lift up your heads, for your redemption is nigh. Lke. xii. 28.—Men, be moderate in providing garments, in building palaces, in purchasing precious things. Every thing, even the most precious, must be consumed by fire in the last day, 1 Cor. vii. 30, 31.—The constant recollection of the last day, in which Jesus Christ, the righteous Judge, will give to every man his due reward, is a powerful incentive to godliness, Eccl. xii. 13, 14.—When the heavens and the earth shall have passed away, believers will nevertheless come to a most delightful place, although we cannot now name it or describe its glory, 1 Thess. iv. 17.—Those who do not pursue righteousness and holiness here, will not be preferred to the abode in the new heaven of glory, and still less be permitted to enjoy its pleasures, 1 Cor. vi. 9.—The patience and long-suffering of Christ is our preservation; for we owe it to His mercy that we are not consumed, Lam. iii. 22.—If there are dark passages in Holy Scripture, the darkness is not intrinsic, but extrinsic, that is, with respect to the reader and his weak understanding. But it is clear enough in the order of salvation and eternal life to silence all excuses, Ps. cxix. 105.—If Holy Scripture seems to be dark here and there, be not offended at it, and take care not to despise it; learn rather therefrom its sublimity and thy lowliness, but ever search more and more and persevere in prayer; thus thou shalt get more light: as for the rest, it will be reserved for the perfect knowledge thou shalt attain in heaven, 1 Cor. xiii. 12.—A perverted understanding goes generally hand in hand with an evil will.—Try the spirits, whether they are of God; if not, hearken not to them, do not follow them, and let them not deceive thee, 1 Cor. vi. 9.—A strong fortress needs a vigilant and lion-hearted commander, else it will be lost.—Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall, 1 Cor. x. 12. Watch!—Those who are minded not to fall from their own steadfastness, must above all things grow in the grace and knowledge of Christ, Jno. xvii. 8.

STIER:—If we may sigh in our own case, Lord, come speedily; must we not, on the other hand, pray because of the ungodly, Lord, have patience. Examples: Abraham, Jonah.—Look at all the glory of this poor world with no other thought than the knowledge that all is destined to pass away!

RIEGER:—True part of friendship among Christians, to warn one another.—All the notices of the Holy Scriptures concerning future things are given to us that we should be on our guard. Those who only use them to gratify their curiosity, deprive them all of their best properties of salt and light.—The multitude of the wicked and the diversity of the instruments whereby error is conveyed to men, constitute no small power of deception.—How many a possession, the objects of doubt, dispute and contradiction will be saved in the day of eternity!

RICHTER:—Ye that are fortified in genuine Scripture-truth and in the doctrine in Christ, are in the city of refuge, of which the Jewish city of refuge was a type! Numb. xxxv.

KAPFF:—In the great process of combustion the earth will experience the fate of ore which contains silver and gold. The gross, light and formless parts are consumed, the precious and light-giving parts are preserved.—The earth will be a great light-bearer corresponding to the light of the glorified resurrection bodies.—In the passages describing the glorification of the earth, it is difficult to determine how much belongs to the renovation of the earth during the millennial kingdom, and how much to the glorification of the new earth.—If the earthly is so unclean before the holiness of God that it must be burned with fire, how dare we suffer our spirit to be linked to the earthly?

LISCO:—Of the salvation, which we may attain even in this life.—The inner completion of the citizens of the kingdom.—The salutation of departing Christians.—The renovation of the world at the coming of Christ.

[SHARP:—The reflection that our Lord, who came into the world to die for the sins of mankind, is by His resurrection made Judge of the world, doth not afford matter of greater terror to His enemies, than it does of comfort to His friends and followers. How must it revive the heart of every honest Christian, and encourage him to go on patiently and cheerfully in the service of his Master, notwithstanding the many frailties and infirmities under which he labours; notwithstanding the many slips and errors, that after his best endeavours do attend his course of life, to consider that He, who is to take his accounts at the last day, and to pass sentence upon him, is no other than his dear Redeemer! If we look upon the judgment to come only in this view, that then all the hidden works of darkness shall be brought to light; the secrets of all hearts be laid open; the actions of all mankind strictly examined and scanned; and sentence passed upon every one according to his works done in the flesh; if we have no other view of the last judgment than only this, it would not be very comfortable to the best of us, who are all sinners, and therefore cannot plead our innocence at that great tribunal. But when we consider farther, that it is our Saviour who shall then sit upon the throne; that it is our Saviour to whom God hath committed the judging of us; our Saviour who knows our frame, who is sensible of all the difficulties we have to conflict with, as having Himself in the days of His flesh had sufficient experience of them, "He being in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin;" and that this Saviour of ours will not judge us according to the rigour of the Law, but according to that gracious allowance of the Gospel; the consideration of this will prove an effectual antidote against all the fears, and disquietudes, and despondencies we may lie under upon account of our own unworthiness. Let none of us, therefore, that heartily own our Lord Jesus and His religion, and honestly endeavour to live up to the laws of His Gospel, fright ourselves with such thoughts as these: How much shall I, poor wretch, dare to appear before the face of my Judge at the last day: I, who have so many sins to answer for? Let us but go on in the good course we are in: let us but hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, and daily apply to the throne of grace for strength and assistance against our corruptions; and to our prayers let us add our sincere endeavours to increase in virtue, and the longer we live still to grow better; and then I dare say, whatever sins we may have been guilty of, we shall not need to have any apprehension, or fear our condition on account of them, when we come to die: but we may with confidence appear before the tribunal of our Lord; and expect our part in that comfortable sentence, which He will at the last day pronounce to all His true disciples and followers: "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," Matt. xxv. 34.—M.]

§ 1. CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE.

I. THE EXORDIUM (i. 1-4) states the object of the Apostolic annunciation (i. 2) and its purpose (v. 3); the design of the Epistle being superadded (v. 4).

II. PRINCIPAL PART THE FIRST (i. 5—ii. 18):

IF YE WALK IN THE LIGHT (i. 5—ii. 2), IN OBEDIENCE TO HIS LAW IN GENERAL (ii. 3-6), AND KEEPING THE COMMANDMENT OF BROTHERLY LOVE IN PARTICULAR (ii. 7-14), NOT BEING MISLED BY THE LUSTS (ii. 15-17), AND THE LIES OF THE WORLD (ii. 18-23), YE SHALL HERE-AFTER ABIDE BEFORE CHRIST.

1. The leading thought: "God is light" (i. 5).
2. The first inference: true fellowship (i. 6. 7).
3. The second inference: perception and confession of sins (i. 8-10).
5. The third inference: reconciliation and redemption (ii. 1. 2).
6. Mark of the walk in the light; obedience to His commandments, especially brotherly love (ii. 3-11).
6. Consolatory warning against love of the world (ii. 12-17).
7. Warning and consolation against antichrist (ii. 18-28). Description of his forerunners, whose appearing points to the last time (ii. 18-23); Exhortation of the faithful to steadfastness in their assurance of having the truth and eternal life (ii. 24-28).

III. PRINCIPAL PART THE SECOND (ii. 29—v. 12):

HE THAT IS BORN AGAIN (OUT) OF (THE BEING OF) GOD THE RIGHTEOUS (ii. 29), IS A MIRACLE OF HIS LOVE NOW AND HEREAFTER (iii. 1-3), IS BOUND BY HIS WILL (iii. 4-10a), ESPECIALLY TO PRACTISE BROTHERLY LOVE (iii. 10b-18), IS BLESSED BEFORE HIM AND IN HIM (iii. 19-24), TRYING, LIKE GOD, THE FALSE SPIRITS (iv. 1-6), HE ENJOYS THE LOVE OF GOD AND EXHIBITS BROTHERLY LOVE (iv. 7-21), HE TRIUMPHS OVER THE WORLD AND IS SURE OF ETERNAL LIFE (v. 1-12).

1. The leading thought: He that is born again of God the Righteous doeth righteousness (ii. 29).
2. The glory of the Sonship (iii. 1-3).
3. The way of God's children passes through God's law (iii. 4-10a).
4. Brotherly love is the sum-total of the Divine law (iii. 10b-18).
5. The blessed consequences of our adoption by God (iii. 19-24).
6. Warning and exhortation with reference to false teachers (iv. 1-6).

7. Brotherly love and Divine love as related to each other on the ground of Christ's advent (iv. 7-21).

8. The power of faith (v. 1-5), its testimony (v. 6-10) and substance (v. 11. 12).

IV. THE CONCLUSION (v. 12-21) REMINDS US OF THE GIFT OF ETERNAL LIFE (v. 13), OF THE CONFIDENCE THAT OUR PRAYERS ARE HEARD (vv. 14. 15), EXHORTS US TO INTERCEDE FOR ERRING BRETHREN (vv. 16. 17), AND REMINDING US OF THE CERTAINTY OF OUR REDEMPTION FROM SIN (v. 18), DEHORTS US IN VIEW OF THE WORLD (v. 19) AND THE REDEEMER (v. 20) FROM IDOLATRY (v. 21).

This attempted analysis will have to be justified by the exposition, but the situation of the question has to be noted here in brief. Formerly nobody thought of seeking and finding in this Epistle a well-ordered train of thoughts, or even definite and connected groups of thought. Augustine (Expos. in Ep. Joh.) contented himself with the remark: "locuturus est multa et prope omnia de caritate." Thus Luther in his two expositions says: "The main substance of this first Epistle relates to love." "The Apostle's object in this Epistle is to teach faith against heretics, and true love against the vicious."—Calvin (in his Commentary on the New Testament) says: "doctrinam exhortationibus mistam continet. Disserit enim de eterna Christi deitate, simul de incomparabili, quam mundo patefactus secum attulit, gratia; tum de omnibus in genere beneficiis, ac præsertim inestimabilem divinæ adoptionis gratiam commendat atque extollit. Inde sumit exhortandi materiam; et nunc quidem in genere pie sancte vivendum admonet, nunc de caritate præcipit. Verum nihil horum continua serie facit; nam sparsim docendo et exhortando varius est: præsertim vero multos est in urgenda fraterna intellectione. Alia quoque breviter attingit." Lutheran expositors, e. g., Valentine Löcher and Rappolt thought that the Epistle was written without method; the latter described John's method as aphoristic. Not until the 18th century, more definitely since the middle of that century, the programme of Joachim Oporin of Göttingen led to progress in the recognition of a plan and order in this Epistle. Bengel recognized the exordium (i. 1-4), the tractatio (namely the special one i. 5-iv. 21, and the more general v. 1-12), and the conclusion (v. 13-21).—Lücke with his ten sections approached again the aphoristic plan (i. 1-4; i. 5-ii. 2; ii. 3-17; ii. 18-28; ii. 29-iii. 10; iii. 10-24; iv. 1-6; iv. 7-v. 5; v. 6-12; v. 13-21).—After v. Hoffmann's lead (in Schriftbeweis 2, 2. p. 335-337), who, independently of the exordium (i. 1-4), and the conclusion (v. 13-21), divides the Epistle into four parts (i. 1-ii. 11; ii. 12-28; ii. 29-iii. 22; iii. 23-iv. 21; v. 1-17), Luthardt in his programme of 1860 adopted the following division after the exordium: i. 5-ii. 11; ii. 12-ii. 27; ii. 27-iii. 24a; iii. 24b-iv. 21; v. 1-21.—Ebrard has six divisions; i. 1-4; i. 5-ii. 6; ii. 7-ii. 29; iii. 1-24; iv. 1-v. 3a; v. 3b-21.—Ewald has only three divisions: i. 1-ii. 17; ii. 18-iv. 6; iv. 7-v. 21.—Huther, who, at the suggestion of de Wette, in the first edition of his commentary had grouped his divisions according to the three leading thoughts:—God is light (i. 5), righteous (ii. 29), love (iv. 8), has abandoned this arrangement as untenable, and adopted the following division in the second edition of his work: i. 5-ii. 11; ii. 12-ii. 28; ii. 29-iii. 22; iii. 23-v. 17, leaving it optional to combine the first and second into one. Düsterdieck has, after the exordium, i. 1-4, two main parts (i. 5-ii. 28; ii. 29-v. 5), and a double conclusion (v. 6-13 and 14-21).

§ 2. CHARACTER OF THE EPISTLE.

1. The Epistle treats of the following subjects: God is light, love, righteous; being of God, being God's child, born of God, being and abiding in God; His Son, who is from the beginning, sent by the Father, come in the flesh to destroy the works of the devil, who gave His life for us, who is the propitiation for all, for the sins of the whole world, our Paraclete, in whom is eternal life, in whom we are and abide, whom we shall see as He is: His Spirit, the Spirit of truth, of whom we have: His word, which is eternal; fellowship with the Apostles, with the Father and the Son, prayer, intercession, confidence even in the judgment, the faith which overcomes the world, love of the brethren even to the point of laying down our lives for them, hope that purifies itself;—the devil, the spirit of fraud, lying, darkness, antichrist, the world, the lust of the eyes, the lust of the flesh, the sin which is formally lawlessness, inwardly unrighteousness, the sin unto death, being of the devil, the child of the devil, hatred, death, idols.—They are almost exclusively ethical ideas, very few dogmatical, and these are immediately delivered of the ethical references they contain, and thus linked into this chain of ethical ideas; e. g., the death of Christ (ch. ii. 2; iii. 16). The author hastens in this Epistle through the whole sphere of life, although his power to do so is derived from a very small circle of ethical ideas. The advent of the Son of God in the flesh, His walk and aim as well as His intercession make up the christology he sets in operation, and the life of the Christian, snatched away from the power of the devil by regeneration and united in church-fellowship with the Father and the Son in his way through the world with its seductive power in particular things and in groups to the bliss of eternal life after death,—this is the sphere of life, the extent of ethical contemplations in this Epistle. We have therefore to deal here as much with faith in the divinity of Christ transposed into life, then with the life in Christ, as with the life in Christ theologically thought-out and leading to faith in the divinity of Christ. While the Gospel seeks to strengthen and enlarge faith in Jesus (says v. Hoffmann, Schriftbeweis, 2, 2, p. 337), the Epistle shows forth the moral conduct which is necessary to faith and only possible to faith.

2. But our Epistle does not treat these ideas as abstractions of the mind, but as contemplations of life, experiences of life, as facts and concrete manifestations of life. "One cannot tell whether the artless ingenuousness of a childlike disposition strikes us more in this Epistle than the grave high-tonedness of a thoughtful man, because, in fact, both are intimately blended together." (Düsterdieck). The author takes hold of the most weighty thoughts and ideas with a sure, light and dexterous hand; he is perfectly master of them, he has experienced them, they are his own, he is familiar with them. His object is to bring them home to the consciousness of his readers and to make them know them. Hence oldate, oldaqen, dokimásete, ginóssete, ina ginóskamev, ina eidōte. Peculiar is the constant repetition of antithetical sentences, not by way of simple antithesis, but so that the predicate of a sentence becomes the subject of the antithesis or vice versa; the antithesis only brings out a new feature and thus carries on the thought, cf. e. g., i. 6 sq., 8 sq.; ii. 4—vi. 9 sqq. 22, sq.; iii. 3—6. On the use of kai instead of de, of oti, ina, etc., see Ebrard, p. 9. [He says: Style and construction remind us strongly of the didactic passages of the Gospel, e. g., Jno. i. 1—18; iii. 27—36, etc. For we recognize in the Epistle the same mode of thinking in paratactic periods and the same preference for kai in connecting together the different members of a train of thought (cf. e. g., 1 Jno. ii. 1—3, where Paul would doubtless have used tan de for kai tan, and surely have put aitos gar blasphētos esti for kai aitōs blasphētos esti); cf. his taking up again the immediately preceding oti in 1 Jno. iii. 20 with the anaphoras in Jno. i. 33; iv. 6, etc., and in general his preference for the particle oti which is used in so many different senses (cf. Jno. xvi. 3. 4. 6. 17; also 1 Jno. ii. 12 sqq. with Jno. xvi. 9—11), and the use of the particles rep, ina, álla. It is clear that the author of the Epistle, like the Evangelist, is in the habit of thinking in Hebrew, i. e., Aramaic, and moving within the narrow range of the particles

ו, כי or י, למען. To this must be added certain other modes of construction peculiar to a Hebrew cast of thought, e. g., the circumlocution of the Genitive by ex, 1 Jno. iv. 13, cf. Jno. i. 35; vi. 8, 70 and many other passages, the solution of a relative sentence into a conditional sentence, (tan tis . . . oik estin en aitō for dotis κ. τ. λ.) 1 Jno. ii. 15; iii. 17; cf. Jno. vi. 43, etc. The solution of a simple antithesis into a final or causal sentence depending on a word to be supplied (oik hōan ef hōōn álla ina . . .) 1 Jno. ii. 19; cf. Jno. i. 8; iii. 28, etc. The circumlocution of the Dative of the instrument by en, 1 Jno. ii. 3, etc., compared with Jno. i. 26. 33; xvi. 30; and lastly the frequent use of thaupten and deidōnai, while ōpōn is only used in the Perfect, and certain phrases such as την ψυχην τάτναι, θεός δ' ἀληθινός, ὁ σωτὴρ τοῦ κόσμου ὁ Χριστός, κόσμος λαμβάνει, the use of paivein, teknia, paidia, etc.—M.]—John's method is neither dialectical like that of Paul, nor rhetorical like that of the Epistle to the Hebrews, but speculative, contemplative, noting the substance of thought without marking the mutual relation of the thoughts themselves. Huther strikingly illustrates the Apostle's peculiarity by comparing his leading thought to a key-note that he strikes and causes to sound through the derivative thoughts until a new key-note is struck that leads to a new key. It is the dialectics of contemplation, of experience. "His simplicity and unadornedness of statement are characteristic: whether he refers to the Divine truths themselves, or addresses his readers by way of admonition or warning, his language preserves throughout the same calmness and decision; he never discloses a passionately excited frame of mind, but we see every where the reflection of the calmness of a heart resting in blissful peace, which makes him sure that the simple statement of the truth is sufficient to commend his words to the hearts of his readers. At the same time a firm, manly tone pervades the Epistle, contrary to all effeminate sentimentality of which the Apostle is so thoroughly free, that while enforcing spirituality of life, he uniformly insists upon the necessity of the exhibition of its truth in deeds [i. e., in the life and practice of men.—M.].—It is also noteworthy that while, on the one hand, he addresses his readers as a father speaks to his children, he does not forget, on the other, that they are no longer minors and do not require to be taught new things, but that they are his equals and joint-possessioners with him of all the truth he enunciates and of the life which he wants not to create, but to preserve in them." (Huther). This Epistle, "a deed of sacred love," "is to the most simple reader whose heart has made experience of Christian saving truth, immediately intelligible, but also unfathomable to the profoundest Christian thinker, although equally dear and refreshing to both. The very method pursued by the author of our Epistle in taking hold of Christian living, believing and loving from their profoundest depth, and in their inexhaustible wealth, shows with peculiar clearness how the foolishness of God confounds all the wisdom of the world; for that which our Epistle declares with almost playful ease, or at least with the perfectly artless simplicity of a heart which in its real vital fellowship with the Lord possesses all the riches of Divine wisdom and communicates them in holy anxiety of love—that which it declares with the triumphant assurance and joyful confidence of indisputable truth concerning the source and nature of the Christian life, i. e., of eternal life, is infinitely more than all the wisdom of the world together can ever reach, and also more than even Christian wisdom can ever think out or fathom." (Düsterdieck). One cannot fail to see how unexcelled gentleness, tenderness and thoroughness of love are wonderfully blended with the most decided sternness and deep-cutting keenness of judgment. "It does not seem as if only a father were addressing his beloved children, but as if a glorified saint were speaking to men from a higher world. The doctrine of heavenly love, calmly active, with indefatigable zeal essaying everything and never exhausting itself, has in no writing been so perfectly demonstrated as in this." (Ewald). With such testimonies, triumphantly corroborated by the exposition, we may take comfort under the charges that the confusion of the Epistle betrays the senility of its author, who, either with planless abruptness, wanders from a thought he had suggested, or falls into the eternal sameness of an old man (S. G. Lange, Eichhorn, Ziegler). And the reproach of the master of the Tübingen school, of v. Baur, that the Epistle lacks the freshness of direct life, and that the tenderness and profound thoroughness of the Johannine mode of contemplation and statement had too much resolved themselves into a tone childishly effeminate, dissolving in indefiniteness, marked by constant repetitions and a lack of logical energy, may be met by Hilgenfeld's declaration that this Epistle is one of the most beautiful writings of the New Testament, that it is peculiarly rich and original with reference to the subjective, intensive life of Christianity, and that the fresh, living and attractive character of the Epistle consists just in the marked preference with which it introduces us into the inward experience of the true Christian life.

[After all this, we may well say with Ebrard to the commentator and his readers: "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground."—M.]

§ 3. THE AUTHOR OF THE EPISTLE.

If we glance at the testimony of the ancient Church and pay close attention to the statements of the witnesses respecting the author of this Epistle, all doubt must vanish that the Apostle St. John was, without contradiction, considered to have been its author. The Apostolic Fathers contain several allusions and references to our Epistle. Ebrard gives them along with similar matter in the Introduction to his Commentary, pp. 14-16. [The paragraphs in question, besides the quotation from Polycarp, as given below, are these: Papias knew and used this Epistle: Κέχρηται δ' ὁ αὐτὸς [Papias] μαρτυρίας ἀπὸ τῆς προτέρας Ἰωάννου ἐπιστολῆς. v. Euseb. H.

E, III, 39.—The anonymous Epistle to Diognetus, written about the time of Justin Martyr, contains many passages, which imply an unquestionable dependence on this Epistle. Cf. Cap., X, with 1 Jno. iv. 9-11; XII. with 1 Jno. ii. 18-25; iv. 4-6; v. 6-12; also Cap., V.-VII.; XI. The Epistle of Vienna and Lyons [Euseb., V., 1] contains an unmistakable allusion to 1 Jno. iii. 16; ὁ δὲ τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἀγάπης ἐνεδείξατο, εὐδοχῆσας ὑπὲρ τῆς τῶν ἀδελφῶν ἀπολογίας καὶ τὴν ταῦθ' εἶναι ψυχὴν.—Carpocrates, a Gnostic, who flourished about the beginning of the second century at Alexandria, sought to use for his purpose, 1 Jno. v. 19. "Mundus in maligno positus est," see Origen in Genes., cap. I., Opp., I. p. 23,—M.]—The most important testimony is that of Polycarp, the disciple of John, who suffered martyrdom, A. D. 168, as found in his Epistle to the Philippians c. vii.: πᾶς γὰρ ὃς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι ἀντίχριστός ἐστι; which Ebrard calls "an unmistakably clear reminiscence", and Düsterdieck "a free use of Jno. iv. 2. 3."—Very important is the testimony of the Canon of the New Testament, which was edited by Muratori about a hundred years ago and is known as the Muratorian Canon. According to Wieseler's careful investigation (see Studien und Kritiken, 1847, pp. 815-857) it was written A. D. 170 by a Church-teacher for the purpose of instructing catechumens in the documents of the Christian faith which were received in his Church. We read, thereafter, notices of the fourth Gospel and its origin: "Quid ergo mirum, ei Johannes tam constanter singula etiam in epistolis suis proferat, dicens in semet ipso (1 Jno. i. 1): quæ vidimus oculis nostris et auribus audivimus et manus nostræ palpaverunt, hæc scripsimus; sic enim non solum visorem, sed et auditorem, sed et scriptorem omnium mirabilium domine per ordinem proficetur." And again after an enumeration of the Pauline Epistles: "Epistolæ sane Judæ et superscripti Johannes duæ in Catholica habentur." This reference to the two Epistles of St. John must not be construed as denoting either the second and third, as if the citation from the first Epistle rendered further reference to it unnecessary (Schleiermacher, Lindner and Ebrard in Herzog's R. E., p. 98), or the first and the third, the second being regarded as an appendix to the first (Hug), but the first and the second, as Catholic Epistles proper, the second Epistle, addressed to the κνῖα, being considered to have been written not for a single person, but for a congregation; it is consequently the third Epistle which is not mentioned, not because its Johannian authorship was called in question, but because it was regarded as less instructive and as a private letter addressed to an individual.

The Peschito, belonging to the same age as the Muratorian fragment, also bears witness to the authenticity of this Epistle.—Quotations from this Epistle grow more frequent after the beginning of the third century in the writings of Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen and Cyprian.—It is very probable, but without much importance, that the Alogi, who, on the authority of Epiphanius, rejected the Gospel and Revelation of St. John, rejected also the first Epistle. Nor can it be of any moment that Marcion and his followers did not enumerate the writings of John in their Canon. Eusebius, whose defects in statement, pompous style, and disjointed treatment are considerably excelled and counterbalanced by his comprehensive and laborious historical researches, includes the Epistle among the Homologoumena (H. E., III., 24. 25), and Jerome (de viris illust. c. 9) says: "ab universis ecclesiasticis viris probatur."—Most excellent is also on this point Tischendorf's short but weighty essay: "Wann wurden unsere Evangelien verfasst?" Leipzig, 1865. [See also my article on the Sources of the Gospels in the Bibliotheca Sacra, July and October numbers, 1866.—M.]

2. This chain of external evidence is confirmed by the internal evidence arising from the comparison of the Epistle with the Gospel of St. John. Both the range of thoughts and their mode of expression, as well as the diction, are the same in the first Epistle and in the Gospel, and the remarks on the former in § 2., 1. 2, may and must be applied to the latter with slight modifications. Cf. Grimm: On the Gospel and first Epistle of St. John as Works of the same Author in Studien und Kritiken, 1847, p. 171-181, and On the first Epistle and its relation to the fourth Gospel, ibid., 1849, p. 269-303.—"As in the Gospel we see here the author retire to the background, unwilling to speak of himself and still less to support any thing by the weight of his name and reputation, although the reader meets him here not as the calm narrator, but as an epistolary writer, as exhorter and teacher, as an Apostle, and moreover as the only surviving Apostle. It is the same delicacy and diffidence, the same lofty calmness and composure, and especially the same truly Christian modesty that cause him to retire to the background as an Apostle and to say altogether so little of himself: he only desires to counsel and warn, and to remind his readers of the sublime truth they have once acquired; and the higher he stands the less he is disposed to humble 'the brethren' by his great authority and directions. But he knew who he was, and every word tells plainly that he only could thus speak, counsel and warn. The unique consciousness, which an Apostle, as he grew older, could carry within himself, and which he, once the favourite disciple, had in a peculiar measure, the calm superiority, clearness and decision in thinking on Christian subjects, the rich experience of a long life, steeled in the victorious struggle with every unchristian element, and a glowing language lying concealed under this calmness, which makes us feel intuitively that it does not in vain commend to us love as the highest attainment of Christianity—all this coincides so remarkably in this Epistle, that every reader of that period, probably without any further intimation, might readily determine who he was. But where the connection required it, the author intimates with manifest plainness that he once stood in the nearest possible relations to Jesus (i. 1-3; v. 3-6; iv. 16), precisely as he is wont to express himself in similar circumstances in the Gospel; and all this is so artless and simple, so entirely without the faintest trace of imitation in either case, that nobody can fail to perceive that the selfsame author and Apostle must have composed both writings." (Ewald, Die Johann. Schriften, I., p. 431 sq.) Add to this the bold self-testimony with the impress of truth, ch. iv. 6.—Surprising is the number of parallel passages in the two writings:

Considerably more than half of the thirty-five passages taken from the Gospel form part of the last sayings of Christ in ch. xii.-xvii. There the receptivity of the witness was preëminently necessary, and there it showed its strength; where he made the most vital surrender of himself, there he received the most permanent impressions. This is thoroughly Johannean. Compare on this subject especially Lange, The Gospel of John, §§ 1-3, Vol. IV., p. 1 sqq. German edition.

3. The genuineness of this Epistle as that of an Apostle was maintained by the Church without all contradiction until Joseph Scaliger boldly enunciated the notion: "tres epistolæ Johannis non sunt Apostoli Johannis." Then there arose at the time of the atomic criticism of Rationalism S. G. Lange (Die Schriften des Johannes übersetzt und erklärt, Vol. III., p. 4 sqq.), who although not venturing to assault the external evidence, made the subject matter of the Epistle the starting-point of his criticisms, and raised the doubt whether the Epistle was worthy of an Apostle; his strictures were as follows: that the Epistle lacked individual and local character, that its agreement with the Gospel gave rise to the suspicion of timid imitation and slavish copying; that John, before the destruction of Jerusalem, was not old enough to produce such a work of senility; that he may not have mentioned the destruction of Jerusalem, because it was a ticklish point, etc.—Bretschneider (Probabilia) is a more important opponent; but he lived to become convinced of the groundlessness of his doubts of the authenticity of John's writings. Claudius (Ursichten des Christenthums), who maintained that the Epistle was the fabrication of a Jewish Christian, and Horst (in Henke's Museum für Religionswissenschaft von 1803) are only mentioned on account of their boldness, and Paulus (Die drei Lehrbriefe des Johannes wortgetreu mit erläuternden Zwischensätzen übersetzt und nach philologisch-notiologischer Methode erklärt. Mit exegetisch-Kirchenhistorischen Nachweisungen über eine sittenverderbliche magisch-persische Gnosis, gegen welche diese Briefe warnen. 1829. [The three doctrinal Epistles of John literally translated with explanatory parentheses, and expounded after the philologico-notiologial method. With exegetico-Church-historical references to an immoral magico-Persian Gnosis, of which these Epistles give warning. 1829.—This title is enough to awe even confirmed book-worms.—M.]), who like Bretschneider believed the Presbyter Johannes to have been the author of this Epistle, is referred to simply because of the manner in which he maltreated it.

4. More important are the assaults of the Tübingen school on the authenticity of our Epistle. It starts with the Hegelian idea of God, which makes man truly the other part of God; we may say that the followers of that school have already applied Darwin's theory to their conception of history: Christianity did not come down from heaven in a finished form, involves no miracle or privilege of certain persons, but originated in the inmost being of the Spirit, in the natural consciousness of man by a genuine historical development, without revelation or inspiration by a process in agreement with the general laws of historical development. The real original Christianity was a Judaism only slightly modified by Christ, quite Ebionite as exhibited by Peter and John in the Apocalypse, or Gentile-Christian as exhibited by Paul (Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians and Galatians), who, to be sure, went further in the dogma of the law. Hence there arose a contention between him and the other Apostles, in which men, well qualified to effect an understanding and reconciliation among the contending parties, advanced to Christian views and composed the other writings of the New Testament, which simply amount to unhistorical party-writings [German: Tendenzschrift, i. e., a writing of a certain tendency favouring the distinctive views of a party.—M.], not without legends, and were written about the middle of the second century. This applies also to our Epistle. At first Köstlin (Lehrbegriff des Ev., etc., 1843) and Georgii (Theol. Jahrbücher, 1845) pronounced for the identity of the author of the Epistles and that of the Gospel; then Zeller, who as late as 1842 had presupposed the identity of the author of both writings, was the first to declare, in a review of Köstlin's work, that it was conceivable that the Epistles and the Gospel were written by different authors. This view was raised by Baur, the leader of that school (in Theologische Jahrbücher, 1848), to apodictical certainty, and according to him the Epistle is a weak imitation of the Gospel, whereas Hilgenfeld (Das Evangelium und die Briefe Johannis, 1849, and Theol. Jahrbücher, 1855) identified and proved the Epistle to be a splendid type of the Gospel.—Baur starts on the unfounded supposition that the author manifests the intentional and most studious anxiety (1 John i. 1-3) to be regarded as identical with the author of the Gospel; in ch. v. 6-9, he sees, owing to an exegetical misunderstanding, a wanton attempt of drawing a distinction between Divine and human testimony, and shows by this the unskilful imitation of the author. From a comparison of the eschatological statements of the Epistle (ch. ii. 18-23; iii. 2) with those of the Gospel (ch. xiv. 3. 18 sq. 23; xvi. 16. 22), and of 1 John v. 6, with John xix. 34, he infers that the mode of contemplation in the Epistle is more material and outward than that of the Gospel, which he considers to be more ideal and spiritual. The idea of the atonement, ἁσμεν (ch. i. 7; ii. 2; iv. 10), and that of the interceding High Priest, παράκλητος, he thinks more suited to the range of ideas peculiar to the Epistle to the Hebrews, and foreign to that of the Gospel. Baur, lastly, considers the Epistle to be wholly Montanistic, because it describes the fellowship of Christians as holy and sinless, makes mention of the χρῖσμα, and draws an unevangelical distinction between venial and mortal sins. But our Epistle does not distinguish a higher class of spiritual Christians from the lower classes of other Christians, the Psychici, but believing Christians from an unholy world; the Epistle does not, nor may we refer the χρῖσμα to the baptismal anointing which is mentioned for the first time by Tertullian; and with respect to the mortal sins enumerated by Tertullian (homicidium, idolatria, fraus, necatio, blasphemia, mæchia et fornicatio et si qua alia violatio templi dei), Baur ought not to have made a most arbitrary selection of three, viz., idolatry (ch. v. 21; iii. 4), murder (iii. 15), adultery or fornication (from the inscription ad Parthos, corrupted from πρὸς παρθένους), and still less to have remarked that the author does not refer to the outward acts, but to the inward, moral disposition; for that is not Montanistic. If Hilgenfeld considers (1 John i. 5. 7) the statement that God is φῶς, ἐν τῷ φωτί, too material and local [räumlich, literally, relating to space.—M.], turns 1 John iii. 4, where sin is called ἡμιονία, and 1 John ii. 7. 8, where love is referred to as an old commandment, into an argument for a friendly relation to the Mosaic law, and maintains that the idea of a personal Logos, clearly expressed in the Gospel, is unknown to the Epistle, although ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ is considered as identical with the Logos, and ὁ ζωὴ in Christ as hypostatical,—that the Holy Ghost is not described as a Person because He is called χρῖσμα, and not παράκλητος, although He is called τὸ μαρτυρεῖν (1 John v. 6), that the exhortation, addressed to the readers of the Epistle, to a conduct enabling them to look for and pass through the ordeal of the judgment without being ashamed, militates against the idea of the Gospel, which does not speak of the judgment of believers,—all this is as untenable on exegetical grounds as the recognition of Gnostical elements belonging to the post-Apostolical age in the idea of the σπέρμα (iii. 9), the conception of the χρῖσμα, and the thought that God ought not to be feared, but only to be loved (ch. iv. 18. 19). Anointing as an Old Testament type suggested χρῖσμα in the antithesis of the Christian and ἐντίχριστος, the representation of being born of God suggested the σπέρμα, and in that representation the fundamental view of an atonement for all the sins of all mankind prohibits any reference to a dualistic separation and to a metaphysical reason without ethical life-process, and the love of God is not a Gnostical discovery, but a purely Christian and Divine command. Of what avail is all the praise which Hilgenfeld awards to the first Epistle of John (for he solely refers to it without adverting to the second and third Epistles, although the title of his book refers to Epistles) and its author, in calling him a great independent thinker, if he nevertheless regards him as blindly echoing the Gnostic system of his time, and having only given a clear, practical impress to its speculative features, and considers the Epistle as less spiritual, and on that account older than the Gospel; and how can he accuse those who reject a pseudo-epigraphical literature of the New Testament, of overlooking the important circumstance that the modern idea of literary property was wanting in primitive Christian times; it has not been overlooked that the modern idea was then wanting, but even more than that, there was wanting all license of any forger. The pretensions of the Tübingen school are by no means borne out by what it gives us. Cf. Dietlein (Urchristenthum). Düsterdieck, Vol. I, p. XXXV—CI. #### § 4. THE READERS OF THE EPISTLE.

1. Augustine has a literal quotation of 1 Jno. iii. 2, which he introduces thus: Quod dictum est ab Joanne in epistola ad Parthos (Quæst. Evang. ii. 39). Possidius in his indiculus operum S. Augustini cites the tractates on our Epistles as "de ep. ad Parthos sermones decem."

Thus has this designation found its way at least into the Benedictine edition of the works of Augustine, and even into some Latin codices and several other writings (Vigilius Tapsensis, Cassiodorus, Beda). Grotius already knew how to explain and apply it: "Vocata olim fuit epistola ad Parthos, i. e., ad Judæas Christum professos, qui non sub Romanorum, sed Parthorum vivebant imperio in locis trans Euphratem, ubi ingens erat Judæorum multitudo, ut Neardæ, Nisibi et aliis in locis. Et hanc causam puto, cur hæc epistola neque in fronte nomen titulumque Apostoli, neque in fine salutationes apostolici moris contineat, quia nimirum in terras hostiles Romanis hæc epistola per mercatores Ephesios mittebatur multumque nocere Christianis poterat, si deprehensum fuisset hoc quancumque innocens litterarum commercium."

Clement of Alexandria (opera ed. Potter, fragm. 1011) observes that the second Epistle was addressed ad virgines (see Introduction to the second Epistle). It is easy to see how  $\pi\rho\varsigma\ \pi\alpha\rho\theta\epsilon\upsilon\sigma$  may have been wrongly transcribed  $\pi\rho\varsigma\ \pi\acute{\alpha}\rho\theta\upsilon\varsigma$ , and thus originated the corrupted subscription of the second Epistle, which, being used as its superscription, may have been mistaken for the subscription of the first Epistle and connected with it, as Hug conjectures. Or, as in a codex of the Apocalypse, the subscription of the first and second Epistles may have read  $\iota\sigma\alpha\rho\upsilon\upsilon$  after  $\pi\alpha\rho\theta\epsilon\upsilon\sigma$ , and thus have given rise to the above mutilation and designation (so Gieseler, Ecol. Hist., I., p. 189). There is evidently a mistake somewhere, and since Hug's supposition is even more simple than Gieseler's, it seems to commend itself as giving the solution of the riddle. The matter is not furthered if we suppose with Paulus of Heidelberg, that this subscription originated in  $\pi\rho\varsigma\ \pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha\varsigma$ , or conjecture a corrupted reading in Augustine of ad Pathmias (Serrarius), ad sparsos (Wegscheider), adpertius (Semler). In this way, it is clear, we shall never find the readers for whom our Epistle was intended.

2. Equally inadmissible is the inference of Benson that  $\acute{\alpha}\nu\ \acute{\alpha}\rho\chi\eta\varsigma$  (ch. ii. 7. 13. 14) points to a circle of readers in Judæa, and that of Lightfoot who, connecting the Gaius, mentioned 3 Jno. 1, with the Gaius 1 Cor. i. 14, thinks of Corinth as the Church to which the Epistle was sent. The Epistle is not addressed to any one Church in particular; and this accounts for the absence of detailed notices of a concrete or personal character. The circumstance, that while the Epistle contains only slight and incidental references to representations peculiar to the Old Testament, it expressly denounces idolatry, gives countenance to Düsterdieck's shrewd conjecture (§ 7), that it was addressed to Gentile Christian Churches; moreover, the author's contrasting the knowledge of the true God in Jesus Christ, which includes eternal life, with the dazzling form of paganism and an antichristian Gnosis, is in perfect agreement with the historical notice that John selected Asia Minor as the sphere of his labours, if we have to look to that province for the Churches to whom this encyclical Epistle was sent. But we must not think of a single Church, least of all of the Church at Ephesus (Hug), but of several Churches "of John's Ephesian circle of Churches" (Lücke), [i. e., Churches within the diocese of Ephesus, as we should say, Churches under the especial jurisdiction of John.—M.], perhaps of all Churches to whom the personal labours of John extended (Huther).

§ 5. THE FORM OF THE EPISTLE.

1. Given an encyclical or circular Epistle, and it is manifest that it may and does lack features which generally belong to other Epistles: i. e., the special address and particular salutations. Thus the common epistolary address is wanting in the Epistle to the Hebrews, while the Epistle of James is without the customary final salutations. Barring this circumstance all the requirements of the epistolary form are complied with:  $\gamma\rho\acute{\alpha}\phi\omega$  occurs seven times,  $\gamma\rho\acute{\alpha}\phi\alpha\mu\epsilon\upsilon$  once,  $\epsilon\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\alpha$  six times;  $\acute{\upsilon}\mu\iota\upsilon$ ,  $\epsilon\upsilon\ \acute{\upsilon}\mu\iota\upsilon$ ,  $\acute{\upsilon}\mu\epsilon\iota\varsigma$  and  $\acute{\upsilon}\mu\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$  occur thirty-six times, the address  $\tau\epsilon\kappa\upsilon\iota\alpha$  and  $\pi\alpha\upsilon\delta\iota\alpha$  ten times,  $\acute{\alpha}\gamma\alpha\pi\eta\tau\acute{\alpha}\iota$  six times,  $\pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho\epsilon\varsigma$  and  $\nu\epsilon\alpha\upsilon\iota\sigma\tau\iota\kappa\omicron\iota$  twice each,  $\acute{\alpha}\delta\epsilon\lambda\phi\omicron\iota$  once. The exordium (ch. i. 1-4) may be regarded with Calov (Biblia N. T. illustrata, Tom., II., p. 1582. Francof. 1676), who follows Estius, as founded on the usual form of an epistolary address. Lücke regards it as the amplification of such an address. The view of Baronius (Annal. Eccl. an. 99, II., p. 964) that the address, like a modern envelope, may have been lost, is as unnecessary as unfounded. The spirit of the Epistle corresponds with its form, the former being thus capably described by Bacon: "Epistola habent plus nativi sensus quam orationes; plus etiam maturitatis quam colloquia subita." Hence Düsterdieck very correctly remarks (I., p. X.) : "The whole writing rests so thoroughly on a living, personal relation between the author and his readers, the pertinence of the written exhortation is so absolutely personal, that this ground is sufficient to make us consider the writing as a genuine Epistle. This epistolary character belongs moreover to the whole keeping and structure of the short writing. With all logical order, there reigns in it that free and easy naturalness and unconstraint of statement, which suits the immediate interest and hortatory tendency of an Epistle, while the strict, progressive dialectical development, peculiar to a treatise or homily, is held back."

2. Receiving this writing with the ancient Church as an Epistle of John, is therefore every way commendable. Heidegger (Enchiridion Bibl., p. 986) advanced his new view as late as the end of the seventeenth century: "Accedit, quod scriptum hoc, licet epistola insigniatur, censeri tamen possit brevis quaedam Christiana doctrina epitome et evangelii a Johanne scripti succinatum quoddam enchiridion, cui adhortationes quaedam pro communi totius ecclesiae conditione adjecta sunt. Non enim, ut reliqua epistolae, inscriptiones ac salutationes inchoatur, neque etiam salutationes et voto clauditur." Although Bengel calls the writing epistola, he rather regards it as a libellus. Michaelis (Introd., p. 1520) calls it a treatise. Storr (Ueber den Zweck der evangelischen Geschichte und Briefe Johannis, pp. 384. 401 sq.) calls it the polemical, and Berger (Versuch einer moralischen Einleitung ins N. T., II., p. 179 sq.) the practical part of the Gospel; while Reuss (Die Geschichte der Heiligen Schriften, N. T., p. 217) describes it as "a homiletical essay, at the most a pastoral Epistle, the readers being present." Augusti calls the Epistle an anacaphalaosis of the Gospel, and Hug, Fromman (Studien und Krit., 1840, p. 853), Thiersch (Versuch zur Herstellung des historischen Standpunkts, p. 78, und die Kirche im apostolischen Zeitalter, p. 266) and especially Ebrard (Kritik der Evangelischen Geschichte, p. 148, and Comment., pp. 29-39) designate it as a companion-writing of the Gospel, or regard it in the light of a preface as an epistola dedicatoria without an independent designation per se, but we ought to have some notice or reference to that effect. This view certainly does not explain the want of an address, salutation and benediction, and we shall show in § 8, 3 that such a view is impossible.

§ 6. RELATIONS AND CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CHURCHES.

1. The external relations cannot have been peculiarly difficult; there is no reference whatsoever to persecutions, like those to which the Christians were exposed either by the Jews as in the time of Paul, or by Nero at Rome (A.D. 54-68), or at the end of Domitian's reign (A.D. 81-96), and under that of Trajan (A.D. 98-117), and his proconsul Pliny in Bithynia. The Epistle speaks of the hatred of the world (ὁ κόσμος μισεῖ ὑμᾶς, ch. iii. 13). The notices of the victory of young men (ch. ii. 13. 14, νεκρύνετε τὸν πονηρὸν) and the victory over the world (v. 4, ἡ νίκη ἡ νικῶσα τὸν κόσμον, ἡ πίστις ἡμῶν), point rather to spiritual struggles, in the Church and in the individuals themselves; but they afforded opportunity for a reference to and description of external conflicts. The external relations must have been, on the whole, favourable; at least external fears cannot have been of sufficient moment to be taken into account (cf. Ewald, p. 437 sq.).

2. The disquiet and motion reigning within, which characterize this Epistle, point to rest without. The Churches were not necessitated to cling together and to remain closed by themselves. The writing is deficient in words of consolation, but not in exhortations to brotherly love, to steadfastness in the fellowship of faith and life with the Father and the Son, in cautions against the seductions of worldly lusts and false brethren. The time of their first enthusiasm has passed; their zeal and love lack the vibration produced by the weighty pendulum of obstacles and enmity. The reaction of evil from without is followed by the more pernicious reaction from within; falling away has begun without a violent crisis; the energy of evil, as well as of good, has abated. The first generation which had torn loose from idolatry and the world, and earnestly laid hold of God in Christ, has died; a showy and nominal Christianity has crept into the Churches. Believers, like Gaius, exhibit all the Christian virtues (3 John 5. 6), old men full of Christian wisdom, young men full of vigorous aims (1 John ii. 13. 14), are pleasing evidences of the Christian life. But ambition spreads itself, as in Diotrephes (3 John 9. 10), the lusts of the world assert their claims (1 John ii. 15-17), false brethren arise, and not only tear themselves, but also others from the true fellowship (ch. ii. 18 sq.; iii. 7; iv. 1 sqq.). And the influences from the world are rather those of pagan frivolity, than those of Judaistic narrowness.

3. The heresy, against which the Epistle is directed, is a pagan Docetism. Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God! Jesus is the incarnate Son of God! The Epistle, from the beginning to the end, raises high and holds fast confession as the banner under which we must fight and are sure of victory, thus pointing to Docetism, which had not yet developed into a system, but had appeared as a tendency, as is certified by Cerinthus, the contemporary of John. For Cerinthus held that Jesus was the son of Joseph, with whom the Logos united at His baptism, but left Him again after His crucifixion. Cf. Dörner, Entwicklungsgeschichte, I., 314 sqq. Pressensé, Hist. of the First Three Centuries, II., p. 233 sqq. The Epistle insists upon knowing and knowledge in opposition to the false spiritualistic Gnosis which had already begun with Docetism and opposed to the ergism of Judaism a syncretistic philosophy, and set in motion an ingenious theory operating intellectually, in the place of the work of redemption operating ethically.

In opposition to the pagan Dualism, which is the basis of Docetism in fixing metaphysically the antinomy of spirit and matter, the Epistle points to the opposites of light and darkness, of truth and falsehood, of the world with the evil one, and God with His Son and His children, opposites which are altogether ethical and in the fusion of an ethical life-process, so that the opposing element is overcome, dissolved and rejected, or may and shall be saved.—We do not yet find the full-blown Gnosticism, nor yet the rigid Docetism (as maintained by Lücke, Sander and Thiersch), nor any longer the antinomism combated by Paul, nor yet the later antinomism of the Gnostics (as Hilgenfeld assumes). Nor do we find the least trace of opposition to the disciples of John the Baptist, whom Paul met at Ephesus (Acts xix. 1 sqq.), whom John may have had regard to in his Gospel (John iii. 22-36), and a reference to whom was suggested by the very language of this Epistle (1 John v. 6. 8).

4. The Epistle knows no other division of the Church than that by age, fathers and young men (1 John ii. 12-14). But John gives distinct prominence to the circumstance that every one receives the unction of the Holy Ghost (1 John ii. 20. 27); he joins his readers in the confession of sins (1 John i. 8. 9), does not set himself above his brethren, and acknowledges the inalienable rights of Christians to try the spirits (1 John iv. 1), as well as their own responsibility to the Lord (1 John ii. 28).

[The heresy of Cerinthus and other heretics is thus described by Irenæus in his great work against heresy:

"Et Cerinthus autem quidam in Asia non a primo Deo factum esse mundum docuit, sed a virtute quadam valde separata et distante ab ea principatitate, quæ est super universa, et ignorante eum, qui est super omnia, Deum. Jesum autem, subiecit, non ex virgine natum, (impossibile enim hoc ei visum est) fuisse autem cum Joseph et Mariæ filium similiter ut reliqui omnes homines, et plus potuisse justitia et prudentia et sapientia ab hominibus. Et post baptismum descendisse in eum ab ea principatitate, quæ est super omnia, Christum figura columbæ: et tunc annuntiassse incognitum patrem et virtutes perfecisse; in fine autem revolasse iterum Christum de Jesu, et Jesum passum esse et resurrexisse; Christum autem impassibilem perseverasse, existentem spiritualem." (Adv. Hær. 1, 26).

"Hanc fidem annuntians Joannes Domini discipulus, volens per evangelio annuntiationem auferre eum qui à Cerintho inseminalus erat hominibus errorem, ut confunderet eos et suaderet quoniam unus Deus qui omnia fecit per Verbum suum; et non, quemadmodum illi dicunt, alterum, quidem fabricatorem, alium autem Patrem Domini; et alium quidem fabricatoris filium, alterum vero de superioribus Christum, quem et impassibilem perseverasse, descendente in Jesum filium fabricatoris, et iterum revolasse in suum Pleroma; et initium quidem esse Monogenem, Logon autem verum filium Unigeniti; et eam conditionem, quæ est secundum nos, non à primo Deo factam, sed à virtute aliquâ valde deorsum subjecta, et abscissa ab eorum communicatione, quæ sunt invisibilia et innominabilia. Abstulit autem à nobis dissensiones omnes ipse Joannes dicens, In hoc mundo erat et mundus per ipsum factus est, et mundus eum non cognovit. In sua propria venit, et sui eum non receperunt. Secundum autem Marcionem et eos, qui similes sunt ei, neque mundus per eum factus est; neque in sua venit, sed in aliena; secundum autem quosdam Gnosticorum ab angelis factus est iste mundus, et non per Verbum Dei. Secundum autem eos, qui sunt à Valentino, iterum non per eum factus est, sed per Demiurgum. Hic enim operabatur similitudines tales fieri, ad imitationem eorum quæ sunt sursum, quemadmodum dicunt: Demiurgus autem perficiebat fabricationem conditionis. Emissum enim dicunt eum à matre Dominum et Demiurgum ejus dispositionis, quæ est secundum conditionem, per quem hoc mundum factum volunt quum Evangelium manifestè dicat, quoniam per Verbum, quod in principio erat apud Deum, omnia sunt facta: quod Verbum, inquit, caro factum est, et inhabitavit in nobis.

Secundum autem illos, neque Verbum caro factum est, neque Christus, neque qui ex omnibus factus est, Salvator. Etenim Verbum et Christum nec advenisse in hunc mundum volunt; Salvatorem verò non incarnatum neque passum; descendisse autem quasi columbam in eum Jesum qui factus est ex dispositione, et cum advenciasset incognitum Patrem, iterum ascendisse in Ploroma. Incarnatum autem est passum quidam quidem eum, qui ex dispositione sit, dicunt Jesum, quem per Mariam dicunt pertransisse, quasi aquam per tubum: alii verò Demiurgi filium, in quem descendisse eum Jesum qui ex dispositione sit: alii rursum Jesum quidem ex Joseph et Mariâ natum dicunt, et in hunc descendisse Christum, qui de superioribus sit sine carne et impassibilem existentem. Secundum autem nullam sententiam hæreticorum, Verbum Dei caro factum est. Si enim quis regulas ipsorum omnium perscrutetur, inveniet quoniam sine carne et impassibile ab omnibus illis inducitur Dei Verbum, et qui est in superioribus Christus, alii enim putant manifestatum eum, quemadmodum hominem transfiguratum; neque autem natum neque incarnatum dicunt illum: alii verò itaque figuram eum assumpsisse hominis: sed quemadmodum columbam descendisse in eum Jesum, qui natus est ex Mariâ. Omnes igitur illos falsos testes ostendens discipulus Domini, ait: "Et Verbum caro factum est et habitavit in nobis." (Iren. iii. xi. p. 462). ### § 7. SCOPE OF THE EPISTLE.

The Apostle distinctly specifies in two passages the scope of this Epistle, viz.: ch. i. 4: ἡ ἀγάπη ἡν ἔχουσιν οἱ πεπρωμένοι, and ch. v. 13: ἵνα εἰδῆτε ὅτι ζωὴν ἔχετε αἰώνιον. The Church therefore has already the joy of faith, the joy of the possession of eternal life; but it must increase and grow until it is perfected; the Church has eternal life, but she must know and be conscious of it. Further particulars relating to the scope of the Epistle may be gleaned from the preceding paragraph. They must abide with Christ, without whom they have neither joy nor eternal life, the object of joy, without whom also they have no undimmed and clear consciousness of what they are and have, of what they may acquire or preserve; John desires to keep his Church with Christ, who is from the beginning, and will come again as Judge, but in the form of a Servant, became our Redeemer and Saviour (ch. i. 1 3. 5-10; ii. 1-3. 22-28; iii. 1-6; iv. 1-6; v. 1-2; 18-20). By obedience to the law and commandments of God and by a faithful following of Christ, he desires to establish his people more and more in the communion of God and in the participation of the Divine nature as the children of God (ii. 3-11; iii. 4-18). In Christian humility before the Father and the Son, and in Church-fellowship he desires to fill them with courage in confronting all proud spirits and the anti-Christian powers of the world; he wants them to be timid lest in any way they should injure the truth, the word of God, or themselves, but courageous and fearless in reliance on God and in the conflict with the world and its lusts and threatenings (ch. ii. 12-21; iv. 7-27). On that account they must not think lightly of the faith, as if the wisdom of the world were superior to it, but cling to it as the means by which they lay hold of Christ and eternal life and of the Father Himself, and make them so thoroughly their own, that thereby they may be glorified in and with Christ (ch. iii. 1-3; iii. 23. 24; v. 1-5). "Thus John, like Paul at the very close of the apostolic age, plants with a firm hand the cross before the Church, as the lighthouse destined to shed its friendly light in all the storms through which she has to pass. The foolishness of the Crucified shall always be her wisdom, and all the efforts of false doctrine shall split on it." (Pressensé, History of the First Three Centuries, II. p. 234 sqq.).

[Huther specifies three chief points as essential to the understanding of the construction of the Epistle:

1. The manifest purpose of the Apostle to preserve his readers in the fellowship with God, that their joy may become perfect.

2. For the accomplishment of his purpose he develops the thoughts that fellowship with God is possible only in a holy life of love, rooted in faith in Jesus Christ, and answering to the Being of God, and that the Christian is not only obliged to lead such a life, but that he necessarily does lead it in virtue of his being born of God (whereby he is absolutely opposed to the world, which is ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ).

3. The Apostle develops these thoughts both with reference to the anti-Christian lie that had already appeared, and the nearness of the advent of Christ.

Huther then states his reasons for his division of the Epistle into six parts, viz.: The exordium, ch. i. 1-4; i. 5-ii. 11; ii. 12-28; ii. 29-iii. 22; iii. 23-v. 17; v. 18-21, the conclusion, and leaving aside the exordium and conclusion, he says that of the remaining four parts,

The first (i. 5-ii. 11) warns against the danger of moral indifferentism, the second (ii. 12-28) warns against the love of the world and antichrist, the third (ii. 29-iii. 22) shows that nothing short of a righteous life in brotherly love is compatible with the nature of Christians, and the fourth (iii. 23-v. 17) indicates faith in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, as the Divinely authenticated foundation of the Christian life.—M.]

§ 8. DATE OF THE EPISTLE.

The material already produced in the foregoing paragraphs furnishes us with three points of view from which we may determine the date of this Epistle; first, the Epistle itself; secondly, the author, the Apostle John; thirdly, the writing related to the Epistle, viz.: the Gospel.

1. From the Epistle itself we glean these particulars:

a. It contains no reference to seasons of persecutions when it was written (§ 6, 1.); consequently it must have been written before the time of Trajan (A. D. 98—117), even before the end of the reign of Domitian, who reigned until A. D. 96, and also after the reign of Nero and the destruction of Jerusalem, consequently between A. D. 70 and 96, and rather about 90 than soon after 70, since the greatness and importance of that catastrophe would render some reference to it most natural, unless a sufficient period of time had elapsed to account for the want of such reference. Ch. ii. 18 cannot be made to supply a chronological date; ἐσχάτη ὥρα is too indefinite an expression for that purpose; besides, the context in which it occurs must not be explained of external events, but relates to internal disturbances occasioned by antichristian heresies. Hence we cannot see with Dusterdieck (I. p. ciii.) a prophetic reference to the judgment impending on Jerusalem, but join him in decidedly rejecting the reference of this passage to the end of the Jewish state, as maintained by Grotius, Benson, al.

b. The more so, because cognizance is taken not of Jewish opposition, but of Gentile corruption, the strength of the former having been broken with the destruction of Jerusalem.

c. The Church-life, well-ordered in its course and of many years' standing, points likewise to the time after A.D. 70 (§ 6, 2).

d. The heresies also point to the time after the destruction of Jerusalem to the end of the century (§ 6, 3).

2. The Apostle John cannot have entered upon his labours among the Churches of Asia Minor until after the death of Paul, A.D. 64 (§ 4, 1. 2); he lived at Jerusalem until about A.D. 60; after that time no trace of him is found there. Moreover, the whole tenor of the Epistle forbids the hypothesis that it marks the beginning of his ministry in that sphere, as a kind of pastoral Epistle. Huther, who had advanced this view in the first edition of his Commentary, has retracted it in the second edition: this view is too modern to suit the ancient Church. The Apostle was banished to Patmos during the reign of Domitian, consequently before A.D. 96, and died after A.D. 100, in a good old age. Cf. Lange on the Gospel of John in the Bibelausgabe, IV., p. 8. 9. (German edition).

3. The Gospel at all events was written before the Epistle. If we read in the Gospel, ch.

xx. 31: ταῦτα γέγοναν ἵνα, πιστεύσῃτε ὅτι ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐστὶν ὁ Χριστὸς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ ἵνα πισἐόντες ζῶντες ἐχόντες ἐν τῇ ἐννομίᾳ αὐτοῦ, believing in Jesus the Christ and life in His Name are the end contemplated; but if we read in the Epistle, 1 John v. 13: τὰς ἐγγραφὰς ὑμῖν, ἵνα εἰδῆτε, ὅτι ζῶντες ἐχετε αἰώνιον, τοῖς πιστεύουσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ, the reference is simply to the knowledge of believers who already possess faith and eternal life. This would indicate that the Gospel was written prior to the Epistle, that both could not have been written at the same time, and that the Epistle was not a companion-writing of the Gospel. John could not have thus written simultaneously to the same readers: the Epistle realizes what is only aimed at in the Gospel.—Düsterdieck (I., p. LIX.) thinks it only possible, while we think it inevitably certain, that the Epistle was written after the Gospel, and believe that this opinion may also be proved by many passages of the Epistle in which thoughts developed in the Gospel are expressed in a briefer and more pregnant form. v. 12.	iii. 36; xiv. 6.

14.	xiv. 13. 14.
	xvi. 33.

As a rule, the briefer form is the later and riper form of thought; a splendid illustration of the truth of this position may be found on a larger scale in Luther's Lesser Catechism, which, being the more difficult of the two, followed his Larger Catechism. But we must not disregard the circumstances under which the Epistle was written, and the relations to which the author had respect. Hence the comparison of the exordium of the Epistle with the beginning of the prologue is at any rate irrelevant, because the Apostle begins there in a monologue, whereas he begins here moved by the double impulse of vivid joy in the Lord and tender care for the Church. And the comparison of ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, John i. 14, and Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθὼς, does not show that the former expression is more definite, and therefore of a later date than the latter, because that was chosen and held fast with particular reference to the heresy intended to be opposed (against Huther).

[As Dr. Braune's view may fail to carry conviction to the mind of the reader, we add that of Huther (in Meyer's Comment., p. 33): "The greater number of critics assume that the Epistle was written after the Gospel, and that the date of the latter is subsequent to the destruction of Jerusalem. As to the first point, the chief argument is that derived from occasional references in the Epistle to the Gospel; but this is not the case; there is not a single passage in the whole Epistle, which presupposes the known existence of the written Gospel." (Reuss: "We need the Gospel as a commentary on the Epistle; but as the Epistle had a commentary in the oral instructions of the author, this circumstance does not prove the later date of the Epistle"). It seems more probable per se that John, moved by the pernicious influence of the false teachers, wrote first the Epistle for the admonition and warning of the Churches confided to his care, and afterwards the Gospel for the benefit of all Christendom, as "a hallowed document of the historical basis of salvation," than that he wrote first the Gospel, and then the Epistle. (The general observation of Thiersch, "that, as a rule, the proposition: writings of a momentary destination, among which most of the Epistles have to be classed, are of an earlier origin than the writings of a permanent destination, which include the Gospels, may be proved historically true," may also be applied to the relation of the Gospel to the Epistle of John.)—And this seems to be confirmed by some of the very passages adduced to show the dependence of the Epistle on the Gospel. The passage, 1 John i. 1-4, compared with John i. 1 sqq., appears to be not the later, but the earlier, because the Apostle in the former struggles to give a proper expression to his idea, whereas, in the latter

he has already found it, and the expression: ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, compared with Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς ἐκ σαρκὸς ἐληλυθὼς, shows the latter to be less definite, and on that account perhaps earlier than the former. Moreover, the affinity of the two writings warrants the supposition, that in point of time they are not far distant from each other; and this affinity appears not only in the character peculiar to both, but also in their form, seeing that both not only commence with an exordium embodying the same ideas, but that also the concluding thoughts of both writings exhibit a singular correspondency, cf. John xx. 31, with 1 John v. 13.—As to the second point: while no conclusive proof can be drawn from the Gospel itself that the Epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, it contains on the other hand nothing to contradict the ancient tradition that John wrote the Gospel towards the close of his life. Nor is it improbable that it was not published during the life of the Apostle; at least it is more natural to assume that the twenty-first chapter was added at the time of its publication, than at a later period when it had already become the possession of the Christian Churches. In that case John wrote his Gospel as a legacy for the time subsequent to his death; but this would require the Epistle also to have been written at the close of the Apostle's life, but before the Gospel. The Apostle indeed states nowhere that his readers had heard the Gospel of him, notwithstanding his reiterated reference to their acquaintance with the Gospel, nor is there a single passage to prove his personal labours among them, although we must not infer from this that he wrote this Epistle when he settled in Asia Minor, after the decease of Paul, as a pastoral introductory of his work there (first edition of Huther's Commentary); for on the one hand, we lack all indications of such a tendency of the Epistle, and on the other, said circumstance may be accounted for by the consideration that the Apostle intended this Epistle not exclusively for the use of those Churches among whom he exercised his ministry, but also for that of others not included in the round of his visitations.—An unbiassed consideration of all the circumstances renders it probable that John wrote this Epistle during the last quarter of the Apostolic age."—M.]

- 4. Putting all things together, the year A.D. 90 seems to mark the date of this Epistle; so Ewald (Die Johann. Schriften, I., p. 471). It is impossible to fix the date of the Epistle with Hilgenfeld, who gives A.D. 150 for the date of the Gospel, at A.D. 125–150, unless it be classed with the Tübingen school among the pseudo-epigraphical literature of the New Testament.

§ 9. PLACE WHERE THE EPISTLE WAS WRITTEN.

It is not known and cannot be determined. Some mention Ephesus, after an old supposition found in several subscriptions by Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach and Matthæi, but hardly entitled to the name of tradition. This is also the view of Bengel, who observes: "non videtur peregre misisse, sed cenam impertiisse auditoribus."—Hug, Grotius and Ebrard name Patmos as the place where the Epistle and the Gospel were written, the former with reference to 2 John 12, and 3 John 13, as if the want of writing-material pointed to the Apostle's exile. But ancient tradition names Ephesus also as the place where the Gospel was written. See Lange, Bibelwerk, IV., p. 26. (German edition).

§ 10. LITERATURE.

Compare, (and it is worth comparing) LUECKE's section on the principal features of the history of the first Epistle of John.

Of the Commentaries of the Greek Fathers some have been lost entirely (DIDORUS of Tarsus, CHRYSOSTOM), others with the exception of small fragments (CLEMENT of Alexandria), and others with the exception of fragments not wholly unimportant (DIDYMUS of Alexandria).—The Catena of OECUMENIUS, THEOPHYLACT and two Scholiasts have been preserved.

Of the Latin fathers we have the Expositio of AUGUSTINE and that of BEDE. From the time of the Reformation we may notice, besides the Annotationes in Novum Testamentum by ERASMUS, two expositions of LUTHER (Werke ed. Walch IX., 909–1079; and 1080–1252), the Commentaries of CALVIN and BEZA, the lectures of ZWINGLI taken down and edited as an expositio by MEGANDER, and BULLINGER's Brevis et Catholica Expositio.

Along with the Lutheran A. CALOVIVS, the Arminian HUGO GROTIUS should be named. BENDEL, in his Gnomon, is here, as always, very noteworthy.

Among the moderns we specify in particular LUECKE, whose Commentary passed through a third edition in 1856, and DE WETTE, whose hand-book has in several respects been happily improved by BRUECKNER. EBRARD has contributed the Epistles of John to OLSHAUSEN's Commentary. Excellent is DUESTERDIECK's: Die drei Johanneischen Briefe, 2 Bände; Göttingen, 1852-1854. HUTHER's Commentary in Meyer's Critico-exegetical Hand-book is very well done; 2d ed., 1861.

For practical exegetical purposes we name after SPENER's Exposition, 1699, ZELLER's (Arch-deacon at St. Nicolai, Leipzig) Explication of the First Epistle of John in 206 sermons, 1709.—STEINHOFFER, The First Epistle of John, 1762; Hamburg, 1848.—RICKLI, Johannis 1 Brief Erklärt und Angewendet in Predigten; Luzern, 1828.—JOHANNSEN, Sermons on the First Epistle of John; Altona, 1838.—K. ### I. THE EXORDIUM.

CHAPTER I. 1-4.

OBJECT AND PURPOSE OF THE APOSTOLIC ANNUNCIATION (1-3). DESIGN OF THE EPISTLE. (VER. 4).

- 1 That which<sup>1</sup> was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of 2 life; (For<sup>2</sup> the life was manifested, and we have seen it,<sup>3</sup> and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which<sup>4</sup> was with the Father, and was manifested unto us;)
3 That which we have seen and heard declare<sup>5</sup> we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship<sup>6</sup> is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus
4 Christ. And these things write<sup>7</sup> we unto you that your joy<sup>8</sup> may be full.

Verse 1. <sup>1</sup>German ["What was from the beginning, what we have heard, what we have seen with our eyes, what we gazed upon and our hands handled, of the Word of the Life."—M.]

Verse 2. <sup>2</sup>German ["And the Life was manifested, and we have seen and testified and declare unto you the eternal Life, as which it was with the Father and was manifested unto us."—M.]

<sup>3</sup>[ἡ, supplied by E. V., not necessary; it is better to construe ἡ ὡς ἡμεῖς, μαρτυροῦμεν and ἀπαγγελλόμεν with ζῶν τὴν αἰώνιον. So Lachm., Hahn, Thellie, Tischend. and Lillie.—M.]

<sup>4</sup>[On the whole, the rendering of E. V., "that eternal Life which was with the Father," is preferable to the German, and the meaning is clear without the adoption of the Greek idiom, "Life Eternal," by Wordsworth.—M.]

Verse 3. <sup>5</sup>[German: "What we have seen and heard, declare we also to you, that ye . . . us; and our fellowship indeed is with . . . Christ." καὶ—34; the καὶ adds something, and 34 is slightly adversative, cf. 2 Peter i. 5, also Matt. xvi. 18; Mark iv. 36; Luke ii. 35; Acts iii. 24; xlii. 29; Heb. ix. 21; John vi. 51; viii. 16. 17; xv. 27.—Indeed or truly seem to bring out this slightly adversative sense better than again (Lillie).—M.]

Cod. Sin. has καὶ ἀπαγγελλόμεν καὶ ὑμῖν. The first καὶ occurs also in Theoph. and Vulg. (Cod. Amakense; it may have crept in from v. 2). The second καὶ is found in A. B. C. Cod. Sin. has before this second καὶ an erased εἰ, as if εἰ καὶ ὑμεῖς was to have followed forthwith; καὶ ὑμῖν seems therefore to be copied.

<sup>6</sup>Cod. Sin. has ὑμῶν after ἡμετέρας, but a disapproval in the margin.

Verse 4. <sup>7</sup>R. ἡμεῖς for ὑμῶν, [Cod. Sin. ἡμεῖς and ὑμῶν.—M.]

<sup>8</sup>B. G. al. ἡμῶν; so Vulgate with the variation, "ut gaudeatis et gaudium nostrum sit plenum." Both ἡμεῖς and ὑμῶν have probably arisen from the μεθ' ἡμῶν and ἡμετέρας of v. 3, [ἡ χάρις ὑμῶν. A. C. K. al. Copt.; Tischend.—M.]

[German: "And these things we write unto you that your joy may be fulfilled." Wordsworth: "filled up to the full;" but fulfilled is better.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The exordium (v. 1-4) describes in vivid and definite language the object and purpose of the Apostolical annunciation and of this Epistle.—The affinity of this exordium with the prologue of the Gospel of St. John is unmistakable.

THE GOSPEL.

VER. 1. In the beginning (ἐν ἀρχῇ) was the Word.

1. 2. And it was with God (πρὸς τὸν Θεόν.)

1-4. The Word (λόγος) in Him was Life (ζωή.)

4. 5. The Life was the Light of men, and the Light shineth (φαίνει)—

9. He was the true Light, who lighteneth every man, come into the world.

14. We gazed upon His glory (ἐθεασάμεθα.)

Equally unmistakable is the difference between the two exordia; the prologue of the Gospel is a monologue, a testimony and confession, where the Apostle, soaring aloft like an eagle, is raised in calm contemplation above all the tumults of life; the exordium of the Epistle, however, is written in profound emotion under the impressions of a blessed experience in the past, and of the present in hearty sympathy with and tender anxiety for the readers of the Epistle; its address is eloquent, pathetic and lively.

In point of form this exordium differs from that of almost all the Epistles of the New Testament, and resembles only the exordium of the Epistle to the Hebrews; it is alike devoid of the name of the writer, of a description of the readers, and of the salutation. But even in the second and third Epistles, although addressed to individuals, and specifying their name or description, the name of the author is not given, his office only being mentioned (ὁ πρεσβύτερος).—As in the Gospel, so in the Epistles, John loves to suppress his name (John i. 85. 40; xii. 23; xviii. 15; xix. 26; xx. 8; xxi. 20, and cf. J. P. Lange, the Ev. Jo., p. 68. 2). But although he does not name himself, the Apostolic office and vocation of the author are accurately marked; and although the readers are not even designated, his relation to them is made sufficiently prominent, so that we must say that the Epistle is written not only for them, but to them. But the salutation (χαίρετε) may be alluded to in ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ τοῦ ὅπου ἡ πεπληρωμένη.

The structure, v. 1-8, owing to its liveliness, is not quite simple; it is repeatedly interrupted and has been variously given. The fundamental or leading word (the verbum finitum), is doubtless ἀπαγγέλλομεν, v. 8, which for the sake of clearness is appropriately placed between the object of the annunciation and its purpose. The purpose is simply and definitely indicated: ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς κοινωνίαν ἔχητε μεθ' ἡμῶν. In defining the object, the Apostle seems to struggle for the right expressions, and renders it prominent in a double series of clauses, first, v. 1: ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς—ἐψηλάφισαν; then v. 1: περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς—ἐφανερώθη ἡμῖν. He marks it first according to its import and being, v. 1. ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, in the second part of v. 1; περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς, and v. 2, ἡ ζωὴ ἡ αἰώνιος ἥτις ἦν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, and then according to its manifestation, v. 1: ὁ ἐώρακαμεν—ἐψηλάφισαν, v. 2: ἐφανερώθη—ἡμῖν, or first according to its mysterious sublimity and fulness, and then according to the manifold internal relations in which it stood and stands to John and his associates. The Apostle, while strongly marking the object of the Apostolical annunciation after the first series of relative clauses by περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς, takes occasion to introduce with the Genitive ζωῆς a parenthesis, v. 2, which concludes with ἐφανερώθη ἡμῖν, and cannot be resolved or broken up. This constrains him to connect the sentence, thus interrupted by the parenthesis, with what goes before by ὁ ἐώρακαμεν καὶ ἀψηλάφισαν, and so that, as the sentence begins with a relative, now that the object has been distinctly defined by περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς, it also concludes with a relative. We have therefore here no period with protasis and apodosis, but a simple sentence, much enlarged indeed and interrupted by long parentheses, the structure of which however is plain enough and does not allow any other construing.

2. Which (Life) was with God [with the Father] (πρὸς τὸν Θεόν.)

THE OBJECT OF THE APOSTOLICAL ANNUNCIATION.

VER. 1-8a

a. The First Series of Clauses.—VER. 1.

VER. 1. What was from the beginning.—The opening words remind us of John i. 1: "In the beginning was the Word," and of Gen. i. 1: "In the beginning God created." Not the moment of creation, but the purely eternal existence until the beginning of the world and its history. The word ἀρχῆς must always be defined by the context, e. g., in 1 John ii. 7: "Ye had from the beginning," the beginning denotes the time when they became Christians, in ch. iii. 8, "the devil sinneth from the beginning," i. e., from the time when he became the devil, which happened immediately after the creation of the world; in ch. ii. 18, 14: "Ye have known him that is from the beginning," i. e., from eternity, Jesus Christ.—The beginning of the devil dates from the creation of the world (ch. iii. 8), the beginning of faith lies in the life of the readers themselves (ch. ii. 7), and the beginning here and at ch. ii. 18, denotes eternity before the creation of the world. The sense is clear from the parallel sentence, v. 2, "ἦν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα," and corresponds with πρὸ πάντων Col. i. 17, πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου Eph. i. 4, πρὸ τὸν κόσμον εἶναι John xvii. 5, or with ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 26. But ἀπὸ does not equal πρὸ, nor is ἀπ' ἀρχῆς equal to ἐν ἀρχῇ, John i. 1.—In the Gospel the Apostle describes and considers the Existence of the Logos with the Father before the Creation, and then proceeds to denote His agency in the creation; but here the Apostle passes from the Existence of the Logos to His manifestations in history. He was therefore before the world was, and He was, before He appeared in history [i. e., before His incarnation.—M.]. The Apostle looks back from his personal experience to the eternity from whence He came; His eye travels over thousands of years from the beginning to the time of His personal experience. As He became not the Logos when He became man, so He became not [began to exist—M.] when the world was made, began to exist. The reference is consequently not to the μυστήριον Θεοῦ (Theophylact, Oecumen.), or to the Gospel of Jesus Christ (Socinus), or to the res a Deo destinatus (Grotius).—The simplest explanation of the designation of the personal Logos by the Neuter  $\delta$ , is the supposition that the Apostle, moved by the mysterious sublimity and the fulness of essential [belonging to the Being or Essence of Christ—M.] glory (which will not be fully recognized and known before His ultimate revelation in His second advent, ch. iii. 2: καθὼς ἐστι), writes with a soaring sense of indefiniteness, and views the Person to whom he refers at the same time as the principle of the world and its history, although this does not pass into a reflecting consciousness [sic in German.—M.]. Similarly τὸ κατέχον precedes ὁ κατέχων in 2 Thess. ii. 6; similar terms may also be seen in Luke i. 85; John iii. 6; vi. 37; Heb. vii. 7; 1 Cor. i. 27 sq.; Col. i. 26; 1 John v. 4. The reference is consequently not to abstraction, the Word of Life, the Life (Huther), or to the connection of the Person of Jesus with His history and doctrine (Lücke, Ebrard), or the taking together of His preexistence and historical appearance (Düsterdieck), or to the mere designation of the Apostolical annunciation (Hofmann). [Braune's explanation lacks perspicuity, and really seeks to combine the views of Huther and Düsterdieck, with the addition of a reference to the second coming of Christ; we doubt whether it will convince many readers, while Huther's explanation, which we give in full, supplies a clear and natural reason for the use of the Neuter  $\delta$ . "The Apostle points to the Apostolical annunciation, namely, the personal Christ, by the Neuter because he thinks of Him as 'the Word of Life,' or 'the Life.' The reference then being to an abstract (per se) or general idea, ζωή, the Neuter  $\delta$  seems to be in place. The Apostle might indeed have used  $\delta\epsilon$  for  $\delta$ , because this ζωή is to him the personal Christ; but considering that the characteristic import of Christ consists in His being the Life (not only a living individual) and that John, full of this idea, begins this Epistle, it was more natural that he should use  $\delta$  than  $\delta\epsilon$ ."—M.]

What we have heard—seen—gazed upon—handled is a rising gradation; hearing is the lowest degree of the climax, it strikes the ear from a certain distance, perhaps unsought for; with our eyes intensifies the word seen; seeing indeed may be involuntary, but the beginning of self-activity is already marked; gazing upon gives prominence to this self-activity [voluntary exercise of the sense of sight—M.], with the secondary idea of continuance; handled with our hands denotes the nearest and most direct intercourse. By "what we have heard" the Apostle naturally passes from the eternal existence of the Logos to His historical appearing; the λόγος ἄσαρκος becomes the λόγος ἐνσαρκος. He makes Himself known first and most naturally in the Word. Not what he had heard of Him in the Word of the Old Testament, in the prophecies until John the Baptist, but that he had heard Himself. "O cannot be another object than in the first clause; the same word,  $\delta$ , is used in all the clauses, and designates the same object, the Logos; the perceptions and modes of revelation only differ. The Apostle had not only heard words of the mouth, words from human lips, but in such human words, and through them the speaker Himself, the Logos; not the Apostle's ear, but he himself has heard, his soul of course through the instrumentality of the material organ of hearing.—He had seen, as he says, in order to lay peculiar emphasis on the testimony of his ears and eyes, with his own eyes, the form of a servant, the Son of man, but of course what lived therein shown forth therefrom in look and mien, in manner and motion; the soul of John, therefore, looked with bodily eyes into the Nature of the manifested, incarnate Logos. Hence again the same object. Indeed He says Himself: "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father," Jno. xiv. 9 compared with ch. xii. 45.

What we gazed upon—handled are Aorists, not Perfects, as just before. This change of tense is neither arbitrary nor inaccurate, but designed and wise. The Apostle had heard and seen in single moments; these are finished acts, facts with their effects; but now he intends by the use of these Aorists to point to the past as an expiring present, how he had ever and anon had continuous intercourse with Him in the most direct nearness and lively self-activity.—The verbs "heard" and "seen" rather denote involuntary perception, while the others, "gazed upon" and "handled," signify voluntary, intentional perception for the purpose of making sure of the reality and nature of the Logos. (Huther).—The man Jesus only was gazed upon, His body only was handled, but through all that sensuousness the Son of God was recognized and felt, and His Divine glory perceived and experienced. We have, therefore, to deal with the same object throughout. The verb "gazed upon" reminds us of the language of John in his Gospel (ch. i. 14): "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us, and we gazed upon (ἐθεασάμεθα) His glory;" the verb "handled" is connected with the words of the risen Saviour, Lke. xxiv. 39: "Behold my hands and my feet that it is I myself; handle me (ψηλαφήσατέ με), and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have," cf. Jno. xx. 27. John, who leaned on His bosom, Jno. xiii. 28: ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ, Jno. xiii. 25; xxi. 20: ἐπὶ τὸ στήθος, denotes thereby the most intimate relation, rendering shaking of hands and kissing proper, and thus places the real humanity and bodily existence of Christ beyond the possibility of doubt. "He patiently allowed murderers to handle Him, why should He not have suffered those who love Him to do the same." (Pfenninger). Thus the Apostle marks here two things, first, the fulness of his perceptions, and, secondly, their authentication. Luther says correctly: "He multiplies words, and thus makes the matter great and important. We have, says he, looked and gazed upon with the utmost care and diligence; we have not been deceived, but are sure that it was not an illusion. He says this in order to make his hearers perfectly sure of the matter." Thus both the glory of the incarnate Word, so difficult to understand, and the authentication of the testimony, so important in its bearing, are portrayed in such lively colours on account of the object.

b. The Second Series of Clauses.—VER. 1-8a.

Of the word of the Life is neither an independent appositive addition to the preceding definitions of the object (Huther), nor governed by the last verb, ἐψηλάφησαν (Erasmus, al.), nor, indeed, by ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς (S. G. Lange, "What happened to the Word of Life from the beginning!"). It is the beginning of a new clause, parallel with the series of relative clauses as to matter (Düsterdieck), which terminates with them in ἀπαγγέλλομεν. That which before had been taken indefinitely as a Neuter, is here described for the first time as a Person. The Word of Life, per se, may stand both for the Gospel of Life and the Personal Logos of Life, and taken as the Apostolical Word, or the hypostatical Word. If it be taken in the former sense as verbum simpliciter (Bengel), the Genitive τῆς ζωῆς may designate the quality (Socinus, Grotius), like ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ζωῆς, Jno. vi. 85, τὸ φῶς τῆς ζωῆς, or the object (Luther: "we speak of the life," Düsterdieck), as in 1 Cor. i. 18: ὁ λόγος τοῦ σταυροῦ. But this construction of περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς is impossible, because it must be connected with ἀπαγγέλλομεν (1 Thess. i. 9: περὶ ἡμῶν ἀπαγγέλλουσιν); the construction with περὶ instead of the Accusative is designed to guard against the possible misunderstanding of making the Word designate the Gospel and not Christ. To speak the Gospel concerning, respecting the Word, although in the manner of a declaration, pertains rather to the province of science, is more the work of the theologian than of the Apostle. But grammatically it is inadmissible to infer from the parenthesis after ζωῆς, namely from the words ἀπαγγέλλομεν τὴν ζωὴν τὴν αἰώνιον, that λόγος τῆς ζωῆς is equal to said words, i. e., the declaration or annunciation of life. The Word, ὁ λόγος, the object of the Apostolic annunciation, must be, as in Jno. i. 1, sqq., the original, eternal, personal Word, the eternal Son of the eternal Father, and fully accords with ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, with the sole difference that the neutrum becomes a masculinum, in order to bring out the personal character of the Logos according to His historical manifestation. On ὁ λόγος see J. P. Lange, The Gospel According to John, p. 88, sq., Germ. edition.—The Genitive τῆς ζωῆς is explained by Jno. i. 4: ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν. The Word has Life in itself, is Life Itself, and imparts Life to others. It is the true, eternal, primal Life, and this Life is the Nature of the Logos, but the object of the annunciation is the Logos Himself. (Düsterdieck).

VER. 2. And the Life was manifested.—καὶ adds in a vivid manner an explanation by introducing a parenthesis and interrupting the sentence; ἐφανερώθη recalls Jno. i. 4. 5, "And the Life was the Light, and the Light shineth (φαίνει) in the darkness." The Life of the Logos appeared, was manifested, so that we may infer His Being and Nature from His Life, and thus acquire a knowledge of the Son. This epiphany is the immediate consequence of the Incarnation, of the ἐνανθρωσῆς. Jno. i. 14: ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο.

And we have seen—testify—declare.—

Antithesis of Jno. i. 5, "And the darkness has (Luther: had) not comprehended it." The climax is: ἐφάναμεν connected with ἐφανερώθη, he had been a spectator, but did not see in vain; for he became a witness through intercourse with the manifested One, and in his capacity of witness he fixes his eye on what had become visible, the acts and events which he had experienced: what he thus sees and utters is purely objective without reference to his hearers and their wants or relations, but in the interest in and for the matter itself. But he does not stop there; he now declares also what he has seen; he explains and applies at the same time; he unfolds in their fullness, and with a special interest in his readers, the thoughts and facts comprised in his personal experience. The objective is brought near through the subjective. Thus he joyfully recalls to himself that blessed manifestation, and is constrained to testify for himself, and to declare to others, that they also may have such an experience. 'Απαγγέλλειν = καταγγέλλειν, Acts xvii. 27; and = κηρύσσειν, Rom. x. 14, sq., cf. Matt. xxviii. 8. 11; Acts xxvi. 20. In John's writings, ὁρᾶν and μαρτυρεῖν are frequently joined together, Jno. i. 84; iii. 82; xix. 35; but the last of these passages, like Jno. xv. 27, is without an object, which, however, may be readily supplied from the context. The object of the three verbs is the Eternal Life (Occumenius, Lücke, Huther), and not only ἀπαγγέλλειν (Fritzsche, de Wette, Düsterdieck). The life is called eternal, ἡ αἰώνιος, because it did not take its beginning in the world, but rather gave a beginning to the world and the life in the world. It is Absolute Life, the source and root of all life in the world, physical and ethical (Lücke on Jno. i. 4). It was before it appeared, became visible; it did not become [come into being] perchance, when it appeared. On that account the Apostle adds ἦν ἡ πρὸς τὸν πατέρα.—The relative ἦν is not = ἦ, but = was, hence, eternal life as which it was, that is to say, which was (ἦν) as such before its revelation in the direction towards the Father, not with, alongside of Him; it denotes not a mere juxtaposition, but a being together, having mutual intercourse; it is directed towards Him, turned to Him, longing for and leading to Him, according to its nature. It is not in the Father, but from Him, and hence directed towards Him. Here is asserted of the ζωὴ what Jno. i. 1 predicates of the λόγος; in Him truly is such life, in Him also it has become manifest. Because John had just had such a lively conception of the Life of the Logos, he was able to begin in the Neuter, ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς; for it is without the world, before the world, with and for God in the Logos.

And was manifested unto us.—Eternal Life has appeared, and just now become manifest to us the Apostles. Thus closes the parenthesis with a return to the thought at the beginning, and it is because of this conclusion (ἐφανερώθη) that John resumes the interrupted sentence, the words "what we have seen and heard" being placed before, and, in consequence of the prolonged interruption, breaks off and drops the series of clauses beginning with περὶ τοῦ λόγου, and resumes the first series of clauses, in a brief and concise form. The object is the same as in v. 1.

On ἀπαγγέλλομεν see the notes on v. 2.

VER. 3a. Declare we also to you.—Kal ὑμῖν places the readers of this Epistle alongside of other Churches who had heard the Apostolical annunciation; hence John, in using the Plural in the verbs from v. 1 onward and ἡμῖν in v. 2, probably did not only refer to himself after the manner of authors, but to himself and his brethren, more particularly to the disciples of Jesus and the Apostles; the opposition of ἡμῖν and ὑμῖν is only the opposition of the first Christians and the immediate disciples of the Lord, or the Apostles and the Churches formed by the instrumentality of the former, or founded by the agency of the latter. John is fond of including himself among the whole of Christendom, ch. i. 6-8; ii. 1. 28; iii. 1. But the comparison of Jno. xv. 27 seems to render it probable that John in this place speaks of himself as connected with the Apostles, the reference being to the founding and conservation of Christian Churches. He does not stand alone, but like him all the Apostles have heard, seen and handled, and bear witness with him.

VER. 3b. That ye also may have fellowship with us.—The word also, kal before ὑμεῖς after the preceding kal ὑμῖν, renders it very prominent that the purpose of the Apostolical annunciation is always and every where the same with all the Apostles in all Churches, namely: unity and fellowship. Fellowship with us is not the same as fellowship such as we have it, like us, with the Father and the Son (Socinus, Episcopius, Bengel). The position of the words forbids such a construction. It is rather the fellowship with us, the Church-fellowship of Christians among themselves.—Μετὰ (from μέσος, between, among) τινος denotes the circle into which one enters, consequently coexistence, whereas σύν τινι signifies connection with, coherence (so Krüger). The Church of the first disciples, of the Apostles, is the primitive Church into which they must enter in order to partake [of its fellowship—M.]; mere connection with it is not sufficient. The Apostles are and remain the foundation on which we must take our stand (Eph. ii. 20), the mediators who must take us by the hand (Eph. iv. 11. 12); they are the stem out of which the Churches break forth and grow like branches. All (kal) the Churches are to be in Church-fellowship with the Apostles.—ἔχητε is not: acquire (Fritzsche), nor does it denote progress (à Lapide [who says: "pergere et in ea, κοινωνία, proficere et confirmari"—M.]), but indicates simply permanent possession, constancy.

And our fellowship indeed is with the Father, etc.—kal does not connect with the preceding clause, so that also that which follows depends on iva (Luther: and our fellowship be, so Augustine, Calvin, Grotius, Ebrard); for there is also a δέ after κοινωνία [see Appar. Crit. v. 8. 5.—M.]. The reference, therefore, is to a κοινωνία here as well as in the preceding clause, hence καὶ ἡ κοινωνία ἡ ἡμετέρα; but this fellowship is yet another μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς, etc. The other stands in some sort of antithesis to this; it must go beyond the former, and in it come to the latter,

hence δέ. Similar is the construction, Jno. vi. 51; viii. 17; Matt. xvi. 18; Mk. iv. 86; Lke. ii. 35. Winer, p. 898. We have here a separate clause, in which ἐστὶ must be supplied, which adds a new and somewhat different particular, as if we did read: καὶ ὑμεῖς ἔχομεν κοινωνίαν μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς κ. τ. λ., so that they have not only fellowship with the Apostles, but also with the Father and the Son. The thought itself forbids a close connection with iva. The purpose of the Apostolical annunciation is not to effect a union with the Father and the Son, for that is the office of Jesus Christ, the Mediator. The Apostle insists upon Church-fellowship, and that is sufficient, because in it is the fellowship with the Father and the Son; a fellowship with God in Christ is not to be created from Church-fellowship; the Church-fellowship is not without the former, and the former is in the latter; otherwise the Church-fellowship would be no Church-fellowship, the Apostolical fellowship, no fellowship with the Apostles. Κοινωνία is a fellowship with the Father and the Son, so that we form part of Them and are personally united with Them. They are in us and we in Them (Jno. xiv. 23), Their Life is our Life (v. 6). Besides the Father, His Son Jesus Christ is particularly named, and thus the full designation of Him ὃ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, of the λόγος τῆς ζωῆς serves to show His identity with the Incarnate Saviour; and thus the conclusion is found. Cf. Jno. xvii. 22-26. [This κοινωνία is one of essence and being, founded on the circumstance that its subjects are begotten of the same σπέρμα θεοῦ (1 Jno. iii. 9), and that the same power of a heavenly and glorified life animates them; so Sander. The definition of Zuinglius deserves transcribing: "De qua loquatur societas, quodque intelligat consortium, exponit; non qua homines hominibus solum pace, concordia et amicitia fraterna iunguntur, sed qua homines Deo animo, mente atque adeo fide hic unitur indissolubiter et posthanc cum eo aeternum viventes. Hoc est quod Christus orat Patrem, Jo. xvii."—M.]

The Epistle and its Design, VER. 4.

VER. 4. And these things we write unto you.—And not only connects, but continues, leads us further, and marks the next progress; the fellowship just described promotes joy, operates in the depth of the heart. Ταῦτα is neither what precedes (Sander), nor what follows immediately (Socinus), but the whole contents of the Epistle (Lücke, de Wette, Düsterdieck, Huther, Ebrard). John considers the Epistle with its contents as documentary evidence connected with the oral annunciation.

We write.—Although the personal relation of the Apostle to the readers is here more prominent than in the Plurals of the preceding clauses, the Plural is not used, after the manner of authors, for the Singular. John continues impressed with the convictions of the common Apostolical annunciation; he knows that he is in perfect agreement with all the Apostles, that he speaks as they speak, and that their speech is like his; nor does he stand alone, but has his associates and assistants, like Paul (1 Cor. i. 1, Παῦλος καὶ Σωσθένης ὁ ἀδελφός; 2 Cor. i. 1; Col. i. 1; Philem. 1, Παῦλος καὶ Τιμόθεος; Phil. i. 1, Παῦλος καὶ Τιμόθεος δούλοι I. Χρ.; 1 Thess. i. 1;

2 Thess. i. 1: Παῦλος καὶ Σιλουανὸς καὶ Τιμόθεος). Writing is indeed another species of μαρτυρία, co-ordinate with oral communication. Bengel:—Testimonium genus; species duæ: annuntiatio et scriptio; annuntiatio ponit fundamentum, scriptio superædificat. The Epistle seems only to build up and perfect the life already existing in the readers. Dürstlerdieck.

That your joy may be fulfilled.—The reading ἡμῶν would make the joy of the Apostles over the Churches [i. e., joy, because their word yields fruit among their hearers. Theophylact: “ἡμῶν γὰρ ὑμῖν κοινωνοῦντων πλείστην ἔχομεν τὴν χαρὰν ἡμῶν, ἢν ταῖς θειασταῖς ὁ χαίρων σπορεῖς ἐν τῇ τοῦ μισθοῦ ἀπολήψει βραβεύσει, χαίροντων καὶ τούτων διὰ τῶν πόνων αὐτῶν ἀπολαύουσι.”—M.]. So does Bede with reference to Phil. ii. 2: “gaudium doctorum sit plenum, cum multos prædicando ad sanctæ ecclesiæ societatem perducant.” Jno. xvii. 13; xv. 11 cannot be adduced in support of this reading; said passages, besides the reason already stated above in Appar. Crit. [v. 4. 8—M.], may have suggested this reading. The identical language occurs at Jno. xvi. 24: ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ ὑμῶν ἢ πεπληρωμένη. To be sure, according to Jno. xv. 11: ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ ἡ ἐμὴ ἐν ὑμῖν ἢ καὶ ἡ χαρὰ ὑβῶν πληρωθῇ, the joy of Christians is the joy of Christ, of which they had become partakers. For Christ has in Himself the Life, Life eternal, true, full, unobstructed Life, which is happiness and peace. Whoso derives Life from Christ becomes a convalescent, recovers health, the health of the soul, and that is peace and joy. Surely, he who is holy, must be happy, and none but the holy and sanctified are happy. If Christ's high-priestly intercession (Jno. xvii. 13) still continues the object and ground of great joy, it contemplates also the growth of joy in individuals going on to eternity, even as John remarks in a private Epistle addressed to a friend (2 Jno. 12).—Hence Christ speaks of His joy, which shall become our joy, even as Christ's Life shall become our Life through faith; hence χαρὰ πιστεως, Phil. i. 25.—Given is the joy by Him, but only like a grain of wheat, which must grow in order to become perfect and to yield fruit. But that which is to be perfected must exist. The perfection, however, is not instantaneous, magical or miraculous, but has its stages and maladies of development,—struggles—dangers; hence: ἡ πεπληρωμένη. Now this takes place in the fellowship, both in that of the Church and in that with the Father and the Son; there, joy is not only a transient emotion, but an habitual state becoming ever more perfect. Luther (Schol. ed. Bruns.):—“Principium hujus gaudii est, quum incipimus credere; postea quum fides augescit meditando, docendo, studendo, tum fit plenum gaudium.” The reason why the Apostle dwells on joy (χαρὰ) rather than on peace, may be that at the beginning of the Epistle he thinks with reference to the readers of the greeting, χαίρειν, which, apart from the Epistle of Claudius Lysias to Felix (Acts xxiii. 26–30), occurs only in the circular of the Apostles at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts xv. 23) and at James i. 1. [Wordsworth contrasts the πλήρωμα χαρᾶς with the πλήρωμα of the Gnostics.—M.]

[Dürstlerdieck:—“The peace of reconciliation, the blessed consciousness of sonship, the happy growth in holiness, the bright prospect of future completion and glory,—all these are but simple details of that which in all its length and breadth is embraced by one word, Eternal Life, the real possession of which is the immediate source of our joy. We have joy, Christ's joy, because we are blessed, because we have Life itself in Christ.” Compare the beautiful extract from Augustine, below in Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 7.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On the word λόγος cf. J. P. Lange on Jno. i. 1, Vol. IV., p. 41, sq., of the Bibelwerk, German edition.—It is characteristic of John, and perfectly analogous to the Gospel, to start from the historical stand-point, vv. 1. 2. 3., cf. Jno. i. 14, and draw the a posteriori conclusion of the Eternal Being and Nature, and then taking there, as it were, a firm position, to trace the epiphanies and operations of the Logos in the world, in time and among men. On this account the Apostle begins here, as in the Gospel, with the Preexistence of the Logos (ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἡ ζωὴ ἡ αἰώνιος, ἥτις ἦν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα). He does not lose himself in the genesis of the Logos, like the Gnostics with their theogonies, but only dwells upon His Being, as ζωὴ αἰώνιος, in relation to the Father (πρὸς τὸν πατέρα). Hence we must not connect the λόγος and the ζωὴ as a (third) syzygy with Valentinus (†160 on the island of Cyprus), “that most profound, spiritual, thoughtful, intelligent and imaginative” Gnostic (see Gieseler, K. G., I, p. 155; particularly Kurtz, K. G., I, 186, sqq.). Eternal, true, full life is only the Being of the Logos, as it is the Being of the Father. But this Life He has not only in Himself as a possession, as Jno. i. 4: ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν, but He Himself was truly and altogether Life, eternal Life in His Being (v. 2), of the same Life-substance with God the Father, indissolubly united with Him, although different from Him in Person, there is nothing in Him which is not likewise in the Father, but He is self-dependent, turned to and belonging to the Father (πρὸς τὸν πατέρα).

2. Threefold is the mode of existence of the Logos: a. anterior to the world of time; b. earthly-human; c. glorified. The first is made prominent in the beginning of this Epistle: ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς, the second is intimated in ἐφανερώθη, and in conjunction with the third in νῦν αὐτοῖς Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. For λόγος and νῦν are to be distinguished, so that the historical Christ is called Son, cf. vv. 1. 3 with Jno. i. 1. 14. But in reality it is the same Person. The incarnate Logos does not become the Son of God, and this designation is not so much of ethical as of metaphysical import. He is called and is the Son of God only because of the relation essential to His Person, and of His eternal and ante-temporal relation to God.

3. The humanity of the Logos is referred to with marked emphasis, in the terms ἀνθρώπου, ἄνθρωπος, φηλασάν, vv. 1. 2. 3. The Son of Man has become audible, visible, sensible to the children of men. His being ἐφανερώθη to the disciples was only brought about by His human nature, but so that He really σὰρξ ἐγένετο and ἐκφύωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν (Jno. i. 14). He is perfect man. But His becoming man is not brought out as much by John as by the other Apostles with reference to His humiliation, because John recognized the Divine glory in the form of the Servant, the Divine attributes in the form of His human appearing, sought their traces with peculiar love, and found them with a jubilant soul. John was more concerned with what the Son of God brought with Him, His eternal Life which He had in Himself, than with what He did assume, human flesh and blood. The Apostle sees in all the epiphanies and exhibitions of the Incarnate One, in all the humiliations of His earthly-human Being and Life, the Love, the Wisdom and the Power of Christ; he follows their traces with ardent attachment, and he follows them not in vain. He hears more testimony to the κρίσις than the ἐκνώσις, but also more to the Lutheran intermixture [German: Into-one-another—M.] of the Divine and the Human in Christ.—Traces of the transcendency and immanency of God may also be found and proved here, and how both have to be held fast together.

4. Christ is the eternal principle of the life of men and of the world in general; He is the Mediator of all the activity of the Father exerted with reference to the world. The thought expressed in the Epistle to the Hebrews by φέρων τὰ πάντα τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ is the fundamental pre-supposition of ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, ἥτις ἦν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, κοινωνία μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ μετὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, as well as of ἰνα—πληρωμὴν. John, by the use of ἀπ' ἀρχῆς—which, as opposed to ἐν ἀρχῇ, Jno. i. 1, within the beginning, points as a definite sphere, and as opposed to κατ' ἀρχὰς (Heb. i. 10) along the beginnings, following the beginnings,—points, although fastened to a longer line, more than ἐξ ἀρχῆς, Jno. vi. 64, out of the beginning as out of a fountain, to a source of history after the beginning—intends to mark the power existing in eternity as present and real in time and the course of history. [The peculiarly involved and occasionally obscure style of Dr. Braune will tax the patience of the reader, as it does that of the translator, who tries his best to express B's meaning in idiomatic English. The last sentence was peculiarly difficult, but the use of dashes and other marks of punctuation will, it is hoped, enable the reader to catch the author's meaning.—M.]. But it must be remembered that the Apostle is more concerned with the life of individuals, of the Apostles and of Churches, than with that of the whole world. Still what holds good in the case of individual man, the microcosm, must also apply to the whole world, the macrocosm. Christ could not be the principle of salvation to individuals, unless He were potent and destined for the whole world. Because in the creation He is the Mediator of the beginning of the world's life (Jno. i. 8) so also in the redemption He is of course the Mediator of the consummation of the world's life. The earth requires no new suns, and mankind no other Saviour. The truth of Christ is the only and eternal truth for all nations and times. Christ is not a world-historical personage, like Alexander the Great, but the Living One that has the keys of hell and of death (Rev. i. 18).

4. VER. 8 indicates the relation of Churchliness and Christianness, of Church-dom and Christianity, [I am not altogether satisfied with these terms, but they express as nearly as possible the German words, Kirchlichkeit, the quality of being Church-like, Christlichkeit, the quality of being Christ-like, or Christian, Kirchentum, the state, existence or establishment of the Church, and Christentum, the religion taught by Christ.—M.] For ἡ κοινωνία μετ' ἡμῶν, the fellowship of the Churches with the Apostles and among themselves is Church, while κοινωνία μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ denotes the nature of Christianity. John insists only on Church-fellowship for the promotion of Christianness. It is Apostolical that the Churches should keep to the Apostles and their annunciation, and be united among each other without independentism, but it is equally and only Apostolical that the Christ-like or the Christian-like should be the basis and aim of the Churchly. The Churchly must ever be measured and adjusted by the Christ-like.

5. The Church is a whole, an organization embracing heaven and earth in the Church militant and triumphant, and in the Church militant all the different local Churches (καὶ ὑμῖν, καὶ ὑμεῖς, v. 8), and all the Churches of all centuries (ἀπαγγέλλομεν) gathered by the Apostolical ministry in general, with its continuous activity (Lücke). What Paul says (1 Cor. iii. 9-11. 16; Eph. ii. 20 sq.; cf. 1 Peter ii. 5) of the Church, that it is a building of the temple of God founded on Christ the corner-stone, or a body of which Christ is the head (Eph. i. 22 sq.; v. 23; Col. i. 18), is here also present to the mind of John, who, with a leaning to John xv. 1, seems to think of a growth, in which the Church is the stem founded by Christ, out of which believers come forth on all sides like branches (John xvii. 20).

6. The Apostolical annunciation, ἀπαγγελία, pre-supposes an eventful experience from personal intercourse with the Redeemer, and is accompanied by the Apostolical writings (γραφόμεν). All information derived from oral communication must be strengthened, guided, cleared and completed by the written communication. He only is able to work for the Lord and the brethren that has lived with Him in intimate converse, to whom He did yield Himself and whom he did draw to Himself, so that he "cannot but speak the things which he has seen and heard," (Acts iv. 19. 20).

7. Joy is the essence of Christianity. Augustine, Conf., 10, 22, says: "Est enim gaudium, quod non datur impiis, sed iis tantum, qui te gratis colunt, quorum gaudium tu ipse es. Et ipsa est beata vita gaudere ad te, de te, propter te, ipsa est et non altera."—The Christian faith does not move in a circle of different objects, thoughts, words and works, some of which must be done and others shunned; but it moves in that which it does gladly, and shuns that which it scorns to do. The Word and Life of Christ are as much the Christian's element as air is the element of birds, and water that of fishes. The exercises of godliness are to him not charms against an evil, or the worship of God a slave-work, or prayer a burden. The godliness, which is kindled by the loving-kindness of God is true happiness and felicity. The fear of God does not bring to the Christian gloomy self-denial and renouncing of the world, as if the Christian's life consisted solely in the suppression of ardent desires and want, but in joys which he experiences, according to the exhortation of the Apostle Paul in the Epistle for the fourth Sunday in Advent (Phil. iv. 4): "Rejoice in the Lord always; and again I say rejoice." Or according to the Lord's promise in the Gospel for the third Sunday after Easter (John xvi. 22): "Your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." Hence the reiterated monition: "Be not afraid," and the promise of the Comforter and of peace. In the praise and love of God we have a token and a standard of true Christianity. Delight in the Lord (Ps. xxxvii. 4) with His creating, preserving, overruling, pardoning, atoning and glorifying (John iii. 2) love, is the Christian's duty and life. Only that he ABIDE, AND THE JOY OF CHRIST ABIDE IN HIM, AND THAT HIS JOY MAY BE FULL (John xv. 1-11).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Seek-Jesus and His light; all without that is unprofitable.—Seek in all your experience in time for that which is from all eternity.—Seek in all sensuous manifestations for the supersensuous kernel with its life, which continues to all eternity, even as it is from all eternity.—Nothing is more sure than that which is of Christ: He is from all eternity, and brings His own into the Kingdom of the Father.—Learn more and more that God is not only above thee, but in the world, not far from thee, but very nigh thee.—Speak of Christ only as His witness. Speak of Him, because thou hast known and felt Him within thee, not because thou art a preacher or a theologian, or because thou art baptized.—Do not despise Church-fellowship; it contains a blessing, even an eternal blessing.—Be not satisfied with thy churchliness (churchmanship) unless it make thee more happy in, and more sure of the Father and the Son.—Christian knowledge, like all science, is possible only in fellowship with the whole, especially in going back to the fountain-head in the writings and the testimony of the Apostles.—Holiness and joy are indissolubly united in the Christian, but impiety and lust in the worldly-minded.—Be ashamed, if for want of faith or courage, or even because of a desponding mind, thou dost not rejoice in thy Lord.—Be afraid lest thy joy in Christ and the Kingdom of heaven decrease.—Strive that thy joy in Christ grow fuller and fuller. Delight in the Lord is thy duty, in order that thy duty become thy joy and honour, not thy task and burden.—A Christian must be joyful, for his is the truth which maketh free, the righteousness that availeth with God, the liberty of the children of God, the peace that passeth all understanding, the joy that no man may take away, the Divine sonship and inheritance, the life which death cannot kill, and the happiness which endureth and groweth forever.

STARKE:—Christ is Absolute Life, and our life depends upon Him, not only this earthly life, but also blessed, eternal life through faith in Him.—He that despises the word of the Gospel, despises also the Absolute Word of God, for Christ is the star and kernel of the whole Bible.—Christ liveth, and the believers shall live too. Glorious consolation! Mighty strengthening of our faith, in adversity and temptation and in the hour of death! Because Life and Light have appeared unto us in Christ Jesus, we should most diligently use them, for sure he will be without excuse that notwithstanding remaineth in darkness and blindness.—What shall it profit an unconverted teacher, to testify of Christ the Life, and to urge the people to receive Him, if he himself remains in death and in his life and by his works denies Him?—In order to be saved, it is not enough that a man know and believe Christ to have come into the world, but he must know and believe Him to have also risen and shone as the Morning-star in his heart.—The design of the Gospel is to lead men to fulness of joy, for God has not called us to sadness, but to joy.—If our joy turns sometimes into sorrow when affliction without and temptation within, as it were, threaten to take it by storm, we know, for our edification and comfort, that Christ will come again and turn our sorrow into joy. [Cf. Dr. Muhlenberg's hymn, "I would not live away."—M.]

SPENER:—Our life in Christ is eternal life, and out of (extra) Him there is no life; although hidden now, it shall be revealed hereafter.—The Divine word of the Gospel is given unto us for the purpose of restoring us to the fellowship with God, and it is therefore an inestimable benefit that it gives us not only the knowledge of certain truths, but actually bestows upon us the blessings which it announces.—The written Word of God is not less potent to produce faith than the preached word, and this Word the Apostles have left us as a legacy which may be heard and read at all times, and therefore we ought to consider the written Word as more sure and trusty than the declarations of men.

LANGS:—In spiritual matters every man should for himself examine and understand the truths of God, and not blindly believe the report of others, lest like a blind man he be led astray and miserably cheated.—All human fellowship should be so arranged and constituted that it do not oppose the fellowship with God. We should regard the Epistles of the Apostles as Epistles of God addressed to ourselves, and know that they are most surely addressed to us in order that we may become, as it were, living Epistles of God, known and read of all men.

BESSE:—There is no fellowship with the Head of the Church apart from the instrumentality of the joints of the Apostles. Those who are inserted in the edifice of the Church, rest upon the foundation of the Apostles and prophets, with Jesus Christ Himself as the chief corner-stone.—Out of infinite Love the Son of God became what we are, in order that He might give us power to become what He is; He became partaker of our nature, that we should become partakers of the Divine nature. (Irenæus.)

HEUBNER:—Christianity demands a solemn and deep contemplation wholly absorbed in Christ [for entering into Christ.—M.]; hasty and superficial looking and hurrying away is unprofitable; Christianity wants profound natures.—Christianity rests mainly on facts, as external revelations of God, in order that thus the Godhead may become visible to the sensuous man [to our senses.—M.], without any injury being done to its dignity.—The Apostles as such eye-and-ear-witnesses are also most sure and reliable, and it is impossible that their account of so many facts, their harmonious and many-sided account, could have been fabricated or be spurious.—These Apostolical writings compensate us for that which we can no longer see with our own eyes. We have, moreover, the testimony of the Church for those facts, for without them it [the Church.—M.] could not have come into existence.—The vocation of the Apostles was most philanthropic and beneficent: the design of their testimony and of the preached Gospel in general, is to lead all men to the fellowship of the same life which was enjoyed by the Apostles. The Apostles did not wish to keep their life to themselves, but loved to communicate it. The true nature of life is its impulse, wherever it is, to pour itself into others. The Apostles were to the first Christians, and are still to all Christians, channels and conductors to the Life Eternal; without the Apostles we should have neither Christ nor Christianity. The Apostles conduct us to it. Those who reject the Apostles and their testimony, cannot reasonably continue to discourse of Christianity; they have only left to them a Christianity of their own making.—Holy Scripture is a standing monument of history that may not be interpolated; it remains a pure and ever-accessible fountain; oral delivery would have grown more and more unreliable, the memory would have lost much, and our delight in the enjoyment of the Gospel would have lessened.—The evangelical history the most sublime history: 1. We will convince ourselves of it, it comes from God, continues in God, and leads us to God; and, 2. Lay to heart the conclusions we draw: behold the poverty of those who despise and neglect it! Give more attention and diligence to it!

Christian joy is from its very nature the highest joy. For,

I. a. Whence is it? Of God, of heavenly origin. b. What does it aim at? The eternal salvation of our souls. c. For whom does it exist? For all in the same manner (without exception).

II. (Conditions on our part): a. Acquire a thorough understanding of the truth that sin is our common misery, and that none can save us therefrom but Jesus Christ alone. b. Believe in Jesus, the Son of God. c. Animate this faith by habits of devotion.

The Apostolical testimony of the Word of Life.—1. How it is attested (as to its verification); 2. How joyful it is (as to its object: the Life was manifested, and as to its effects: Fellowship of Christians among themselves and with God).

The firm foundation of our faith.—It rests, 1, upon the Apostolical announcement of the witnesses of Him who is the Beginner, Fulfiller and Object of our faith (v. 1); 2, on its joyful object (contents, German) v. 2, which could not have spontaneously entered into any man's heart; 3, on the testimony of the Holy Ghost in those who receive the word of faith from the lips of the aforesaid witnesses.

SPURGEON:—It is indeed written (Prov. xiv. 10): "A stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy." The secret is with them that fear Him, and their joy no man taketh from them. But we would remind you of the proverb, "Still waters run deep." The brook rushing over the stones dries up in summer, but the deep river flows uniformly along in freshets, or in heat and drought, and yet glides calmly through the fields. We do not speak or boast so loudly of our joys, as you do of your pleasures, because it is unnecessary; ours are as well known in silence as in lively company. We do not want your company to indulge our joy, still less the manifold condiments with which you try to flavour your joy. We require no cups, no banquets, no fiddles, no dance in order to be joyful.—Our joy does not depend on transitory things, but rests in the eternal, unchangeable Creator of all things. I know very well, notwithstanding all we shall say, the slander will continue that the children of God are a wretched people.—We have joy, we have delights, so precious that we would not exchange an ounce of ours with a ship-load of yours; not drops of our delight for rivers of your pleasures. Our delight is not tinsel, painted joy, but solid reality; our joys are such as we take along with us to our quiet resting place beneath the dust; joys which sleep with us in the grave and will wake with us in eternity, joys on which we may courageously look back, and which, therefore, we enjoy a second time in memory; joys also which we enjoy beforehand, and know already here below as the antepast of eternal joy and delight. Our joys are no soap-bubbles which only glitter and sparkle in diverse colours in order to burst, they are no apples of Sodom which crumble in your hand into ashes; true joys are real, true, solid, lasting, enduring, eternal! What more shall I say? Joy and true piety are eternally joined together like root and blossoms, as inseparably as truth and assurance; they are indeed two precious jewels, set side by side in the same gold setting."

II. PRINCIPAL PART THE FIRST.

CHAPTER I. 5-II. 28.

IF YE WALK IN THE LIGHT (I. 5-II. 2)—OBEDIENT TO HIS LAW IN GENERAL (II. 2-8), AND TO THE COMMANDMENT OF BROTHERLY LOVE IN PARTICULAR (II. 7-14), NOT MISLED BY THE LUSTS (II. 15-17) AND THE LIES OF THE WORLD (II. 18-23) YE SHALL ABIDE BEFORE CHRIST.

1. Leading thought: God is Light.

5 This then is<sup>1</sup> the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you,<sup>2</sup> that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.

[German:—And this is the message, which we have heard from Him, and announce you again, that God is Light and darkness in Him is none whatsoever.—M.]

Verse 5. ἡ ἐστὶν αὐτῇ, B. C. G. K., Cod. Sin., al. [Syr., Theoph., Oecumen., Tischend., Buttmann, Wordsw. αὐτῇ ἐστὶν, A., Vulg., Lachm., Rec.: this is altered from the original reading.—M.]

<sup>1</sup> Instead of ἀγγελία, A. B. G., al. [Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Tischend., Wordsw.—M.] we find ἀγγελία in C, and in Cod. Sin., over ἀγγελία, the following correction, probably emanating from the transcriber himself: ἀγαθὴ τῆς ἀγγελίας; but a later hand has added ἀγγελία as the right reading.

<sup>2</sup> ἀπαγγέλλομεν, Erasmus, announce again, report (Lille). Declares, E. V., is too weak, it denotes a repetition of an announcement already made and known, brought out by the preposition ἀπ. See the notes of Bengel and Erasmus in Exegetical and Critical.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 5. And is not like οὐν (igitur, Beza) or δὲ (Episcopus); for it is neither an inference, nor even a delicate antithesis; it simply connects with the preceding, as does καὶ—γράφουμεν, v. 4, with ἀπαγγέλλομεν, and while ταῦτα points to the contents of the now opening Epistle, καὶ connects with the exordium, in which preparation is made for what follows, and αὐτὴ ἡ ἀγγελία points to the subsequent words [ὅτι ὁ θεὸς κ. τ. λ.—M.].

This is the message.—Contrary to the usual position of the words (αὐτὴ ἐστὶν, ch. ii. 25; iii. 11. 28; iv. 8; v. 11. 14, cf. Jno. xvii. 8), ἐστὶν is emphatically placed first to denote the existence and reality of the message. The poorly authenticated reading ἐπαγγελία is very awkward, the word denoting not announcement (Oecumen., Beza, de Wette contrary to the grammatical usage of the N. T.), either here or elsewhere (ch. ii. 24; iii. 11; cf. var. 2 Tim. i. 1; Acts xxiii. 31), and if taken in the sense of promise would have required here an enlargement of the thought. Calov: non jubemur tantum in luce ambulare ac mundari sanguine Christi, sed utriusque etiam gratia nobis promittitur, illius per Spiritus Sancti illuminationem, hujus per expiationis Christi applicationem; quia utraque fruimur per beatam cum Deo et Christo communionem. [Huther thinks that the reading ἐπαγγελία in the sense of promise might be justified on the ground that every announcement of the New Testament is fraught with promise, and cites Spener, who says: “Promise, as the sequel indeed conceals a promise. God is not only a light in Himself, but He is also the light of believers. And that is the promise.”—M.]—ἀγγελία, which occurs no where in the New Testament, as Socinus and Episcopus read, is an arbitrary correction. The outwardly best authenticated reading is strongly supported by the context, for it seems to réecho in the following ἀπαγγέλλομεν: the message of Christ is announced again by His Apostles. Erasmus: “Quod filius annuntiavit a patre, hoc Apostolus acceptum a filio renuntiavit nobis.”

Which we have heard from Him.—The Apostle alludes to v. 1. He thinks of the first disciples, and more particularly of the Apostles. Hence both the ἀγγελία, the ἀκηκόμεν, and the contents of the message: ὁ θεὸς κ. τ. λ., suggest the reference to Jesus, the Christ; this is also rendered necessary by the preposition ἀπὸ, which indicates the Prophet-speaker, the Person of the Master, on whose lips the Apostles hang as hearers and disciples. John uses ἀπὸθεν παρὰ, ch. viii. 26. 40; xv. 15, but there it is the Father who speaks and the Son who hears; this (παρὰ) presupposes the nearness, the being together, and had to be used when the Son was hearing the Father, the other (ἀπὸ) denotes distance, and could hardly have been used in the aforesaid passages; παρὰ points also to familiarity, ἀπὸ only to derivation in general. αὐτοῦ denotes, with reference to v. 8: τοῦ νοῦ αὐτοῦ, Christ; the assertion that αὐτοῦ, as distinguished from ἐκεῖνος, which always relates to Christ, invariably refers to the Father (Paulus, Baumgarten-Crusius) is incorrect. The sense then is: From Him, the Incarnate Son of God, whom we have heard, etc., v. 1, we have received the message concerning God the Father (Düsterdieck, Huther). Socinus, who takes the relation of God and Christ not as conjunctio essentiae, but only as conjunctio voluntatis et rerum aliarum omnium, understands a Deo et Christo, i. e., a Deo per Christum, thus representing Christ as the mere mediator and not as the author of the message.

And announce to you again.—Next to the note of Erasmus, as quoted above, we cite the admirable exposition of Bengel: “Quæ in ore Christi fuit ἀγγελία eam apostoli ἀγγέλλουσι; nam ἀγγέλλαν ab Ipso acceptam reddunt et propagant.” ἀπαγγέλλειν is not exactly—ἀπαγγέλλειν, the latter denotes to continue announcing [rather to bear tidings from one person (ἀπὸ) to another—M.], the former to announce anew, back, again, as in Jno. iv. 26; xvi. 25, where, however, ἀπαγγεῖλω is the more authentic reading. As our Lord conversed with the Syrophenician woman as the Messenger of God reporting what the Father had told Him before, so the Apostles report what the Lord had told them before (Jno. xx. 21).

God is light.—This is the substance of the ἀγγελία. But Christ did not say so, although He called Himself the Light, Jno. xii. 12; xv. 46; and speaks of the children of the Light (Jno. viii. 86), even as James refers to the Father of the Lights, τῶν φῶτων, Jas. i. 17, see the note above ad loc. But Christ, as the Son of God, is ἀνάγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ (Heb. i. 2), and this it is which John and his fellow Apostles (v. 1) had heard, seen and gazed upon, so that the sum-total and centre of the message of Christ, as well as His personal manifestation and revelation in the flesh, may truly be expressed in the words "God is Light." Christ reveals this, but no philosopher is able to find it; without Christ the wise men of the world pass it by. It is not a light, as Luther translates, as if there were other lights beside and out of Him. The Being of God is Light. Neither is it in the light, as if it were only surrounding Him, nor as the Light. It is not secundum similitudinem (Bullinger), but secundum substantiam. Light is His garment (Ps. civ. 2); Ezekiel (ch. i.) and Habakkuk (iii. 8, seq.) beheld the glory of the Lord as fire, pure and bright as lightning. He is not only the Author of light, to whom belongs His first creative fiat (Gen. i. 3), but the Father of all light (Jas. i. 17), a mighty sphere of light surrounds Him (1 Tim. vi. 16); and the marvellous light wherein Christians walk is God's (1 Pet. ii. 9). This sentence is parallel to the sentence: "God is Love" (ch. iv. 8, 16), with the same fundamental thought, although in the one instance the expression is figurative, and in the other literal, and the figurative expression lays peculiar emphasis on one side of the Divine Being, and this, on account of the antithesis in the following verses (vv. 6–10), is also holiness, perfect pureness, but not omniscience, as Calov maintains, although in Dan. ii. 22 light is the symbol of the omniscience of God; it may include, however, the wisdom of God. [Alford:—"Of all material objects, light is that which most easily passes into an ethical predicative without even the process, in our thought, of interpretation. It unites in itself purity, and clearness, and beauty, and glory, as no other material object does; it is the condition of all material life and growth and joy. And the application to God of such a predicative requires no transference. He is Light, and the fountain of light material and ethical. In the one world, darkness is the absence of light; in the other, darkness, untruthfulness, deceit, falsehood, is the absence of God. They who are in communion with God, and walk with God, are the light, and walk in the light."—M.]

And darkness in Him is none whatever.—This second negative member, stated with marked emphasis (οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδέμια, similar to John xv. 5, see Winer, p. 521. ["The two negations produce one negation, which is the more frequent case, and serve, originally, to make the principal negation more distinct and forcible, and exhibit the sentence as negative in all its parts."—M.]), rejects any and every darkness, i. e., impureness [or absence of all admixture.—M.]. Oecumenius: ἡτοι τὴν ἀγνοίαν, ἢ τὴν ἀμαρτίαν. Rather both: neither an untruth or a lie, nor any sin is in Him. The fullness of the reference contained in this expression is brought out by Lorinus in the following passage cited by Huther: "Deus lux est, quia clarissime se ipsum percipit, omnique in se ipse, utpote prima et ipsissima, veritas; quia summe bonus, ac summa et ipsissima bonitas; fidelis absque ulla iniquitate, justus et rectus, quia fons omnis lucis in aliis, i. e., veritatis atque virtutis, non solum illustrans mentem, docensque quid agendum sit, verum etiam operans in nobis, ut agamus et sic radiis suis liberans mentem ab ignorantia tenebris, purgans a pravitate voluntatem."—John's speculation or mysticism is so thoroughly ethical, that he is solely concerned with the practical working out of the truth: "God is Light." As he connects this sentiment with the preceding by καὶ, namely, the fellowship with the Father and the Son, so he develops the nature of this fellowship-life in the sequel (v. 6–ii. 28). Now, since the nature of this fellowship and of the life in it depend upon the nature of the Father, he begins with the leading thought (v. 5) and with reference to errors in a sentence of two members, the one positive, the other negative. [Huther: "John properly makes the truth that God is Light, as the chief substance of the ἀγγελία of Christ, the starting-point of his development; for it is the essential basis of Christianity, both as to its objective and subjective substance, and it involves both the consummation of sin and the redemption from sin by the incarnation and death of Christ; both the necessity of repentance and faith and the moral problem of the Christian life."—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Monotheism and the absolute personal existence of God are with John two chief points, which may be also identified here, although one side only is made prominent. Of the two sentences, "God is Spirit" (John iv. 24), and "God is Love" (1 John iv. 8, 16),—the former denoting the Being of God physically, the latter ethically; the former describing the nature and substance, the latter the character of God,—the second only will have to be connected with the sentence, "God is Light," and thus be further defined by a metaphorical expression. Spirit and Love are indeed correlative fundamental ideas, since Spirit denotes "free self-glory in self-consciousness and spontaneity over a substantial fullness of real vital powers," and Love "free self-surrender with conscious and intentional conservation of the essential original determinateness both of oneself and of others" (Plitt). But the phrase "God is Light," declares "the superiority of God to all sensuous wants" (Köstlin), the holiness of God, and thus defines further the character of God, His Love, and this as a holy Love, while it enables us to take the Love of God as contemplating also the communication of His Holiness. We may add, "God is—eternal Life" (v. 20) as a correlative, so that His Love as well as His Holiness are live. There is no manner of darkness in Him. He is not a God in process of being coming to Himself in the history of creation, the world or in the spirit of man, as Plato maintains: He is operative prior to all the élan of Plato, or the dark Urgrund of Schelling, as a self-conscious, holy, loving and living God. Nor has sin, evil, its original beginning in Him, as was taught by the Gnostics in their doctrine of emanations. [Wordsworth: "A sentence opposed to the error of most of the Gnostics, who asserted the existence of two hostile Deities, one a God of Light, the other of Darkness. Irenæus I., 25. 28, ed Grabe. Theodoret, Hæret., fab. præm. Epiphani., Hæres., XXVI., cf. Ittig. Hæres., p. 84; note in his Comment. on John i. 6; and Bp. Andrewes, III., pp. 371-376. Almost all the Gnostics adopted the theory of dualism, derived from the Magians, and afterwards developed by the Marcionites and Manichæans."—M.]

2. God is Light—must not be taken as a notice, a truth without reality, a reality without efficiency. As the sentence "God is Spirit" (John iv. 24) is immediately followed by "and those who worship Him, must worship Him in Spirit and in truth," so this sentence must be taken as a principle, the application of which is contained in the sequel. The sentence is through and through ethical and practical. John wants no science without practice. He does not allow an enlightenment of the mind without a corresponding bias and purifying of the will.

3. The question "Whence comes sin, evil into the world?" the Apostle here decides very distinctly in a negative form: in no event from God. Evil though connate, is not co-created.

4. Nothing must be taught or announced that does not rest upon or does not agree with the testimony of Christ. Those who pretend to know eternal truth which maketh free, different from Him, do not know it better, and are not servants, but adversaries and rebels.—It is at once Apostolical and Protestant to go back to the beginning of the Gospel in Christ. We are much more the Apostolical Church than the Church of Rome with its claims to Apostolicity.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

God is Light. 1. Whence do you know it? 2. What does it mean? 3. Whither does it point?—Whatever right and true views you may have of God the Father, you have them from Christ, no matter whether a messenger of salvation, a servant of the Church have announced them to you, whether they were told you by your mother or commended by the counsel of a friend, whether Christian hands brought them to you in the Bible, or the Holy Ghost excited them in your heart.—Nothing gladdens the hearts of men more than light; but how have they abused the Word and deprived it of its best part, and try to make it chime in with unholiness in thought, in word and in deed!—The world's light dazzles without illumining, shines without producing a spring with blossoms or an autumn with fruit.—The world's light may be useful, build you in this life bridges of honour, bring wreaths to artists and fame to the wise, make account of order in the land and in the streets, rejoice the heart in the social circle and refresh the mind, but also undermine and destroy the salvation of your soul. But it cannot carry a shine of consolation into the night of life, still less into the night of death; it cannot help the soul to find love and the life which death cannot destroy.—The world's light sets like the sun in the sky; but the Light which is God the Lord, shines through all the night of sin, of life, of death.—Try every light, whether God be in it.—If He, the Holy One, is absent, that light is no light worthy of the name, but a false light, a will-o'-the-wisp.—Do not look for salvation in any light of science or civilization, if it denies the holy light. Fear only the darkness in which God the Father is not found.

STARKE:—Teachers should not pronounce any thing in things Divine but that which they have heard from the Lord in His Word; for if the Apostles themselves were firmly tied by it, how much more are they bound to cleave to it? The thoughts of man, being fallible, are not sufficient for the foundation of the faith.—Because God is Light, and in Him is no darkness whatsoever, it is wholly impossible that He can be the Cause of sin, which is the greatest darkness.—God is all Light, Wisdom, Holiness, Consolation and Joy; who would not desire to be united with Him?

LANGHE:—Because God is Light we have often to sigh in our fellowship with Him: "Lord, cause Thy face to shine upon us, and be gracious unto us."

SPENER:—God is Light. 1. Holiness and Righteousness, showing that He not only has no evil within Himself, but also cannot suffer sin or evil in His creatures. 2. All wisdom and All-wisdom. 3. Glory and salvation.

HEUBNER:—Christianity has showed to all men the light-nature of God in Christ in the clearest brightness; that He is through and through perfect Knowledge, Omniscience, Wisdom, Love, Grace, Holiness and Happiness, and delights in the happiness of His creatures. Why does John specify this as the chief announcement? 1. Because it is of the first importance and indispensably necessary for sinful man to know that it is not by the hostile and malicious purpose of an omnipotent Being that he has been cast into this misery, that God did not plan his ruin, and that it does not come from Him, because He is pure and good. 2. Because salvation, a restoration of happiness may be expected from this God who desires all men to be happy. This belief is man's first support [holding-point] of salvation. And this His Will God has proved most strongly in fact—through Christ.

BESSER:—John convicts of falsehood three classes of spirits by declaring the vanity of the boast of fellowship with God on the part of such as walk in darkness instead of walking in the Light, of such as comfort themselves with the assurance of being perfectly pure instead of relying upon the continual cleansing of the blood of Christ, and lastly, of such as, instead of confessing their sins, deny their sinfulness. Worldly-mindedness, boast of sanctity and self-righteousness are exposed by John to the condemnatory light of the truth, and accompanied by an exhortation to a sincere, humble and penitent walking in the Light.

2. First Inference: The True Fellowship.

CHAPTER I. 6-7.

6 If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness,<sup>1</sup> we lie, and do not the truth: But if we walk in the light, as he<sup>2</sup> is in the light, we have fellowship one with another,<sup>3</sup> and the blood of Jesus<sup>4</sup> Christ his Son cleanseth<sup>5</sup> us from all sin.<sup>6,7</sup>

Verse 6. <sup>1</sup> ἐν τῇ σκότει, in the darkness; so German, Lillie, al., Dutch, Ital., French vers.—M.]

Verse 7. <sup>2</sup> ὡς αὐτὸς ἐστίν, as He Himself is, etc.; so Meyer, Lillie, Wordsworth, al. Winer: "Among the Greeks, as is well known, αὐτὸς in the casus rectus does not stand for the mere unemphatic he, nor could any decisive examples of this be found in the N. T."—M.]

<sup>3</sup> μετ' ἀλλήλων. The best Codd., also Sinait., have this reading; μετ' αὐτὸν is substituted chiefly by Latin Codd., but the less authentic reading, and clearly a correction designed to conform v. 7 to v. 6.

<sup>7</sup> German of the last clause:—"and the blood of Jesus, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The sequence is clear: the Apostle concludes from the Being of God the nature of their life who are and live in fellowship with God. He postulates that spiritual fellowship necessitates an affinity among persons in fellowship with one another, and that this internal fellowship must manifest itself externally in their life, so that fellowship with God is impossible without a corresponding godlike life as exhibited in the walk and conversation of men.

VER. 6. The negative part of the inference stands first, connecting with the last clause of the preceding verse ("and darkness in Him is none whatsoever").

If we say.—John is very fond of this phrase, vv. 7. 8. 9. 10; ii. 1; iv. 12; it is similar to ἐὰν τις, ch. ii. 1. 15; iv. 20, or ὅς τις, ch. iii. 17; iv. 15. As to the sense, the following phrases present parallels: πᾶς ὁ ἔχων, ch. iii. 8; πᾶς ὁ ποιῶν, ch. iii. 4; πᾶς ὁ μένων, ch. iii. 6; πᾶς ὁ ἀκούμενος, ch. ii. 23; without πᾶς, ch. ii. 4. 6. 9. 10. The Apostle is thus wont to describe an objective possibility (Winer, p. 308), i. e., he assumes that it may be so, and that the event would show whether it will be so. The Apostle renders this hypothesis general by the use of the communicative Plural, and thus makes his speech more lively; if we,—not excluding myself and the Apostles, beginning with myself down to the most humble reader of this Epistle, or to any individual Church-member,—should say. Thus John combines in the communicative and hypothetical form generality of application and considerate delicacy (Lücke). Saying does not denote here the inaudible language of the heart, that is thinking, but articulate utterance and assertion induced by the force of conviction. But it is not on that account nos gerere (Episcopius), as if the reference were to a testimony of our walk and practical conduct, although this saying and alleging must be taken as equivalent to an act, a fact or an action. [Wordsworth suggests that ἐὰν εἰπωμεν contains a reference to the saying of the Gnostics, who alleged that by reason of the spiritual seed in them, and of their superior spiritual knowledge, and communion with the light, they were free to act as they chose, and were not polluted thereby, and were not guilty of sin (Irenæus, I., 6, 20). Some of them even ventured to extol the workers of the most audacious acts of darkness, such as Cain, Korah and Judas, as persons gifted with superior freedom of thought and intrepidity of action, and to affirm that, since the soul could not attain unto perfection except by knowledge, it was even requisite for men to make themselves familiar with all manner of evil, in order that by a universal empiricism of evil they might arrive the sooner at their ultimate consummation. See Irenæus, I., 25, 4, ed. Stieren; p. 103, ed. Grabe; II., 32, ed. Stieren; p. 187, ed. Grabe, and cf. Blunt on the Heresies of the Apostolic Age, Lectures, ch. IX., p. 179.—M.]

That we have fellowship with Him.—See the notes on v. 3. Here the Father only is mentioned, of whom it was said above that He is Light, in order to draw therefrom a conclusion bearing on the nature of the Christian life. [Fellowship with God is the centre and foundation of the Christian life.—M.]

And walk in the darkness.—And combined with say makes one sentence. — Walk, περιπατεῖν, ch. ii. 6; 2 Jno. 6, occurs also Rom. vi. 4; viii. 4; its synonymes are παλίτευμα, Phil. iii. 20, ἀναστροφή and ἀναστρέφειν, Eph. iv. 17, sq., ii. 2, sq.—Bengel: "actiones interna et externa, quoquo nos vertimus." It embraces all our actions, not only those perceptible to men (Ebrard), but also that on which these depend, whereby they are caused, the inward actions of our life.

In the darkness indicates the sphere and element in which that walking takes place, cf. Jno. viii. 12. Darkness, which is not at all in God, does not in any way belong to Him, is the undivine, the unholy, that which is separate from Him—sin, evil. It is therefore not: to have still adhering to one sin or evil, or failure and falling through haste or weakness in temptation, in the struggle; but as the walk does not denote gross and common sin only, so walking in the darkness does not imply the presence of satisfaction with sin, or the entire passing through the whole territory of sin in all directions; the reference must be to one particular phase of life; some want to be Christians and make good their profession in every thing except honour; others are not severe with themselves or unfaithful to God and His Word in matters of worldly possession or in some master-passions, although in other respects they are strict and faithful. Such men walk, nevertheless, in the darkness, and the words "we lie" apply also to them. It is a contradiction and opposition, cf. 2 Cor. vi. 14, sqq. Not exactly intentional lying and conscious hypocrisy, but actual contradiction between Christian principle and the Christian sphere of life, and the real exhibition of life, certainly not without personal guilt; it is our guilt and our sin, our own lie, we ourselves are liars. Whenever, under those circumstances, we say that we have fellowship with Him, we lie; we lie to ourselves, if we say it only within ourselves, in our heart, think or imagine it, or we lie to others, if we say it to them in our words or our works. Such lying consists, therefore, in thoughts, words and deeds.

And do not the truth.—This is not the same as φειδεδεσθαι, as if ποιεῖν τὴν ἀλήθειαν were identical with ἀληθεύειν, Eph. iv. 15. It is neither the same as agere recte (Socinus), nor sincere (Beza, Grotius, Carpovius), nor veraciter (Calvin). The truth consists not only in words, but also in thoughts and deeds; its sphere embraces the whole life, the whole man. The truth, according to John's view, must be done; saying with him implies acting; not to do the truth is here parallel with walking in the darkness, while to do the truth corresponds to walking in the Light. "It is one and the same truth, which is apprehended in faith and confessed with the mouth, which, as a holy, Divine power, recreates the life of the new man and manifests itself in internal and external deeds." (Düsterdieck), cf. Jno iii. 19–21 [where ποιεῖν τὴν ἀλήθειαν is opposed to φαῦλα πρὸς οὐρανόν, and where special reference is made to the ἔργα.—M.]—Thus the Apostle raises his powerful protest against every form of show-, word- or lip-Christianity, but his reference is to Christians, and therefore he passes on to V. 7, to the positive part of the inference. But if we walk in the Light.—ὅτι marks an antithesis. In the Light is explained by the antithesis ἐν σκότει, and by the additional clause, as He is in the Light, with reference to v. 5. [But this, it seems, is not the only antithesis, for it is also antithetical to ἐὰν εἰπομεν, ὅτι κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' αὐτοῦ, v. 6, viz.: if we not only say that we have fellowship with God and not walk in the darkness, but if we really walk in the Light; so Huther, Ebrard.—M.]—Our walk in the light embraces, therefore, the holiness of our inner and outer life, a holiness which in its consequences operates a communion among the brethren, and fully corresponding to the Light-Being of God, which is also Love, exhibits its essential strength in the formation and preservation of fellowship. As He is in the Light is only formally different from God is Light; the latter phrase denotes Light as the Being of God, the former designates the element in which He is and lives.—ὅτι indicates the oneness of element [in which Christians walk and God lives and moves.—M.] and ground in God and ourselves; His holiness must be traceable in us if we have fellowship with Him. He indeed is in the Light, while we walk in the light, it matters not how poor and defective our efforts may be. The sense is very similar to 1 Pet. i. 14–16; 2 Pet. i. 4. [Cf. ἔστι and περιπατοῦμεν. God is infinite—man finite.—M.]

We have fellowship one with another.—The reading μετ' αὐτοῦ cannot be right; for to walk in the Light and to have fellowship with Him coincide. But we naturally expect an advance in the argument. It is, therefore, not right to take μετ' ἀλλήλων as ἡμῶν τε καὶ τοῦ φωτός (Theophrast., Oecumen.), especially because God and men, the Creator and His creatures, are not of sufficient equality to be comprised in μετ' ἀλλήλων. Equally inadmissible is the construction of Beza (cum illo mutua communione), and that of de Wette, who renders our fellowship with God. It is the fellowship of Christians one with another, as v. 8, μετ' ἡμῶν, cf. iii. 11; iv. 7. 11. 12. To have (see note on v. 8) and to keep this fellowship is not a light matter; it is the fruit of the walking in the Light, of the fellowship with God, of a holy life and of holy aspirations. For sin separates, impedes and constantly destroys that fellowship. [This passage shows that the fellowship of Christians, or the "communion of Saints," as it is expressed in the Apostles' Creed, rests on a truly Catholic basis, and that its restriction to the narrow limits of a sect is at once un-evangelical, un-Apostolic and un-Christian.—M.] Hence the Apostle continues:

And the blood of Jesus His Son cleanseth us.—The copula καὶ establishes a parallel with the preceding words, and points consequently not to fellowship with God and the brethren to be established, but to a fellowship already existing, and so well established that the first, viz.: fellowship with God, has already yielded the fruit of the second, viz.: fellowship with the brethren. It is impossible to take and interpret καὶ=γὰρ, as alleged by Oecumen., Bede, Calov, Semler, al. The question is not to supply proof of the fellowship with the brethren, but to state a consequence of walking in the Light. The only question is whether the cleansing through the blood of Christ takes place alongside or inside the fellowship of the brethren with one another. The work of redemption is a whole, and not mechanical, but organic and moral, so that this cleansing takes place inside the fellowship of the Church, of the fellowship essential to and established for redemption. Exegetically important is, moreover, the meaning and the Present form of καθαρίζει. This word cannot be the same as ἀφίεναι τὰς ἀμαρτίας, because it recurs, v. 9, by the side of and after that phrase. The reference is, therefore, not to the remission of sins, to exemption from punishment or the pardon of guilt, but to the cancelling of sin and redemption from it. The Apostle does not advert here to justification, regeneration, conversion, the actus judicialis or forensis concerning the sinner, but to sanctification. The Present may suggest the idea of daily repentance and forgiveness of sins, but the meaning of the verb forbids also this reference. But wherein that cleansing consists is defined by the cleansing subject: the blood of Jesus His Son. It is said αἷμα, consequently not: God's new covenant with us established by the blood of Christ (Socinus), not: our faith in the sufferings of Christ (Grotius), not: Jesus Christ who shed His blood for us, not: the contemplation of the death of Jesus (Paulus), not: the reasonable belief of the moral end of the crucifixion of Jesus (Oertel); τὸ αἷμα Ἰησοῦ is the blood shed upon the cross, the bloody death of Jesus on the cross, as in ch. v. 6, sqq. [The blood which Jesus, so-called because of His incarnation, shed as a sacrifice at His Crucifixion, or the bloody sacrificial death of Jesus, so Luther, Düsterdieck, Ebrard.—M.J. This indicates the historical fact when the man Jesus died upon the cross at Golgotha, the sufferings of the Lord when He made experience of the sins of men, suffered for them, carried them also, assumed them (ἀντὶ τοῦ θεοῦ ὁ αὐτὸν, etc., Jno. i. 29), and took them away as Reconciler, but takes them away also as our Saviour, having died for us, but now lives and works in us, cf. ch. iii. 5. [Wordsworth: "No less a sacrifice than the death of the Son of God was required to propitiate the offended justice of God for sin; and no less a price than His blood, to ransom us from the bondage of Satan, to which we were reduced by sin."—M.J. The addition of τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ points to His relation to God the Father, consequently to His Divinity, where two things are to be considered, first, the exaltation and glory, secondly, the humiliation and servant-form of the Crucified One; the blood of the God-Man is the subject which cleanses. Now the death of Jesus is a sacrificial death, His blood sacrificial blood, shed for the atonement of committed guilt, for reconciling the offended majesty of God and the inimically disinclined sinner, a ransom for mankind doomed to death and condemnation. See ch. ii. 2; iii. 6; iv. 9; v. 6, sqq. He creates to believers justification before God, but the power that creates preserves also that which it creates. The redeemed congregate at the cross of Jesus; sin is forgiven, the debt remitted, sin must now be cancelled and fresh guilt avoided; in believers peccatum manet but non regnat. Thus in the Church congregated at the cross and preserved in unity, sanctification continues in operation, after having begun its operativeness in justification. It is not our walking in the Light, not our own efforts in sanctification, but the blood of Jesus which cleanses us. (See Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 8).

[The whole doctrine of this verse is very fully and admirably set forth in Düsterdieck. The sum of what he says we give in the language of Alford: "St. John, in accord with the other Apostles, sets forth the Death and Blood of Christ in two different aspects:

1. As the one sin-offering for the world, in which sense we are justified by the application of the blood of Christ by faith, His satisfaction being imputed to us.

2. As a victory over sin itself, His blood being the purifying medium, whereby we gradually, being already justified, become pure and clean from all sin. And this application of Christ's blood is made by the Spirit which dwelleth in us.

The former of these asserts the imputed righteousness of Christ put on us in justification: the latter, the inherent righteousness of Christ wrought in us gradually in sanctification. And it is of this latter that he is here treating."—M.]

From all sin—whether sins of thought, word or deed, sins of rashness or sins of ignorance, sins of malice, sins of omission or sins of commission, sins in affectu or sins in defectu, sins of pleasure or sins of pain, sins committed at our work or during our recreation, sins against the first or the second table of the decalogue. Bengel: originale, actuale.

[Wordsworth notices the completeness of this doctrinal statement, which declares that Jesus is the Christ, against the Cerinthians (but this rests on the doubtful reading χριστὸν, see App. Crit., v. 7, 4), that He is the Son of God, against the Ebionites, that He shed His blood on the cross, against the Simonians and Docetæ, that it cleanseth from all sin, against those who deny pardon on earth to deadly sin after baptism, and that it cleanseth us if we walk in the Light, against the Antinomian Gnostics, who changed the grace of God into lasciviousness (Jude 4), and alleged that a man might walk in darkness and yet be clean from all guilt of sin.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. As He is in the Light, v. 7—is not a Gnostic dogma simply required to be known and understood, but an ethical principle for the governance of our walk. Light, as it is the Being of God (v. 5), so it is also the element of God, and because it is the Being of God, therefore it is also His element, wherein He dwells and lives. Light must become our element in order that it may also become our Being; we must live in Him that He may more fully live in us, for we are destined to become θεῖας κοινωνοὶ φώσεως, 2 Pet. i. 4. To strive after resemblance of God (Lücke) is saying too little. Nor is Bengel altogether right in saying: "imitatio Dei criterium communionis cum Illo." For if the Lord says (Matt. v. 48): "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (cf. Lke. vi. 36), perfection or compassion is not set down as a foreign and distant goal, or held up as an ideal rule, but the experience and enjoyment of the perfect compassion of God is to become an impulse for receiving and appropriating it, in order that we, in our turn, may exhibit it. 1 Pet. i. 16. 16 is similar. Even Paul says (Eph. v. 1): ζῆτε ὡς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ ὡς τὸ ἐκ τῆς ἀγαπῆρας. As children they are in their converse with the Father to inhale and receive what they experience at His hands, in order that they may have within themselves a living fountain, causing in its turn the streaming forth of Divine life, and to do as the Father doeth. The reference is not to an artificial imitation, but to a filial following the Father in ardent attachment to Him. The child is not so much literally to imitate as to cleave to the Father, to receive Him, and as the Lord so often requires it, to follow Him. Such a life in converse with God, in the life-sphere of God, John emphatically demands as the chief requirement of individual Christians, as well as of the whole Church.

2. The Person of Jesus is again taken as uniting the Godhead and Manhood, when His blood is spoken of as αἷμα τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ (of God). The word αἷμα testifies against Docetism, because it is operative as a real power, and against Ebionism the words "His Son," whose the blood is: the Godhead, in brief, is a factor in the work of redemption. This combined expression opposes as much Nestorianism, which separates the two natures, as Eutychianism, which confounds them, and testifies for the Lutheran doctrine with its communicatio idiomatum, and against the Reformed principle: finitum non capax infiniti. Luther, in his Confession of Faith, A. D. 1528-29 (Guerike: Symbolik, p. 666), says: "Again I believe and know that the Scripture teaches, that -- God the Son -- did assume a whole, full humanity, and was the true seed or child promised to Abraham and David, and was born as the natural son of Mary, every way and in every form a true man, as I am myself and all others; but that He came without sin, of the Virgin alone, by the Holy Ghost. And that this man is truly God, and became (other reading: was born) one inseparable Person of God and man, so that Mary the holy Virgin is a very and true mother not only of the man Christ, as the Nestorians do teach, but of the Son of God." But if Luther in a Trinity Sermon (Erlangen edit., 9, p. 25), on the ground of Acts xx. 28, calls the blood of Christ straightway the blood of God, it is to be borne in mind that in that passage κρῖον and not θεόν is the best authenticated reading, and that such an oxymoron must not be pressed beyond seeing in it the doctrine of the inseparable God-Man. Calov's following Luther cannot be regarded as a precedent of great moment, since the Scripture, with its wisdom in the choice of terms, does not require us so to do.—Cf. Doctrinal and Ethical, on v. 3, No. 3. [Also the last note on v. 7, in Exegetical and Critical.—M.]

[Article II. of the 39 Articles of the Church of England and the Prot. Episc. Church in the U. S. states thus briefly the doctrine of the Person of Christ: "The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very and eternal God, and of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance: so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one Person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very Man; who truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile His Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men." And the Athanasian Creed, vv. 28-35, thus defines:

28. Et ergo Fides recta, ut credamur et confiteamur, Dominus noster Jesus Christus, Dei Filius, Deus pariter et Homo est.

29. Deus ex substantia Patris ante secula genitus: Homo, ex substantia Matris in secula natus.

30. Perfectus Deus, perfectus Homo ex anima rationali et humana carne subsistens.

31. Aequalis Patri secundum Divinitatem: minor Patre secundum Humanitatem.

32. Qui licet Deus sit et Homo, non duo tamen, sed unus est Christus.

33. Unus autem, non conversione Divinitatis in carnem, sed assumptione Humanitatis in Deum.

34. Unus omnino, non confusione Substantiæ, sed unitate Personæ.

35. Nam sicut anima rationalis et caro unus est Homo; ita Deus et Homo unus est Christus."—M.]

3. The work of Jesus is strongly characterized in one direction: "His blood cleanseth from all sin." This statement involves the following particulars:

1. We can nevermore cleanse ourselves, our cleansing remains the work of Christ.

2. It is just the death of Christ that effects and accomplishes our cleansing; dying for sin, He conquers it; the victory of sin is its defeat, and the defeat of Christ is His victory: fighting unto death, He acquires the life of His own, and sin in its triumph over Him on the cross is discomfited. For His sake God turns to the world His reconciled countenance, and through faith in the Crucified One the world abandons sin, which is enmity against God. The cross, the death upon the cross, possesses an overwhelming power of attraction, and the life of the Son of God shut up in the life of the body breaks through in the life of the Spirit, in the working of the Spirit sent by Him and the Father, who now becomes operative in believers (Jno. vii. 39; Col. xvi. 7; Acts ii. 33).

3. Sin still cleaves to the justified; justification does not miraculously or magically cancel sin by a judicial decree, it only absolves us from punishment, guilt and condemnation, but requires the carrying on of the work of redemption (of which it is the beginning), and of its consummation in sanctification; justification does not end, but it does begin redemption.

4. Justification does not even effect the independence of the believer, but merely introduces him into the walk in Light, to the fellowship of the brethren one with another, as into the sphere within which redemption may be carried on and consummated, and also in the individual; redemption, like the knowledge of infinite Love, is a common experience (Eph. iii. 18, sq., ὅτι πάντες τοῖς ἀγίοις).

5. Sanctification is the continuation of justification, it must ever return to it and recur to its power and might.

6. Sanctification is a work gradual in its growth.

7. It has respect to all sin, not only to its manifestation, but to its seat and origin.

8. Justification and sanctification, the power of the death upon the cross and the fellowship with the brethren, the walk in the Light and the cleansing from all sin, all these reciprocally operate on and promote each other; this holds more particularly good of brotherly, of Church-fellowship, and of the hallowing power of the Saviour's death upon the cross, so that we are reminded of the words of Cicero: "Nisi in bonis amicitia esse non potest." Or, we must distinguish, but not separate Christ for us, before us, and in us.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Every thing depends on the reply you give to the question whether sin rules you or as yet only adheres to you. If sin reigns over you, you belong as yet to the darkness, but if the reign of sin is broken in you, though there be still sin in you, you belong to the children of light.—It is not with pride, but with gratitude to God, that the Christian contemplates his being in the light.

—Love of God and of the brethren is the power of sanctification, and this is the life of love.—It is just the sanctified who see even the smallest sins with painfulness and perceive that they stand in need of cleansing through Jesus Christ.—If thy sin troubles thee in its deep motions, know that in the cross thou hast a well, whence thou mayest and must draw consolation. It is not sufficient that thou art a Christian who is shone upon, thou must become an enlightened Christian.

STARKE:—The ungodly are children of darkness without admitting it, they walk in the darkness without perceiving it, they commit the works of darkness without believing it. O, terrible blindness! Lord, open thou their eyes that they may see, tremble and return from their evil way.—How busy are people during the natural day! O, that they would not suffer the acceptable time and the day of salvation to pass by idly and without profit! Walk in the Light!—The virtue of the blood of Jesus Christ effects not only our first cleansing from dead works, but also our daily cleansing.

SPENER:—We may say it and glory that we have fellowship with God; nor is it spiritual pride to acknowledge the grace of God which we have received, provided we do not ascribe it to ourselves.—Light is impatient of darkness, and God of sin. By this test thyself, whether thou art God's. Moses shone beautifully through long converse with this light; why should not the soul wherein He dwelleth do likewise? Let thy light shine, and do not deceive thyself by false conceits.

NEANDER:—To those who sincerely strive to walk in the Light, yet make daily experience of the still remaining influence of sin, and are disquieted in their conscience on hearing that fellowship with God, who is Light, can only be had by those who walk in the light,—to such is offered the comfortable assurance of entire cleansing from the sin as yet adhering to them. But the self-deception of those is also met, who trust to cleansing through the blood of Christ, without a corresponding course of life. The close connection between Christ in us and Christ for us is here indicated.

HUBNER:—Only among the pure is fellowship, i. e., true concord, love, confluence of the hearts. Evil separates, and is the source of discord.—The kingdom of God is the kingdom of love and peace; that of Satan the kingdom of discord.

AHLFELD:—Which are the seals and evidences of true fellowship with God? 1. That we walk in the light; 2. that we have fellowship one with another; 3. the humble confession that we owe the cleansing from our sins solely to the blood of Jesus Christ.—Providence moves pari passu from the first creative fiat to the last judgment.—Thou knowest that every transgression enshrouds thy heart in night.—True fellowship does not flow from our natural life, not from leagues for the commission of common sin, not from common pleasure or common profit, but only from the walk in Light.—First His passion, then thy passion; first His dying, then thy dying.—As long as Christ is our Righteousness, you also must go with Him into the walk in Light. As long as He is truly your Surety and Sacrifice, you also must with Him present to God your heart and will as a sacrifice of sweet savour. But he that learns to sacrifice himself, remains also in the fellowship with the brethren.

BESSER:—But how many, who, perchance, do not know the school-name of the modern Nicolaïtanes, the Pantheists, yet do their works, while from the fear of a separateness from sin, grievous to the flesh, they change the frontier-line between good and evil, put light for darkness and darkness for light, and then spread a figment of their own thoughts, which they call God, as a pillow for their worldly-mindedness.—Our fellowship with God, whom we do not see, is evidenced by our fellowship with one another, where one sees the other.—There are also will-o'-the-wisp-fellowships, and the mere saying of any Church-fellowship that it has fellowship with God is not sufficient.—Anna, the electress of Brandenburg, ordained in her will: "Our text shall be 1 Jno. i. 7: The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."

STEINHOFFER:—"A soul washed in the blood of Jesus Christ has very delicate perceptions. The light which has risen in her shows her the smallest dust-particle of sin and the most subtle motions of the flesh, and makes her perceive whatever accords with her happy frame in gladsome converse with God and the Saviour, and whatever disturbs it."

[RIEGER:—The Bible-verse of the blood of Jesus Christ and its cleansing virtue is a verse for the children of God, for the children of the Light, and says to them: your love of the light, your hatred of darkness with its unfruitful works were insufficient to warrant your access to God, your joyous appeal to His Love; with these only your approach of the Light would have caused you to melt away as wax exposed to the heat of fire; but it is the blood of Jesus Christ the Son of God, that is, God's sending His Son into the world to make atonement for your sins, whatever He did and suffered, especially His sacrificial blood-shedding in the voluntary surrender of Himself, and His present priestly appearance before the face of God with His blood and the treasure of all His merits contained therein, it is this which must be of avail to you. The design of this blood-shedding was the cleansing of your sins; and thus we find it declared in the Gospel, for our use in penitence and faith; thus it was sprinkled over us in Holy Baptism; and thus the Holy Ghost applies it in our daily renovation, bestowing upon us the double benefit of the forgiveness of our sins and the cleansing from all unrighteousness. At every motion of sin in our conscience or in our members, we may, under the influence of the Spirit, apply to this blood and its cleansing virtue, and thus prevent the calling into question or the sundering of our fellowship with God, and that in the power of the power of the high-priesthood of Christ we may ever become and remain nearer to God."—M.]

[BR. HALL:—As He is Light, so every aberration from Him is darkness; if we then say that we have fellowship with this pure and holy God, and yet walk in the darkness of any sin whatsoever, we belie ourselves, and do not according to that truth which we profess.—M.]

[Sermons:—

GRIFFITH, M.:—The spiritual antidote to cure our sinful souls.

CHARNOCK, STEPHEN:—The virtues of the blood of Christ.

EARLE:—The Popish doctrine of purgatory repugnant to the Scripture account of remission through the blood of Christ.—M.]

3. Second Inference.—Perception and Confession of Sins.

CHAPTER I. 8-10.

- 8 If we say that we have no<sup>1</sup> sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.
9 If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just<sup>2</sup> to forgive us our sins,<sup>4</sup> and to cleanse<sup>1</sup>
10 us from all unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us.

Verse 8. [German: "If we say that we have not sin," but the rendering of E. V. is better and idiomatically more correct, for ἀμαρτίαν ἔχειν is to have sin, and ἀμαρτίαν οὐκ ἔχειν denotes to have no sin, to be absolutely free from it.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> ἐν ᾧ μὴ οὐκ ἔστιν A. C. K. al. [Lachm., Tischend., Wordsw.—M.] is a more authentic reading than οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν ᾧ μὴ B. G. al. Sin. Vulg.; which is probably a correction according to v. 10.

Verse 9. [German: "He is faithful and righteous to forgive us the sins." δικαιοσ "occurs other five times in this Epistle, and is always in E. V. so rendered. The opposition, moreover, between God as δικαιοσ and the ἀδικία from which the Church is cleansed, is lost in E. V." Lillie.—The omission of our, supplied in E. V., is idiomatic German, but hardly English.—M.]

<sup>4</sup> ἡμῶν, Cod. Sin., but otherwise feebly sustained, is probably added from the first clause of the verse.

<sup>5</sup> καθάρισις A. al. [perhaps also in C*?] cannot be received as the original reading. καθάρις has the weightier authority of Sin. B.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection.—The structure of these verses is unmistakably the same as that of those immediately preceding them: negative (v. 8) and positive (v. 9), while the negation (v. 8) is continued (v. 10) with reference to the positive (v. 9), and the parallel is even indicated in the form: τὰν εἰπομεν. vv. 8. 10. The connection of v. 8 with the presuppositions at the end of v. 7. (καθαρίσει ἀπὸ πάντων ἀμαρτιῶν) that sin is still inhering in us, is equally unmistakable. But it is just as unmistakable that the perception and confession of sins are here emphatically dwelt upon as following and accompanying the true fellowship with its walk in the Light. The continuance of the Plural form (we, us, our) denotes also the general character both of what is said here and in the preceding verses. After all, we have here a second inference drawn from the leading thought that "God is Light," (v. 5).

VER. 8. Perception of Sin.—If we say, cf. v. 6, above in Exegetical and Critical.

That we have no sin.—'Αμαρτία in the Singular denotes sin in general; the absence of the Article points out that the reference is neither to a particular sin, nor to the whole, full sin [but to any sin.—M.]. Hence the application of the term to original sin as contrasted with actual sins (peccata actualia), as maintained by Augustine, Bede, Luther, Calvin, Beza, Calov, Baumgarten-Crusius, Neander, Sander and Düsterdieck, is as inadmissible as that which refers it to a particular sin or a particular kind of sins, as in ch. v. 16; ἀμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον, or μὴ πρὸς θάνατον, sins of infirmity, light offences, against which so early a writer as Augustine remarks: "Multa levia (peccata) faciunt unum grande." Nor can ἀμαρτία designate the guilt of sin, as held by Socinus, Episcopius, Löffler and Grotius, the latter saying: "Habere peccatum non est: nunc in peccata esse, sed: ob peccata reum posse fieri," nor describe sins committed or inhering anterior to entrance into fellowship with God the Light, where the Greeks Oecumenius, Theophylact and the Scholiasts have the precedence. 'Αμαρτία is simply 'sin, nothing more or less, but it is certainly sin. Nor does ἔχομεν make any change in the matter, so as to designate the state "in which sin has not yet wholly disappeared" (Lücke). But it is less the state which is the result of continued sinning, than the state from which results such sinning, i. e., the state which is not the product of former sin, but the producer of new sin. John says: We have sin, and that denotes, both that original sin gives us still trouble, and that we still do sin in thought, in word and in deed; if not as servants, under the dominion of sin, who looking for reward are in the service of sin, yet by hastiness, infirmity or ignorance, now only suffering it by the force of habit or because of its congenital strength, or again by offering it too little resistance; sin insinuates itself into our good and our good works, even into prayer, partly in affectu (self-love, hardness in firmness, etc.), partly in defectu (gentleness even to parting with virtue, the love of our neighbour, as well as the love of self with fear, etc.). 'Αμαρτία is a sinful demeanour of any kind, falling away from true godliness, from that which is well-pleasing to God; here we may name particular inclinations, tendencies, principles, and especially the forms of the life of the imagination [German: Arten des Phantasieleben, an expression of Ebrard, who alludes to the impure representations of a depraved imagination preceding the overt acts of vice and sin.—[M.]. This we must not deny. The sentence with its substance and bearing becomes clearer if we take it in connection with περικατέιν ἐν σκότει. The darkness is the territory of the undivine, well marked off in every direction and containing the whole system of sin,—the sphere of the walk, the life and doings of men. A Christian cannot and may not be said to walk thus in the darkness, but he still has sin. There is still within him a territory which is constantly receiving some kind of admixture from the territory of darkness. He is no longer in sin, but sin is in him; the degrees, indeed, are infinitely different and adjusted to the degree of the cleansing and growth of the inner man. But even John is constrained to say: "We have sin."

We deceive ourselves.—Here we have the Active, not the Middle Voice; ἐαυτὸν πλανᾶν. This form brings out the self-activity which sinks more into the background by the use of the Middle with its Passive form. This brings out a difference like that in the German, "ich selbst ärgere mich—ich ärgere mich selbst." In the latter case the cause is excluded in others, while in the former it is definitely laid within myself, and thus gives prominence to my own guiltiness, whereas the second case describes only a suffering without any one else's guilt. The pronoun of the third person αὐτοῦ in the Plural is used frequently both for the first (Rom. viii. 28) and the second person (John xii. 8). See Winer, p. 168, No. 6. The context removes all doubt that the reference is here to deception, to lying and error, as in 1 John iii. 7; Matt. xxiv. 4. 11, and elsewhere. This is also the proper meaning of this verb. It is parallel with ψευδόμεθα of v. 6, but gives greater prominence to self-guilt; there he lies before others in word or deed, here he lies to himself and this sin works into himself greater perdition. There an unregenerate man wants others to believe that he is a Christian, here a regenerate man deceives himself through pride. [Augustine: Si te confessus fueris peccatorem, est in te veritas: nam ipsa veritas lux est. Nondum perfecte splenduit vita tua, quia insunt peccata: sed tamen jam illuminari cepisti, quia inest confessio peccatorum."]—[M.]

And the truth is not in us.—Since deceiving oneself runs parallel with the lying of v. 6, so this sentence concludes parallel with not doing the truth, (v. 6). The truth, ἡ ἀλήθεια is to be taken objectively (Düsterdieck, Ebrard, Huther); the subjective lies in ἐν ἡμῖν (Bengel: non in corde, neque adeo in ore). It is the Divine truth in Christ; the absolute principle of life from God, received into our heart. Hence it is neither studium veri (as maintained by Grotius and Episcopius), nor a truthful disposition (Lücke), nor the truthfulness of self-knowledge and self-examination, of purity (de Wette), nor that which is true in general (S. G. Lange, Paulus), nor better moral perception, melior rerum moralium cognitio, as Semler interprets. Moreover, the being, the existence of the Divine truth as the principle of life in us is also denied (οὐκ ἔστιν). Hence this is even stronger than the former οὐ ποτε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, v. 6; the latter is without the deed of the truth, the former without its existence; here the truth being in us is denied, in v. 6, only its manifestation and expression in our life.

VER. 9. Confession of Sins.—If we confess our sins.—The connection of this sentence with the preceding is not like that of v. 7 with v. 6, by δὲ, as Luther renders; the negatives of the preceding verse are strongly and abruptly antithetical to the positive of this verse; [Ebrard: "Now follows the second thought-member in a conditional sentence which introduces the opposite case. Ἐὰν ὁμολογῶμεν τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἡμῶν. Here also John scorns a merely tautological repetition; he does not say: ἐὰν ὁμολογῶμεν ὅτι ἀμαρτίαν ἔχομεν, but where he opposes to the negative the positive, Confession, he does not speak of sin in general (as a state), but of definite, concrete, specific sins. For this is the form which the confession of sins must assume, in order to be inwardly true and efficacious. The mere confession in abstracto that we have sin, would be without truth and value and shrink into a hollow phrase, unless it be attended by the perception and acknowledgment of concrete particular sins. It is much easier to make pious speeches concerning repentance and the greatness of the misery engendered by sin, than in a specific case of sin to see one's wrong, admit and repent it, and to be sorry for it. John requires the latter."—[M.].—The Apostle is not satisfied with εἰπόμεν as before, but uses ὁμολογῶμεν, which is much more comprehensive than the former, and of course involves it as well as the inward opining, thinking, saying and feeling convinced, which finally develops into audible utterance and declaration before men; nor is this all, for it involves the additional particular of confessing one's guilt before God, and this confession of guilt must be so lively and profound as to become public and ecclesiastically ordained, and stands in nothing behind the former εἰπεῖν. It is therefore not enough to see here only a perception or recognition (Socinus: "Confiteri significat interiorem ac profundam suorum peccatorum agnitionem." Baumgarten-Crusius: "ὁμολογεῖν is to perceive, to be sensible, and to become conscious of, as contrasted with εἰπεῖν μὴ ἔχειν ἀμαρτίαν"), or "an inward act grounded in the whole inward bias of the mind" (Neander), all which is taken for granted. Nor is it only the real utterance of sin inwardly identified and confessed to oneself (Huther, Düsterdieck), for this also is implied as a consequence. Nor must we exclude the acknowledgment before God, and "the confession" ordained for the comfort of a disquieted conscience, from which no truly penitent man will withdraw himself, and which is gladly sought and made by such as are of a contrite heart. [The reference here is to the Lutheran "confession," which must not be confounded with the R. C. auricular Confession. Luther himself distinguishes three kinds of confession: the first, before God (Ps. xxxii. 6), which is so essential that it ought to be the sum-total of a Christian man's life; the second, towards our neighbour, and is the confession of love, as the former is that of faith (Jas. v. 16). This confession, like the former, is necessary and ordained. The third is that ordered by the Pope to be made secretly into the ears of a priest with an enumeration of sins. Luther condemned compulsory private confession, and left it optional with individuals to determine if, and what they should confess. Still he commends private confession, saying, "it is advisable and good." The Augsburg Confession, II., IV., says: "Confession has not been abolished in our Churches, and the usage is not to give the Lord's Body to those who have not been previously examined and absolved," and Luther in his Larger Catechism supplies a form of confession which is very full of private matters (Catech. Minor., IV., 16-29). The present practice varies in different Lutheran establishments, some retaining private confession, others substituting general confession. The latter custom prevails, I believe, among Lutherans in the United States.—M.]—The proud ειπεῖν stands in antithesis with the humble ὁμολογεῖν, which includes all the aforesaid particulars. The original ὁμολογεῖν signifies to  speak together [hence to hold the same language.—M.], then to accord, assent to, and points to a dialogue between God accusing and reproaching us in our consciences by His Word and His Spirit, and man assenting thereto in humility, faith and prayer, even unto pouring out his heart before loved fellow-men, from his nearest friend to the spiritual guardian of his soul, the servant of the Word, the Minister of the gifts and Steward of the mysteries of God. Hence the object is designated by τὰς ἀμαρτίας. The sins are "the particular manifestations of ἀμαρτίαν ἔχειν" (Huther), "definite, concrete, specific sins" (Ebrard), of whichever kind they may be, lesser and even the least sins, even as repentance goes ever deeper and deeper and attains more clear and distinct perceptions of sin in its endless turns, in its hideousness and wrong. See below on v. 10, and on ch. iii. 4.

He is faithful and righteous.—That is only God the Father (so Lücke, de Wette and the majority of commentators), who is the ruling subject in the work of redemption, since for Christ's sake, and through Christ the Mediator, He forgives and makes us happy, although Christ is referred to in v. 7, and below in ch. ii. 1. The reference to the Father and the Son is inadmissible (J. Lange, Sander, S. Schmid). The subject is not defined, because the reference is to God the Father, who is the principal subject throughout [vv. 5-10]. God is faithful, He does not become so through forgiveness consequent upon our repentance. God is faithful because His Essence accords with His workings, and these in all particular manifestations accord with one another and all of them together. The primary reference is to God's faithfulness towards us, to the truth-and-light-essence which reigns in us, if we confess our sins, and is related to and in accordance with His Own Essence (Ebrard); but to this must be added a secondary reference to His Word with its promises of help, blessings, redemption and remission of sins (Düsterdieck, Huther, al.), and this secondary reference follows from the context v. 10, which re-adverts to the Word of God, although it had already been mentioned in vv. 1. 3. 5, and is in perfect harmony with the grammatical usage of both Testaments and the views they express (cf. Ps. xxxii. 8 sqq.; Ezek. xviii. 31 sq.; 1 Cor. i.

9; x. 13; 2 Cor. i. 18-21; 1 Thess. v. 24; Heb. x. 23; xi. 11). And more than this, the term πιστός, held thus absolute and undefined, has surely a wider bearing. It concerns something which He has produced as Creator and suggested as Regent in dispensations, to which the Father and the Lord have given consciousness in the Word, and which is in perfect harmony with the Light-nature of God. He is faithful to His Own Being, to His doings for, and in man as Creator, Preserver, Governor, Redeemer and Revealer. He is "stiff and firm" (Luther) in cleaving to His holy purpose of grace, that is, His faithfulness; πιστός therefore is not only misericors (S. Schmid). Besides this we have the epithet δικαίος, righteous, just, which applies to one who acts in accordance with the duties arising from his position; it denotes the disposition and righteousness which gives to every man his due. God is righteous or just when He punishes those who walk ἐν ἀντιθεῖ, 2 Thess. i. 5. 7, where the reference is to δικαία κρίσις, then He κατακρίνει but blesses those who walk ἐν φόβῳ, forgiving, cleansing and ultimately glorifying them: It is only the juxtaposition of πιστός and the context which render the limitation of δικαίος to the judicial character of God with reference to the penitent admissible in this passage. Faithful towards the penitent, agreeably to His Love, His eternal purpose of grace, His Word of promise and His work of redemption, He is also righteous, just, to them as promising them forgiveness and cancelling what is still unrighteous in them in conformity to His appointed laws. Hence δικαίος is not=bonus, lenis (Grotius, Schöttgen, Rosenmüller), nor=equus, benignus (Semler, G. S. Lange, Carpsov, Bretschneider), nor again=πιστός (Hornejus, "in promissis servandis integer"), nor=δικαίων (Ebrard). Nor does the righteousness of God appear here as justitia vindicativa, which was revealed in the death of Christ, so that the forgiveness of sins is Christo justa non nobis (Calov), or in that the sinner, appealing to the ransom paid in the blood of Christ, has his sin cancelled, because it would be unjust to insist upon a twofold payment (Sander). Luther's explanation is excellent; he says, "God is righteous who gives to every man his due and accords to those who confess their sins and believe, the righteousness acquired through the death of Christ, and thus makes thee righteous." This righteousness of God is closely connected with His faithfulness. But we must guard against the distinction that πιστός relates to PECCATA MORTALIA, δικαίος to PECCATA VENIALIA, "quia sc. justi per opera pœnitentiæ, caritatis etc. merentur de condigno hanc condonationem" (Suarez). Faithfulness is rather the soil and foundation from which righteousness springs up. [The blessings conferred upon Christians conformably to the δικαιοσύνη of God, are in fulfilment of the Divine promises.—M.]. In Holy Scripture goodness and righteousness, truth and righteousness are synygies (Nitzsch, System, 6th ed., p. 176). Cf. Pa. cxliii. 1, and notes on ch. ii. 29.

To forgive us our sins.—Ἰνα is not=εἵνεκα, so that, or ὅτι with which it alternates, v. 5, ch. iii. 11. The difference is, whether we have here simply the contents of the message (v. 5), or its purpose (ch. iii. 11). The meaning here seems to be: "He is faithful and righteous for the purpose of forgiving. It is His Law and Will to forgive (de Wette), but of course the Will manifests its energy in action (contrary to Huther). [I should prefer putting this with Winer thus: "He is faithful and righteous in order to forgive us," i. e., the Divine attributes of faithfulness and righteousness are exercised in order to our pardon, as Wordsworth puts it.—M.]. The sins which have been confessed He remits. Pardon, forgiveness of sins, i. e., the cancelling of the debt of sin and its culpability as well as of the consciousness of guilt or of an evil conscience; justification and reconciliation are therefore the first consequence of the confession of sin; the second consequence is:

And cleanse us from all unrighteousness.—Neither an epezegetical addition (Semler) nor an allegorical repetition of the preceding (Lange). It is a coördinated clause describing sanctification as the continuation of justification, or redemption as the consequent of reconciliation. On καθαρίζειν see notes on v. 7. Unrighteousness, ἀδικία, is synonymous with ἀμαρτία, and consequently not pœna peccati (Socinus); the latter denotes the formal, the former the material side of sin; the latter indicates the genesis of sin (or its course of development) which does not coincide with the law, the former the fact of the effect of sin as violating, transgressing and offending against the Law, and on that account liable to punishment and conducing to ruin and perdition.

VER. 10. Conclusion.—If we say.—Cf. v. 8, of which this verse is not merely the repetition, but the intensification and continuation.

That we have not sinned goes back to ἀμαρτιαν οὐκ ἔχομεν, but οὐχ ἡμαρτήκαμεν is a much stronger expression; the former denotes a state or condition of which the latter is the actual expression [v. 10 describes the concrete act, v. 8 the abstract state.—M.]; we have here the conduct (v. 10) in a certain relation (v. 8) in connection with ἀδικία, v. 9. The use of the Perfect does not warrant an exclusive reference to sins anterior to entrance into the Church (Socinus, Paulus), but denotes active sinfulness reaching down to the present and sins just committed; τὰς ἀμαρτίας, v. 9, show that the separate acts, the actusositas [actusositas.—M.] of the ἀμαρτία (v. 8) are here dwelt upon. [Huther: "The Perfect does not prove that ἡμαρτήκαμεν denotes sinning prior to conversion (Soc., Russmeyer, Paulus, etc.); the reference here, as well as in all the preceding verses, is rather to the sinning of Christians; for no Christian would think of denying his former sins. The Perfect is in part accounted for by John's usus loquendi, according to which an activity reaching down to the present is often expressed by the Perfect tense, and in part by the fact that confession always has respect to sins committed before.—M.]

We make Him a liar.—This clause answers to ψευδόμεθα and ἐναντὶς πλανῶμεν, but is a much stronger expression; we not only lie for ourselves, we not only deceive ourselves, but we make God (αὐτὸν) a liar, and this takes place not without pride, stubbornness or bitterness even unto blasphemy (cf. Jno. v. 18; viii. 53; x. 33; xix. 7. 12). He who is πιστός is blasphemed as ψεῦδος, of course only by such men.

And His word is not in us, i. e., His word of promise containing the ἀλφειά, v. 8; not only the truth and its knowledge are wanting to such persons, but they are also without the Word, the frame and vessel of the truth. As the reference is to Christians, His word probably designates the Gospel of, or concerning Jesus (Socinus, Calov, Neander, Luther, Huther, Düsterdieck), and not the Old Testament in particular (Oecumenius, Grotius, de Wette, al.), or only the New Testament (Lachmann, Rosenmüller), nor in general the revelation of God absolutely, His entire self-disclosure, including the λόγος, Jno. i. 1 (Ebrard).—It is not stamped into the heart in living characters (Spener), it has remained or become again "outwardly or inwardly strange to us" (Huther); for the regenerate may fall from grace. A man that is not conscious of sin still adhering to him, not conscious, therefore, of the true nature of the holiness for which he was born and born again, cannot be or have been wont to contemplate and examine himself in the mirror of the Divine Law, in the Light of the Divine Word, by the pattern held up to us in the revelation of Jesus Christ. Such a one does actually, carelessly or maliciously accuse of falsehood the Word of God and the God of the Word, who looks upon us sinners and calls us to the consciousness of sin. Such men may remember the Word of God, know it by heart, but it is not to them an animating life-principle and impelling power; it is not extant in their inward life and consciousness.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The want of redemption which is universal is also permanent, which even in the Church of the redeemed has not disappeared (v. 8), although it is disappearing more and more (v. 9). The certainty of the difference between walking in the darkness (περιπατεῖν ἐν τῷ ἀνόρῳ) and walking in the light (περιπατεῖν ἐν τῷ φωτί) is not greater than the certainty that those who are walking in the light have sin adhering to them (ἀμαρτιαν ἔχομεν). Vast as is the difference between these two modes and spheres of life, yet the import of the difference among Christians still affected with sin, but experiencing a daily growing redemption from sin, vanishes before the purity of God the Father, no matter how marked and important the difference may be between a John and individual Church members. The perception and cognition of sin, especially of one's own sin, and the clear consciousness of it in all humility, are indispensable requisites for the walk in the Light. Though your sin, as compared with that of the unregenerate, be light, take care lest you esteem it light. The smallest stain soils a clean garment. If you despise it when you weigh it, be afraid when you count it up. Many little sins make one great sin; many drops make a river.

2. Self-deception is so fearful because it will progress to the denial of the truth and the truthfulness of God and His Word, even to open and formal blasphemy (we lie, v. 6; we deceive ourselves, v. 8; we make God a liar, v. 10). Christians are saints, but only in process of being, and not already complete and perfect. [German:—becoming, not yet become.—M.]. This contradicts the Donatist error.

8. Justification is before sanctification, its antecedent; τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἀπέλαι precedes the καθαρίζειν ἀπὸ πάσης ἀδικίας (v. 9); this is the fixed order in the kingdom of God.—Both are acts of God; the first an act occurring once only, the second involving the continuous doing of God [the first is a solitary act, the latter a continuing process—M.]. Although the former is only a solitary, momentary act, and not a process like the latter, the former repeats itself whenever there occurs an interruption in the walk in light, or a loosening or sundering of the fellowship with God (v. 9).

4. The forgiveness of sins, as the principal part of justification, consists of different elements: 1. cancelling or diminishing of the punishments of sin; 2. cancelling of the debt of sin and the culpability connected therewith (culpa et debiti); 3. removal of the consciousness of guilt or of an evil conscience; 4. the inclination of Divine grace to the sinner as actually evidenced in the communication of positive, and especially of spiritual and eternal riches; 5. abrogation of the strength and power of sin, wherewith the blotting out of sin did begin, redemption, loosening from the power of evil, the purification of the reconciled sinner from sin. While the two last elements (Nos. 4. 5) mark the transition from the realm of justification to that of sanctification (καθαρίζειν, v. 7) that named first and relating to the punishment of sins is so externally related to the subject needing the forgiveness of sins, that its centre may be sought and found only in the other two, viz., the cancelling of the guilt and the removal of the consciousness of guilt, in perfect analogy with the confession of a justified man, as supplied by St. Paul in Rom. v. 1-5, a passage which may be called classical in this matter: εἰρήνην ἔχομεν. The centre of the forgiveness of sins is the non-imputatio peccati. Temporal ills appointed as punishments of sin cease to be punishments to one who has received the forgiveness of sins, they are to him only δοκιμασία or παιδεία; they are not always or altogether cancelled and removed, and are not the worst, particularly as they do not terminate in damnation, ἀπώλεια, whereas guilt and an evil conscience disquiet and cause pain. The forgiveness of sins simply changes the sinner's relation to and before God, but afterwards there springs up a different conduct of God towards the sinner and of the sinner towards God in sanctification, wherein sins are forgiven and forgotten, the sinner is no longer regarded by God as a sinner, but as another man, and God appears to, and is felt by the sinner no longer as Judge, but as a merciful Father. But such a relationship springing from the forgiveness of sins may indeed be disturbed and impaired and needs therefore repeated renewing and quickening.

5. The factor of the forgiveness of sins is God the Faithful and Righteous with His purpose of grace and its revelation (v. 9). No man can forgive his sins to himself; self-redemption is a lie. Very beautifully says Luther in execrable Latin: "Amor Dei non invenit, sed creat suum diligibile; amor hominis fit a suo diligibili."

6. The condition of the forgiveness of sins is the confession of sins (ὁμολογεῖν τὰς ἀμαρτίας) resting upon and conditioned by perception of sins and self-knowledge. After the death of Christ with its sufferings as well as with the proof of His perfect obedience (v. 7) has operated on the sinner's conscience and caused him by that light to perceive his own sinfulness, and to feel at the same time the mercy of God, as having special regard to, and influence upon him, he ceases in the love of faith in Christ to love himself and sin within himself, is afraid of himself in his ugliness, afraid of sin and its perdition reaching to the bottom of his heart and to eternal damnation, afraid of the wrath of God in the holy energy of holy love, and confesses his sin, which he has discovered, before himself, before God and before men. Thus penitent he not only confesses his sins, but he is also another man, he is regarded as such by God, who now remits to him the debt of sin. This is the initial phase of sanctification, which begins with the forgiveness. The reconciliation of sinners is effected through the reconciliation in the bloody sacrificial death of Jesus, so that as the sons of God by grace, through the Son of God by nature, they make experience of the further communication of His grace, and in virtue thereof grow up into heirs of His glory. This was very correctly perceived by Luther: "Here John meets the objection: 'What must I do then? my conscience reproaches me with my many sins, and John says, Confess thy sins. Thereby he confounds all such objections as if conscience says: What must I do to be saved? How shall I set about to grow better? Nothing else, says he, but this: Confess thy sins to Him, and pray Him to pardon thy grievous guilt.'" "This must be the form of confession," says Ebrard, "in order to be inwardly true and efficacious." The mere confessing in abstracto that we have sin, etc. [See above in Exegetical and Critical on v. 9.—M.] The child after the deed and with his deed, which is evil, is a very different child, if he goes and sorrowfully and truthfully confesses his sins to his father. ["I will arise and go to my Father and will say unto Him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called Thy son," etc. Luke xv. 18, 19, compared with vv. 21-24.—M.] It is wholly unwarranted that the Concil. Trident. XIV. c. 5, p. 87, cites this passage along with Luke v. 14; xvii. 14; Jas. v. 14, in proof of auricular confession, that auricularis confitessio and alleges "Dominus noster Jesus Christus, a terra ascensus ad caelos, sacerdotes sui ipsius vicarios reliquit tamquam praesides et iudices, ad quos omnia mortalia crimina deferantur." Likewise à Lapide says: "Quam confessionem exigit Johannes? Haeretici solum, quae fit deo, admittunt; catholici etiam speciale requirunt. Respondeo, Johannem utramque exigere. Generalem pro peccatis levibus, specialem pro gravibus." Equally unwarranted is the inference drawn in favour of purgatory from καθαρίων as if the forgiveness (ἀπέλαι τὰς ἀμαρτίας) took place here and the cleansing from all unrighteousness (καθαρίζειν ἀπὸ τῆς πάσης ἀδικίας) not until hereafter in another state of existence; even the reading καθαρίσει would not warrant such a construction. It is Paul's particular aim to guard his readers against all such false satisfactions and hopes as those in which auricular confession and purgatory entangle men, and pastors and friends also should bear this in mind in private confessions. [See above note on v. 9.—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The truth that we are altogether sinners is very bitter, universal in its application and reaches deep. But those who flatter themselves, and think higher and better of themselves than they really are, lose the truth. If you think any thing of yourself, you ruin yourself. God only knows and is able to make something of man. Without the perception of sin no confession of sin, without confession of sin no forgiveness of sin, without forgiveness of sin no cancelling of sin, ergo without grace no salvation. The denial of our sin and sinfulness will hardly avail with a human judge, but it will ruin us with the Judge Eternal. Without truthfulness and the love of truth you will have no room for God and His word in your heart and lose all susceptibility for them. Be afraid of desiring to know any thing, and especially thy heart, better than God, the Lord.

STARKE:—We must not look for perfect holiness in this world; those who entertain the fancy that they may be or are perfect are like those who walk on stilts or over precipitous cliffs: before they are aware of it they will fall and come to naught. Whoso seeks righteousness in absolute deliverance from sin, will lose it if he has it already, and never get it if he has it not. Confession of sins before God is necessary to the forgiveness of sins; but we cannot merit forgiveness by confession of sins. The confession of sins is here simply adduced as a sign of hearty, contrite repentance; it comprises all these parts and is founded on a thorough knowledge accompanied by a perfect hatred and detestation of sin; but it must take place without all cloaking and concealment, sincerely and from the heart. Moreover it must take place with the heart and with the mouth, first and foremost before God whom we have offended therewith and who, we hope, may forgive it us; but also before men, whom we have either offended or vexed thereby. It is a congenital fault of men to love making themselves innocent by their own efforts [literally "to burn themselves white"—M.]; but let none act the hypocrite to himself; for God has concluded all under sin, and no man living is righteous before him.

SPENER:—Those also who walk in the light, stand in fellowship with God and are cleansed by the blood of Christ, have sins adhering to and remaining in them, from which they still require to be cleansed. If God has forgiven your sins, He will also cleanse you from all unrighteousness: now if you desire the one benefit without striving for or refusing to receive the other, you seek to overturn the righteousness of God and therefore cannot get it; for God has ordered that they must remain together. If the word of God is to be profitable to us, it must be kept and planted within us in order that it may be powerful and efficacious in us.

[Collect for second Sunday in Advent: "Blessed God, who hast caused all holy Scriptures to be written for our learning: grant that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn and inwardly digest them, that, by patience and comfort of thy holy Word, we may embrace and ever hold fast the blessed hope of everlasting life, which Thou hast given us in our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen."—M.]

J. LANGE:—If God daily forgives penitents their sins, how much more ought we to forgive one another's sins; if we have been offended by men and we do not willingly and truly forgive them, neither will God forgive us.

If one thinks himself perfectly holy and pure, he comes short of,

1. Daily renovation;
2. The sense of godly poverty of spirit;
3. The daily prayer for the forgiveness of the sins and transgressions he has committed;
4. Spiritual watchfulness and carefulness;
5. Avoiding what may excite his inward desires and appetites;
6. The right use of the means of grace which are appointed for the furtherance of virtue;
7. The proper regard and daily appropriation of the blood of Christ for cleansing from all unrighteousness;
8. Bounden sympathy with, and compassion on his faulty and erring brethren. Thus he will at last fall from the grace of God into abominable selfishness and spiritual pride; and, unless he turn from the error of his ways, into eternal perdition.

WHISTON:—Although we should like David and Peter fall from fellowship with God, He will, if we humbly and penitently confess those repeated sins and beg for mercy for Christ's sake, forgive them also and cleanse us from all unrighteousness. We must not however boldly go on sinning, but rather shun sin the more.

HEUBNER:—The beginning of all wisdom is to know one's sin. There is a difference between having and doing sin. The first is partly former guilt, partly the remaining bias to sin which misleads us to the commission of many sins of infirmity; the second is living in some master sin, to be wholly the servant of sin. The matter stands thus: God says on every page of His Book: All men, consequently you and I also, are sinners; but man says, I am not a sinner. One or the other therefore must lie. If man denies his sin, he affirms that God has lied in His Word; yea, the whole Christian religion, Christ's coming into the world would become a lie; for He came for the salvation of sinners—and there would be no sinners! Hence pride, self-righteousness is so dangerous, hateful and loathsome to God, because the proud accuse God of lying.

NITZSCH:—I. The warning against the false method of getting acquitted of the burden of our guilt before God. The Apostle warns,

1. Against the false interpretation and depreciation of the law; the precepts, which I have not violated, cannot preserve my righteousness and innocence in the one which I have broken; nor is ignorance of any avail to me, how often I have unconsciously or half-consciously transgressed; more malice may lie concealed in a word than in a deed, and more still in a thought. Knowledge of sin is the only gain we can derive from the law.

2. Against excuses of sin from external or internal circumstances (the world, fate, human nature); we lose more by taking from God what is His, than if we give up all self-praise. Why did you not threaten or entice with God when men threatened or enticed you with the world, and seek to lead those to virtue who wanted to mislead you to vice? and have you always done the good you knew and were able to do? That ignorant sinner remains to be found who has not knowingly transgressed the Divine precepts.

8. Of false satisfactions; for they contain one and all an untrue and unhappy release from the state of guilt.

II. The true way of getting acquitted of our guilt before God:

1. Ask what the confession of our sins is; and,

2. Consider how on the right confession of sin God the True and Righteous will forgive us our sins and cleanse us from all unrighteousness.

The man who confesses his sins in Ps. xxxii., does not make a show of his wickedness, nor regard his transgressions with the fear or carelessness of the natural man, nor say yea to the general situation and complaint, and yet feel his guilt as he feels the regular pulsation of his heart, satisfied with his condition. No, his whole being, thinking, moving and life fully participate in his confession, which insists upon the full act and truth of our separation from sin and the accomplishing of all that to which grace in Christ will lead us. It is full knowledge of sin and of our sin in us; we feel truly the guilt and misery of sin and that sin imperils our life, we confess in despair unto salvation, yet not without faith, but in faith in holy Love. This is the way with the beginning and progress of being cleansed from all unrighteousness.

T. A. WOLF:—Of the true constitution of those who live without the knowledge of sin.

1. Its marks: rude security, tender selfishness, self-contented pride.

2. Its consequences: without the light of the truth, without the consolation of forgiveness, without strength for real amendment.

3. Its end: either dying without the knowledge of sin, partly with fearful presumptuousness, partly with a firm courage that might make us doubt our belief, or attaining to a penitent and sincere knowledge of our sin.

KRUMMACHER:—The throne of grace—1. Is concealed from ignorant or bad self-righteous men; 2. Unveiled—to believers; 3. Left too soon by levity, idleness, or culpable opinionativeness.

FRIEDRICH:—Either God is a liar, or we are altogether sinners. 1. A call to decision as to whether we will believe God's Word in general or not. 2. A call from sleep whether we will continue to yield ourselves to the dream of self-deception or not. 3. A call of the judgment, whether we will seek the grace of the forgiveness of our sins, or be lost forever.

CLAUSS:—The Confession: 1. What it is? 2. What are its effects?

BESSER:—God grant that the truth be written not only in our confessions, but in our hearts!—No sanctification unless its root be forgiveness; and no forgiveness unless its fruit be sanctification.

[STANHOPE:—On v. 2, "That the true purport of this condition be not mistaken, it is fit we remember that nothing is more usual in Scripture than to express a man's duty by some very considerable branch of it. Thus the whole of religion is often implied in the love or the fear of God; and thus confession here, no doubt, denotes not only an acknowledgment of our faults, but all that deep humility and shame, all that afflicting sorrow and self-condemnation, all that resolution against them, all that effectual forsaking them for the future, all that diligence to grow and abound in the contrary virtues and graces, all that entire dependence on the merits and sacrifice of our crucified Redeemer, all that application of His Word and sacraments ordained to convey this cleansing blood to us, which accompany such acknowledgments, when serious and to the purpose, and which are elsewhere represented as constituent parts of repentance and necessary predispositions to forgiveness. In the mean while, as the mention of this singly was sufficient, so was no part of repentance as proper to be mentioned as this; for it was directed to persons vain and absurd enough to suppose themselves void of sin, and thereby evacuating, so far as in them lie, the whole Gospel of Christ; for the Gospel propounds a salvation to all men, to be obtained only by His death,—a death undergone on purpose that it might propitiate for sin, and consequently a death needless to them who had no sin; a death of none effect to any who do not allow the necessity and trust to the virtue of it, for the remission of their own sins; but to all who do, so beneficial that God can as soon renounce His Word, as disappoint their reasonable expectations. His promise is passed, and He is faithful; the Judge of all the earth cannot but do right; His Son has paid the debt, and He is just; He will not therefore require from the principal what the Surety has already discharged. So sure are we to be happy, if we be but sensible how miserable we have made ourselves; so sure to be miserable, if puffed up with vain confidence in our own real impotence, and insensible that to Jesus Christ alone we owe the very possibility of our being happy."]

[BARROW:—"When from ignorance or mistake, from inadvertency, negligence or rashness, from weakness, from wantonness, from presumption we have transgressed our duty and incurred sinful guilt; then, for avoiding the consequent danger and vengeance, for unloading our consciences of the burden and discomfort thereof, with humble confession in our mouths, and serious contrition in our hearts, we should apply ourselves to the God of mercy, deprecating His wrath and imploring pardon from Him, remembering the promise of John: "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."—M.]

CHAPTER II. 1-2.

1. My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man 2 sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: And he<sup>1</sup> is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins<sup>2</sup> of the whole world.

Verse 2. Ἰ καὶ αὐτὸς—ἑστίν. "And He is Himself." Little: "Here the emphatic or exclusive force of αὐτὸς is important. He is the only propitiation for sin. The penitent may trust the Advocate who, righteous Himself, died for him. Such an Advocate God will hear." The emphatic force is retained by Tyndale, Cranmer, Geneva (he it is that); Syr. Latin versions except Castal. (ipse), German (the same); French vs. (c'est lui qui) Bengel (ipse). Hoc facit epistolarum. PARACLETUS valentissimus, quia ipse PROPITIATIO.—Lachmann following A. B. Vulg. places ἑστίν before ἰλασμός.—M.]

[<sup>2</sup> German: "But also for the whole world." Winer, p. 599, specifies this clause as an instance of oratio variata, pointing out that in περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, οὐ περὶ τῶν ἡμετέρων δὲ μόνον ἀλλὰ καὶ περὶ ὅλου τοῦ κόσμου, instead of the last words περὶ τῶν ὅλου τοῦ κόσμου, or instead of the first περὶ ἡμῶν might have been used.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection.—Luther is prepared to call him a theologian who is able to show the consistency and agreement of this passage. He agrees however with Augustine, who says: "Et ne forte impunitatem videretur dedisse peccatis, quia dixit: fidelis est et justus, qui mundet nos ab omni iniquitate, et dicerent jam sibi homines: peccemus, securi faciamus, quod volumus, purgat nos Christus,—tollit tibi malam securitatem et inserit utilem timorem. Male vis esse securus, sollicitus esto; fidelis enim est et justus, ut dimittat nobis delicta nostra, si semper tibi displiceas et mueris, donec perficiaris. Ideo quod sequitur? filioli.—Sed forte surrepit de vita humana peccatum. Quid ergo fiet? Jam desperatio erit? Audi. Si quis, inquit, peccaverit, etc." So Bede, Calvin, Calov, Dusterdieck. [Alford thinks that there is more in the connection than this: "It is not corrective only of a possible mistake, but it is progressive—a further step taken in the direction of unfolding the great theme of this part of the Epistle, enounced in ch. i. 5. The first step for those walking in the light of God was, that they should confess their sins: the next and consequent one, that they should forsake them, and agreeably to their new nature, keep His commandments. This verse introduces that further unfolding of our subject, which is continued, and especially pressed as regards the one great commandment of love, in our vv. 8-11."—M.] The difficulty lies not so much in the sequence of ideas as in the ethical relation and agreement of the points under consideration, viz.: the grace of God and reconciliation through Christ, the universality and power of sin and man's wrestling with it. On the one hand, the aid of God and Christ must neither make us disheartened in the struggle with sin, nor render us confident that we are sure to have it, and, on the other, the power of sin must not terrify us as if all were in vain.

VER. 1a. Call to the contest. My little children.—Thus "tum propter etatem tuam, tum propter paternam curam et affectum" (Horne-jus), and because he was their spiritual father (Gal. iv. 9), and as John called out to the lapsed youth (Euseb. H. E. III, 23); τί με πέτρεις, τέκνον, τὸν σαρροῦ πατέρα; Lorinus ("Diminutiva nomina teneri ac blandientis sunt amoris signa"). So Ch. ii. 12, 28; iii. 18; iv. 4; v. 21, only μου is certain, but in ch. iii. 18, it is uncertain. Here, just in view of the danger, the most tender and heartfelt love is awake.

These things write I.—The Plural ταῦτα (not τοῦτο), has respect, not to a particular point, but to the whole in its vital harmony. We should be eager for the contest with sin, because God is light; because walking in the light is the preservative of our fellowship with God, and the means of deriving the benefits of the blood of Christ; because we must not deny having sin, and because God will gladly rid us of it.

That ye sin not.—This is the design of his writing. Sinning applies to particular sins, not to small faults and inadvertencies only which would properly be no sins; they might gradually fall even into mortal sin (ch. v. 16). It is neither = peccatis manere (Socinus, Episcopus), still less = to continue unbaptized (Löffler).

VER. 1b. The aid. And if any man sin [better: and if any one sin.—M.].—Not an antithesis (Vulg. δὲ), but simple copulation (καὶ); since even in zeal against sin there ever recurs the indubitable case of sinning (ἐάν τις cf. the note on ch. i. 6). [ἐάν simply admits the possibility of sinning.—M.]. Both fighting against sin and sinning, go always together. The reference is general, and hence the apostle continues in the Plural. But the apostle does not affirm an inward necessity, that it must be so, as Calvin supposes: nam fieri non potest, quin peccemus; it may be so in fact, but the conditional particle must not be turned into a causal. Socinus also disfigures the thought; "si quis peccat, i. e., post Christum agnitum, et professionem nominis ipsius adhuc in peccatis manet, necdum respicit." The note of time and the intensification of the thought, are purely arbitrary; "for, on the one hand, a true Christian may sin, but he cannot remain in sins, and on the other, to one remaining in sins Christ is not the παράκλητος" (Huther). "If any one sin—not with the wilfulness of sin, but in spite of the will of his mind, which says no when sin is present." (Besser).

We have an advocate with the Father.—On παράκλητος see Lange on John xiv. 16, Vol. IV. p. 311 sq. [German edition.—M.]. The word has here undoubtedly a Passive sense, viz.: advocatus, orator, causæ patronus (Luther, Vormund), intercessor. Its application to Christ, although its application in the Gospel, is limited to the Holy Spirit (Jno. xiv. 16, 26; xv. 26; xvi. 7), is anticipated in the first of these passages by the words ἄλλος παράκλητος; Christ is also Paraclete, the Holy Ghost only another Paraclete; this is clear from the context. ["Christ is the real παράκλητος, the Holy Ghost His substitute" Huther.—M.]. Here Christ is παράκλητος πρὸς τὸν πατέρα (cf. on ch. i. 2), there the Holy Ghost is μετ' ὑμῶν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. The Holy Ghost carries on the work of Christ in His followers, the world with its threatenings notwithstanding, but Christ pleads the cause of His followers before God the Father, interceding for them with Him, even as Heb. iv. 14-16; vii. 25-28; 8, 1sq.; Col. ix. 24, relate to a transaction between the Father and the Son. The ὑπερευχόμενος of the Holy Ghost, Rom. viii. 26, is a different matter, and does not affect the difference marked by John. The apostle says Father, not God, because the new relation into which those who are reconciled through Christ have been translated, is assumed as already existing; hence not only because the Son intercedes with Him, but because He intercedes for believers who, through Him, have become τέκνα τοῦ Θεοῦ (ch. iii. 1, 2). The activity of the Paraclete is ἐντυγχάνειν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν (Rom. viii. 34; Heb. vii. 25).—Ἐχομεν indicates two things. 1. The Plural, as in ch. 1, 6 sqq., denotes the general character of the intercession and the universal want of Christians of such an intercessor. Augustine's note is capital: "Non dixit: habetis, nec: me habetis dixit, sed et Christum posuit, non se, et habemus dixit, non habetis. Maluit se ponere in numero peccatorum, ut haberet advocatum Christum, quam ponere se pro Christo, advocatum et inveniri inter damnandos superbos." [The same Father says in the same connection after the words cited at the head of this section under Connection: "Ille est ergo advocatus: da operam tu ne pecces: si de infirmitate vitæ subreperit peccatum, continuo vide, continuo displiceat, continuo damna; et cum damnaveris, securus ad judicem venies. Ibi habes Advocatum: noli timere ne perdas causam confessionis tue. Si enim aliquando in hac vita committet se homo disertæ linguæ et non perit: committit se verbo et periturus est?"—M.]. 2. The Present indicates that the intercession is continued and permanent in its operation.

Jesus Christ the Righteous.—Δίκαιος is evidently put in antithesis to the still sinning children of God, and is not—ἀγίος, innocens et sanctus (a Lapidé), but His sinlessness and holiness as manifested in His life, "righteous, unblemished and sinless" (Luther). While the sense of bonus, lenis suggested by Grotius is too weak here, as also in ch. i. 9, that given by Ebrard—δικαιῶν, says too much, and is incorrect, because it is not the province of the intercessor to δικαιῶν, and that of Bede, who says, "justus advocatus, injustas causas non suscipit," is equally inadmissible, because δίκαιος is not the adjective belonging to παράκλητον. Nor can it be taken in the sense of "fidelis et verax" (Socinus), like πιστός ch. i. 9. It corresponds exactly with the description of the interceding High-priest, Heb. vii. 26; cf. 1 Pet. iii. 18. Moreover here, where we have neither χριστὸν alone, nor υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, but χριστὸν, preceded by Ἰησοῦν, with emphatic force, the reference is not to the λόγος σαρκος, but to the λόγος ἐνανθρωπος, who has shed His blood (ch. i. 7). For both in Heb. vii. 25 sqq.; iv. 14 sqq., and Rom. viii. 34, the intercession of Christ is connected with His suffering on the Cross, as part of His high-priestly work and office. If Grotius supplies, and on the strength of ch. v. 16; Gal. vi. 1; 2 Cor. ii. 6, puts after ἐάν τις ἁμαρτή "Et se ecclesiam regendam sanandamque tradiderit" remarking, "non dicit: habet ille advocatum, sed ecclesia habet, quæ pro lapsis precatur," and "preces ecclesie Christus more advocati deo patri commendat," (Jno. xvi. 26), it is not a Spiritu Sancto, sed a Grotiana audacia, as Calov expresses himself. The Plural ἔχομεν does not involve the idea of the Church, but designates rather every individual, even the most advanced Christian, for every one is the object of our holy Saviour's intercession. And this very thing is the comfortable help vouchsafed to those who fight against sin.—All this shows that Christ, who died for us and is now at the right hand of the Father, is our Advocate pleading the cause of every Christian with the Father, provided that, clearly and profoundly conscious of his guilt, he appear before God as a penitent, and fight manfully against the sin in his heart. Christ, as the Sinless and Righteous One, lays before the Father the supplication of the penitent sinner, supported by His intercession, and as He has died for him on the cross, as He has wooed and drawn him to Himself to walk in light, so He desires to preserve him therein, and to aid him towards the attainment of sanctification, in the continued activity of an advocate in glory, even as He did intercede for His followers in the days of His humiliation (Jno. xvii. 9; Luke xxii. 32; xxiii. 34).

VER. 2. The assurance. And He is the Propitiation for our sins.—Καί is here the simple copula, which adds a further particular, and, therefore, neither—quia (a Lapidé), nor—nam (Beza). This particular relates to the Person of the Intercessor (καὶ αὐτός—et ipse, idemque) and is of perpetual validity and operation (ἐστίν), like and parallel to the preceding ἔχομεν παράκλητον. The word λασμός occurs only here and in ch. iv. 10, and there also connected with περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν. The verb λάσκεισθαι is also found in a Passive sense, Luke xviii. 18: λάσθητί μοι τὸ ἁμαρτωλόν, where the reflexive sense is not wholly quiescent; be (become thou) mercifully disposed, suffer thyself to be mercifully disposed, it is consequently λατὼν γενέσθαι, propitium fieri. Or with the obliteration of the reflexive force peculiar to the Middle, it has an Active sense, e. g., Heb. ii. 17: λάσκεισθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας τοῦ λαοῦ, to atone, expiate for the sins of the people, expiare. In classical Greek λάσκεισθαι denotes only propitium facere aliquem, indicating the attempt of the pagan sacrifices to reconcile God. In Holy Scripture, and especially in the New Testament, God is not reconciled by us, but reconciles, as we learn from the instructive passage, 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, cf. Col. i. 20; Eph. ii. 16. Man is καταλλάγεις, God only καταλλάξας, ἀποκαταλλάξας ἐαυτὸν, εἰς αὐτόν. In Clement Rom. we find already ἐξλάσκεισθαι τὸν Θεόν, but it does not occur in a canonical writing. The Socinians have not overlooked this. Schlichting says: "Non est ergo cur quipiam ex his placandi voce concludat, deum a Christo nobis fuisse placatum" (see Delitzsch, Note on Heb., p. 97). The same view is very distinctly contained in our parallel passage, ch. iv. 10: αὐτὸς ἡγάγησεν ἡμᾶς καὶ ἀπέστειλεν τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ ἱλασθῆναι περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, God the Father has constituted the propitiation by sending therefor His Son. He Himself is the propitiation, which comprises the High-priest and the sacrifice. For according to Kühner 1, §. 378, p. 418, ἱλασμός denotes "the intransitive relation of the stem verb." It is, therefore, neither=ἱλαστήρ (Grotius, al.), for He is also the propitiatory sacrifice, nor=ἱλαστήριον (Bengel, Lücke, de Wette al.), for He is the Agent accomplishing the propitiation (or expiation). As He is the Light of the world, the Truth, the Life, the Way in Himself, and not only has, shows or brings it, so He is Himself the Propitiation; it is "really existing in His Person" (Düsterdieck); He is "not the Reconciler or Propitiator through something external to Him, but through Himself" (Lücke). Thus He is called our ἀγιασμός, 1 Cor. i. 30; cf. 2 Cor. v. 21.—Nor is He ἱλασμός Θεοῦ, but περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν. The sins are the points with which the propitiation is concerned, to which it has reference (περὶ); neither substitution is mentioned here, nor the manner and means how this propitiation is accomplished and brought about. John evidently designates church-members by ἡμῶν (fidelium, as Bengel explains the word); he writes to Christians, not to Jews. The sequel also simply contrasts Christians and non-Christians. Bengel justly observes with reference to ch. v. 19: "quam late patet peccatum, tam late propitiatio." On that account the apostle adds:

Yet not for ours only, but also for the whole world.—Here is simply oratio variata. He might have said: ἀλλὰ καὶ περὶ τῶν ὅλων τοῦ κόσμου, joining what precedes with ἁμαρτιῶν, or connecting before with ἱλασμός, οὐ περὶ ἡμῶν δὲ μόνον, which would answer to the conclusion as it stands. See Winer p. 599; [also Appar. Crit. v. 2, 2.—M.]. A similar variation is found Heb. ix. 7. The point is, therefore, not breviloquence (Ebrard), nor the supplying of τῶν (Grotius, de Wette, Düsterdieck). Nor was it because of the evil inhering in the κόσμος, since it is equally applicable to Christians (contrary to Luther). The Apostle's design was manifestly to show the universality of the propitiation, in the most emphatic manner, and without any exception. This renders any and every limitation inadmissible. We must not except with Calvin the reprobos, because of predestination; it is rather the double decretum absolutum which is here excluded. Neither is it admissible to take κόσμος as ecclesia electorum per totum mundum dispersa (as Bede does), nor to explain it of the heathen only (Occumenius, Cyrillus, Horneus, Semler, Rickli). In like manner we must not think only of the apostle's age, but rather of the totality of unbelieving mankind in general (Spener, Paulus, de Wette, Lücke, Sander, Neander, Düsterdieck, Luther). As in ch. i. 7, the work of Christ extends to all the sins of His people, so it extends here to the sin of the whole world, without distinguishing between contemporaneous and successive generations (Baumgarten-Crusius), or finding here any reference to the difference between sufficientia and efficacia. This renders it also perfectly clear that while Christ is the Paraclete of believing penitent Christians only, His propitiation has respect to, and is sufficient for all men in general. The idea of παράκλητος is, therefore, not wider than and including ἱλασμός, as Bede supposes ["advocatum habemus apud patrem qui interpellat pro nobis et propitium eum ac placatum peccatis nostris reddit."—M.]; or, vice versa, ἱλασμός is not the wider idea including παράκλητος (de Wette, Rickli, Frommann); the two ideas are rather coördinate, yet so that παράκλητος pre-supposes ἱλασμός; Christ has made a propitiation sufficient for all men. He is Himself the propitiation, and would fain appear before the Father as the Paraclete of all men. There are two different parts of the Redeemer's work, each having its real mode of action and effect, but of course in an ethical life-sphere.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The frontiers of Christianity.

Systems which, like Pelagianism, do not acknowledge the necessity (ἐάν τις ἁμάρτη) or like Manichaeism with its fundamental dualism, deny the possibility (ὡς μὴ ἁμάρτη) of redemption, if the question bears on the objects of redemption, and systems which, like Ebionism, deny the Divinity (δικαίων), or in the opposite case, like Docetism, the humanity (Ἰησοῦν) of the Redeemer, if the question bears on the subject of redemption; such systems are wholly foreign to Christianity.

2. Of Christ.

a. Sinlessness and holiness is the fundamental trait of His Being. He requires neither an expiation nor the help of an advocate, but He makes the one and accords the other.

b. His work on earth is indicated by His being ἱλασμός περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν—καὶ ὅλων τοῦ κόσμου. This implies, a. As He is δίκαιος, and according to 1 Cor. i. 30: σοφία—δικαιοσύνη τε καὶ ἀγιασμός καὶ ἀπολύτρωσις, so He is Himself, so there is existing in Him, also ἱλασμός; and beside Him and without Him there is no propitiation for our sins.

β. As He only is δίκαιος, and all men ἄδικοι, so it is He only who has made and does make a propitiation for all men; this affirms the universality of the only ἱλασμός.

γ. The atonement extant relates to the sins which violate the majesty of God, disturb the holiness of the order of His Kingdom, and are the products of an enmity to the Glorious One, so that they arouse the reaction of the ὀργή; and therefore, as distinguished from καταλλαγή, reconciliation which bears on sinners and creates a disposition, reconciliatio, ἱλασμός is to be taken in the sense of atonement, propitiation [or expiation] expiatio, and as regulating a disturbed relationship. Expiatio renders quiescent the ὀργή τοῦ Θεοῦ, whereas reconciliation allays the enmity of man in his ἀμαρτία, cf. Nitzsch, System § 135.

δ. The effect of the ἱλασμός is that he, whose sins are expiated, ceases to belong to the κόσμος, but not irresistibly, nor by a physical process, but only as a real beginning and supporting foundation, on which we must take our stand, and progress, in order that the καταλλαγὴ may ensue, and that we may become partakers thereof; in our ethical demeanor we must do our part whenever occasion and aid are afforded us, otherwise we shall lose the ground of salvation, the beginning of blessedness, and the receptivity for the same. But our passage is silent as to the manner how it is done; even the αἴμα (ch. i. 7) is tacitly pre-supposed. Nor may an inference respecting substitution be drawn from this passage, as Nitzsch (System, p. 284) has done.

γ. Christ is and remains the ἰλαστήριος—both for all sins and the sins of all, and for all ages and generations; His atonement is permanent in its operativeness. Not only in a general way, but the individual, every individual, is the object of expiation and reconciliation. This passage teaches the predestination of the salvation of all men.

δ. His work in heaven is indicated by παράκλητος πρὸς τὸν πατέρα; which imports, α. That it concerns a work after His entrance into His original glory, consequently that which the glorified Redeemer does for us in heaven; He is not only a historical person and power, whose influence is felt for centuries, like Luther and his reformation, and the Greeks with their civilization, but He is an ever living person above, and at the same time in the world's history.

β. Jesus, the Christ, is consequently the Paraclete, not only as to His Divine, or as to His human nature, but in His Divine-human person in its glory with the Father.

γ. This work concerns our need of help remaining after our expiation and reconciliation effected by Him on earth, which need of help consists in our repeated sinning anew, and the consequent peril threatening anew our filial relation to God the Father effected by him; He desires "to cancel again the effects of our sins on our relation to God," (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis 11, 1, p. 545), on the object of this work, are "believers still sinning in their walk in the light" (Huther), and that without any exception.

δ. This work of the exalted Redeemer is an intercession for Christians belonging to Him in faith; it is a real work of the Lord, since He not only silently waits for the effects of His reconciliation, but is actively engaged in pressing His merit with the Father, and that, as a vocalis et oralis intercessio. Our passage excludes all the intercessions of Romanism, those of the Virgin Mary, and of all the saints, who, as well as St. John, stand in need of intercession. See Conf. Aug. XXI., Apol. XXI. 10, sqq. For the saints are not deprecatores, still less propitiatores, ut orent, non tamen invocandi. It also dismisses the "grossly sensuous view" combated by Calvin when he says: "nimis crasse errare eos, qui patris genibus Christum adolunt, ut pro nobis oret;" the intercessio is not humilis. But it is equally false to regard it as only symbolical, as nuda interpretiva (per ostensa merita), as Bede does, or only as the continuing effect of the work of redemption consummated by Christ in His death (Baumgarten-Crusius). Unfounded is the view of Köstlin (Lehrbegriff, pp. 81, 192), who understands παράκλητος to denote the eternal High-priest, who does not pray, but, as the Father for His sake loves also those who believe in Him, directly excludes intercession, because Jno. xvi. 26 expressly deprecates ἐπαύρις πρὸς τὸν πατέρα πρὸς ἑμὲν. The intercession of the Paraclete, which contemplates the perfection of believers and their preservation in the Sonship, must be well distinguished from the asking intercession of the High-priest, which contemplates the acceptance of the Sonship, cf., Lange on John xvi. 26, Vol. 4, p. 343, n. 16. [German edition, M.]

8. Of Christians.

a. Sinfulness continues even in the most advanced Christians, and manifests itself in the constant recurrence of particular sins.

b. The warfare against sin, however, is earnestly insisted upon. John does not say whether it is possible to a believer not to sin; nor does he say that he must sin (Calvin: "nam fieri non potest, quin peccemus"), but demands that Christians should strive not to commit sin. The Apostle's love of the Church (τεκνία μου) constrains him to charge them not to sin, because those who sin not, keep themselves, (τηρεῖ ἑαυτὸν, ch. 5, 18) preserve their sonship with God and their regeneration (ch. iii, 6, 9). He views sin as man's ruin and ungodliness.

c. The Christian requires no other human mediator, or priest; he has become spiritual himself, and no longer secular, himself a priest and not a layman. These antitheses vanish to those who live in faith in Christ the Redeemer, do every thing through Him and for His sake, and refer every thing to Him.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Sin should not be denied, but fought and conquered. Seek with Jesus the Sinless One for true humility in the knowledge of thy sin, and thou wilt find with Him the right courage to overcome thy sin. As thy perception of sin grows more keen, thy sensibility even of the most secret and most trifling sin more acute and delicate, thy sorrow for sin more profound, thy struggle with it more desperate, so thy perception of the Saviour's life and work will also grow more keen, thy hearing of God's still small voice more acute, thy joy over the cleansing power of His word and work more profound, the Lord's victory over thee and thy triumph with Him more certain. Although a man sanctify himself, he still sins. It is Jesus Christ, the Righteous, in His glory, who prays for the fallen, for an unrighteous world, that cannot forgive and forget any thing that judges and condemns. The demand not to sin is not devoid of consolation, if we do sin; but he only that strives to satisfy the demand will be satisfied with the consolation. Never forget that Christ has expiated sin, and that He had to expiate it, and thou wilt take a serious view of sin.

AUGUSTINE:—"Ibi habes advocatum, noli timere, ne perdas causam confessionis tue. Si enim aliquando in hac vita committit se homo disertis linguis et non perit, committit te verbo et periturus est?"

LUTHER:—The righteousness of Jesus Christ is on our side; for the righteousness of God is ours in Jesus Christ.—It is a certain fact, that thou art a part of the world: lest perchance thy heart might deceive thee and say: "The Lord died for Peter and Paul—not for me!"

STARKE:—Teachers should deal with their hearers as a father deals with his children; but then the hearers should so demean themselves that such a course is possible.—Whoso serves the Church of Christ with his writings, should examine himself as to the motive which prompts him; if he does unite with the motive of ambition or covetousness, it is sin to him; but if his motive is really and truly the glory of God, and he desires to make his gifts useful to men, it is well-pleasing to God.—Blessed consolation! Christ is our advocate and spokesman, who has taken our cause in hand! Rejoice, ye tempted ones! there is no danger. Our Saviour claims His right.—

HEUBNER:—The Christian promises of grace are holy and not designed to abet idleness; they are not given to careless and hardened sinners, but to sorrow-stricken, contrite and penitent sinners.—Here is expressly taught Christ's intercession for His people. It is of infinite value before God, because it is the intercession of the Righteous, of the perfectly Holy One, who may dare to intercede with God.

[CRANMER, ABP.:—"Christ was such an High Bishop, that He, once offering Himself, was sufficient by one effusion of His blood to abolish sin unto the world's end. He was so perfect a Priest, that by one oblation He purged an infinite heap of sins, leaving an easy and ready remedy for all sinners, that His one sacrifice should suffice unto all men that would not show themselves unworthy, and He took unto Himself not only their sins, that many years before were dead and put their trust in Him, but also the sins of those, that until His coming again, should truly believe His gospel. So that now we may look for none other Priest or sacrifice to take away our sins, but only Him and His sacrifice. And as He dying once was offered for all, so, as much as pertained to Him, He took all men's sins unto Himself."—M.]

[CHURCH HOMILIES:—"All men are God's creation and image, and are redeemed by Christ."—M.]

[BEVERIDGE:—"If any man's sins be not pardoned—it is not for want of sufficiency in Christ's sufferings, but by reason of his own obstinacy or negligence in not performing the conditions required for applying the sufferings of the human nature in Christ unto his own particular person. For seeing that that death, which was threatened to all mankind in the first Adam, was undergone by the whole nature of man in the second; hence all particular persons comprehended under that general nature, are capable of receiving the benefit of those sufferings, if they will but apply them rightly to themselves."—M.]

[BARROW:—"The whole world is here mentioned in contradistinction from all Christians to whom St. John speaketh in this place: that the whole world of which he says below, that it 'lieth in wickedness.' Ch. 5, 19. In this and in various other places, where Jesus is called the Saviour of the world, that the world, according to its ordinary acceptation, and as every man would take it at first hearing, doth signify the whole community of mankind, comprehending men of all sorts and qualities, good and bad, believers and infidels; not, in a new unusual sense, any special restrained world of some persons, particularly regarded or qualified, will, I suppose, easily appear to him, who shall, without prejudice or partiality, attend to the common use thereof in Scripture, especially in St. John, who most frequently applyeth it as to this, so to other cases or matters."—M.]

[NEANDER:—"What now is the practical significance of this truth, that Christ, the Holy, is our ever-abiding Advocate with the Father? To this perpetual mediation through the living Christ, to His ever-abiding priesthood for those who are reconciled to God through Him, corresponds the ever-remaining need of mediation in believers, their constant dependence upon the priesthood of Christ, in union with whom they are a generation consecrated to God. Under every feeling of sin and infirmity, in all their temptations and conflicts, they may securely trust in their indissoluble union with this Divine human Personage, who Himself has felt all their necessities, and is near to them in the intimate sympathy of perfect love. Moreover, their whole inward and outward Christian life, flowing as it does from this sense of continual need of redemption, will take its character from this ever-continuing mediation of Christ, and their own conscious connection therewith."—M.]

5. Mark of the walk in the light. Obedience to the commandments of God, especially brotherly love.

CHAPTER II. 3-11.

3 And hereby we<sup>1</sup> do know that we know<sup>2</sup> him, if we keep<sup>3</sup> his commandments.
4 He that saith,<sup>4</sup> I know<sup>5</sup> him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the

- 5 truth is not in him. But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God
 6 perfected<sup>8</sup>: hereby know we that we are in him. He that saith he abideth in him
 7 ought himself also so<sup>7</sup> to walk, even as he walked. Brethren,<sup>8</sup> I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning.<sup>9</sup>
 8 The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.<sup>9</sup>
 9 Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in 10 you;<sup>10</sup> because the darkness is past,<sup>11</sup> and the true light now shineth. He that saith 11 he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in<sup>12</sup> darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him.<sup>13</sup> But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that<sup>14</sup> darkness hath blinded his eyes.

Verse 3. [<sup>1</sup> German: "And hereby we know;" the emphatic do know in E. V. suggests an idea foreign from the text.—M.]

[<sup>2</sup> German: "That we have known him." Lillie: "Have attained to this knowledge." Where knowledge is spoken of merely as present, γινώσκω, or οἶδα is used, not ἐγνώκα. See John's epistles passim.—E. V. vv. 13, 14; ch. iii. 6; iv. 16; 2 John i., and generally elsewhere.—M.]

<sup>3</sup> Cod. Sin. has φησὶ ἀξίωμεν for τηρῶμεν; which is, however, given as well. The future by no means suits the Apostle's thought.

Verse 4. <sup>4</sup> A. B. Cod. Sin. al. insert ὅτι before ἐγνώκα. John usually employs the oratio indirecta with the inf., as in vv. 6, 9; ch. i. 6, or temp. fin. with ὅτι, as in ch. i. 8, 10. The oratio directa with ὅτι occurs only in one other place, ch. iv. 20. It is difficult to understand why ὅτι should have been introduced here from there. [Rather: ὅτι was possibly omitted by later transcribers, on account of the difficulty it presented.—M.]

Verse 5. [<sup>6</sup> German: "In such an one the love of God is truly perfected." Lillie: "Truly in this man hath the love of God been perfected."—M.]

Verse 6. [<sup>7</sup> C. Cod. Sin. insert οὕτως before περὶ παραστῆν. There is no reason why it should be inserted, although it might have seemed superfluous to some. [It is wanting in A. B. Vulg.—M.] It renders the thought very emphatic.

Verse 7. [<sup>8</sup> German: "Beloved" M.] ἀδελφοί, Oecum, Mill, Wetstein, is weakly supported; ἀγαπητοί is manifestly the correct reading [A. B. C. Cod. Sin. Syr. Vulg. Griesb. Bengel, al. sustain it.—M.]

Verse 8. <sup>10</sup> ὁ μὲν, B. C. Cod. Sin., although the more difficult reading, is better authenticated than ὁ μὲν (A.)

<sup>11</sup> σκοτία instead of σκορία lacks the weight of authority, and is clear as to its tendency or origin from the contrast between the economy of the Old and New Testaments.

[German: "Passeth away," ἀπαύεται. The Present should by all means be retained. German: already, ἤδη, better than now.—M.]

Verse 9. [<sup>12</sup> German: "The darkness," ἡ σκορία, both here and below in v. 11. The omission of the Article in E. V. obscures the sense.—M.]

Verse 10. [<sup>13</sup> German: "An offence" or "stumbling-block is not in him."—M.]

Verse 11. [<sup>14</sup> German: "The darkness;" "because that darkness" (E. V.) is perplexing and ambiguous, better retain the more correct rendering, "because the darkness," ὅτι ἡ σκορία. German: "where he goeth to."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Connection. The call to the contest with sin on the ground of the Saviour's antecedent propitiation and lasting intercession is connected with this section of the mark of the true knowledge of and fellowship with God, as that of vital Christianity: see whether thou really art the object of the intercession of the Sinless One with Him who is Light! The malis securitas and the utilis timor move the Apostle to set this section with the given marks of a true Christian into close connection with the immediately preceding section of the atonement for the sins of the whole world, and namely, as a link in the chain of thoughts depending on v. 5: "That God is Light." His object is to excite a salutary, moral seriousness of purpose in his readers; their obedience to the commandments of God, and especially their practice of brotherly love are given to them as tokens by which they may determine whether they are really in God's kingdom of grace. He warns, therefore, "against the false security of a show-Christianity," and guards his churches "against false confidence and carnal security" (Neander); similar are the views of the greater number of commentators, from Episcopius and Calov down to Düsterdieck, who, however, confines himself to pointing out the dependence of this section also on the leading thought in ch. i. 5, 6, while the former take too narrow views of the connection with ch. ii. 1, 2. The copula and denotes the close connection and appurtenance of the sequel to the preceding section. Hence it is not correct to make here the beginning of a new section, (Sander: "Having thus far spoken of the proofs of salvation, he now proceeds to exhort his readers to its preservation"), or to connect with ch. i. 5, 6 (Huther).

Obedience to the commandments of God is the general characteristic of true Christianity. (v. v. 2-8).

VER. 8. And hereby we know.—John uses ἐν τοῦτω in order to refer to the sequel, as here, ch. iii. 16, 19, 24; iv. 9, 10, 13, 17; v. 2, or to the preceding, as in v. 5: iii. 10; the reference is generally plain from the context. In the former case the Apostle is wont to indicate the mark whereby we know, by the addition of the preposition ἐκ (iv. 13), or by δι (ch. iii. 16, 19; iv. 9, 10), or ὡς (ch. iv. 17), or ἐάν (vv. 8, 5), or ὅταν (ch. v. 2), according as he wants to supply either "a really existing, historically given and objectively sure token" (Düsterdieck), on one only ideally existing and described as possible or conditional. The Apostle, who lays a strong emphasis on knowing, understands to express in writing the different shades of thought with the same nicety and correctness. ["John uses the formula ἐν τοῦτω γινώσκουμεν first as referring the demonstrative pronoun back to what has gone before, as e. g. in our v. 5, and in ch. iii. 10. If, however, the demonstrative pronoun in this or a like formula, looks onward, and the token itself, with the cirumstance of which it is a token, follows, he expresses this token variously and significantly, according to the various shades of meaning to be conveyed. Sometimes the token implied in the demonstrative, follows in a separate sentence, as in ch. iv. 2; sometimes the construction is slightly changed, and the sentence begun with ἐν τούτῳ is not regularly brought to a close, but continued in a new and correlative form; e. g. ch. iii. 24, where ἐν τούτῳ γνωσάμεν is taken up by ἐκ τοῦ πν. And this way of expression is closely parallel to that where ὅτι completes the construction begun with ἐν τούτῳ. So ch. iii. 16, 19; iv. 9, 10, 18. In these cases the full objective reality of the token, as a fact, is set forth. It is an undoubted fact that He has given us of His Spirit, that He has sent His Son: and from these facts our inference is secure to the other facts in question, that He abideth in us, etc. But in other passages we find instead of this ὅτι an ὅτι, ch. iv. 17, or an ὅτι, as here, John xiii. 85, or ὅτι, ch. v. 2. This ὅτι, ὅτι, mark the token implied in ἐν τούτῳ as one not actually existent, an historical or objectively certain fact; but as a possible contingency, something hypothetically and conditionally assumed: in other words as ideal." Düsterdieck, pp. 172, sq.—M.] He is concerned with the fact,
